American Political Science Association

American Political Science Review

Volume 96 | Number I | March 2002

INSIDE THIS ISSUE:
NOTES FROM THE, (NEW) EDITOR
	A STATE OF THE STA
ARTICLES ·
<ul> <li>Theories of War in an Era of Leading F</li> </ul>	Power Peace
Robert Jervis
Dictatorial Peace?	15
Mark Peceny and Caroline C. Be On the Vote Purchasing Behavior of in
Matz Dahlberg and Eva Johanns	sources and Growth in Young Adulthood 41
Becoming a Habitual Votersine Habitual	Sources and Growth in Young Adulthood 4.
Eric Plutzer
• The Social Calculus of Wotings Interper	sonal, imegia and Organizational Influences on Presi	Gential Choices
Paul Allen Beck, Russell J. Dalto	dential Choices 57  on, Steven Greene, and Robert Huckfeldt  rime Racial Attitudes During Campaigns 75
• Cues that Matter How Political Ads P	Hutchings: and Ismail K. White
Sexiles and War: How Soft News E	Prince Forma Palicy to the
• Sex Lies and War. How Soil News L	191
inartennve Public LiWatthew A. Baum
Cose Cutting Social Notworks: Tostin	g Democratic Theory in Practice
Diana Mutz	g Deligot dela signical y III Teledica
©ut of Step, Out of Office: Electoral A	\\ and House Members' Voting	127
Brandice Canes-Wrone, David V	V Brady and John F. Cogan
• Coordination and Policy Moderation a	t Midreini 141
Walter R. Mebane, Jr., and Jasje	eet SZSekhoń:
Watter in medane, on, and one,
FORUM .
Political Regimes and International Tra	ade: The Democratic Difference Revisited 159
Xinxuan Dai
Replication, Realism, and Robustness	: Analyzing Political
Regimes and Intérnational Trade	10/
Édward D. Mansfield, Helen V. I	Milner, and B. Peter Rosendorff
BOOK REWEWS
Political Theory
American Politics	201
<ul> <li>Comparative Politics</li> </ul>	223
• International Relations	254

EDITOR

Lee Sigelman
Department of Political Science
The George Washington University
Washington, DC 20052

BOOK REVIEW EDITORS

Susan Bickford
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

Gregory E. McAvoy
University of North Carolina at Greensboro

EDITORIAL BOARD

Martha Ackelsberg Smith College Kathleen Bawne University of California, Los Angeles Janet Box-Steffensmeier The Ohio State University Cathy Cohen University of Chicago/ Yale University Timothy Cook Louisiana State University/ Williams College Neta Crawford University of Massachusetts, Amherst Ivor Crewe University of Essex Darren Davis Michigan State University Jon Elster Columbia University Diana Evans Trinity College Steven Finkel University of Virginia Robert Goodin Australian National University Ruth Grant Duke University Peter Hall Harvard University Richard Hermann The Ohio State University

Rodney Hero University of Notre Dame James Johnson University of Rochester Jane Junn Rutgers University Kim Fridkin Kahn Arizona State University George Klosko University of Virginia Arthur Lupia University of Michigan Forrest Maltzman The George Washington University Edward Mansfield University of Pennsylvania Kenneth Mayer University of Wisconsin Kirstie McClure University of California, Los Angeles Kenneth Meier Texas A&M University C. Morrison University of Missouri James Morrow University of Michigan Rebecca Morton New York University Robert Price University of California, Berkeley Thomas Remington Emory University

M. Elizabeth Sanders Cornell University Kathryn-Sikkink University of Minnesota Beth Simmons University of California, Berkeley Jack Snyder Columbia University Janice Gross Stein University of Toronto Robert Stein Rice University Sven Steinmo University of Colorado Shannon Stimson University of California, Berkeley Leslie Paul Thiele University of Florida Clyde Wilcox Georgetown University John Wright The Ohio State University Bernard Yack University of Wisconsin Langche Zeng The George Washington University

EDITORIAL STAFF

Elizabeth Cook
Assistant Editor

John A. Donaldson Jason MacDonald Tricia Mulligan Editorial Assistants Elizabeth K. Markovits Maria Murray Riemann Carisa R. Showden Assistants to the Book Review Editors

The American Political Science Review (ISSN-0003-0554) appears quarterly. It is published by the American Political Science Association, 1527 New Hampshire Ave., N.W., Washington, DC 20036, and sent to all members. Dues: Regular members with gross calendar income: under $40,000, $72; $40,000-$49,999, $106; $50,000-$59,999, $124; $60,000-$79,999, $134; $80,000-$99,999, $149; $100,000 or higher, $174; students (7-year limit), high school faculty, community college faculty, unemployed members (2-year limit), $34; retired: income under $25,000, $29; $25,000 and higher, $49; life members, $3,000; institutional members: domestic (U.S.) institutions, $365, international institutions, $390 (includes air mail). Dues allocated for a subscription to the APSR: $25 for individual members; $204 for institutional members. Changes of address sent to Membership Services APSA. Postmaster: Send address changes to APSA, 1527 New Hampshire Ave., N.W., Washington, DC 20036. Periodicals postage paid at Washington, DC, and at additional mailing offices. Copyright © 2002 by the American Political Science Association.

CUR- HO5475-9-LP1519

merican Political Science Review

Volume 96, Number 1, March 2002 Table of Contents

NOTES FROM THE (NEW) EDITOR
ARTICLES The price of Westinger Free of Leading Power Posses Theories of War in an Era of Leading-Power Peace:  Presidential Address, American litical Science  Association, 2001
Association, 2001 Robert Jervis Dictatorial Peace?
Dictatorial Peace?  Mark Peceny and Caroline C. Beer, with Shannon Sanchez-Terry 15
On the Vote-Purchasing Behavior of Incumbent Governments  Matz Dahlberg and Eva Johansson
Becoming a Habitual Voter: Inertia, Resources, and Growth in Young Adulthood
Eric Plutzer41
The Social Calculus of Voting: Interpersonal, Media, and Organizational Influences on Presidential Choices
Paul Allen Beck, Russell J. Dalton, Steven Greene, and Robert Huckfeldt
Cues that Matter: How Political Ads Prime Racial Attitudes
During Campaigns Nicholas A. Valentino, Vincent L. Hutchings, and Ismail K. White 75 Sex, Lies, and War: How Soft News Brings Foreign Policy to the Inattentive Public
Matthew A. Baum
Cross-cutting Social Networks: Testing Democratic Theory in Practice
Diana C. Mutz
Out of Step, Out of Office: Electoral Accountability and House Members' Voting
Brandice Canes-Wrone, David W. Brady, and John F. Cogan 127
Coordination and Policy Moderation at Midterm
Walter R. Mebane, Jr. and Jasjeet S. Sekhon
FORUM
Political Regimes and International Trade: The Democratic Difference Revisited
Xinyuan Dai159
Replication, Realism, and Robustness: Analyzing Political
Regimes and International Trade  Edward D. Mansfield, Helen V. Milner, and B. Peter Rosendorff 167
Edward D. Mansheld, Helen v. Miniel, and D. I elei Mosendolff 107

BOOK REVIEWS

Political Theory
Becker, Ted and Christa Daryl Slaton. The Future of Teledemocracy	171
Phelan, Shane, Sexual Strangers: Gays, Lesbians, and the	177
Dilemmas of Citizenship	172
Equality	174 174
Dean, Jodi, Cultural Studies and Political Theory Jill Locke Dumm, Thomas L. A Politics of the Ordinary Fred M. Frohock	175
Dunn, John. The Cunning of Unreason: Making Sense of Politics	176
Edmondson, Henry T., III, ed. The Moral of the Story: Literature	170 and Public Ethics. Spiekerman, Tim. Shakespheare's Political Realism: The English History Plays Ethan Fishman	177
Eisenach, Eldon J. The Next Religious Establishment: National Identity and Political Theology in Post-Protestant
America Peter Dennis Bathory	178
Flyvbjerg, Bent. Making Social Science Matter: Why Social Inquiry Fails and How It Can Succeed Again	179
Frank, Jason A. and John Tambornino, eds. The Vocations of
Political Theory	180
State Albert W. Dzur	181
Harle, Vilho. The Enemy with a Thousand Faces: The Tradition of the Other in Western Political Thought and History David Boucher	182
Hochstrasser, T. J. Natural Law Theories in the Early	102
Englightenment	183
of Democratic Order	184
Democracies	185
Levy, Jacob T. The Multiculturalism of Fear Jeff Spinner-Halev Mason, Andrew. Community, Solidarity, and Belonging:	186
Levels of Community and Their Normative Significance	187
Matravers, Matt. Justice and Punishment: The Rationale of Coercion	188
Mayerfeld, Jamie. Suffering and Moral Responsibility Joan C. Tronto	189
McNally, David. Bodies of Meaning: Studies on Language, Labor, and Liberation	189
Miller, David. Citizenship and National Identity Jacob T. Levy	191
Phelan, Shane. Sexual Strangers: Gays, Lesbians, and Dilemmas of Citizenship. See Blasius, Mark, ed., above.
Pirro, Robert C. Hannah Arendt and the Politics of Tragedy Annabel Herzog	192
Sciabarra, Chris Matthew. Total Freedom: Toward A Dialectical Libertarianism	193
Shapiro, Michael J. Cinematic Political Thought: Narrating Race,	104
Nation, and Gender John Seery Smith, Mark J. Rethinking State Theory Bob Jessop	194 195
Spiekerman, Tim. Shakespeare's Political Realism: The English History Plays. See Edmondson, Henry T., III, above.
Spragens, Thomas A., Jr. Civic Liberalism: Reflections on Our
Democratic Ideals	196 197
Warren, Mark E., ed. Democracy and Trust Virginia A. Chanley	198
Weale, Albert. Democracy	199 200
American Politics	-
Alm, Leslie R. Crossing Borders, Crossing Boundaries: The Role of Scientists in the U.S. Acid Rain Debate William R. Mangun	201
Banks, Christopher P. Judicial Politics in the D.C. Circuit Court Isaac Unah Barnett, Timothy J. Legislative Learning: The 104th Republican	202
Freshmen in the House Gregory R. Thorson	203

Burke, John P. Presidential Transitions: From Politics to Practice	lli 20 3	3
Cuppingham Maurice T. Maximization, Whatever the Cost: Race, Redistricting, and the Department of Justice
Approach to Presidential Leadership	zi 2 0:	5
1789–2000. Shapiro, Robert Y., Martha Joynt Kumar, and Lawrence R.
Jacobs, eds. Presidential Power: Forging the Presidency for the Twenty-First Century	ey 20	6
Goldgeier, James M. Not Whether But When: The U.S. Decision to  Enlarge NATO Goldstein Kenneth M. Interest Groups, Lobbying, and Participation in America
of Texas v. Johnson		.0
in Urban America	as 21	1
Protest Inside the Church and Military Laura R. Wolly	er 21	2
Lester, James P., David W. Allen, and Kelly M. Hill.  Environmental Injustice in the United States: Myths and		_
Realities		2
Funds and the Politics of Commitment	lo 21 sh 21
Pitney, John J., Jr. The Art of Political Warfare Michael John Burt	on 21
Robertson, David Brian. Capital, Labor, and State: The Bastle for American Labor Markets from the Civil War to the New Deal	sta 21	16
Electoral Process.
Stephenson, Donald Grier, Jr. Campaigns and the Court:  The U.S. Supreme Court in Presidential Elections	tes 21
Schuessler, Alexander A. A Logic of Expressive Choice Michael C. Mung Shapiro, Robert, Y., Martha Joynt Kumar, and Lawrence R.	ger ZI	18
Jacobs. Presidential Power: Forging the Presidency for the Twenty-First Century. See Genovese, Michael, A. above.
Stephenson, Donald Grier, Jr. Campaigns and the Court: The U.S.
Supreme Court in Presidential Elections. See Ryden, David K., ed., above.
Thurber, James A., Candice Nelson, and David A. Dulio, eds.  Crowded Airwaves: Campaign Advertising in Elections Karen M. Kedrow	ski 2 1	19
Unah, Isaac. The Courts of International Trade: Judicial Specialization, Expertise, and Bureaucratic Policymaking Stefanie A. Lindqu
Walton, Hanes, Jr. Reelection: William Jefferson Clinton as a  Native-Son Presidential Candidate		20
Wolbrecht Christing, The Politics of Women's Rights: Parties, Positions, and Change
the Selection of Supreme Court Nominees	an 22	22
Comparative Politics
Alexander, James. Political Culture in Post-Communist Russia:  Formlessness and Recreation in a Traumatic Transition	wa 2 :	23
Andarin, Charles, F. Public Health Policies and Social Inequality.  Freeman, Richard. The Politics of Health in Europe.
Moran, Michael. Governing the Health Care State:
A Comparative Study of the United Kingdom, the United States, and Germany.		•
Tuohy, Carolyn Hughes. Accidental Logics: The Dynamics of Change in the Health Care Arena in the United States, Britain, and Canada	nor 2 ens 2	24 27
Dirch Sarah Flections and Democratization in Ukraine	ma 2	28
ALIPORE ALIPORE	1211
ALER ALER ALER ALER ALER ALER ALER ALER	331
		iii ·

Cameron, David R., and Graham White. Cycling into Saigon: The Conservative Transition in Ontario	1 220
Chao, Emaa, and Ramon H. Wyers. The First (hinese Democracy:	1 447
Political Life in the Republic of China on Taiwan
Dickson, Bruce J. Democratization in China and Taiwan:
The Adaptability of Leninist Parties Steven Goldstein	230
Comparative Political Economy:
New Paradigms	231
Concil, Asher, and Bernard Susser. Israel and the Politics of Igwish identity: The Secular Religious Impasse.
Sharkansky, Ira. The Politics of Religion and the Religion of Politics: Looking at Israel	232
Conton, Thiothy J. Transitional Citizens: Voters and What Influences Them in the New Russia.
Moser, Robert G. Unexpected Outcomes: Electoral Systems,
Political Parties, and Representation in Russia	233
compton, Robert W., Jr. Eust Asian Democratization. Impact of Globalization, Culture, and Economy	235
2 render, Bluce 3. Democratization in China and Talwan. The Adaptability of Leninist Parties. See Chao, Linda and Ramon H. Myers, above.
Drew, Allison. Discordant Comrades: Identities and Loyalties on the South African Left
the South African Left	236
Brazil's Popular Church
Freeman, Richard. The Politics of Health in Europe. See Andarin,	237
Charles F., above.
Frye, Timothy. Brokers and Bureaucrats: Building Market
Institutions in Russia	227
Gillidic, Wichice S. Addactous Reforms: Institutional Invention and Democracy in Latin America	120
Guither, Richard, and Anthony Mughan, eds. Democracy and the	430
Media: A Comparative Perspective.
Mughan, Anthony, Media and the Presidentialization of Parliamentary Elections	230
Dodgon A Down	241
Against Soldiers	241
2. 201411, Wilchaol. Overling the Health Care Male: A Comparative	- 11
Study of the United Kingdom, the United States and Germany
See Andarin, Charles, F., above
Moser, Robert G. Unexpected Outcomes: Electoral Systems,
Political Parties, and Representation in Russia. See Colton,
Timothy, J., above.  Mughan Anthony Media and the Provident Line is a second of the provident Line in the second of the provident Line is a second of the provident Line in the second of the provident Line is a second of the second of the provident Line is a second of the provid Mughan, Anthony. Media and the Presidentialization of Parliamentary Elections. See Gunther, Richard, and Anthony Mughan, above.
Müller Wolfgang C and Koaro Stram als B ! OS
Müller, Wolfgang C., and Kaare Strøm, eds. Policy, Office or Votes?
How Political Parties in Western Europe Make Hard Decisions Michael Laver Nobles, Melissa. Shades of Citizenship: Race and the Census in	243
Modern Politics ————————————————————————————————————
Modern Politics	243
in Postindustrial Societies
in Postindustrial Societies	244
and Democracy in Latin America	A 4.5
Than, Susan J., and Robert D. Pulnam, eds. Disattected	245
Democracies: What's Troubling the Trilateral Countries Mortage M. J. C.	246
Sharin, succes, and initial shallin. The Anatomy of Public	24 0
Opinion	247
Sharkansky, Ira. The Politics of Religion and the Religion of	24 /
Politics: Looking at Israel. See Cohen, Asher, and Bernard Sussar, above.
Sheingate, Adam D. The Rise of the Agricultural Welfare State: Institutions and Interest Group Power in the United States
France, and Japan	248
- Leading Stoven Si, and Indinas I. Remindred I no Politice of Institutional Choice: The Formation of the Russian State Duma John Londregan	249
William Londingan	- ·/

Smith, W. Rand. The Left's Dirty Job: The Politics of Industrial Restructuring in France and Spain	Michael Loriaux	250
Tuohy, Carolyn Hughes. Accidental Logics: The Dynamics of Change in the Health Care Arena in the United States, Britain, and Canada. See Andrain, Charles. F., above.	1
Walters, William. Unemployment and Government: Genealogies of the Social	Stephen McBride	251
of the Social Whiting, Susan H. Power and Wealth in Rural China: The Political	Stephen Mediae	4 J1
Economy of Institutional Change	Benedict Stavis	252
Wydra, Harald. Continuities in Poland's Permanent	Denouier stavis
Transition	ista Maria Cirtautas	253
Transmon
International Relations
Andrean Joffrey Corman Unification and the Union of Furane
The Domestic Politics of Integration Policy  Bass, Gary Jonathan. Stay the Hand of Vengeance: The Politics of	. Beverly Crawford	254
Ross Gary Jonathan Stay the Hand of Vengeance: The Politics of	, ,
War Crimes Tribunals	Arthur W. Blaser	255
Brown, Macalister, and Joseph J. Zasloff. Cambodia Confounds
the Peacemakers, 1979–1998	David W. Roberts	256
Chan Steve and A Cooper Drury, eds. Sanctions as Economic Statecraft: Theory and Practice	Kim Richard Nossal	257
Crawford, Robert M. A., and Darryl S. L. Jarvis, eds. International Relations—Still an American Social Science?: Toward Diversity	·
in International Thought	Timothy Dunne	258
Farkas, Andrew. State Learning and International Change	Erik Gartzke	259
Fetzer, Joel S. Public Attitudes Toward Immigration in the	0 H T 1	260
United States, France, and Germany	Gallya Lahav	260
Goldstein, Avery. Deterrence and Security in the 21st Century:
China, Britain, France, and the Enduring Legacy of the Nuclear	I armanaa Enaadman	262
Revolution	Lawrence Freedman	202
Hansen, Birthe. Unipolarity and the Middle East.
Heydemann, Steven, ed. War, Institutions and Social Change in the Middle East.
Niblock, Tim. "Pariah States" and Sanctions in the Middle East:	Dobert O Freedman	263
Iraq, Libya, Sudan	Manfred B Steger	264
Heydemann, Steven, ed. War, Institutions, and Social Change in	Manifed D. Steger
the Middle East. See Hansen, Birthe, above.
Itoh, Mayumi. Globalization of Japan: Japanese Sakoku Mentality
and U.S. Efforts to Open Japan	Kent E. Calder	265
Jahn, Beate. The Cultural Construction of International Relations:
The Invention of the State of Nature.
Construction in International Relations	Cynthia Weber	266
Vandersluis, Sarah Owen, ed. The State and Identity  Construction in International Relations  Klinghoffer, Arthur J. The International Dimension of Genocide
in Kwanaa	Peter Uvin	,267
Lampton, David M. Same Bed, Different Dreams: Managing		260
U.SChina Relations, 1989–2000	David Bachman	268
Lizee, Pierre P. Peace, Power and Resistance in Cambodia: Global Governance and the Failure of International Conflict	David W. Dahanta	269
Resolution	David w. Roberts	209
Martin, Lisa L. Democratic Commitments: Legislatures and	thleen D. McNemers	270
International Cooperation	illiceli K. Micivalliara	270
Niblock, Tim. "Pariah States" and Sanctions in the Middle East:
Iraq, Libya, Sudan. See Hansen, Birthe, above. Rigby, Andrew. Justice and Reconciliation: After the Violence	Garv I. Bass	271
Rigby, Andrew. Justice and Reconcilidation: After the violence	David Cortright
Stephen, Roland. Vehicle of Influence: Building a European Car
Market	James A. Dunn, Jr.	272
Vandersluis, Sarah Owen, ed. The State and Identity Construction	•	• in International Relations. See Jahn, Beate, above.
Vasquez, John A., ed. What Do We Know About War?	H. E. Goemans	27 3

QUARTERLY JOURNAL OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

Officers

PRESIDENT Robert D. Putnam Harvard University

PRESIDENT-ELECT Theda Skocpol Harvard University

VICE PRESIDENTS
David Collier
University of California,
Berkeley

John Jackson University of Michigan

Kristen Renwick Monroe University of California, Irvine SECRETARY John A. Garcia University of Arizona

TREASURER Robert R. Kaufman Rutgers University

PROGRAM CO-CHAIRS W. Phillips Shively University of Minnesota

Kathryn Sikkink University of Minnesota

EDITOR, APSR Lee Sigelman George Washington University

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR Michael Brintnall American Political Science Association

Council

2000-2002

Richard A. Brody Stanford University

Bob Holmes Clark Atlanta University

L. Sandy Maisel Colby College

Doris Marie Provine Arizona State University

Mary Segers* Rutgers University

Ronald Schmidt*
California State University,
Long Beach

Katherine Tate University of California, Irvine

Margaret Weir University of California, Berkeley

*serving one year terms 2001–02

2001-2003

Bruce Bueno de Mesquita Hoover Institution

Nancy Burns University of Michigan

Susan Clarke University of Colorado, Boulder

Lawrence C. Dodd University of Florida

Valerie Martinez-Ebers Texas Christian University

Kirstie M. McClure University of California, Los Angeles

Desiree Pedescleaux Spelman College

James C. Scott Yale University

Former Presidents

Frank J. Goodnow Albert Shaw Frédérick N. Judson James Bryce A. Lawrence Lowell-Woodrow Wilson Simeon E. Baldwin Albert Bushnell Hart W. W. Willoughby John Bassett Moore Ernst Freund Jesse Macv Munroe Smith Henry Jones Ford Paul S. Reinsch Leo S. Rowe William A. Dunning Harry A. Garfield James W. Garner Charles E. Merriam Charles A. Beard William Bennett Munro Jesse S. Reeves John A. Fairlie

Benjamin F. Shambaugh Edward S. Corwin William F. Willoughby Isidor Loeb Walter J. Shepard Francis W. Coker Arthur N. Holcombe Thomas Reed Powell Clarence A. Dykstra. Charles Grove Haines Robert C. Brooks Frederic A. Ogg William Anderson Robert E. Cushman Leonard D. White John Gaus Walter F. Dodd Arthur W. MacMahon Henry R. Spencer Quincy Wright. James K. Pollock Peter H. Odegard Luther Gulick Pendleton Herring

Ralph J. Bunche Charles McKinley Harold D. Lasswell E. E. Schattschneider V. O. Key Jr. R. Taylor Cole Carl B. Swisher Emmette S. Redford Charles S. Hyneman Carl J. Friedrich C. Herman Pritchett David B. Truman Gabriel A. Almond Robert A. Dahl Merle Fainsod David Easton Karl W. Deutsch Robert E. Lane Heinz Eulau Robert E. Ward Avery Leiserson Austin Ranney James MacGregor Burns Samuel H. Beer

John C. Wahlke Leon D. Epstein Warren E. Miller Charles E. Lindblom Seymour Martin Lipset William H. Riker Philip E. Converse, Richard F. Fenno Jr. Aaron B. Wildavsky Samuel P. Huntington Kenneth N. Waltz Lucian W. Pye Judith N. Shklar Theodore J. Lowi James Q. Wilson Lucius J. Barker Charles O. Jones. Sidney Verba Arend Lijphart Elinor Ostrom M. Kent Jennings Matthew Holden Jr. Robert O. Keohane Robert Jervis.

Political Science:

COMING SOON

The State of the Discipline

(the Centennial edition)

Table of Contents

American Political Science: The Discipline's State and the State of the Discipline

Ira Katznelson and Helen Milner

Section 1: The State in an Era of Globalization

Margaret Levi Miles Kahler Atul Kohli Jeffry Frieden and Lisa Martin James Alt James Morrow Stephen Walt

Section 2: Democracy, Justice, and Their Institutions

Ian Shapiro Jeremy Waldron Romand Coles Gerald Gamm and John Huber Barbara Geddes Kathleen Thelen

Section 3: Citizenship, Identity, and Political Participation

Seyla Benhabib Kav Schlozman Nancy Burns Michael Dawson and Cathy Cohen Morris Fiorina Amy Gutmann Randall Calvert Thomas Risse

Section 4: Studying Politics

David Laitin Barry Weingast Paul Pierson and Theda Skocpol Karen Orren and Stephen Skowroneck Robert Powell Charles Cameron and Rebecca Morton Donald Green and Alan Gerber

APSA is pleased to announce the upcoming third edition of Political Science: The State of the Discipline. Editors Ira Katznelson and Helen Milner of Columbia University have sought to "reflect the vibrant, often contested, diversity of political science while chronicling the past decade's scholarship and prompting thought about future directions."

Breaking away from a traditional organization around the four major fields of political science, the editors chose to create an intellectural architecture that focuses first on the state, followed by democracy, and then agency, concluding with means of inquiry.

The Centennial Edition of the State of the Discipline is an important resource for all scholars interested in reading across fields.

Order Your Advance Copy Today

The essays in this book are not just retrospective appraisals; they also strongly voice views about where the discipline should be going.

Advance copy p	orice: $45.00 e	ach (member Norton & Com	r s only) pany
		***
NAME		* ;
Address '	***
	*
VISA MASTER (CIIRCLE ONE)	RCARD AMI	ERICAN EXPRESS	end of Edge of Section of Section
CREDIT CARD NUM	MBER

OR SEND YOUR CHECK PAYABLE TO APSA TO: 1527 New Hampshire Ave., NW, Washington, DC 20036-1207

Expiration Date

Notes from the (New) Editor

By the standards of the ancient Chinese curse ("May you live in interesting times"), my transition into the position of Editor of the APSR was cursed. Only a few days into these new duties, I looked up one morning from the stack of manuscripts on my desk, glanced out of the window at the beautiful blue sky, and beheld smoke billowing from the Pentagon.

The tragic events of September 11, 2001, affected us all. Certainly they posed unanticipated problems for the APSR's new editorial team. We (a collective consisting of me, Assistant Editor Elizabeth Cook, our Editorial Assistants [John Donaldson, Jason MacDonald, and Tricia Mulligan], our brand-new editorial board [listed elsewhere], and Book Review. Co-editors Susan Bickford and Gregory McAvoy and their Editorial Assistants [Elizabeth Markovits, Maria Riemann, and Carisa Showden]) had "hit the ground running" on September 1. Our careful planning and the extraordinary efforts of Ada Finifter and Harriett Posner at Michigan State were paying off in a smooth transition in our Washington, DC, editorial offices, and the Bickford-McAvoy book review operation in Chapel Hill was off to a good start, too, thanks in part to the cooperation of their predecessor, Mark Lichbach. Then September 11 happened. Here in Washington, DC, offices closed, equipment and supplies went undelivered, and services were suspended. Hard on the heels of September 11 came the anthraxinspired disruption of the mails, which played havoc with our operations. We would go days on end receiving no mail at all and then be deluged, making it difficult to get out of a "scramble" mode and into a normal operating rhythm.

As I compose these notes in the early days of 2002, I am pleased to report that our offices are functioning in a timely, predictable, and appropriate manner. We have come a long way in a short time under conditions that we could not have imagined a few months ago, and things are now more or less "normal," though I have already come to appreciate the wisdom of former Editor Charles Jones's remark (as conveyed by Ada Finifter) that the APSR editorship is a great job but there is a little too much of it.

Many of those with whom I talk about the APSR assume that I must feel cursed by a second accident of timing as well: my assumption of the editorship at a time of widespread expressions of discontent among political scientists—discontent directed at, inter alia, intellectual currents in the discipline, the governing institutions of the profession (ranging from individual departments through the American Political Science Association), and, not least, the APSR itself. It is well to bear in mind that, as Robert Salisbury noted in the December 2001 issue of PS, "Complaints about APSR and petitions to change the structure of APSA have been perennial features of life among political scientists." Even so, in recent years, and particularly with the emergence of the Perestroika movement, these complaints have taken on a special resonance. It thus seems appropriate that in these initial editorial notes, I address some of these concerns and discuss the role I foresee for the APSR in coming years.

I consider myself not at all cursed by this second accident of timing but, rather, blessed by the opportunity to respond constructively to the challenges it poses. In the remarks that follow, I describe some of the elements of this response. (Some of what I say will come as review material for those who during the last year or so have read e-mail messages I have posted, attended meetings at which I have spoken, or talked privately with me.)

SOME NEW PERSPECTIVES AND PROCEDURES

Political science is a strange discipline. Indeed, it is hardly a "discipline" at all. A dictionary definition of "discipline" refers, variously, to "punishment," or "a set or system of rules," or "a branch of learning." I will sidestep the issue of whether political science is a punishment, but I do want to express doubt that it is a set or system of rules. Only someone who takes a narrow, procrustean view of political science would characterize it in that way. And rather than being a distinct branch of learning, political science is a crazy quilt of borrowings from history, philosophy, law, sociology, psychology, economics, public administration, policy studies, area studies, international studies, civics, and a variety of other sources. Any real coherence in political science exists only at the broadest conceptual level, in the form of our widely shared interest in power, the "authoritative allocation of values for society," "who gets what, when, how," and the like.

This overriding intellectual diversity endows political science with vibrancy, energy, and openness to new and often challenging perspectives. Even so, I want to register my sense that in many ways we have become less of a discipline over the years. When I entered the profession three decades ago, virtually everyone seemed to be reading and discussing certain contemporary canonical works (Dahl, Easton, Almond and Verba, Downs, and Bachrach and Baratz, among others). I am hardpressed to think of many equivalents today—perhaps Putnam, but what else? These days it is harder than ever to find a center of intellectual gravity in our discipline. More and more we are a confederation of narrowly defined and loosely connected, or even disconnected, specializations. Our heightened specialization is further fragmenting our already disjointed discipline, to the extent that most of us have little knowledge, understanding, or appreciation of what our colleagues in other subfields are doing.

In recent years, the most widely expressed criticisms of the APSR in particular have been that "It doesn't publish the kind of work that interests me," "It's biased against my kind of work," "I have no idea what most of those articles are even about," and/or "I don't even open it when it arrives." Defenders have countered that the APSR does a good job of publishing the best papers that are submitted to it, and that the problem, if there is one, is that those who feel aggrieved rarely submit their work to the APSR, thereby creating a vicious circle. A second line of defense has been that there is nothing unique to political science about the fact that those in one subfield neither understand nor appreciate what those in other subfields are doing. As seen from this perspective, this is an inevitable by-product of specialization and other aspects of disciplinary "progress," not specifically an APSR problem.

Although the contents of the APSR in recent years have been more diverse than critics often acknowledge, I agree that the rich theoretical, methodological, and substantive variety of our discipline has not been reflected nearly as well as it should be in our premier research journal. (And I am well aware that such variety is not well represented in this particular issue, either.) Recognizing that the problem of the vicious circle is real does not mean that we must bow to its inevitability. Moreover, even while granting that increasingly divergent theoretical perspectives and analytical techniques and the proliferation of specialized vocabularies are barriers to communication, we need to recognize that we have not been doing nearly as much as we should to make our ideas accessible to one another.

The APSR should be an important vehicle for overcoming this isolation, for building and sustaining a sense of intellectual community. It should be the showcase for the best research, representing the wide array of theoretical orientations, substantive foci, and methodological approaches that comprise political science. Opening up the APSR when it arrives should give us a sense of invigoration about all the interesting work that our colleagues are doing. My primary goal as Editor of the APSR is to move as far as possible in that direction, by publishing a broad array of the very best work being done throughout political science and by enhancing the likelihood that this work will actually be read.

The obvious question is how to translate this vision into reality. Among the steps we have already taken or will soon take are the following.

• Because much of the most important political science research is published as books, not articles, the APSR's book review section is avidly read, and the book review editorship is a key position in our discipline. With the completion of Mark Lichbach's term as Book Review Editor, one of my first tasks was to fill that position—a position that requires great intellectual breadth and versatility, innovativeness, tolerance for long hours of drudgery, highlevel organizational skills, and an eye for detail. To fill this tall order, I recruited a pair of scholars who individually and collectively possess the requisite qualities. With Susan Bickford (a political theorist) and Greg McAvoy (a specialist in American)

The factor of

- politics and policy) as co-editors, the book review operation is in excellent hands.
- Another early task was to assemble, for approval by the APSA Executive Council, my slate of editorial board nominees. The editorial board must be composed of productive scholars to whom I can confidently turn for wise counsel, and it must reflect the diversity of the discipline. I consulted widely, soliciting suggestions from every APSA organized section and numerous other affiliated committees and formally constituted groups, as well as many informal groups and various individuals, and I received many unsolicited suggestions as well. The result is a brand new board of 44 members, none of whom had previously served on the board. This is an exceptionally accomplished and diverse group, and I am delighted to have the opportunity to work with them. (It is possible that a few more board members will be added as circumstances warrant.)
- By their very presence on the board, these 44 members symbolize, and by their actions they have been asked to carry throughout the discipline, the message that we genuinely want to receive a wider array of submissions than has come to the APSR in the past, and that we are doing our best to conduct a review process that is fair, thorough, and timely. The idea is simple: The greater the variety of papers we receive, the greater the variety of articles we will be able to publish.
- A new editorial board function that will directly involve only a handful of board members is to serve as an advisory/oversight executive committee. This is the group to which I will, other factors being equal, turn first for advice or other forms of assistance on matters involving procedures, policies, and the like. The executive committee will also review my performance as Editor and the operations of the editorial office. The first scheduled review will take place halfway into my three-year term, at which time the committee will assess the fairness, competence, and timeliness of the review process and my decisions, and will offer any recommendations that follow from its assessment. As academicians, we are accustomed to reviewing the performance of students, colleagues, programs, departments, and even colleges and universities. It seems no less appropriate to review our journals as well—especially a journal that receives as much attention as the APSR.
- We have put several modifications of the review process in place in an effort to open it up and make it more transparent. For example, we are trying in several ways to expand the already large pool from which we draw reviewers. (In that spirit, let me add that if you know of anyone, yourself included, who would be a good reviewer but has not previously served in that capacity for the APSR, we would like to hear from you.) Another example is detailed below in the "Specific Procedures" section of the "Instructions to Contributors": When you submit a paper to the APSR, you are now invited to suggest the names of appropriate reviewers of your paper. Our early experience with this new procedure has been encouraging; authors seem to like it, and their suggestions are bringing to our attention many potential reviewers who might not otherwise have occurred to us. A third example is that when you review a paper for the APSR, you can now expect to receive copies of all the other reviews and my decision letter (all rendered anonymous, of course). The rationale underlying these changes is that increasing the transparency of the review process will boost authors' and reviewers' confidence in the process and their sense of involvement in it. If it turns out that making the process more transparent actually undermines confidence, then we obviously will need to make some major changes to the process.

- I am not necessarily requiring a paper to receive positive recommendations from three reviewers to qualify for publication in the APSR. As I have remarked in several forums, it has sometimes occurred to me that getting a paper accepted by a top journal is something like winning the Olympic gold medal in figure skating. In that competition, what seems to matter most is that one not make a major mistake, so the winning strategy often consists of playing it safe by not doing anything risky. Sometimes a paper that receives two genuinely enthusiastic reviews and one decidedly negative one may be more interesting and important than a competent paper that has nothing seriously "wrong" with it. As Editor, I am trying to diversify the APSR's portfolio by investing in some "speculative" or "growth" stocks along with the normal "blue chips," i.e., by being open to work that is new, different, and perhaps too controversial or too far outside the mainstream to receive unanimously positive reviews.
- I am also willing to apply our 45-page limit on manuscripts flexibly, thereby making publication in the APSR a more realistic prospect for those who do qualitative, "thick-descriptive," or case studybased research.
- I am issuing "revise and resubmit" invitations very sparingly, confining them to situations in which I am confident that if the author implements a relatively narrow and specific set of revisions, the revised paper will warrant publication in the APSR. Genuine enthusiasm among most of the reviewers and a manageable set of suggested revisions that can be accomplished within the current framework of the paper are primary indicators pointing toward a "revise and resubmit" invitation. In the absence of these indicators, I am trying to save time, trouble, irritation, and disappointment for all concerned by rejecting papers rather than inviting resubmissions. I especially dislike the idea of piling one "revise and resubmit" invitation on top of an earlier one, and am willing to follow that path only under extremely unusual circumstances.
- My introduction to the new Style Manual for Political Science includes the following statement:

It is the obligation of authors to make their research accessible to prospective readers, not by 'dumbing it down' but by effectively conveying what they are trying to find out and why this quest is so worthwhile.... [T]he real key lies in careful editing and rewriting designed to open lines of communication rather than to close them. It is not reasonable to expect researchers who use complex formal or statistical models to conduct tutorials on their methods as a part of reporting their work; or to hold those whose research focuses on a certain nation or a certain political thinker responsible for introducing the rest of us to the most basic aspects of their subject matter before turning to the specific issues of concern; or, more generally, to require researchers to eschew all but plain, simple English. Moreover, it is naive to expect that ... those who are untrained in formal or statistical modeling will suddenly become avid and knowledgeable consumers of the technical portions of a statistical or formal presentation, or that those who had previously shown little or no interest in a certain region or thinker will suddenly yearn to master the subtlest nuances thereof. But it is neither unreasonable nor naive to insist at the very least that as political scientists we can and should clearly communicate to a broad range of other political scientists what we are trying to do and why it matters.

In assessing papers, one question I ask myself is whether the authors have done everything they legitimately can to broaden the accessibility and appeal of their work. One way they can do so is by spelling out very clearly at the outset what their basic research question is and why it is so interesting and important that readers who might otherwise ignore an article should instead invest their time in it. To do that, authors must reach out to a broader, more diverse audience than they may be accustomed to addressing-potential readers who cannot be assumed to have any specialized knowledge of their subject matter. Besides broadening the introductory portion of a paper, authors should come back, at the end of the paper, to the questions that motivated the analysis and should clarify what the basic message of their analysis is and why it matters.

- Along the same lines, I will use these Notes from the Editor to provide sneak previews of the articles in each issue, with an eye toward tempting you to take a look at work to which you might not otherwise pay attention. Opening up lines of communication is a two-way street; it requires authors to express their ideas effectively, but also readers to venture outside their well-worn paths.
- It is important to note that some major structural changes are in the works. In the next year or so, the book reviews that currently occupy about a third of the APSR's pages will migrate to the APSA's new journal, Perspectives on Politics. (The new journal will feature integrative essays, survey-critiques of the literature, and analyses of what our discipline has to say about current policy issues, along with book reviews.) Because of these changes, the APSR will be able to publish more articles in a given year, thereby opening up possibilities that are not currently available.

• Finally, a purely symbolic change: I trust you have noticed that the APSR has an attractive new cover. Both the color and the graphic will change from issue to issue, with the graphic being keyed to the issue's lead article. (For several reasons, I am especially pleased to have a peace symbol adorn the cover of the first issue to appear during my editorship.)

I welcome comments on any aspect of these notes, which can be directed to apsr@gwu.edu.

IN THIS ISSUE

With the single exception of the lead article, the articles in this issue were all in advanced stages of the review process when I assumed the editorship in September of 2001. To give credit where it is due, then, I need to acknowledge that responsibility for the contents of this issue belongs more to Ada Finifter than to me. In light of the time lag between the initial submission of a paper and its appearance (almost invariably in revised form) in the APSR, the June 2002 issue, too, will be heavily weighted toward papers that were submitted to, and revised at the invitation of, my predecessor. Thereafter, the balance will shift significantly.

The lead article in this issue, and the immediate occasion for the appearance of a peace symbol on our cover, is "Theories of War in an Era of Leading Power Peace," Robert Jervis's 2001 APSA presidential address. In this essay, Jervis, a leading scholar of international politics, takes three leading schools of international relations theory (constructivism, liberalism, and realism) to task for their failure to explain why wars do or do not occur among members of a security community—in this case, advanced industrial democracies. Jervis argues that the peace that currently prevails among these nations cannot be explained by a singular focus on shared norms, common institutions, or the presence of nuclear weapons. Instead, he argues for melding elements of each approach with an historical, or path dependent, view of behavior. This essay, then, broadens the analytical base from which political scientists and others can consider the fundamental and enduring issue of war and peace.

In "Dictatorial Peace?" Mark Peceny and Caroline C. Beer, with Shannon Sanchez-Terry, shift away from Jervis's focus, and that of the broader international politics literature, on war and peace among democracies. The key assertions of the "democratic peace" argument are that democracies do not go to war with each other and are far less likely than other nations to go to war at all. But might there be a corresponding "dictatorial peace"? Peceny, Beer, and Sanchez-Terry argue that some of the same factors that help explain the incidence of peace among democracies (domestic institutions, values, war fighting capabilities, and transparency) also produce peace among authoritarian regimes. However, not all authoritarian regimes (personalist, military, and single-party) are created equal in this regard. Using new data and sophisticated data-analytic techniques, the authors raise the intriguing possibility that democracies may not be unique after all.

The issue of similarities and differences in the international behavior of democracies and autocracies recurs in the Forum section of this issue, albeit in the context of international commerce rather than war and peace. (The Forum section is where critiques of, or commentaries on, articles previously published in the APSR appear. As noted in our Instructions to Contributors (below), submissions to the Forum undergo our normal review process. If they are accepted for publication, we solicit a response from the author(s) of the original article and we try to ensure that the two pieces appear in the same issue.) In "Political Regimes and International Trade: The Domestic Difference Revisited," Xinyuan Dai takes issue with an analysis of the impact of political regimes on trade barriers that appeared in these pages (Edward Mansfield, Helen V. Milner, and B. Peter Rosendorff, "Free to Trade: Democracies, Autocracies, and International Trade," APSR 94 [June 2000]: 305-321). Recalculating the results after modifying what she considers a problematic component of that analysis, Dai concludes that trade barriers between pairs of democracies are higher than Edward D. Mansfield, Helen V. Milner, and B. Peter Rosendorff predict, and that barriers between democracies are not always lower than barriers between democracies and autocracies. In their response ("Replication, Realism, and Robustness: Analyzing Political Regimes and International Trade"), Mansfield, Milner, and Rosendorff contend that Dai's alteration of their model renders it less realistic and less robust than their original model.

Politics, in Harold Lasswell's formulation, is the process of determining "who gets what, when, how." One answer to the question of "Who gets what?" has been that, in an effort to secure their existing political base, decision-makers reward their core supporters by allocating resources to them. A very different answer has been that decision-makers, secure in the knowledge that their core supporters have nowhere else to turn, instead use the resource allocation process to try to expand their political base. Capitalizing on a rare opportunity to test these competing interpretations, Matz Dahlberg and Eva Johansson ("On the Vote Purchasing Behavior of Incumbent Governments") analyze uniquely suitable data from a "natural experiment" involving a temporary grants program in Sweden. Drawing on this evidence, Dahlberg and Johansson challenge widely held assumptions about the benefits of winning elections, and, thus, provide an intriguing answer to Lasswell's question.

Students of political attitudes and electoral behavior will find much of interest in this issue. One potentially major contribution is Eric Plutzer's analysis of the sources of voter turnout ("Becoming a Habitual Voter: Inertia, Resources, and Growth in Young Adulthood"). Plutzer begins with the simple but powerful idea that voting and nonvoting are matters of habit, and he develops this idea by focusing on voter turnout over the life course. Young adults confronting their first opportunity to vote have not yet gotten into the habit of voting. They tend not to vote at the first opportunity, and having begun as nonvoters, they tend to remain nonvoters in subsequent elections. Their habitual nonvoting eventually gives way, though, to habitual voting, the basic question being how quickly the transition from one habit to the other occurs. In analyzing the pace of this transition, Plutzer integrates within his developmental perspective many factors that have previously been shown to promote or discourage turnout, thereby providing students of electoral behavior with a more inclusive framework from which to analyze voting and nonvoting.

Another broadening of focus is accomplished by Paul Allen Beck, Russell J. Dalton, Steven Greene, and Robert Huckfeldt in "The Social Calculus of Voting: Interpersonal, Media, and Organizational Influences on Presidential Choices." Though with exceptions ranging back to the first survey-based studies of voting in the 1940s, voting has generally been analyzed as if it were the act of an isolated individual, even though it obviously occurs within, and is inevitably shaped by, a complex social context. Employing an imaginative combination of data sources, Beck et al. gauge the impacts on vote choice of interpersonal discussion, media reports and editorials, and involvement in political party activities and other secondary organizations, along with personal traits that are standard predictors of vote choice. The result is a study that melds meticulous data collection with sound data analysis and, returning to a neglected theme in electoral studies, sheds new light on how social intermediaries affect vote choice.

One particular aspect of the social context of mass opinion and political behavior, media content, serves as the centerpiece of Nicholas A. Valentino, Vincent L. Hutchings, and Ismail K. White's "Cues that Matter: How Political Ads Prime Racial Attitudes During Campaigns." Valentino, Hutchings, and White investigate how subtle racial cues embedded in televised campaign ads influence voters' decision-making processes and lead them to endorse certain candidates. The issue is whether, even though explicitly racist campaign appeals have become rare, campaigners can succeed by "playing the race card" unobtrusively, activating racial attitudes through the use of carefully "coded" communication strategies. The answer that Valentino, Hutchings, and White provide not only does much to clarify the impact of campaign ads, but also speaks to the persistence of what Gunnar Myrdal termed "an American dilemma."

It is not only the news and editorial matter and the advertisements that the media carry that can shape mass political attitudes and behavior. In the irresistibly titled "Sex, Lies, and War: How Soft News Brings Foreign Policy to the Inattentive Public," Matthew A. Baum argues that media coverage of foreign policy crises on entertainment-oriented programs such as The Oprah Winfrey Show or on "soft" news-oriented programs such as Dateline is likely to reach segments of the public that do not pay much attention to standard news coverage. Taking coverage of the 1998 U.S. missile strikes against suspected terrorist sites in Afghanistan and Sudan as the case in point, Baum shows that types of coverage that political scientists have ignored can broaden public access to information and thereby enhance public understanding of major policy issues.

Political theorists from John Stuart Mill to Jurgen Habermas have depicted communication among diverse groups as enhancing understanding, mutual tolerance, and even identification and affinity. When communication occurs across social groups, it has the potential to organize disparate groups into "crosscutting" social networks. This notion has informed several influential works, including Robert Putnam's Bowling Alone and Jon Elster's edited volume Deliberative Democracy, which in turn have sparked debates about whether exposure to different viewpoints actually promotes understanding and tolerance. In "Cross-Cutting Social Networks: Testing Democratic Theory in Practice," Diana Mutz begins to fill this gap by analyzing survey and experimental data. Mutz's findings have direct implications for our understanding of how discourse and communication affect political understanding and toleration.

Although the ability of dissatisfied citizens to turn incumbents out of office is widely seen as critical to the health of representative democracy, do the enormous electoral advantages that incumbent members of Congress enjoy make it possible for them to disregard their constituents' wishes? Analyzing House election outcomes over four decades, Brandice Canes-Wrone, David W. Brady, and John F. Cogan probe the link between members' ideological extremity and their performance in their bids for reelection. The results they report in "Out of Step, Out of Office: Electoral Accountability and House Members' Voting" provide a more solid empirical foundation than has previously been available for understanding the connection between what members of Congress do and how their constituents respond.

The link between incumbents and officeholders also serves as the focus of "Coordination and Policy Moderation at Midterm," by Walter R. Mebane, Jr., and Jasjeet S. Sekhon. The technical level of this article is sufficiently high that many readers will find it hard going (in a restaurant this menu item would carry a four-chili pepper designation). However, those who persevere will be rewarded with some intriguing new insights. Among its several contributions, Mebane and Sekhon's "strategic coordination" interpretation provides a rather different account of the sources of divided government than can be found in interpretations based on "surge and decline" or "cognitive Madisonianism."

INSTRUCTIONS TO CONTRIBUTORS

General Considerations

The APSR strives to publish scholarly research of exceptional merit, focusing on important issues and demonstrating the highest standards of excellence in conceptualization, exposition, methodology, and craftsmanship. Because the APSR reaches a diverse audience of scholars and practitioners, authors must demonstrate how their analysis illuminates a significant research problem, or answers an important research question, of general interest in political science. For the same reason, authors must strive for a presentation that will be understandable to as many scholars as possible, consistent with the nature of their material.

The APSR publishes original work. Therefore, authors should not submit articles containing tables, figures, or substantial amounts of text that have already been published or are forthcoming in other places, or that have been included in other manuscripts submitted for review to book publishers or periodicals (including on-line journals). In many such cases, subsequent publication of this material would violate the copyright of the other publisher. The APSR also does not consider papers that are currently under review by other journals or duplicate or overlap with parts of larger manuscripts that have been submitted to other publishers (including publishers of both books and periodicals). Submission of manuscripts substantially similar to those submitted or published elsewhere, or to part of a book or other larger work, is also strongly discouraged. If you have any questions about whether these policies apply in your particular case, you should discuss any such publications related to a submission in a cover letter to the Editor. You should also notify the Editor of any related submissions to other publishers, whether for book or periodical publication, that occur while a manuscript is under review by the APSR and which would fall within the scope of this policy. The Editor may request copies of related publications.

If your manuscript contains quantitative evidence and analysis, you should describe your procedures in sufficient detail to permit reviewers to understand and evaluate what has been done and, in the event that the article is accepted for publication, to permit other scholars to carry out similar analyses on other data sets. For example, for surveys, at the least, sampling procedures, response rates, and question wordings should be given; you should calculate response rates according to one of the standard formulas given by the American Association for Public Opinion Research, Standard Definitions: Final Dispositions of Case Codes and Outcome Rates for RDD Telephone Surveys and In-Person Household Surveys (Ann Arbor, MI: AAPOR, 1998). This document is available on the Internet at http://www.aapor.org/ethics/stddef.html. For experiments, provide full descriptions of experimental protocols, methods of subject recruitment and selection, subject payments and debriefing procedures, and so on. Articles should be self-contained, so you should not simply refer readers to other publications for descriptions of these basic research procedures.

Please indicate variables included in statistical analyses by capitalizing the first word in the variable name and italicizing the entire variable name the first time each is mentioned in the text. You should also use the same names for variables in text and tables and, wherever possible, should avoid the use of acronyms and computer abbreviations when discussing variables in the text. All variables appearing in tables should have been mentioned in the text and the reason for their inclusion discussed.

As part of the review process, you may be asked to submit additional documentation if procedures are not sufficiently clear; the review process works most efficiently if such information is given in the initial submission. If you advise readers that additional information is available, you should submit printed copies of that information with the manuscript. If the amount of this supplementary information is extensive, please inquire about alternate procedures.

The APSR uses a double-blind review process. You should follow the guidelines for preparing anonymous copies in the Specific Procedures section below.

Manuscripts that are largely or entirely critiques or commentaries on previously published articles will be reviewed using the same general procedures as for other manuscripts, with one exception. In addition to the usual number of reviewers, such manuscripts will also be sent to the scholar(s) whose work is being criticized, in the same anonymous form that they are sent to reviewers. Comments from the original author(s) to the Editor will be invited as a supplement to the advice of reviewers. This notice to the original author(s) is intended (1) to encourage review of the details of analyses or research procedures that might escape the notice of disinterested reviewers; (2) to enable prompt publication of critiques by supplying criticized authors with early notice of their existence and, therefore, more adequate time to reply; and (3) as a courtesy to criticized authors. If you submit such a manuscript, you should therefore send as many additional copies of their manuscripts as will be required for this

Manuscripts being submitted for publication should be sent to Lee Sigelman, Editor, American Political Science Review, Department of Political Science, The George Washington University, 2201 G Street N.W., Room 507, Washington, DC 20052. Correspondence concerning manuscripts under review may be sent to the same address or e-mailed to apsr@gwu.edu.

Manuscript Formatting

Manuscripts should not be longer than 45 pages including text, all tables and figures, notes, references, and appendices. This page size guideline is based on the U.S. standard  $8.5 \times 11$ -inch paper; if you are submitting a manuscript printed on longer paper, you must adjust accordingly. The font size must be at least 11 points for all parts of the paper, including notes and references. The entire paper, including notes and references, must be double-spaced, with the sole exception of tables for which double-spacing would require a second page otherwise not needed. All pages should be numbered in one sequence, and text should be formatted using a normal single column no wider than 6.5 inches, as is typical for manuscripts (rather than the double-column format of the published version of the APSR), and printed on one side of the page only. Include an abstract of no more than 150 words. The APSR style of embedded citations should be used, and there must be a separate list of references at the end of the manuscript. Do not use notes for simple citations. These specifications are designed to make it easier for reviewers to read and evaluate papers. Papers not adhering to these guidelines are subject to being rejected without review.

Use endnotes rather than footnotes; again, like all other text, endnotes are to be double-spaced and in 11-point font. Place tables and figures (on separate pages and only one to a page) at the back of the manuscript with standard indications of text placement, e.g., [Table 3 about here]. If your paper is accepted for publication, you will be required to submit cameraready copy of graphs or other types of figures. Instructions will be provided.

For specific formatting style of citations and references, please refer to articles in the most recent issue of the APSR. For unusual style or formatting issues, you should consult the latest edition of The Chicago Manual of Style. For review purposes, citations and references need not be in specific APSR format, although some generally accepted format should be used, and all citation and reference information should be provided.

Specific Procedures

Please follow these specific procedures for submission:

- 1. You are invited to submit a list of scholars who would be appropriate reviewers of your manuscript. The Editor will refer to this list in selecting reviewers, though there obviously can be no guarantee that those you suggest will actually be chosen. Do not list anyone who has already commented on your paper or an earlier version of it, or any of your current or recent collaborators, institutional colleagues, mentors, students, or close friends.
- 2. Submit five copies of manuscripts and a diskette containing the word-processed version of the manuscript. Please ensure that the paper and diskette versions you submit are identical; the diskette version should be of the fully identified copy (see below). Please review all pages of all copies to make sure that all copies contain all tables, figures, appendices, and bibliography mentioned in the manuscript and that all pages are legible. Label the diskette clearly with the (first) author's name and the title of the manuscript (in abridged form if need be), and identify the word processing program and operating system.
- To comply with the APSR's procedure of doubleblind peer reviews, only one of the five copies submitted should be fully identified as to authorship and four should be in anonymous format.
- 4. For anonymous copies, if it is important to the development of the paper that your previous publications be cited, please do this in a way that does not make the authorship of the submitted paper obvious. This is usually most easily accomplished

- by referring to yourself in the third person and including normal references to the work cited in the list of references. In no circumstances should your prior publications be included in the bibliography in their normal alphabetical location but with your name deleted. Assuming that text references to your previous work are in the third person, you should include full citations as usual in the bibliography. Please discuss the use of other procedures to render manuscripts anonymous with the Editor prior to submission. You should not thank colleagues in notes or elsewhere in the body of the paper or mention institution names, web page addresses, or other potentially identifying information. All acknowledgments must appear on the title page of the identified copy only. Manuscripts that are judged not anonymous will not be reviewed.
- 5. The first page of the four anonymous copies should contain only the title and an abstract of no more than 150 words. The first page of the identified copy should contain (a) the name, academic rank, institutional affiliation, and contact information (mailing address, telephone, fax, e-mail address) for all authors; (b) in the case of multiple authors, an indication of the author who will receive correspondence; (c) any relevant citations to your previous work that have been omitted from the anonymous copies; and (d) acknowledgments, including the names of anyone who has provided comments on the manuscript. If the identified copy contains any unique references or is worded differently in any way, please mark this copy with "Contains author citations" at the top of the first page.

No copies of submitted manuscripts can be returned.

ELECTRONIC ACCESS TO THE APSR

Back issues of the APSR are available in several electronic formats and through several vendors. Except for the last three years (as an annually "moving wall"), back issues of the APSR beginning with Volume 1, Number 1 (November 1906), are available on-line through JSTOR (http://wwwjstor.org/). At present, JSTOR's complete journal collection is available only via institutional subscription, e.g., through many college and university libraries. For APSA members who do not have access to an institutional subscription to JSTOR, individual subscriptions to its APSR content are available. Please contact Member Services at APSA for further information, including annual subscription fees.

Individual members of the American Political Science Association can access recent issues of the APSR and PS through the APSA website (www.apsanet.org) with their username and password. Individual nonmember access to the online edition will also be available, but only through institutions that hold either a print-plus-electronic subscription or an electronic-only subscription, provided the institution has registered and activated its online subscription.

Full text access to current issues of both the APSR and PS is also available on-line by library subscription from a number of database vendors. Currently, these include University Microfilms Inc. (UMI) (via its CD-ROMs General Periodicals Online and Social Science Index and the on-line database ProQuest Direct), Online Computer Library Center (OCLC) (through its on-line database First Search as well as on CD-ROMs and magnetic tape), and the Information Access Company (IAC) (through its products Expanded Academic Index, InfoTrac, and several on-line services [see below]). Others may be added from time to time.

The APSR is also available on databases through six online services: Datastar (Datastar), Business Library (Dow Jones), Cognito (IAC), Encarta Online Library (IAC), IAC Business (Dialog), and Newsearch (Dialog).

The editorial office of the APSR is not involved in the subscription process to either JSTOR for back issues or the other vendors for current issues. Please contact APSA, your reference librarian, or the database vendor for further information about availability.

BOOK REVIEWS

All books for review should be sent directly to the APSR Book Review Editors, Susan Bickford and Greg McAvoy. The address is Susan Bickford and Gregory McAvoy, American Political Science Review Book Review Editors, Department of Political Science, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, CB No. 3265, Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3265. E-mail: bickford@email.unc.edu; gemcavoy@uncg.edu.

If you are the author of a book you wish to be considered for review, please ask your publisher to send a copy to the APSR Book Review Editors per the mailing instructions above. If you are interested in reviewing books for the APSR, please send your vita to the Book Review Editors; you should not ask to review a specific book.

OTHER CORRESPONDENCE

The American Political Science Association's address, telephone, and fax are 1527 New Hampshire Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036, (202) 483-2512 (voice), and (202) 483-2657 (fax). E-mail: apsa@apsanet.org. Please direct correspondence as follows.

Information, including news and notes, for PS:

Dr. Robert J-P. Hauck, Editor, PS E-mail: rhauck@apsanet.org

Circulation and subscription correspondence (domestic claims for nonreceipt of issues must be made within four months of the month of publication; overseas claims, within eight months):

Elizabeth Weaver Engel, Director of Member Services

E-mail: membership@apsanet.org

Reprint permissions:

Ed Lamb

E-mail: elamb@apsanet.org

Advertising information and rates:

Laura Barrantes, Advertising Manager E-mail: ibarrantes@apsanet.org

EXPEDITING REQUESTS FOR COPYING APSR AND PS ARTICLES FOR CLASS USE AND OTHER PURPOSES

Class Use

The Comprehensive Publisher Photocopy Agreement between APSA and the Copyright Clearance Center (CCC) permits bookstores and copy centers to receive expedited clearance to copy articles from the APSR and PS in compliance with the Association's policies and applicable fees. The general fee for articles is 75 cents per copy. However, current Association policy levies no fee for the first 10 copies of a printed article, whether in course packs or on reserve. Smaller classes that rely heavily on articles (i.e., upper-level undergraduate and graduate classes) can take advantage of this provision, and faculty ordering 10 or fewer course packs should bring it to the attention of course pack providers. APSA policy also permits free use of the electronic library reserve, with no limit on the number of students who can access the electronic reserve. Both large and small classes that rely on these articles can take advantage of this provision. The CCC's address, telephone, and fax are 222 Rosewood Drive, Danvers, MA 01923, (978) 750-8400 (voice), and (978) 750-4474 (fax). This agreement pertains only to the reproduction and distribution of APSA materials as hard copies (e.g., photocopies, microfilm, and microfiche).

The Association of American Publishers (AAP) has created a standardized form for college faculty to submit to a copy center or bookstore to request copyrighted material for course packs. The form is available through the CCC, which will handle copyright permissions.

APSA also has a separate agreement pertaining to CCC's Academic E-Reserve Service. This agreement allows electronic access for students and instructors of a designated class at a designated institution for a specified article or set of articles in electronic format. Access is by password for the duration of a class.

Please contact your librarian, the CCC, or the APSA Reprints Department for further information.

APSR Authors

If you are the author of an APSR article, you may use your article in course packs or other printed materials without payment of royalty fees and you may post it at personal or institutional web sites as long as the APSA copyright notice is included.

Other Uses of APSA-Copyrighted Materials

For any further copyright issues, please contact the APSA Reprints Department.

INDEXING

Articles appearing in the APSR before June 1953 were indexed in The Reader's Guide to Periodical Literature. Current issues are indexed in ABC Pol Sci; America, History and Life 1954—; Book Review Index; Current Contents: Social and Behavioral Sciences; EconLit; Energy Information Abstracts; Environmental Abstracts; Historical Abstracts; Index of Economic Articles; Information Service Bulletin; International Index; International Political Science Abstracts; the Journal of Economic Literature; Periodical Abstracts; Public Affairs; Recently Published Articles; Reference Sources; Social Sciences and Humanities Index; Social Sciences Index; Social Work Research and Abstracts; and Writings on American History. Some of these sources may be available in electronic form through local public or educational libraries. Microfilm of the APSR, beginning with Volume 1, and the index of the APSR through 1969 are available through University Microfilms Inc., 300 North Zeeb Road, Ann Arbor, MI 48106 (www.umi.com). The Cumulative Index to the American Political Science Review, Volumes 63 to 89: 1969–95, is available through the APSA.

Theories of War in an Era of Leading-Power Peace Presidential Address, American Political Science Association, 2001

ROBERT JERVIS Columbia University

The motor of international politics has been war among the leading states. The most developed states in the international system—the United States, Western Europe, and Japan—form what Karl Deutsch called a security community, which is a group of countries among which war is unthinkable. These states are the most powerful ones in the world and, so, are traditional rivals. Thus the change is striking and consequential. Constructivists explain this in terms of changed ideas and identities; liberals point to democracy and economic interest; realists stress the role of nuclear weapons and American hegemony. My own explanation combines the high cost of war, the gains from peace, and the values that are prevalent within the security community. Whatever the cause, the existence of the community will bring with it major changes in international politics and calls into question many traditional theories of war.

From the most remote ages onward, the peoples have perpetually assailed one another for the satisfaction of their appetites and their egotistical interests [and their fears]. I have not made this history, and neither have you. It is. (Georges Clemenceau, December 29, 1918 quoted by Osiander 1994, 265)

A new science of politics is needed for a new world. [Tocqueville (1835) 1945, 7]

7 ar and the possibility of war among the great powers have been the motor of international politics, not only strongly influencing the boundaries and distribution of values among them, but deeply affecting their internal arrangements and shaping the fates of smaller states. Being seen as an ever-present possibility produced by deeply rooted factors such as human nature and the lack of world government, these forces were expected to continue indefinitely. But I would argue that war among the leading great powers—the most developed states of the United States, West Europe, and Japan-will not occur in the future, and indeed is no longer a source of concern for them (Mueller 1989; also see Adler 1992; Duffield 2001; Goldgeier and McFaul 1992; Jervis 1991/1992; Mandelbaum 1998/1999; Shaw 1994; Singer and Wildavsky 1993; Ullman 1991; Van Evera 1990/1991). The absence of war among these states would itself be a development of enormous proportions, but the change goes even farther because war is not even contemplated. During the Cold War peace was maintained, but this was due to the fear that if the superpowers did not take care, they would indeed fight.

Now, however, the leading states form what Karl Deutsch called a pluralistic security community, a group among whom war is literally unthinkable—i.e., neither the publics nor the political elites nor even the military establishments expect war with each other (Deutsch et al. 1957; also see Adler and Barnett 1998; Melko 1973). No official in the Community would advocate a policy on the grounds that it would improve the state's position in the event of war with other members. Although no state can move away from the reliance on war by itself lest it become a victim, the collectivity can do so if each forsakes the resort to force.

Security communities are not unprecedented. But what is unprecedented is that the states that constitute this one are the leading members of the international system and so are natural rivals that in the past were central to the violent struggle for security, power, and contested values. Winston Churchill exaggerated only slightly when he declared that "people talked a lot of nonsense when they said nothing was ever settled by war. Nothing in history was ever settled except by wars" (quoted by Gilbert 1983, 860-1). Even cases of major change without war, such as Britain yielding hegemony in the Western Hemisphere to the United States at the turn of the 20th century, were strongly influenced by security calculations. Threatening war, preparing for it, and trying to avoid it have permeated all aspects of politics, and so a world in which war among the most developed states is unthinkable will be a new one. To paraphrase and extend a claim made by Evan Luard (1986, 77), given the scale and frequency of war among the great powers in the proceeding millennia, this is a change of spectacular proportions, perhaps the single most striking discontinuity that the history of international politics has anywhere provided.

Two major states, Russia and China, might fight each other or a member of the Community. But, as I discuss below, such a conflict would be different from traditional wars between great powers. Furthermore, these countries lack many of the attributes of great powers: their internal regimes are shaky, they are not at the forefront of any advanced forms of technology or economic organization, they can pose challenges only regionally, and they have no attraction as models for others. They are not among the most developed states and I think it would be fair to put them outside the ranks of the great powers as well. But their military potential, their possession of nuclear weapons, and the size of their economies renders that judgment easily debatable and so I will not press it but rather will argue that the set of states that form the Community are not all the great powers, but all the most developed ones.

Robert Jervis is Adlai E. Stevenson Professor of International Politics, Columbia University, 1333 International Affairs Building, New York, NY 10027 (rlj1@columbia.edu).

&lt;sup>1</sup> One reason for the difference between my analysis and Mearsheimer's (2001) is that he focuses more on the danger of a war with Russia or China.

Other states generally seen as Western also could fight, most obviously Greece and Turkey. Despite their common membership in NATO, the conflicts of interest are severe enough to lead each to contemplate war with the other. Neither is a leading power so this does not disturb my argument, although a thought-experiment that would transform them into such states without diminishing their animosity would.

CENTRAL QUESTIONS

Five questions arise. First, does the existence of the Community mean the end of security threats to its members and, more specifically, to the United States? Second, will the Community endure? Third, what are the causes of its construction and maintenance? Fourth, what are the implications of this transformation for the conduct of international affairs? Finally, what does this say about theories of the causes of war?

CONTINUED THREATS

The fact that the United States is not menaced by the most developed countries obviously does not mean that it does not face any military threats. Indeed, even before September 11 some analysts saw the United States as no more secure than it was during the Cold War, being imperiled by terrorists and "rogue" states, in addition to Russia and China.<sup>2</sup> But even if I am wrong to believe that these claims are exaggerated, representing the political and psychological propensity for the "conservation of enemies" (Hartmann 1982; Mueller 1994); these conflicts do not have the potential to drive world politics the way that clashes among the leading powers did in the past. They do not permeate all facets of international politics and structure state—society relations; they do not represent a struggle for dominance in the international system or a direct challenge to American vital interests.

Even the fiercest foes of Russia, China, or the rogues do not see them as ready to launch unprovoked attacks against the United States or other members of the Community, let alone as out to control the world. Russia and China are not seeking to replace the United States: any clash will come out of these countries' desire for a sphere of influence and the American belief that such arrangements are inappropriate in today's world-at least for others. Thus while there are reasons why the United States might fight the PRC to protect Taiwan or Russia to protect the Baltic republics, these disputes are not like those that characterized great power conflicts over the past three centuries. The United States is defending not traditional national interests, let alone vital ones, but, in seeking what Wolfers (1962, 73–6) called "milieu goals," upholding values such as democracy, self-determination, and rejection of coercion as a means of changing the status quo. These may be deeply held both for their intrinsic value and for their role in maintaining America's worldwide reach, but they are more akin to the concerns of imperial powers than to sources of conflict between equal major powers.

WILL THE SECURITY COMMUNITY LAST?

Predictions about the maintenance of the Community are obviously disputable (indeed, limitations on people's ability to predict could undermine it), but nothing in the short period since the end of the Cold War points to an unraveling. The disputes within it do not seem to be increasing in number or severity and even analysts who stress the continuation of the struggle for world primacy and great power rivalries do not expect fighting [Huntington 1993; Kupchan forthcoming; Waltz 1993, 2000; however, Calleo (2001), Layne (2000), and Mearsheimer (1990, 2001) are ambiguous on this point]. If the United States is still concerned with maintaining its advantages over its allies, the reason is not that it believes that it may have to fight them but that it worries that rivalry could make managing world problems more difficult (Layne 2000; New York Times, March 8, 1992, 14; May 24, 1992, 1, 14). The Europeans' effort to establish an independent security force is aimed at permitting them to intervene when the United States chooses not to (or perhaps by threatening such action, to trigger American intervention). not at fighting the United States. Even if Europe were to unite and the world to become bipolar again, it is very unlikely that suspicions, fears for the future, and conflicts of interest would be severe enough to break the Community.

A greater threat would be the failure of Europe to unite coupled with an American withdrawal of forces, which could lead to "security competition" within Europe (Art 1996a; Mearsheimer 2001, 385–96). The fears would focus on Germany, but their magnitude is hard to gauge and it is difficult to estimate what external shocks or kinds of German behavior would activate them. The fact that Thatcher and Mitterrand opposed German unification is surely not forgotten in Germany and is an indication that concerns remain. But this danger is likely to constitute a self-denying prophecy in two ways. First, many Germans are aware of the need not only to reassure others by tying themselves to Europe, but also to make it unlikely that future generations of Germans would want to break these bonds even if they could. Second, Americans who worry about the residual danger will favor keeping some troops in Europe as the ultimate intra-European security guarantee.

&lt;sup>2</sup> This paper was completed on September 10 and the obvious question is how the next day's events affect the analysis. Although terrorism of this unprecedented magnitude is horrifying and will have a significant impact on domestic and international politics, I do not think it has the potential to be a functional substitute for great power war and be the driving force of politics. The world is not likely to unite to combat terrorism. Not only are the forms and sources of this scourge varied, but states have many other competing interests and leaders may sometimes find terrorism a useful tool. Indeed by calling for a war against terrorism with a global reach (i.e., able to kill Americans), the United States has indicated both that its narrow interests are primary and that it is hopeless if not undesirable to seek an end to all terror. The United States asks other countries to put aside their individual goals, calls on India and Pakistan to "stand down" to facilitate the campaign against Al Qaeda, and tells Israel and the PLO to stop shooting so that Muslim opinion will not be further inflamed. But these and other countries have concerns that are more important to them than combating terrorism and in a fairly short period of time previous outlooks and conflicts of interest will reassert themselves. Absent the use of nuclear weapons or large-scale biological attacks, I think, that, looking back 10 or 20 years from now, these terrorist incidents and the campaign against them will loom less large than the turning points of the 20th century, such as World War II and the end of the Cold War.

Expectations of peace close off important routes to war. The main reason for Japanese aggression in the 1930s was the desire for a self-sufficient sphere that would permit Japan to fight the war with the Western powers that was seen as inevitable, not because of particular conflicts, but because it was believed that great powers always fight each other. In contrast, if states believe that a security community will last, they will not be hypersensitive to threats from within it and will not feel the need to undertake precautionary measures that could undermine the security of other members. Thus the United States is not disturbed that British and French nuclear missiles could destroy American cities, and while those two countries object to American plans for missile defense, they do not feel the need to increase their forces in response. As long as peace is believed to be very likely, the chance of inadvertent spirals of tension and threat is low.

Nevertheless, the point with which I began this section is unavoidable. World politics can change rapidly and saying that nothing foreseeable will dissolve the Community its not the same as saying that it will not dissolve (Betts 1992). To the extent that it rests on democracy and prosperity (see below), anything that would undermine these would also undermine the Community. Drastic climate change could also shake the foundations of much that we have come to take for granted. But it is hard to see how dynamics at the international level (i.e., the normal trajectory of fears, disputes, and rivalries) could produce war among the leading states. In other words, the Community does not have within it the seeds of its own destruction.

Our faith in the continuation of this peace is increased to the extent that we think we understand its causes and have reason to believe that they will continue. This is our next topic.

EXPLANATIONS FOR THE SECURITY COMMUNITY

There are social constructivist, liberal, and realist explanations for the Community which, although preceding from different assumptions, invoke overlapping factors.3

Constructivism

Constructivism points to the norms of non-violence and shared identities that have led the advanced democracies to assume the role of each other's friend through the interaction of behavior and expectations.4 In contradistinction to the liberal and realist explanations, this downplays the importance of material factors and elevates ideas, images of oneself and others, and conceptions of appropriate conduct. The roots of the changes that have produced this enormous shift in international politics among some countries but not others are not specified in detail, but the process is a selfreinforcing one—a benign cycle of behavior, beliefs, and expectations.

People become socialized into attitudes, beliefs, and values that are conducive to peace. Individuals in the Community may see their own country as strong and good—and even better than others—but they do not espouse the virulent nationalism that was common in the past. Before World War I, one German figure could proclaim that the Germans were "the greatest civilized people known to history," while another declared that the Germans were "the chosen people of this century," which explains "why other people hate us. They do not understand us but they fear our tremendous spiritual superiority." Thomas Macaulay similarly wrote that the British were "the greatest and most highly civilized people that ever the world saw" and were "the acknowledged leaders of the human race in the causes of political improvement," while Senator Albert Beveridge proclaimed that "God has made us the master organizers of the world." These sentiments are shocking today because they are so at variance from what we have been taught to think about others and ourselves. We could not adopt these views without rejecting a broad set of beliefs and values. An understanding of the effects of such conceptions led the Europeans, and to an unfortunately lesser extent the Japanese, to denationalize and harmonize their textbooks after World War II and has similarly led countries with remaining enemies to follow a different path: the goals for the education of a 12year-old child in Pakistan include the "ability to know all about India's evil designs about Pakistan; acknowledge and identify forces that may be working against Pakistan: understand the Kashmir problem" (quoted by Kumar 2001, 29).

For constructivists, the fact that all members of the Community are democracies is important not so much for the reasons given by liberals (see below) as for the sense of common identity that the similarity in regime has generated (Hampton 1998/1999, 240-4;

<sup>3</sup> Less popular in the United States is a neo-Marxist account of the need and possibilities for capitalists in the advanced industrial countries to work together to maintain their positions of dominancewhat Kautsky called ultraimperialism at a time when most Marxists thought that classical imperialism would bring the European countries to fight each other. For discussions, see Gill (1990), Halliday (1994, Chap. 3), Shaw (2000, Chaps. 6-9), and Van der Pijl (1998); also see Barkawi and Laffey (1999).

&lt;sup>4</sup> Wendt (1999) draws here on the social-psychological work of M. Deutsch (1973), which is not well known to political scientists. For a discussion of the central role of interactions in politics, see Jervis (1997).

Quoted by Van Evera (1984, 27); this article provides a thorough discussion of the relationship between nationalism and war. For a more pessimistic view, see Mearsheimer (1990, 20-21, 25).

Kahl 1998/1999; Risse-Kappen 1995; Wendt 1999, 353-7). The formation of common identities has been central to national integration (Cronin 1999; Deutsch 1953), and it stands to reason that it plays a major role not only in keeping states at peace, but in making war unthinkable. The evidence for shared identity within the Community is hard to find, however, or at least has not been produced (Cederman 2001). Moreover, constructivists say little about when and why shared identities disintegrate, as they do when a country lapses into civil war (Arfi 1998). Ironically, the spread of democracy might diminish the importance of democratic identity. The sense that being democratic is a vital part of one's self (as an individual or as a country) may diminish if it becomes less distinctive. Being democratic is highly salient when most others are not and when adversaries are hostile to democracy; in a world that is predominantly democratic, sources of identity may be different and more divisive.

The obvious objection to constructivism is that it mistakes effect for cause: its description is correct, but the identities, images, and self-images are superstructure, being the product of peace and of the material incentives discussed below. What is crucial is not people's thinking, but the factors that drive it.6 The validity of this claim is beyond the reach of current evidence, but what it clear is that the constructivist belief that the Community will last places great faith in the power of socialization and the ability of ideas to replicate and sustain themselves. This conception may betray an excessive faith in the validity of ideas that seem self-evident today but that our successors might reject. Constructivism may present us with actors who are "over-socialized" (Wrong 1976, Chap. 2) and leave too little role for agency in the form of people who think differently, perhaps because their material conditions are different.

Liberalism

The liberal explanation has received most attention. Although it comes in several variants, the central strands are the pacifying effects of democracy, economic interdependence, and joint membership in international organizations (Russett and Oneal 2001).

Democracy. The members of the Community are democracies, and many scholars argue that democracies rarely if ever fight each other. Although the statistical evidence is, as usual, subject to debate, Jack Levy (1989, 88) is correct that this claim is "as close as anything we have to an empirical law in international politics."

Less secure, however, is our understanding of why this is the case. We have numerous explanations, which can be seen as competing or complementary. Democracies are systems of dispersed power, and dispersed power means multiple veto points and groups that could block war. (This seems true almost by definition, but if the accounts of former Soviet leaders are to be trusted, Brezhnev was more constrained by his colleagues than was Nixon, at least where arms control was concerned.) Related are the norms of these regimes: democracies function through compromise, nonviolence, and respect for law. To the extent that these values and habits govern foreign policy, they are conducive to peace, especially in relations with other democracies who reciprocate.

Other scholars have argued that the key element lies in the realm of information. By having a relatively free flow of intelligence and encouraging debate, democracies are less likely to make egregious errors in estimating what courses of action will maintain the peace (White 1990). The other side of the informational coin is that democracies can more effectively commit themselves and telegraph their intentions, and so avoid both unnecessary spirals of conflict and wars that stem from others' incorrect beliefs that the democracy is bluffing (although an obvious cost is an inability to bluff) (Fearon 1994; Schultz 2001; for qualifications and doubts, see Finel and Lord 2000).

The two parts of the informational argument can reinforce or be in tension with each other. If democratic processes make behavior highly predictable, then even dictatorships should be able to estimate what they will do, thereby reducing the distinctiveness of interactions among democracies. In fact, this does not seem to be the case, as the misjudgments of Hitler, Stalin and Saddam Hussein make clear. If democratic processes do not provide totally unambiguous evidence, however, one can conclude that predictability will be high only when each side both sends and receives information clearly, thereby explaining the advantages of democratic dyads.

Finally, in a recasting of the traditional argument that democracies are less likely to go to war because those who hold ultimate authority (i.e., the general public) will pay the price for conflict, some argue that the institutional and coalitional nature of democratic regimes requires their leaders to pursue successful policies if they are to stay in office (Bueno de Mesquita, Morrow, Siverson, and Smith 1999; Goemans 2000; a related argument is Snyder 1991). Thus democracies will put greater efforts into winning wars and be careful to choose to fight only wars they can win (Lake 1992; Reiter and Stam 1998). Autocracies have a narrower base and so can stay in power by buying off their supporters even if their foreign policies are unnecessarily costly. These arguments, while highly suggestive, share with earlier liberal thinking quite stylized assumptions about the preferences of societal actors and pay little attention to how each country anticipates the behavior of others and assesses how others expect it to behave.

&lt;sup>6</sup> In fact Wendt's analysis relies heavily on changed material circumstances, in contradiction to his theoretical formulation (1999, 343–66).

<sup>7</sup> The literature is voluminous: for good summaries see Ray (1995, 1998), Russett (1993), and Russett and Oneal (2001 Chaps. 2 and 3); for critiques see Gowa (1999) and Mares (2001, Chap. 4). Other scholars argue that the benign behavior is a product not of the broad category of democracy, but of the subset that are liberal and/or mature (Owen 1997; Mansfield and Snyder 1995; Ward and Gleditsch 1999)

For the latest exchange see Green et al. (2001), Oneal and Russett (2001), Beck and Katz (2001), and King (2001).

The explanations for the democratic peace are thoughtful and often ingenious, but not conclusive. Many of them lead us to expect not only dyadic effects, but monadic ones as well—i.e., democracies should be generally peaceful, not just peaceful toward each other, a finding that most scholars deny (but not all: Rummel 1995). They also imply that one democracy would not seek to overthrow another, a proposition that is contradicted by American behavior during the Cold War. Furthermore, most of the arguments are built around dyads but it is not entirely clear that the posited causes would apply to multilateral groupings like the Community.

The more recent arguments implicitly dispute rather than fully engage older ones that focus on the obstacles to effective foreign policies in democracies: the fickleness of public opinion, the incentives that leaders have to seek short-run success at the cost of investing for the long run, the recruitment of inexperienced leaders, the parochialism that makes democracies prone to misunderstand others (Almond 1950; Lippmann 1955). Because extensive citizen participation can easily lead to emotional identification with the country, high levels of nationalism can be expected in democracies. Because public opinion has greater influence and pays only sporadic attention to foreign policy, consistency and commitments should be harder rather than easier for them. These once-familiar views may be incorrect, but they deserve careful attention.

The causal role of democracy is hard to establish because these regimes have been relatively rare until recently, much of the democratic peace can be explained by the Soviet threat, and the same factors that lead countries to become democratic are conducive to peace between them [e.g., being relatively rich and secure, resolving regional disputes (Thompson 1996)]. It is particularly important and difficult to control for the role of common interest, which loomed so large during the Cold War (Farber and Gowa 1995, 1997; also see Elman 1997; Layne 1994). But interests are not objective and may be strongly influenced by the country's internal regime. Thus the democracies may have made common cause during the Cold War in part because they were democracies; common interest may be a mechanism by which the democratic peace is sustained as much as it is a competing explanation for it (for this and related issues, see Gartzke 1998, 2000; Maoz 1997; Oneal and Russett 1999; Schweller 2000). Moreover, if democracies are more likely to become economically interdependent with one another, additional common interest will be created. But to bring up the importance of interest is to highlight an ambiguity and raise a question. The ambiguity is whether the theory leads us to expect democracies never to fight each other or "merely" to fight less than do other dyads. 10 The related hypothetical question is whether it impossible for two democracies to have a conflict of interest so severe that it leads to war. This troubles the stronger version of the argument because it is hard to answer in the affirmative.

But would democracies let such a potent conflict of interest develop? As striking as the statistical data is the fact—or rather the judgment—that the regimes that most disturbed the international order in the 20th century also devastated their own peoples—the USSR, Germany under the Nazis and, perhaps, under Kaiser Wilhelm. One reason for this connection may be the desire to remake the world (but because the international order was established by countries that were advanced democracies, it may not be surprising that those who opposed it were not). Not all murderous regimes are as ambitions (e.g., Idi Amin's Uganda), and others with both power and grand designs may remain restrained (e.g., Mao's China), but it is hard to understand the disruptive German and Soviet foreign policy without reference to their domestic regimes.

Interdependence. The second leg of the liberal explanation for the Community is the high level of economic interdependence, which also could facilitate a common identity (Wendt 1994, 1999, 344-9), as earlier functional theorists of integration argued (Sterling-Folker 2000, 106–7). The basic argument was developed by Cobden, Bright, and the other 19th-century British liberals. As Cobden put it, "Free Trade is God's diplomacy and there is no other certain way of uniting people in bonds of peace." 11 Although the evidence for this proposition remains in dispute, the causal story is straightforward. "If goods cannot cross borders, armies will" is the central claim, in the words of the 19th-century French economist Frederick Bastiat, which were often repeated by Secretary of State Cordell Hull. 12 Extensive economic intercourse allows states to gain by trade the wealth that they would otherwise seek through fighting (Knorr 1966; Rosecrance 1986, 1999). Relatedly, individuals and groups develop a powerful stake in keeping the peace and maintaining good relations (but for evidence that bad relations do not necessarily impede trade, see Barbieri and Levy 1999). Thus it is particularly significant that in the contemporary world many firms have important ties abroad and that direct foreign investment holds the fates of important actors hostage to continued good relations (Milner 1988; Rosecrance 1986, Chap. 7). There can be a benign cycle here as increasing levels of trade strengthen the political power of actors who have a stake in deepening these ties (see, e.g., James and Lake 1989; Milner 1988). Furthermore, interdependence is more politically potent than it was in earlier eras because political leaders are now held accountable for the state of the economy and will be punished for a downturn.

&lt;sup>9</sup> For his discussion of what he deems an "important anomaly," see Russett (1993, 120-4); for a rebuttal see Mares (2001, 102-4).
<sup>10</sup> Most scholars take the latter view, but this does not mean that this is what most versions of the theory actually imply.

&lt;sup>11</sup> Quoted by Bourne (1970, 85). For a general treatment of Cobden's views, see Cain (1979). For the most recent evidence, see McMillan (1997) and Russett and Oneal (2001, Chap. 4); for arguments that interdependence has been exaggerated and misunderstood, see Waltz (1970, 1979, Chap. 7, 1999). Most traditional liberal thinking and the rest of my brief discussion assumes symmetry; as Hirschman (1945) showed, asymmetric dependence can provide the basis for exploitative bargaining.
<sup>12</sup> Hull (1948, 355, 363–5) gives his views, although not the phrase.

The liberal view assumes that actors place a high priority on wealth, that trade is a better route to it than conquest, and that actors who gain economically from the exchange are politically powerful. These assumptions are often true, especially in the modern world, but are not without their vulnerabilities. At times honor and glory, in addition to more traditional forms of individual and national interest, can be more salient than economic gain. Thus as the Moroccan crisis of 1911 came to a head, General von Moltke wrote to his wife: "If we again slip away from this affair with our tail between our legs.... I shall despair of the future of the German Empire. I shall then retire. But before handing in my resignation I shall move to abolish the Army and to place ourselves under Japanese protectorate; we shall then be in a position to make money without interference and to develop into ninnies" (quoted by Berghahn 1973, 97). Traditional liberal thought understood this well and stressed that economic activity was so potent not only because it gave people an interest in maintaining peace, but because it reconstructed social values to downgrade status and glory and elevate material well-being (Hirschman 1977, 1986, Chaps. 3, 5; Schumpeter 1934). It follows that the stability of the Community rests in part upon people giving priority to consumption. Critics decry modern society's individualistic, material values, but one can easily imagine others that would generate greater international conflict.

Of course conquest can also bring wealth. The conventional wisdom that this is no longer true for modern economies, which depend less on agriculture and raw materials than on the intricate web of skilled tasks, has been challenged by Liberman's careful study of 20th-century conquests (1996a; also see Mearsheimer 2001, 148–52; for a partial rebuttal see Brooks 1999). But the net benefit from trade might have been even greater, especially when we consider the costs of arming and fighting. It also is not clear that conquered people will provide the innovation and ingenuity that produce wealth over the long run.

Here as elsewhere, expectations are crucial and this both strengthens and weakens the liberal argument. It strengthens it to the extent that most people believe that high levels of economic exchange strongly contribute to prosperity and expect tensions, let alone wars, to decrease trade and prosperity. But it is also important that people expect good economic relations to continue as long as their country does not disturb them. Since people set their policies by the predicted future benefits, even high levels of beneficial exchange will be ineffective if a deterioration is foreseen (Copeland 1996, 1999-2000).

Interdependence will have its pacifying effect only if actors who benefit from it are powerful. American social scientists often take for granted the model of contemporary American society in which this is the case and overlook the fact it is not universal. Thus Ripsman and Blanchard (1996/1997) note that while leading businessmen in Britain and Germany opposed World War I, just as liberalism leads us to expect, they were not powerful enough to force their preferences on their governments.

There are four general arguments against the pacific influence of interdependence. First, it is hard to go from the magnitude of economic flows to the costs that would be incurred if they were disrupted, and even more difficult to estimate how much political impact these costs will have, which depends on the other considerations at play and the political context. This means that we do not have a theory that tells us the magnitude of the effect. Second, even the sign of the effect can be disputed: interdependence can increase conflict as states gain bargaining leverage over each other, fear that others will exploit them, and face additional sources of disputes (Barbieri 1996; Keohane 2000, 2001; Waltz 1970, 1979, Chap. 7). These effects might not arise if states expect to remain at peace with each other, however. Third, it is clear that interdependence does not guarantee peace. High levels of economic integration did not prevent World War I, and nations that were much more unified than any security community have peacefully dissolved or fought civil wars. But this does not mean that interdependence is not conducive to peace.

Fourth, interdependence may be more an effect than a cause, more the product than a generator of expectations of peace and cooperation. Russett and Oneal (2001, 136) try to meet this objection by correlating the level of trade in one year, not with peace in that year, but with peace in the following one. But this does not get to the heart of the matter since trade the year before could be a product of expectations of future good relations.

Short of onerous and subjective coding of large numbers of cases to establish expectations about future relations, it may not be possible to ascertain which way the causal arrow runs. Indeed, it probably runs in both directions, with magnitudes that vary with other factors. But it is clear that the economic order in the current Community was premised on the belief that these countries could and had to remain at peace. One part of the reason was the lessons of the 1930s and the belief that economic rivalries led to political divisions and wars. Another part was the perceived threat from the Soviet Union, which, as Gowa (1994) has noted, meant that the fear of relative economic gains was eased if not reversed because partners' economic growth brought with it positive security externalities. This created a situation very different from that in the early 20th century when Britain and Germany, while heavily trading with each other, feared that the other's prosperity would endanger it. As one British observer put it after a trip to Germany in 1909: "every one of those new factory chimneys is a gun pointed at England" (quoted by Kennedy 1980, 315; but also see Liberman 1996b). Post-1945 European economic cooperation probably would not have occurred without American sponsorship, pressure, and security guarantees, and close American economic relations with Japan had similar political roots.

International Organizations. Even those who argue for the pacifying effect of common memberships in international organizations aver that the magnitude of this effect is relatively slight, at least in the short run (Russett and Oneal 2001, Chap. 5), and so my discussion is brief. The causal mechanisms are believed to be several: enhanced information flows, greater ability to solve problems peacefully, an increased stake in cooperative behavior linked to the risk of being excluded from the organization if the state behaves badly, and possibly a heightened sense of common identity (Keohane 1984; much of the literature is summarized by Martin and Simmons 1998). Harder to pin down but perhaps most important are processes by which joint membership alters states' conceptions of their interest, leading them to see it not only as calling for cooperative reciprocations, but also as extending over a longer time-horizon and including benefits to others (Jervis 1999, 2001; March and Olsen 1998).

The obvious reasons to doubt the importance of shared institutional membership are that the incentives do not seem great enough to tame strong conflicts of interest and that membership may be endogenous to common interests and peaceful relations. States that expect war with each other are less likely to join the same international organizations and political conflicts that are the precursors to war may destroy the institutions or drive some members out, as Japan and Germany withdrew from the League of Nations during the 1930s. Even with a strong correlation and reasonable control variables, the direction of causality is difficult to establish.

Realist Explanations

The crudest realist explanation for the Community would focus on the rise of the common threat from Russia and China. While not entirely implausible, this argument does not fit the views espoused by most elites in Japan and Europe, who are relatively unconcerned about these countries and believe that whatever dangers emanate from them would be magnified rather than decreased by a confrontational policy.

American Hegemony. Two other realist accounts are stronger. The first argues that the Community is largely the product of the other enormous change in world politics—the American dominance of world politics.<sup>13</sup> U.S. defense spending, to take the most easily quantifiable indicator, is now greater than that of the next eight countries combined (O'Hanlon 2001, 4-5). Furthermore, thanks to the Japanese constitution and the integration of armed forces within NATO, America's allies do not have to fear attacks from each other: their militaries—especially Germany's—are so truncated that they could not fight a major war without American assistance or attack each other without undertaking a military build-up that would give a great deal of warning. American dominance also leads us to expect that key outcomes, from the expansion of NATO, to the American-led wars in Kosovo and the Persian Gulf, to the IMF bailouts of Turkey and Argentina in the spring and summer of 2001 and the abandonment of the latter six months later, will conform to American preferences.

But closer examination reveals differences between current and past hegemonies. The U.S. usually gives considerable weight to its partners' views, and indeed its own preferences are often influenced by theirs, as was true in Kosovo. For their parts, the other members of the Community seek to harness and constrain American power, not displace it. The American hegemony will surely eventually decay but increased European and Japanese strength need not lead to war, contrary to the expectations of standard theories of hegemony and great power rivalry. Unlike previous eras of hegemony, the current peace seems uncoerced and accepted by most states, which does not fit entirely well with realism.

Nuclear Weapons. The second realist argument was familiar during the Cold War but receives less attention now. This is the pacifying effect of nuclear weapons, which, if possessed in sufficient numbers and invulnerable configurations, make victory impossible and war a feckless option. An immediate objection is that not all the major states in the Community have nuclear weapons. But this is only technically correct: Germany and Japan could produce nuclear weapons if a threat loomed, as their partners fully understand. The other factors discussed in the previous pages may or may not be important; the nuclear revolution by itself would be sufficient to keep the great powers at peace.

While there is a great deal to this argument, it is not without its problems. First, because this kind of deterrence rests on the perceived possibility of war, it may explain peace, but not a security community. Second, mutual deterrence can be used as a platform for hostility, coercion, and even limited wars. In what Glenn Snyder (1965; also see Jervis 1989, 19-23, 74-106) calls the stability-instability paradox, the common realization that all-out war would be irrational provides a license for threats and lower levels of violence. In some circumstances a state could use the shared fear of nuclear war to exploit others. If the state thinks that the other is preoccupied with the possibility of war and does not anticipate that the state will make the concessions needed to reduce this danger, it will expect the other to retreat and so can stand firm. In other words, the fact that war would be the worst possible outcome for both sides does not automatically lead to uncoerced peace, let alone to a security community.15

&lt;sup>13</sup> For discussions of current and future American hegemony see Sheetz 1997/98; Wohlforth 1999; Waltz 1993, 2000. In an exception to the propensity for liberals to ignore the possible pacifying effects of hegemony, Russett and Oneal (2001, 184–91) propose a rebuttal by looking at earlier eras, but these are not comparable to the current situation.

&lt;sup>14</sup> See Kugler and Lemke (1996), Modelski (1987), Organski and Kugler (1980), and Thompson (1988). In his epilogue Gilpin (1981) discusses the reasons why future hegemonic transitions might be carried out peacefully.

<sup>15</sup> The same logic applies to the independent of the indepe

<sup>15</sup> The same logic applies to the indeterminant effect of the high costs of damaging relations that is a consequence of economic interdependence, but only in attenuated form. Relations are bad when two states confront each other with nuclear weapons, but they are likely to be good under conditions of interdependence, which means that the threat to sever ties will harm relations and decrease economic

A Synthetic Interactive Explanation

My explanation for the development and maintenance of the Community combines and reformulates several factors discussed previously. Even with the qualifications just discussed, a necessary condition is the belief that conquest is difficult and war is terribly costly. When conquest is easy, aggression is encouraged and the security dilemma operates with particular viciousness as even defensive states need to prepare to attack (Van Evera 1999). But when states have modern armies and, even more, nuclear weapons, it is hard for anyone to believe that war could make sense.

Of course statesmen must consider the gains that war might bring as well as its costs. Were the former to be very high, they might outweigh the latter. But, if anything, the expected benefits of war within the Community have declined, in part because the developed countries, including those that lost World War II, are generally satisfied with the status quo. <sup>16</sup> Even in the case that shows the greatest strain—U.S.—Japanese relations—no one has explained how a war could provide anyone much gross, let alone net, benefit: it is hard to locate a problem for which war among the Community members would provide a solution.

The other side of this coin is that, as liberals have stressed, peace within the Community brings many gains, especially economic. While some argue that the disruption caused by relatively free trade is excessive and urge greater national regulation, no one thinks that conquering others would bring more riches than trading with them. Despite concern for relative economic gain (Grieco 1990; Mastanduno 1991) and economic disputes, people believe that their economic fates are linked more positively than negatively to the rest of the Community.

Of course costs and benefits are subjective, depending as they do on what the actors value, and changes in values are the third leg of my explanation. Most political analysis takes the actors' values for granted because they tend to be widely shared and to change slowly. Their importance and variability become clear only when we confront a case such as Nazi Germany, which, contrary to standard realist conceptions of national interest and security, put everything at risk in order to seek the domination of the Aryan race.

The changes over the last 50–75 years in what the leaders and publics in the developed states value are striking. To start with, war is no longer seen as good in itself (Mueller 1989); no great power leader today would agree with Theodore Roosevelt that "no triumph of peace is quite so great as the supreme triumph of war" (quoted by Harbaugh 1961, 99). In earlier eras it was commonly believed that war brought out the best in individuals and nations and that the virtues of discipline, risk-taking, and self-sacrifice that war required were central to civilization. Relatedly, honor and glory used to be central values. In a world so constituted, the material benefits of peace would be much less important; high levels of trade, the difficulty of making conquest pay, and even nuclear weapons might not produce peace.

Democracy and identity also operate through what actors value, and may be responsible in part for the decline in militarism just noted. Compromise, consideration for the interests of others, respect for law, and a shunning of violence outside this context all are values that underpin democracy and are reciprocally cultivated by it. The Community also is relatively homogeneous in that its members are all democracies and have values that are compatibly similar. It is important that the values be compatible as well as similar: a system filled with states that all believed that war and domination was good would not be peaceful.<sup>17</sup> One impulse to war is the desire to change the other country, and this disappears if values are shared. The United States could conquer Canada, for example, but what would be the point when so much of what it wants to see there is already in place?

Central to the rise of the Community is the decline in territorial disputes. Territory has been the most common cause and object of conflicts in the past, and we have become so accustomed to their absence within the Community that it is easy to lose sight of how drastic and consequential this change is (Diehl 1999; Hensel 2000; Huth 1996, 2000; Kacowicz 1998; Vasquez 1993; Zacher 2001). Germans no longer care that Alsace and Lorraine are French; the French are not disturbed by the high level of German presence in these provinces. The French, furthermore, permitted the Saar to return to Germany and are not bothered by this loss, and indeed do not feel it as a loss at all. Although during the Cold War the West Germans refused to renounce their claims to the "lost territories" to the east, they did so upon unification and few voices were raised in protest. Today the United Kingdom is ready to cede Northern Ireland to the Irish Republic if a referendum in the six counties were to vote to do so.

The causes of these changes in values in general and in nationalism and concern with territory in particular are subject to dispute, as are the developments that could reverse them. In particular, it is unclear how much they are rooted in material changes, most obviously the increased destructiveness of war and the unprecedented prosperity that is seen as linked to good political relations, and to what extent they are more autonomous, perhaps following out a natural progression and building on each other. They may be linked (inextricably?) to high levels of consumption, faith in rationality, and the expectation of progress, although it is not unreasonable to argue that this describes Europe in 1914 as well. The decreased salience of territory is almost surely produced in part by the decoupling of territorial control and national prosperity, and most of activity. Thus even if the state prevails by using coercive tactics, it will pay a price for doing so. For related arguments, see Gartzke et al. (2001) and Morrow (1999).

&lt;sup>16</sup> Kacowicz (1998, Chap. 2) finds satisfaction with the status quo responsible for peace in several areas outside the Community.

&lt;sup>17</sup> For a discussion of homogeneous and heterogeneous systems, see Aron (1966, 99–124, 373–403) and Hoffmann (1961, 207–9); for evidence of the central role of common values in relations between individuals and groups, see Rokeach and Mezei (1966).

the other relationships between material structures and ideational patterns are complex and reciprocal. Just as capitalism is built and sustained by precapitalist values and postmaterialism may grow from prosperity (Inglehart 1977, 1997), so the values that sustain the Community can be neither separated nor deduced from changes in the means and levels of production and potential destruction.

The obvious threat to these pacific values is an economic depression, which could also undermine democracy and weaken the links between good political relations and prosperity. If countries were to believe that the only way to halt a downslide was to disadvantage others, or even if they were to develop incompatible views about how to deal with dire economic circumstances, then not only would policies come into conflict, but the values supporting peace might erode. It is also possible that these values could change by themselves as people become bored by the rich, peaceful world and come to desire glory, honor, and extreme nationalism once again. But some changes may be irreversible: just as it is hard to conceive of slavery, torture, or dueling coming back into fashion, so the current values may be highly stable, being sustained by constant socialization and supporting the peace that serves the Community so well. 18

The destructiveness of war, the benefits of peace, and the changes in values interact and reinforce each other. If war were not so dreadful, it could be considered as an instrument for national enrichment; if peace did not seem to bring national well-being, violence would at least be contemplated; that military victory is no longer seen as a positive value both contributes to and is in part explained by the high perceived costs of war. In parallel, expectations of peace allow states to value each other's economic and political successes. Although these may incite envy, they no longer produce strong security fears, as was true in the past. The Community may then contain within it the seeds of its own growth through the feedbacks among its elements.

Another dynamic element is crucial as well: the progress of the Community is path-dependent in that without the Cold War it is unlikely that the factors we have discussed could have overcome prevalent fears and rivalries. The conflict with the Soviet Union produced American security guarantees and an unprecedented sense of common purpose among the states that now form the Community. Since the coalition could be undermined by social unrest or political instability, each country sought to see that the others were well off and resisted the temptation to solve its own problems by exporting them to its neighbors. Since the coalition would have been disrupted had any country developed strong grievances against other members, each had reason to moderate its demands and mediate when conflicts developed between others. To encourage better relations in the future, leaders consciously portrayed the others as partners and sponsored the socialization practices discussed earlier. The American willingness to engage in extensive cooperation abroad, the European willingness to go far down the road of integration, and the Japanese willingness to tie itself closely to the United States were improbable without the Cold War. But having been established, these forms of cooperation set off positive feedback and are now self-sustaining.

IMPLICATIONS

What are the implications of the existence of the security community for international politics in the rest of the world, for how the most developed states will carry out relations among themselves, and for general theories of war and peace?

International Politics in the Rest of the World

One obvious question is why the leading powers but not other have formed a security community. The preceeding discussion implies that the outcome is overdetermined. Compared to others, the states in the Community are richer, more democratic, more satisfied with the status quo, would lose more in a war, and have a more explicit American security guarantee. Furthermore, they were the core of the anti-Soviet coalition during the Cold War, which produced benefical path-dependent results. This does not mean that other security communities will not form, but only that they are not likely to fit the pattern discussed here.

Despite the fact that war is thinkable outside the Community, it is striking that several other regions appear to be peaceful, most obviously South America. 19 The reasons remain unclear but may include the role of the superpowers in controlling dangerous conflicts during the Cold War, American hegemony more recently, and the example of peace among the developed countries. Although war remains possible, even a pessimist would have to note that there is little evidence that the countries outside the Community will recapitulate Europe's bloody history. For these countries, the main security danger stems from the civil wars and insurgencies, either of which can lead to interstate war (Herbst 2000; Holsti 1996). These developments are beyond the scope of this article, but the obvious challenge would be to bring them and the Community into a common theory.

International Politics Within the Community

In previous eras, no aspect of international politics and few aspects of domestic politics were untouched by the anticipation of future wars among the leading powers. As Charles Tilly (1990, 74) put it, "Over the millennium as a whole, war has been the dominant activity of European states." Much will then change in the Community. In the absence of these states amalgamating—a development that is out of the question outside of Europe and unlikely within it-they will neither consider using force against one another nor lose their sovereignty. There will then be significant conflicts of interest without clear means of resolving them. The states will continue to be rivals in some respects, and to bargain with each other. Indeed, the stability-instability paradox implies that the shared expectation that disputes will remain peaceful will remove some restraints on vituperation and competitive tactics. The dense network of institutions within the community should serve to provide multiple means for controlling conflicts but will also provide multiple ways for a dissatisfied country to show its displeasure and threaten disruption.

&lt;sup>18</sup> See Jervis (1991/1992, 55), Mueller (1989, Chaps. 10 and 11), and Wendt (1999, 310-2). The movement toward women's rights and the tolerance of diversity has waned as well as waxed in many parts of the world, however, especially within Muslim countries.

&lt;sup>19</sup> See Hurrell (1998), Kacowitcz (1998), Mares (2001), and Martin-Gonzalez (1998); for general discussions of the changing incidence and nature of war see Holsti (1996), Kaufman (2001), and Mueller (2001).

The fact that the situation is a new one poses challenges and opportunities for states. What goals will have highest priority? Will nonmilitary alliances form? How important will status be and what will give it? Bargaining will continue, and this means that varieties of power, including the ability to help and hurt others, will still be relevant. Threats, bluffs, warnings, the mobilization of resources for future conflicts, intense diplomatic negotiations, and shifting patterns of working with and against others all will remain. But the content of these forms will differ from those of traditional international politics.

Politics within the Community may come to resemble the relations among the United States and Canada and Australia, which Keohane and Nye (1977) described as complex interdependence: extensive transnational and transgovernmental relations, negotiations conducted across different issue areas, and bargaining power gained through asymmetric dependence but limited by overall common interests. Despite this path-breaking study, however, we know little about how this kind of politics will be carried out. As numerous commentators have noted, economic issues and economic resources will play large roles, but the changed context will matter. Relative economic advantage was sought in the past in part because it contributed to military security. This no longer being the case, the possibilities for cooperation are increased. States will still seek economic benefit, but will care about whether others are gaining more than they are only if they believe that this can produce political leverage or future economic benefits. The range of cases in which the latter is true is now thought to be fairly small, however (see, e.g., Busch 1999; Krugman 1991).

Even though force will not be threatened within the Community, it will remain important in relations among its members. During the Cold War the protection the United States afforded to its allies gave it an added moral claim and significant bargaining leverage. Despite the decreased level of threat, this will be true for the indefinite future because militarily Japan and Europe need the United States more than the United States needs them. While the unique American ability to lead military operations such as those in the Persian Gulf and Kosovo causes resentments and fric-tions, it also provides a resource that is potent even—or especially—if it is never explicitly brought to the table.<sup>20</sup>

Four Possible Futures. Even within the contours of a Community, a significant range of patterns of relations is possible, four of which can be briefly sketched.

The greatest change would be a world in which national autonomy would be further diminished and the distinctions between domestic and foreign policy would continue to erode. Medieval Europe, with its overlapping forms of sovereignty rather than compartmentalized nation-states, which might dissolve because they are no longer needed to provided security and can no longer control their economies, is one model here (Bull 1977 264-76; Cerny 1993; Lipschutz 2000; Osiander 2001; Rosenau 1990; van Creveld 1999; for a discussion of how the changed environment will affect state structures and strength, see Desch 1996). Although most scholars see the reduction of sovereignty and the growth of the power of nongovernmental organizations as conducive to peace and harmony, one can readily imagine sharp conflicts, for example, among business interests, labor, and environmentalists; between those with different views of the good life; and between those calling for greater centralization to solve common problems and those advocating increased local control. But state power and interest would in any case greatly decrease and the notion of "national interest", always contested, would become even more problematic.

A second world, not completely incompatible with the first, would be one in which states in the Community play a large role, but with more extensive and intensive cooperation, presumably produced and accompanied by the internalization of the interests of others and stronger institutions (Keohane 2000). A possible model would be the United States before the Civil War (Deudney 1995). Relations would be increasingly governed by principles, laws, and persuasion rather than by more direct forms of power (Lukes 1974; Nye 1990), a change that could benignly spill over into relations outside the Community. Although bargaining would not disappear, there would be more joint efforts to solve common problems and the line between "high" and "low" politics would become even more blurred.

In this world, the United States would share more power and responsibility with the rest of the Community than is true today. While popular with scholars (e.g., Ikenberry 2001; Ruggie 1996), at least as likely is a continuation of the present trajectory in which the United States maintains hegemony and rejects significant limitations on its freedom of action. National interests would remain distinct and the United States would follow the familiar pattern in which ambitions and perceived interests expand as power does. Consistent with the continuing concern with competitive advantages (Mearsheimer 2001), both conflicts of interests and the belief that hegemony best produces collective goods would lead the United States to oppose the efforts of others to become a counterweight if not a rival to it (Art 1996a). In effect, the United States would lead an empire, albeit a relatively benign one. But doing so would be compleated by the American self-image that precludes it from seeing its role for what it is, in part because of the popularity of values of equality and supranationalism. Other members of the Community would resent having their interests overridden by the United States on some occasions, but the exploitation would be limited by their bargaining power and the American realization that excessive discontent would have serious long-term consequences. So others might accept these costs in return for U.S. security guarantees and the ability to keep their own defense spending very low, especially because the alternative to Americandominated stability might be worse.

&lt;sup>20</sup> For a related debate about the fungibility of military power, see Art (1996b, 1999) and Baldwin (1999).

The fourth model also starts with the American attempt to maintain hegemony, but this time the burdens of American unilateralism become sufficient to produce a counter-balancing coalition, one that might include Russia and China as well (Waltz 1999, 2000; Layne 2000). Europe and Japan might also become more assertive because they fear not U.S. domination but the eventual withdrawal of the U.S. security guarantee. In this world, much that realism stresses—the clash of national interests, the weakness of international institutions, maneuvering for advantage, and the use of power and threats—would come to the fore, but with the vital difference that force would not be contemplated and the military balance would enter in only indirectly, as discussed above. This would be a strange mixture of the new and the familiar, and the central question is what ultima ratio will replace cannons. What will be the final arbiter of disputes? What kinds of threats will be most potent? How fungible will the relevant forms of power be?

Outlining these possibilities raises two broad questions that I cannot answer. First, is the future essentially determined, as many structural theories would imply, or does it depend on national choices strongly influenced by domestic politics, leaders, and accidents? Second, if the future is not determined, how much depends on choices the United States has yet to make, and what will most influence these choices?

IMPLICATIONS FOR THEORIES OF THE CAUSES OF WAR

Whatever its explanation, the very existence of a security community among the leading powers refutes many theories of the causes of war or, at least, indicates that they are not universally valid. Thus human nature and the drive for dominance, honor, and glory may exist and contribute to a wide variety of human behaviors, but they are not fated to lead to war.

The obvious rebuttal is that war still exists outside the Community and that civil wars continue unabated. But only wars fought by members of the Community have the potential to undermine the argument that, under some conditions, attributes of humans and societies that were seen as inevitably producing wars in fact do not do so. The cases that could be marshaled are the Gulf War and the operation in Kosovo, but they do not help these theories. These wars were provoked by others, gained little honor and glory for the Community, and were fought in a manner that minimized the loss of life on the other side. It would be hard to portray them as manifestations of brutal or evil human nature. Indeed, it is more plausible to see the Community's behavior as consistent with a general trend toward its becoming less violent generally: the abolition of official torture and the decreased appeal of capital punishment, to take the most salient examples (Mueller 1989).

The existence of the Community also casts doubt on theories that argue that the leading powers always are willing to use force in a struggle for material gain, status, and dominance. Traditional Marxism claims that capitalists could never cooperate; proponents of the law of uneven growth see changes in the relative power of major states as producing cycles of domination, stability, challenge, and war (Gilpin 1981; Kennedy 1987). Similarly, "power transitions" in which rising powers catch up with dominant ones are seen as very difficult to manage peacefully (Kugler and Lemke 1996; Organski and Kugler 1980; also see Modelski 1987; Thompson 1988). These theories, like the version of hegemonic stability discussed above, have yet to be tested because the United States has not yet declined. But if the arguments made here are correct, transitions will not have the same violent outcome that they had in the past, leading us to pay greater attention to the conditions under which these theories do and do not hold.

For most scholars, the fundamental cause of war is international anarchy, compounded by the security dilemma. These forces press hardest on the leading powers because while they may be able to guarantee the security of others, no one can provide this escape from the state of nature for them. As we have seen, different schools of thought propose different explanations for the rise of the Community and so lead to somewhat different propositions about the conditions under which anarchy can be compatible with peace. But what is most important is that the Community constitutes a proof by existence of the possibility of uncoerced peace without central authority. Because these countries are the most powerful ones and particularly war-prone, the Community poses a fundamental challenge to our understanding of world politics and our expectations of future possibilities.

REFERENCES

Adler, Emanuel. 1992. "Europe's New Security Order." In The Future of European Security, ed. Beverly Crawford. Berkeley: University of California Institute for International and Area Studies. Pp. 287–326.

Adler, Emanuel, and Michael Barnett, eds. 1998. Security Communities. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Almond, Gabriel A. 1950. The American People and Foreign Policy. New York: Harcourt Brace.

Arfi, Badredine. 1998. "Ethnic Fear: The Social Construction of Insecurity." Security Studies 8 (Autumn): 151–203.

Aron, Raymond. 1966. Peace and War. Translated by Richard Howard and Annette B. Fox. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.

Art, Robert J. 1996a. "Why Western Europe Needs the United States and NATO." Political Science Quarterly 111 (Spring): 1–39.

- Art, Robert J. 1996b. "American Foreign Policy and the Fungibility of Force." Security Studies 5 (Summer): 7–42.
- Art, Robert J. 1999. "Force and Fungibility Reconsidered." Security Studies 8 (Summer): 183–189.
- Baldwin, David A. 1999. "Force, Fungibility, and Influence." Security Studies 8 (Summer): 173–182.
- Barbieri, Katherine. 1996. "Economic Interdependence: A Path to Peace or a Source of Interstate Conflict?" Journal of Peace Research 33 (February): 29–49.
- Barbieri, Katherine, and Jack S. Levy. 1999. "Sleeping with the Enemy: The Impact of War on Trade." Journal of Peace Research 36 (July): 463-79.
- Barkawi, Tarak, and Mark Laffey. 1999. "The Imperial Peace: Democracy, Force and Globalization." European Journal of International Relations 5 (December): 403–34.
- Beck, Nathaniel, and Jonathan N. Katz. 2001. "Throwing the Baby Out With the Bath Water: A Comment on Green, Kim, and Yoon." International Organization 55 (Spring): 487–96.
- Berghahn, V. R. 1973. Germany and the Approach of War in 1914. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Betts, Richard. 1992. "Systems of Peace or Causes of War? Collective Security, Arms Control, and the New Europe." International Security 17 (Summer): 5–43.
- Bourne, Kenneth. 1970. The Foreign Policy of Victorian England: 1830–1902. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Brooks, Stephen G. 1999. "The Globalization of Production and the Changing Benefits of Conquest." Journal of Conflict Resolution 43 (October): 646–70.
- Bueno de Mesquita, Bruce, James Morrow, Randolph Siverson, and Alastair Smith. 1999. "An Institutional Explanation of the Democratic Peace." American Political Science Review 93 (December): 791–807.
- Bull, Hedley. 1977. The Anarchical Society: A Study of Order in World Politics. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Busch, Marc L. 1999. Trade Warriors: States, Firms, and Strategic-Trade Policy in High-Technology Competition. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Cain, Peter. 1979. "Capitalism, War and Internationalism in the Thought of Richard Cobden." British Journal of International Studies 5 (October): 229–47.
- Calleo, David. P. 2001. Rethinking Europe's Future. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Cederman, Lars-Erik, ed. 2001. Constructing Europe's Identity: The External Dimension. Boulder, CO.: Lynne Rienner.
- Cerny, Philip G. 1992. "Plurilateralism: Structural Differentiation and Functional Conflict in the Post-Cold War World Order. Millennium 22 (Spring): 27–51.
- Copeland, Dale C. 1996. "Economic Interdependence and War: A Theory of Trade Expectations." International Security 20 (Spring): 5-42.
- Copeland, Dale C. 1999–2000. "Trade Expectations and the Outbreak of Peace: Détente 1970–74 and the End of the Cold War 1985–91." Security Studies 9 (Autumn-Winter): 15–59.
- Cronin, Bruce. 1999. Community Under Anarchy: Transnational Identity and the Evolution of Cooperation. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Desch, Michael C. 1996. "War and Strong States, Peace and Weak States?" International Organization 50 (Spring): 237–268.
   Deudney, Daniel H. 1995. "The Philadelphia System: Sovereignty,
- Deudney, Daniel H. 1995. "The Philadelphia System: Sovereignty, Arms Control, and Balance of Power in the American States-Union Circa 1787–1861." International Organization. 49 (Spring): 191–228.
- Deutsch, Karl W. 1953. Nationalism and Social Communication. New York: Wiley.
- Deutsch, Karl W., et al. 1957. Political Community and the North Atlantic Area: International Organizations in the Light of Historical Experience. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Deutsch, Morton. 1973. The Resolution of Conflict: Constructive and Destructive Processes. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Diehl, Paul F., ed. 1999. A Road Map to War: Territorial Dimensions on International Conflict. Nashville: Vanderbilt University Press.
- Duffield, John S. 2001. "Transatlantic Relations After the Cold War: Theory, Evidence, and the Future." International Studies Perspectives 2 (February): 93–115.

- Elman, Miriam F., ed. 1997. Paths to Peace: Is Democracy the Answer? Cambridge, MA: MIT Press.
- Farber, Henry, and Joanne Gowa. 1995. "Polities and Peace." International Security 20 (Fall): 123–46.
- Farber, Henry, and Joanne Gowa. 1997. "Common Interests or Common Polities?" Journal of Politics 59 (May): 123-46.
- Fearon, James D. 1994. "Domestic Political Audiences and the Escalation of International Disputes." American Political Science Review 88 (September): 577–92.
- Finel, Bernard I., and Kristin M. Lord, eds. 2000. Power and Conflict in the Age of Transparency. New York: Palgrave.
- Gartzke, Erik. 1998. "Kant We All Get Along? Motive, Opportunity, and the Origins of the Democratic Peace." American Journal of Political Science 42 (1): 1–27.
- Gartzke, Erik. 2000. "Preferences and Democratic Peace." International Studies Quarterly 44 (June): 191–212.
- Gartzke, Erik, Quan Li, and Charles Boehmer. 2001. "Investing in the Peace: Economic Interdependence and International Conflict." International Organization 55 (Spring): 391–438.
- Gowa, Joanne. 1994. Allies, Adversaries, and International Trade. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Gowa, Joanne. 1999. Ballots and Bullets: The Elusive Democratic Peace. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Gilbert, Martin. 1983. Winston S. Churchill, Vol. VI, Finest Hour 1939–1941. London: Heinemann.
- Gill, Stephen. 1990. American Hegemony and the Trilateral Commission. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Gilpin, Robert. 1981. War and Change in World Politics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Goemans, H. E. 2000. War and Punishment: The Causes of War Termination and the First World War. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Goldgeier, James M., and Michael McFaul. 1992. "A Tale of Two Worlds: Core and Periphery in the Post-Cold War Era." International Organization 46 (Spring): 467-91.
- Green, Donald P., Kim, Soo Yeon, and Yoon, David H. 2001. "Dirty Pool." International Organization 55 (Spring): 441–68.
- Grieco, Joseph M. 1990. Cooperation Among Nations: Europe, America, and Non-Tariff Barriers to Trade. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Halliday, Fred. 1994. Rethinking International Relations. Vancouver: University of British Columbia Press.
- Hampton, Mary N. 1998/1999. "NATO, Germany, and the United States: Creating Positive Identity in Trans-Atlantia." Security Studies 8 (Winter-Spring): 235-69.
- Harbaugh, William Henry. 1961. The Life and Times of Theodore Roosevelt. New York: Collier Books.
- Hartmann, Frederick H. 1982. The Conservation of Enemies: A Study in Enmity. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Hensel, Paul R. 2000. "Territory: Theory and Evidence on Geography and Conflict." In What Do We Know About War?, ed. John A. Vasquez. New York: Rowman and Littlefield. Pp. 57-84.
- Herbst, Jeffrey. 2000. States and Power in Africa: Comparative Lessons in Authority and Control. Princeton NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Hirschman, Albert O. 1945. National Power and the Structure of Foreign Trade. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.
- Hischman, Albert O. 1977. The Passions and the Interests: Political Arguments for Capitalism Before Its Triumph. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Hirschman, Albert O. 1986. Rival Views of Market Societies and Other Recent Essays. New York: Viking.
- Hoffmann, Stanley. 1961. "International Systems and International Law." In The International System, eds. Klaus Knorr and Sidney Verba. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press. Pp. 205-37.
- Holsti, K. J. 1996. The State, War, and the State of War. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Hull, Cordell. 1948. The Memoirs of Cordell Hull, Vol. 1. New York: Macmillan.
- Huntington, Samuel P. 1993. "Why International Primacy Matters." International Security 17 (Spring): 68–83.
- Hurrell, Andrew. 1998. "An Emerging Security Community in South America?" In Security Communities, eds. Emanuel Adler and

- Michael Barnett. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. Pp. 228-64.
- Huth, Paul K. 1996. Standing Your Ground: Territorial Disputes and International Conflict. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Huth, Paul K. 2000. "Territory: Why are Territorial Disputes Between States a Central Cause of International Conflict?" In What Do We Know About War?, ed. John A. Vasquez. New York: Rowman and Littlefield. Pp. 85-110.
- Ikenberry, John G. 2001. After Victory: Institutions, Strategic Restraint, and the Rebuilding of Order After Major Wars. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Inglehard, Ronald. 1977. The Silent Revolution: Changing Values and Political Styles Among Western Publics. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Inglehart, Ronald. 1997. Modernization and Postmodernization: Cultural, Economic, and Political Change in 43 Societies. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- James, Scott, and David Lake. 1989. "The Second Face of Hegemony: Britain's Repeal of the Corn Laws and the American Walker Tariff of 1846." International Organization 43 (Winter): 1–30.
- Jervis, Robert. 1989. The Meaning of Nuclear Revolution: Statecraft and the Prospect of Armageddon. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University
- Jervis, Robert. 1991/1992. "The Future of World Politics: Will It Resemble the Past?" International Security 16 (Winter): 39-73.
- Jervis, Robert. 1997. System Effects: Complexity in Political and Social Life. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Jervis, Robert. 1999. "Neorealism, Neoliberalism, and Cooperation: Understanding the Debate." International Security 24 (Summer):
- Jervis, Robert. 2002. "Comment on Schweller and Institutions." International Security (in press).
- Kacowicz, Arie M. 1998. Zones of Peace in the Third World: South America and West Africa in Comparative Perspective. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press.
- Kahl, Colin H. 1998/1999. "Constructing a Separate Peace: Constructivism, Collective Liberal Identity, and Democratic Peace." Security Studies 8 (Winter-Spring): 94–144.
- Kaufman, Stuart J. 2001. "The End of Anarchism: The Society of Nations, Institutions, and the Decline of War." Paper presented at the 2001 Annual Meeting of the International Studies Association.
- Keohane, Robert O. 1984. After Hegemony: Cooperation and Discord in the World Political Economy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Keohane, Robert O. 2001. "Governance in a Partially Globalized World." American Political Science Review 95 (March): 1-14.
- Keohane, Robert O., and Joseph Nye, eds. 1977. Power and Interdependence: World Politics in Transition. Boston: Little, Brown.
- Kennedy, Paul. 1980. The Rise of Anglo-German Antagonism, 1860-1914. Boston: George Allen and Unwin.
- Kennedy, Paul. 1987. The Rise and Fall of Great Powers: Economic Change and Military Conflict from 1500-2000. New York: Random House.
- King, Gary. 2001. "Proper Nouns and Methodological Propriety: Pooling Dyads in International Relations Data." International Organization 55 (Spring): 497-507.
- Knorr, Klaus. 1966. On the Uses of Military Power in the Nuclear Age. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Krugman, Paul. 1991. Rethinking International Trade. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press.
- Kugler, Jacek, and Douglas Lemke, eds. 1996. Parity and War: Evaluations and Extensions of The War Ledger. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Kumar, Amitava. 2001. "Bristling on the Subcontinent." The Nation April 23: 29-30.
- Kupchan, Charles. 2002. The End of the American Era. New York: Knopf (in press).
- Lake, David. 1992. "Powerful Pacifists: Democratic States and War."
- American Political Science Review 86 (March): 24-37.
  Layne, Christopher. 1994. "Kant or Cant: The Myth of the Democratic Peace." International Security 19 (Fall 1994): 5-49.
- Layne, Christopher. 2000. "US Hegemony and the Perpetuation of NATO." Journal of Strategic Studies 23 (September): 59-91.

- Levy, Jack S. 1989. "Domestic Politics and War." In The Origins and Prevention of Major Wars, eds. Robert I. Rotberg and Theodore K. Rabb. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. Pp. 79-
- Liberman, Peter. 1996a. Does Conquest Pay? The Exploitation of Occupied Industrial Societies. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University
- Liberman, Peter. 1996b. "Trading with the Enemy: Security and Relative Economic Gains." International Security 21 (Summer):
- Lippmann, Walter. 1955. Essays in the Public Philosophy. Boston: Little, Brown.
- Lipschutz, Ronnie D. 2000. After Authority: War, Peace, and Global Politics in the 21st Century. Albany: SUNY Press.
- Luard, Evan. 1986. War in International Society: A Study in International Sociology. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Lukes, Steven. 1974. Power: A Radical View. London: Macmillan.
- Mandelbaum, Michael. 1998/1999. "Is Major War Obsolete?" Survival 40 (Winter): 20–38.
- Mansfield, Edward, and Jack Snyder. 1995. "Democratization and the Danger of War." International Security 20 (Summer): 5-38.
- Maoz, Zeev. 1997. "The Controversy Over the Democratic Peace: Rearguard Action or Cracks in the Wall?" International Security 22 (Summer): 162-98.
- March, James G., and Johan P. Olsen. 1998. "The Institutional Dynamics of International Political Orders." International Organization 52 (Autumn): 943-69.
- Mares, David R. 2001. Violent Peace: Militarized Interstate Bargaining in Latin America. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Martin, Lisa L., and Beth Simmons. 1998. "Theories and Empirical Studies of International Institutions." International Organization 52 (Autumn): 729-57.
- Martin-Gonzalez, Felix. 1998. The Longer Peace in South America, 1935-1995, Unpublished Ph.D. dissertation. New York: Department of Political Science, Columbia University.
- Mastanduno, Michael. 1991. "Do Relative Gains Matter? America's Response to Japanese Industrial Policy." International Security 16 (Summer): 73-113.
- McMillan, Susan M. 1997. "Interdependence and Conflict." Mershon International Studies Review 41, Supplement 1 (May): 33-58.
- Mearsheimer, John J. 1990. "Back to the Future: Instability in Europe After the Cold War." International Security 15 (Summer): 5-56.
- Mearsheimer, John J. 2001. The Tragedy of Great Power Politics. New York: Norton.
- Melko, Matthew. 1973. 52 Peaceful Societies. Ontario: CPRI Press. Milner, Helen V. 1988. Resisting Protectionism: Global Industries and the Politics of International Trade. Princeton, NJ: Princeton - University Prèss. Modelski, George. 1987. Long Cycles in World Politics. Seattle: University of Washington Press.
- Morrow, James D. 1999. "How Could Trade Affect Conflict?" Journal of Peace Research 36 (4): 481–9.
- Mueller, John. 1989. Retreat from Doomsday: The Obsolescence of Major War. New York: Basic Books.
  Mueller, John. 1994. "The Catastrophe Quota: Trouble After the - Civil War." Journal of Conflict Resolution 38 (September): 355-75.
- Mueller, John. 1995. Quiet Cataclysm: Reflections on the Recent Transformation of World Politics. New York: HarperCollins.
- Mueller, John. 2001. "The Remnants of War: Thugs as Residual Combatants," Unpublished paper. Columbus: Department of Political Science, Ohio State University.
- Nye, Joseph S. 1990. Bound to Lead: The Changing Nature of American Power. New York: Basic Books.
- O'Hanlon, Michael E. 2001. Defense Policy Choices for the Bush Administration. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.
- Oneal, John R., and Bruce Russett. 1999. "Is the Liberal Peace Just an Artifact of Cold War Interests? Assessing Recent Critiques." International Interactions 25 (3): 213-41.
- Oneal, John R., and Bruce Russett. 2001. "Clear and Clean: The Fixed Effects of Liberal Peace." International Organization 55 (Spring): 469-86.
- Organski, A. F. K., and Jacek Kugler. 1980. The War Ledger. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Osiander, Andreas. 1994. The States System of Europe, 1640-1990. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

- Owen, John. 1997. Liberal Peace, Liberal War: American Politics and International Security. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Ray, James Lee. 1995. Democracy and International Politics: An Evaluation of the Democratic Peace Proposition. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press.
- University of South Carolina Press.
  Ray, James Lee. 1998. "Does Democracy Cause Peace?" Annual Review of Political Science, Vol. 1. Palo Alto, CA: Annual Reviews.
- Reiter, Dan, and Allan Stam III. 1998. "Democracy, War Initiation, and Victory." American Political Science Review 92 (June): 377–90.
- Ripsman, Norrin M., and Jean-Marc F. Blanchard. 1996/1997. "Commercial Liberalism under Fire: Evidence from 1914 and 1936." Security Studies 6 (Winter): 4-51.
- 1936." Security Studies 6 (Winter): 4–51.

  Risse-Kappen, Thomas. 1995. "Democratic Peace-Warlike Democracies? A Social Constructivist Interpretation of the Liberal Argument." European Journal of International Relations 1 (December): 491–517.
- Rokeach, Milton, and Louis Mezei. 1966. "Race and Shared Belied as Factors in Social Choice." Science 151 (January 14): 167–72.
- Rosecrance, Richard. 1986. The Rise of the Trading State: Commerce and Conquest in the Modern World. New York: Basic Books.
- Rosecrance, Richard. 1999. The Rise of the Virtual State: Wealth and Power in the Coming Century. New York: Basic Books.
- Rosenau, James N. 1990. Turbulence in World Politics: A Theory of Change and Continuity. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press. Ruggie, John G. 1996. Winning the Peace: American and World
- Order in the New Era. New York: Columbia University Press. Rummel, R. J. 1995. "Democracies ARE Less Warlike Than Other Regimes." European Journal of International Relations 1 (March): 457–79.
- Russett, Bruce. 1993. Grasping the Democratic Peace: Principles for a Post-Cold War World. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Russett, Bruce, and John R. Oneal. 2001. Triangulating Peace: Democracy, Interdependence, and International Organizations. New York: Norton.
- Schultz, Kenneth A. 2001. Democracy and Coercive Diplomacy. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Schumpeter, Joseph. 1934. The Theory of Economic Development. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Schweller, Randall L. 2000. "Democracy and the Post-Cold War Era." In The New World Order, eds. Birthe Hansen and Bertel Heurlin. New York: St. Martin's Press. Pp. 46–80.
- Shaw, Martin. 1994. Global Society and International Relations. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Shaw, Martin. 2000. Theory of the Global State. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Sheetz, Mark. 1997/1998. "Debating the Unipolar Moment." International Security 22 (Winter): 168-72.
- Singer, Max, and Aaron Wildavsky. 1993. The Real World Order: Zones of Peace/Zones of Turmoil. Chatham, NJ: Chatham House.
- Snyder, Glenn. 1965. "The Balance of Power and the Balance of Terror." In The Balance of Power, ed. Paul Seabury. San Francisco: Chandler. Pp. 184–201.

- Snyder, Jack. 1991. Myths of Empire: Domestic Politics and International Ambition. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Sterling-Folker, Jennifer. 2000. "Competing Paradigms or Birds of a Feather? Constructivism and Neoliberal Institutionalism Compared." International Studies Quarterly 44 (March): 97–120.
- Thompson, William R. 1988. On Global War: Historical-Structural Approaches to World System Analysis. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press.
- Thompson, William R. 1996. "Democracy and Peace: Putting the Cart Before the Horse?" International Organization 50 (Winter): 141–74.
- Tocqueville, Alexis de. [1835] 1945. Democracy in America, Vol 1. New York: Vintage Books.
- Tilly, Charles. 1990. Coercion, Capital, and European States, AD 990-1990. Cambridge, MA.: Basil Blackwell.
- Ullman, Richard H. 1991. Securing Europe. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Van Creveld, Martin L. 1999. The Rise and Decline of the State. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Van der Pijl, Kees. 1998. Transnational Classes and International Relations. New York: Routledge.
- Van Evera, Stephen. 1984. "The Cult of the Offensive and the Origins of the First World War." International Security 9 (Summer): 58–107.
- Van Evera, Stephen. 1990/1991. "Primed for Peace: Europe after the Cold War." International Security 15 (Winter): 7–57.
- Van Evera, Stephen. 1999. Causes of War: Power and the Roots of Conflict. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Vasquez, Jonh A. 1993. The War Puzzle. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Waltz, Kenneth N. 1970. "The Myth of National Interdependence." In The International Corporation, ed. Charles P. Kindleberger. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press. Pp. 205-23.
- Waltz, Kenneth N. 1993. "The Emerging Structure of International Politics." International Security 18 (Fall): 44–79.
- Waltz, Kenneth N. 1999. "Globalization and Governance." PS: Political Science & Politics 32 (December): 693–700.
- Waltz, Kenneth N. 2000. "Structural Realism after the Cold War." International Security 25 (Summer): 5-41.
- Ward, Michael D., and Kristian Gleditsch. 1998. "Democratizing for Peace." American Political Science Review 92 (March): 51–62.
- Wendt, Alexander. 1994. "Collective Identity Formation and the International State." American Political Science Review 88 (June): 384-96
- Wendt, Alexander. 1999. Social Theory of International Politics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- White, Ralph. 1990. "Why Aggressors Lose." Political Psychology 11 (June): 227–42.
- Wohlforth, William C. 1999. "The Stability of a Unipolar World."
- International Security 24 (Summer): 5-41.
  Wolfers, Arnold. 1962. Discord and Collaboration: Essays on Inter- national Politics. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press. Wrong, Dennis H. 1976. Skeptical Sociology. New York: Columbia University Press.

Dictatorial Peace?

MARK PECENY University of New Mexico CAROLINE C. BEER University of Vermont with

SHANNON SANCHEZ-TERRY University of Minnesota

Is there a dictatorial peace that resembles the democratic peace? This paper uses a new data set compiled by Barbara Geddes to examine the conflict behavior of three types of autocratic regimes—personalist, military, and single-party dictatorships—in the post-World War II era. We find some evidence that specific types of authoritarian regimes are peaceful toward one another. No two personalist dictators or two military regimes have gone to war with each other since 1945. These dyads were not less likely to engage in militarized interstate disputes than were mixed dyads, however. Although single-party regimes were the only homogeneous dyad in this study to have experienced war, multivariate analyses of participation in militarized interstate disputes suggest that single-party states are more peaceful toward one another than are mixed dyads. Thus, while we have found no unambiguous evidence of a dictatorial peace to match the robustness of the democratic peace, there is substantial interesting variation in the conflict behavior of specific types of authoritarian regimes. The analysis presented here demonstrates that studies of the impact of regime type on conflict behavior must work from a more sophisticated conception of authoritarianism.

s there a dictatorial peace that resembles the democratic peace? Previous research has shown that democracies almost never fight wars with one another and that democratic dyads are less likely to engage in any type of militarized dispute than are mixed dyads (Russett and Oneal 2001). But are democracies special, or is this type of conflict behavior replicated among other homogeneous dyads? Are similar authoritarian regimes peaceful toward one another?

Existing literature on the conflict behavior of autocracies has not provided a satisfactory answer to this question because it is a pale reflection of the voluminous literature on the democratic peace. While some have found that authoritarian regimes are more peaceful toward one another than are mixed dyads (Oneal and Russett 1997; Gleditsch and Hegre 1997; Raknerud and Hegre 1997), others have found no separate peace among authoritarian regimes (Russett and Oneal 2001). These findings are difficult to interpret because authoritarian regimes are treated as a residual category in studies focused on the democratic peace. Vastly different types of authoritarian regimes are coded as members of homogeneous dyads. If the personalist dictatorship of Saddam Hussein's Iraq attacks the revolutionary theocracy of Iran or if the communist regime of North Vietnam wars with the personalist dictatorship of Ngo Dinh Diem's South Vietnam, existing practice would lead these to be considered wars among homogeneous dyads.

Scholars have increasingly recognized the artificiality of the disciplinary division between the study of comparative politics and that of international relations. Domestic politics inevitably affects the foreign policies of states. The international system shapes the character of domestic political institutions and policy choices. Scholars of international relations have demonstrated conclusively that one cannot understand the central dynamics of contemporary international politics without examining the political institutions and cultural norms of liberal democracies. Indeed, the systematic study of the foreign policy behavior of liberal democracies probably represents the greatest contribution of international relations scholars in the ongoing effort to bridge the gap between the two subfields.

Nearly half of the world's states are governed by authoritarian regimes, however, and the foreign policies of this other half of the world's political regimes have been subjected to much less systematic examination. We study the conflict behavior of authoritarian regimes to deepen the integration of the comparative and international subfields of the discipline and expand our understanding of how political regimes shape foreign policy. Moreover, the democratic peace research has had important policy implications, shaping U.S. security policy to emphasize building democracy abroad. Similarly, important policy implications may come out of a deeper understanding of the conflict behavior of authoritarian regimes.

Mark Peceny is Associate Professor of Political Science at the University of New Mexico, Albuquerque, NM 87131-1121 (markpec@unm.edu). Caroline C. Beer is Assistant Professor of Political Science at the University of Vermont, The Old Mill, P.O. Box 54110, Burlington, VT 05405-4110 (cbeer@zoo.uvm.edu). Shannon Sanchez-Terry is a Ph.D. student at the Department of Political Science, University of Minnesota, Minneapolis, MN 55455.

An earlier version of this paper was presented at the International Studies Association Conference in Minneapolis, MN, March 18–21, 1998. Mark Peceny thanks the Eugene Gallegos Regents' Lectureship and Shannon Sanchez-Terry thanks the Research Opportunities Program of the University of New Mexico for their support. We thank Wyatt Dameron, Andrew Enterline, Douglas Gibler, Jeremy Linneman, Karen Remmer, Ken Roberts, William Stanley, and the editors of and anonymous reviewers for APSR for their comments on early drafts of this article. We are especially grateful to Barbara Geddes for making her data set available to us and to Andrew Enterline for providing the rest of the data used in this project and for his assistance with the data analysis. The data used in this paper, Barbara Geddes' data set on authoritarian regimes, and her 1999 APSA paper providing information of how the data set was constructed are available at www.uvm.edu/~cbeer/research.html.

This article uses a new data set prepared by Barbara Geddes (1999a, b) to examine the conflict behavior of three specific types of authoritarian regimes: personalist dictatorships, single-party regimes, and military regimes. By disaggregating authoritarian regimes into three specific types, not only do we shed light on the conflict behavior of authoritarian regimes, but also we are able to test some of the theoretical explanations of the democratic peace. Scholars of the democratic peace debate whether shared values or domestic institutions explain why democracies are much less likely to engage in militarized interstate disputes but have difficulty distinguishing between these factors since they both typically characterize democracies. By probing the conflict behavior of specific types of nondemocratic regimes, we can isolate and test contending theoretical explanations of the relationship among domestic institutions, values, and peace. Specifically, we hypothesize that personalist regimes are most likely among the three to forge a separate peace because of a particular kind of institutional constraint. Single-party regimes are the most likely among the three to be peaceful toward one another because of shared values. We test these expectations with a multivariate analysis of conflict behavior among homogeneous authoritarian regime dyads in the post-World War II era.

We find that no two personalist dictators or two military regimes have gone to war with each other. These dyads were not less likely to engage in militarized interstate disputes than were mixed dyads, however. Although single-party regimes were the only homogeneous dyad in this study to have experienced war, multivariate analyses suggest that single-party states are more peaceful toward one another than are mixed dyads. Thus, while we have found no dictatorial peace as robust as the democratic peace, there is substantial interesting variation in the conflict behavior of specific types of authoritarian regimes.

Institutions, Norms, and Peace Among Political Regimes

The initial debate on the democratic peace focused on whether institutional constraints or shared normative values were the source of the separate peace among liberal states (Russett 1993). This preliminary examination of whether there is a separate peace among specific kinds of authoritarian regimes begins with a similar evaluation of the relative importance of institutions and norms. The power of the democratic peace probably flows from the way institutions and norms reinforce one another. We do not see this combination in any of the homogeneous autocratic dyads under study here. For this reason, we anticipate that any dictatorial peace we discover will be less robust than the democratic peace. Nevertheless, elements of these two broad explanations for how homogeneity can lead to peace can be found for each of the regime types examined here. Political-military constraints may keep personalist dictatorships from fighting one another. A shared commitment to socialist values may inhibit conflict between single-party regimes.

Sources of the Democratic Peace

Initial advocates of the institutional argument for the democratic peace accepted Kant's basic insight about the constraining impact of republican institutions. If the people who pay the costs of war in lives and treasure have a say in the decision, they are likely to use their voices and votes in favor of peace (Kant 1983). Leaders are restrained from going to war because they must answer to the electorate (Gaubatz 1991) and/or a legislature (Morgan and Campbell 1991). Shared institutional constraints inhibit war between liberal democratic states because the leaders and citizens of such states can safely assume that other democracies are equally unlikely to engage in aggression (Bueno de Mesquita and Lalman 1992).

Subsequent work on the relationship between democratic institutions and the liberal peace has not emphasized the dovish character of liberal states. Fearon (1994) and Schultz (1999), for example, argue that the key to the democratic peace is the transparent character of liberal institutions. Freedom of the press and the openness of liberal institutions make it difficult for liberal states to bluff or hide crucial information about their intentions. Once elected leaders threaten to use force, they face substantial "audience costs" from the public if they back down, making their threats to use force more credible than those made by illiberal states (Fearon 1994). Knowing this, other states will seek negotiated settlements rather than face the likely consequence of defiance. The combination of two transparent liberal states provides sufficient information to make wars of miscalculation unlikely.

Bueno de Mesquita et al. (1999), Lake (1992), and Reiter and Stam (1998) argue that democracies do not fight one another because they are more effective at fighting wars than are authoritarian regimes. Bueno de Mesquita et al. assume that all leaders make choices about war and peace based on how those choices will affect their likelihood of staying in power. Regimes are distinguished primarily by the size of the winning coalition that supports the leader. Leaders backed by large winning coalitions, as in democracies, stay in office by providing good public policy. Because democratically elected leaders are likely to be voted out of office if they fail in war, they fight harder to guarantee victory and avoid war unless they are sure to win. War is unlikely between two democracies because democracies recognize one another as dangerous targets. Large and powerful democracies will consider going to war against smaller and weaker democracies, but the weaker state is likely to accede to the demands of the more powerful one rather than fight a war it is likely to lose.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Subsequent work on the liberal peace has focused on the importance of shared material interests (Farber and Gowa 1995), alliance commitments (Gaubatz 1996), trade, and/or membership in international organizations (Russett and Oneal 2001). Future research will examine the importance of these factors in the context of specific types of authoritarian regimes.

Advocates of the normative argument suggest that shared cultural and philosophical values bind liberal states together. Some emphasize a principled commitment to self-determination as the crucial shared belief that generates a liberal pacific union (Doyle 1983). Others focus on the norms of nonviolent conflict resolution engendered by democratic politics (Russett 1993; Dixon 1994). Advocates of the normative argument suggest that cultural homogeneity alone is not enough to breed peace among like-minded states. The specific content of liberal values is what creates the separate peace among liberal states.

Potential Sources of Peace Among Authoritarian Regimes

How might these insights about democracy and war be used to understand the conflict behavior of specific types of authoritarian regimes? Previous research has not adequately addressed this question because most advocates of the liberal argument implicitly measure nondemocratic states against the liberal standard. States that lack regular free and fair elections, freedom of the press, and/or strong legislatures are considered equally unconstrained, opaque, and/or inefficient at providing public goods such as victory in war. Peoples who lack a liberal commitment to self-determination and nonviolent resolution of conflicts are considered equally unlikely to sustain peaceful relations.

In contrast, scholars of comparative politics have long known that there exist numerous distinct types of authoritarian regimes (Linz 1975). Geddes' (1999a) data set codes three common types of autocratic regimes-military, single-party, and personalistbetween 1945 and 1994. As discussed below, the most crucial factor differentiating these regimes from one another is whether the government is dominated by the military as an institution, a hegemonic political party, or a single individual. Building on the democratic peace literature, we examine four causal mechanisms that link regime type and war-institutional constraints, transparency, war fighting capabilities, and shared values and apply these insights to the three types of authoritarian regimes catalogued by Geddes. Table 1 provides an overview of our argument. The top of each cell briefly summarizes our observations about each regime, while the bottom of each cell notes whether we consider this factor to have a high, medium, or low probability of leading to a separate peace among specific types of regimes.

Institutional Constraints and Transparency. There are ways in which it is appropriate to consider all of these types of autocratic regimes as fundamentally similar. We accept the liberal argument that these regimes are all less constrained than democracies in the sense that they allow a small elite tremendous leverage in determining national policy. In personalist regimes, one man possesses overwhelming authority to make decisions. Military regimes face somewhat more constraints because decisions need to be approved by a portion of the officer corps. Single-party regimes also may be somewhat constrained because decisions must have at least the tacit approval of party members.

As Bueno de Mesquita et al. (1999) point out, however, the size of the winning coalition in personalist, military, and single-party regimes may be equally small. Leaders in each of these autocratic regimes can, therefore, stay in office by providing private goods to key supporters even if they suffer defeat in war. The size of the "selectorate," however, differs substantially in these regimes, with single-party regimes possessing large selectorates and personalist dictators and military regimes small ones. Regimes that combine a large selectorate and a small winning coalition may be least constrained of all from going to war because it is more risky for members of the winning coalition to defect in such regimes, since defectors can be easily replaced (Bueno de Mesquita et al. 1999, 797). For these reasons, we believe that decisional constraints are unlikely to be the source of a separate peace among certain types of authoritarian regimes. Indeed, the lack of such constraints could lead to conflict between similar authoritarian regimes.

Similarly, we see few systematic differences in the openness of specific types of authoritarian regimes and find them all to be more opaque than democracies. Because of the need to provide information to party members and to remain consistent with their professed ideological vision, single-party regimes may be somewhat more transparent than military or personalist regimes. None of these regimes, however, possesses the combination of a diversity of information sources, freedom of the press, and political contestation that makes democracies systematically more transparent than all forms of authoritarianism. The logic of the transparency approach, therefore, does not help us much in distinguishing between specific types of authoritarian regimes and is unlikely to account for any separate peace between specific types of autocracies.

War-Fighting Capabilities. We believe that the institutional argument about democracy and war-fighting capabilities provides important insights for understanding how political institutions could lead to a separate peace among a particular group of autocracies, personalist dictatorships. Our argument, however, emphasizes the weakness of personalist dictatorships, rather than their strength, and suggests that this weakness can generate a political dynamic similar to that anticipated by the institutional constraint argument for the democratic peace. Democracies are more effective in war not only because of the size of their winning coalitions, but also because of the professionalization of their armies and the clear subordination of those forces to civilian authorities (Huntington 1957). With a few exceptions (Mansfield and Snyder 1995) scholars of the democratic peace have underemphasized this aspect of the relationship between democracy and war and have missed the constraints imposed on the politicalmilitary capability of states by certain patterns of civilmilitary relations.

	Ca	usal Mechanism Li	nking Regime Type and Wa
	Institutional Constraints	Transparency	War-Fighting Capabilities	Shared Values
Democracies	Most constrained, by elections and legislature	Transparent	Professionalized military, controlled by political leaders	Shared belief in liberal culture
Probability of leading to peace	High	High	High	High
Personalist	Least constrained	Not transparent	Weak, corrupt military	Least shared values
Probability of leading to peace	Low	Low	High	Low
Military	Somewhat constrained, by members of junta	Not transparent	Professionalized military, focused on internal security	Some shared values based on commitment to
Probability of leading to peace	Medium-low	Low	Medium-low	internal security Medium–low
One-party	Somewhat constrained, by party members and local party officials	Not transparent	Professionalized military, controlled by political leaders	Shared commitment to socialism
Probability of leading to peace	Medium-low	Medium-low	Medium-low	High

Among autocracies, single-party regimes have proven most successful in maintaining or enhancing the power of the coercive apparatus of the state. Singleparty regimes have often proven effective at mobilizing the people and resources of their societies in support of the nation's armed forces and have forged strong civilian control over professionalized militaries. Successful single-party regimes not only maintain the unity and discipline of the armed forces but also transform the Army into an instrument of the Party. An effective military has the potential to make single-party regimes more peaceful toward each other because they recognize the threat that another single-party regime poses. Alternatively, since the war-fighting capabilities of single-party regimes are not directly related to the size of their winning coalitions, their effectiveness in war may not lead to a separate peace among singleparty regimes.

The defining characteristic of a military regime is that the military as a unified institution governs the country. Thus, the military retains its cohesion and often increases the resources available to perform its national missions. As Andreski (1980, 3) notes, however, "The more often the armed forces are used internally, the less capable they become of waging a war." Because they focus on internal security missions, military regimes are likely to be more constrained than single-party regimes. Thus, while the Argentine military proved to be very effective in killing Argentines, it was less effective in fighting the British in the Malvinas War.

We argue, however, that personalist dictatorships are substantially more constrained than either military or single-party regimes. Dictatorial regimes thrive by destroying independent institutions, personalizing all politics, and ensuring that important political decisions are funneled through the one supreme leader (Jackson and Rosberg 1982). Dictators gain allies through the creation of clientelistic patronage networks. Graft and corruption bind individual bureaucrats to the leader rather than to rational, insulated bureaucracies. Those who cannot be coopted by inclusion in the corruption, or who might become future rivals for power, are purged. To stay in power, the dictator must skillfully divide and conquer his potential adversaries in the factional politics endemic to personalist regimes.

No institution presents a greater threat to the power of a personalist dictator than the Army does. Like military regimes, personalist dictators depend on the Army and security forces to repress popular dissent. They understand, however, that the armed forces almost always represent a greater threat to their power than do civilian dissidents. Personalist dictators must be constantly on guard against the possibility of a military coup. Indeed, many personalist dictators are former military officers who took power in coups (Jackson and Rosberg 1982, 32–8).

Dictators guard against this threat by incorporating officers fully in their network of graft and corruption. Officers are promoted and given choice commands because of their loyalty to the supreme leader rather than their skills as soldiers. They report to the dictator rather than through the chain of command, to strengthen the personal ties between the dictator and officers at the expense of the institutional bonds of the military. Multiple security forces and intelligence units proliferate so that the dictator can play one group off against another. These strategies are often very effective at preserving the dictator's power. Personalist regimes last longer than military regimes (Remmer 1989; Geddes 1999a).<sup>2</sup> Dictators can resist pressures to leave power because their regimes are unlikely to experience the splits within the governing elite that are essential for negotiating transitions to democracy (Bratton and van de Walle 1994; Geddes 1999a).

The strategies pursued by dictators to stay in power, however, render military institutions in personalist regimes incapable of doing much more than repressing unarmed civilians. To construct a "coup-proof" regime, dictators must systematically weaken their armed forces (Quinlivan 1999). These institutional constraints make it difficult for dictators to launch aggressive foreign policies because they know that their armies are unlikely to succeed in real combat with disciplined institutionalized military opponents. Because of the constraints personalist regimes impose upon the capabilities of their armed forces, dictators will generally be cautious about using their armed forces in battle. Saddam Hussein may represent an outlier rather than the norm for personalist dictatorships. Thus, personalist dictatorships that face few of the decisional constraints found in democracies are also constrained from participation in international conflict, albeit through different political institutions.

Shared institutional constraints may lead to peaceful relations among personalistic regimes because dictators are aware that their opponents face serious costs when force is used and are likely to be cautious. They may perceive one another as "dovish," which would reduce the probability that they will engage in wars that flow from security dilemmas (Bueno de Mesquita and Lalman 1992).

Any separate peace among personalist dictatorships is likely to be more tenuous than the one between democracies. The institutional incentives for peace are less profound among personalist regimes. Personalist regimes still experience limited decisional constraints and transparency. Furthermore, if personalist dictatorships are known to be weak, this could make them tempting targets. Even other personalist regimes might consider attacking these regimes, especially if there is a wide gap in the relative material capabilities of the two states. To help differentiate between the decisional constraints and war-fighting arguments, we examine the impact of one specific type of mixed dyad, democracypersonalist dictatorship. If constraints are key, the mutual dovishness of democracies and personalist regimes should lead to peace between them. If war fighting capabilities are key, personalist regimes may be precisely the kinds of easy targets that democracies are most likely to attack.

Shared Values and Peace Among Authoritarian Dyads. The political institutions of military and single-party regimes do not provide strong arguments for why these regimes might be peaceful toward one another. Indeed, their lack of decisional constraints, transparency, and weak and divided military institutions could encourage conflict among military and single-party regimes. For these regimes, we must look toward explanations focused on shared interests and/or norms to account for a possible separate peace among similar regimes.<sup>3</sup>

Most military regimes proclaim to be technocratic and apolitical rather than ideological. Despite this, many institutionalized military regimes, especially those concentrated in South America during the 1960s and 1970s, adhere to a well-defined "national security" ideology (Stohl and Lopez 1986). National security ideology maintains an organic concept of the state and proclaims that the military is ideally suited to be the guarantor of the nation, bringing effective government in the national interest. This ideology legitimates aggressive foreign policy "to achieve or defend national goals against existing hostilities and pressures" (Stohl and Lopez 1986, 76). While this vision emphasizes preserving the territorial integrity of the state from external invasion, it focuses more intently on internal threats to the political integrity of the nation. Many of these regimes took power to fight real or imagined communist insurgents and the democratic institutions that might allow communists to achieve power. Shared interests in cooperating against perceived leftist threats could generate a separate peace among military regimes, as illustrated by Operation Condor, in which Latin American military regimes cooperated in hunting down leftist dissidents across national borders. The common socialization shared by most professionalized military institutions could help cement these bonds. Remmer (1998) found that the military regimes of the Southern Cone cooperated extensively on a variety of issues. We test whether these regimes have also avoided engaging in wars or militarized disputes with one another.

We believe that single-party regimes are the most likely kind of authoritarian regime to belong to the same normative community. Marxism-Leninism proclaims that socialists must remain united in their zerosum struggle against capitalism because, if given the opportunity, capitalists will inflict cumulative losses on socialism. Marxist ideology also stresses the necessity for powerful socialist states to provide assistance to radical and other antiimperialist forces abroad. Since socialist states share a common ideology that stresses unity and brotherhood, one may expect that pairs of single-party regimes will not go to war because they share similar worldviews. While they do not focus on shared values, Oren and Hays (1997) find that developed socialist states were indeed peaceful toward one another during the Cold War.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Geddes (1999a) created her data set to examine whether some types of autocratic regimes were more stable and long-lived and whether they exhibited distinctive patterns of breakdowns and transitions to new regimes. She found that military regimes experienced the shortest tenure and were most likely to end in peaceful negotiated transitions to democracy. Single-party regimes were the most long-lived and were also likely to be replaced by some form of negotiated transition. Personalist regimes on average survived much longer than military regimes but not as long as single-party ones. They were also the regimes most likely to be replaced through violence.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Weart (1994) finds that shared political culture has led to peace among one type of nondemocratic regime, oligarchic republics.

This hypothesis should be treated with caution, however. While Marxism-Leninism provides a cohesive set of norms that binds these states together, it simultaneously legitimates violent revolutionary means of resolving conflict. Furthermore, the central role and exclusive nature of ideology in socialist single-party states can lead to conflicts about ideological purity. In his classic formulation of the containment policy, Kennan (1947) argued that the Communist Party leadership in the Soviet Union needed both to spread Communism aggressively and to punish satellite states that deviated from Soviet norms to legitimate their dictatorship at home. Any threat to the party's ideological supremacy, from internal or external sources, could be seen as a direct threat to the state. Thus, states governed by single-party regimes may conflict with one another because "they attempt to derive their legitimacy from identification with an ideological corpus" (Linz 1975, 197). Focusing on this dynamic, Bebler (1987) finds that Marxist-Leninist states have been involved in numerous conflicts with one another. Since Marxist ideology contains potentially contradictory ideas, it is difficult to know which ideas will dominate foreign policy.

One additional caveat is important here. China engaged in more disputes with Taiwan than almost any other member of the international system. Each of these cases is coded as a dispute among single-party regimes according to Geddes' guidelines. Clearly, China and Taiwan do not have shared norms and common interests. Therefore, we also examine below the conflict behavior of single-party regimes with Taiwan removed from the single-party regime category, so that we can get a more accurate sense of the importance of shared norms and common interests among single-party regimes.

Finally, it is unlikely that pairs of personalistic regimes will share similar normative values. Because personalistic regimes lack a common ideology, it is difficult to know what shared set of values might unite Saddam Hussein and Mobutu Sese Seko. A defining characteristic of personalistic regimes is that the cult of the leader rather than ideology dominates political life. Therefore, it is unlikely that shared worldviews will unite these regimes.

In sum, we argue that the more sophisticated classification of autocratic regimes presented in this article can lead to a more accurate assessment of whether specific types of autocratic regimes are peaceful toward one another. We anticipate that any dictatorial peace will be less robust than the democratic peace because none of the homogeneous pairs of autocratic regimes simultaneously exhibits the combination of institutional and normative constraints from warring with one another. Nevertheless, shared constraints may provide the foundation for a separate peace among personalist dictatorships, while shared identities and normative values may generate peaceful relations among single-party regimes. Military regimes are in the middle in terms of both shared values and institutional constraints. This leads to the central hypotheses examined in this paper.

- Hypothesis 1. Homogeneous dyads are less likely to engage in wars and militarized interstate disputes than are mixed dyads.
- Hypothesis 2. If institutional constraints are most important, personalist dictatorship dyads will be less likely to engage in wars and militarized interstate disputes than mixed dyads.
- Hypothesis 3. If shared norms are most important, single-party regime dyads will be less likely to engage in wars and militarized interstate disputes than mixed dyads.
- Hypothesis 4. If institutional constraints are most important, democracy-personalist dictatorship dyads will be less likely to engage in wars and militarized interstate disputes than other mixed dyads.
- Hypothesis 5. If war-fighting capabilities are most important, democracy-personalist dictatorship dyads will be more likely to engage in wars and militarized interstate disputes than other mixed dyads.

EMPIRICAL ANALYSIS

The Dependent Variable

The empirical analysis focuses on militarized interstate disputes (MIDs) as the dependent variable.<sup>4</sup> Militarized interstate disputes are "united historical cases of conflicts in which the threat, display or use of military force short of war by one member state is explicitly directed towards the government, official representatives, official forces, property, or territory of another state" (Jones et al. 1996, 163). Wars are MIDs that have escalated to the point where more than 1000 soldiers died in battle. We examine whether pairs of countries have participated in MIDs of each intensity (threats of force, displays of force, use of force, and/or wars) between 1945 and 1994. The unit of analysis is dyad years. The dependent variables are coded in dichotomous terms for each level of intensity.

Independent Variables

Two data sets are used to determine regime type. First, we use Polity IIId to classify democracies between 1945 and 1994, with a score of six on Polity's democracy scale serving as the cutoff point (Jaggers and Gurr 1995; McLaughlin et al. 1998). We do not use Polity to classify authoritarian regimes, however, because, as Gleditsch and Ward (1997) indicate, there is a variety of paths through which states can achieve the same scores on the Polity scales. Regimes with different institutions and structures are treated as though they were functionally identical. Single-party, military, and personalist regimes often receive the same score on the Polity autocracy scale. Thus, studies that have found some evidence of an authoritarian peace, such as those by Oneal and

&lt;sup>4</sup> The Correlates of War data set of interstate wars and the Militarized Interstate Dispute data set can be accessed at http://pss.la.psu.edu.

Russett (1997, 281–3), Gleditsch and Hegre (1997, 290), and Raknerud and Hegre (1997, 394–400) may not be measuring truly homogeneous dyads.<sup>5</sup>

Then, as noted above, we use Geddes' (1999a) data set, which relies on a wide range of secondary sources. to classify autocratic regimes as personalist, singleparty, or military during this time period. Cases are coded as military regimes if they are governed "by an officer or retired officer, with the support of the military establishment and some routine mechanism for high level officers to influence policy choice and appointments" (Geddes 1999a, 20). Military regimes share the following characteristics: relationships within the Junta and or military council are relatively egalitarian; the regime has some kind of institutions for deciding succession questions, and for routine consultation between the leader and the rest of the officer corps; the military hierarchy remains intact; and the security apparatus is controlled by the military. Geddes (1999a, 18) does not include governments that lasted for less than three years because they represented "periods of holding customary rules in temporary abeyance, struggle over rules, or transition from one set of rules to the next," rather than regimes, defined as "sets of formal and informal rules and procedures for selecting national leaders and policies." Since most of these temporary authoritarian interregna involved military governments, her list of military governments may underrepresent the universe of cases of military regimes.

Single-party regimes are defined as "regimes in which the party has some influence over policy, controls most access to political power and government jobs, and has functioning local-level organizations" (Geddes 1999a, 20). The party almost always exists prior to a leader's accession to power. It retains important functions down to the local level. Single-party systems routinely require party membership for most government jobs. While there are some exceptions, such as Taiwan and Mexico, most single-party states have been socialist regimes. To determine the dividing line between single-party authoritarian regimes and single-party dominant democracies, Geddes (1999a, 18) coded cases as authoritarian if the dominant party had never lost control of the executive and won at least two-thirds of all seats in the legislature in all elections prior to 1985.

Regimes were coded as personalistic if "the leader, who usually came to power as an officer in a military coup or as the leader of a single-party government, had consolidated control over policy and recruitment in his own hands, in the process marginalizing other officers' influence and/or reducing the influence and functions of the party" (Geddes 1999a, 20). These regimes lack effective institutions and one ruler dominates politics. To distinguish between military and personalistic regimes, Geddes codes regimes as personalistic when the leader dissolves military councils and other "consultative institutions"; when military officers are forced to retire; the leader forms a "party" to form an alternative base of support; or the leader murders, demotes, or dismisses dissenting officers. A single ruler dominates these regimes and ideology plays little role in politics. Monarchies, another type of autocratic regime in which a single ruler dominates, are not included in this data set.

Regimes that are not accounted for by either of these data sets are included in an "other" category. Many autocracies exhibit important characteristics of more than one category. Regimes Geddes classifies as hybrids are placed in the "other" category in our analysis. There is also a variety of political systems in uncertain processes of political transition that do not fit clearly into either the democratic or autocratic camps. Geddes, for example, does not classify the successor states created after the collapse of the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia because of the fluid nature of the political regimes in many of these states and because insufficient time has elapsed to judge whether their regimes have become institutionalized. These cases are also included in the "other" category here. We include dummy variables for each type of homogeneous dyad, democracies, personalist dictatorships, military regimes, and single-party regimes. Because we hypothesize that homogeneous pairs of states will be less likely to engage in wars and MIDs than heterogeneous ones, we use mixed dyads (including pairs of states in the "other" category) as the excluded category in our analysis.6

We also include five control variables that previous research has shown to have an impact on war and dispute involvement. First, previous research has shown that contiguous states are much more likely to engage in conflicts with one another than are states that do not share borders. Therefore, we include contiguity in the models.<sup>7</sup> Second, major powers are more likely to engage in conflicts than are lesser powers, so we include an independent variable that indicates whether a dyad includes a major power.8 Third, some argue that states formally allied with one another are less likely to engage in wars or militarized disputes than those who are not allied, especially in the post-World War II era (Russett and Oneal 2001, 103-4). Hence, we include an independent variable to control for allied dyads. Fourth, advocates of power preponderance theories suggest that the greater the disparity between two states, the less likely those states will engage in conflicts (Bueno de Mesquita and Lalman 1992), so we include a variable to control for unequal power capabilities. Finally, previous research has demonstrated that economic development is an important variable in determining conflict behavior (Bremer 1992). Therefore we include a variable to control for economic development. The first three variables are coded as dummy variables. The measure of relative power is a log of the higher/lower ratio between side A and side B in a given dyad according to the COW Composite Indicators of National Capabilities (CINC) data. Following Bremer (1992), we use the energy consumption component of the CINC to measure economic development and code it as a dummy variable that equals one if both states are more economically advanced and 0 otherwise.

&lt;sup>5</sup> Both Oneal and Russett (1997) and Gleditsch and Hegre (1997) follow what has become standard practice in the democratic peace field by combining the autocracy and democracy scales of the Polity data set into a single scale from -10 to +10. When Oneal and Russett (1997, 281-3) included the Polity scores of each state of a dyad in their models, they found a "cats and dogs" effect. The greater the distance between two states on the Polity scale, the more likely it was that they would enter into a militarized dispute. Gleditsch and Hegre (1997, 285) classify regimes as democracies if they score +3 or more on the DEMOC-AUTOC scale. They then differentiate between dyads that have zero, one, or two participants that qualify as democracies by this measure. They found that dyads with two nondemocracies were somewhat more likely to be peaceful toward one another than were dyads with only one democracy. Raknerud and Hegre (1997, 393) use only the democracy scale of the Polity data set and code regimes as democracies if they score 6 or above on that scale. They found that dyads with two nondemocracies were less likely to engage in war than were mixed dyads of democracies and nondemocracies but that this was a function of diffusion effects when democracies join ongoing wars on the side of other democracies. These are important, suggestive findings that help underscore the need to conduct more sophisticated tests of the possibilities for peace among specific types of authoritarian regimes.

&lt;sup>6</sup> Geddes constructed this data set to examine the longevity of different types of authoritarian regimes. Because she hypothesized that military regimes would be the most likely to break down quickly, while single-party regimes would last longest, she constructed a sixpoint scale that arrayed regimes along the range of their expected longevity: 1 = military regimes; 2 = hybrid regimes that share characteristics of military and personalist governance; 3 = personalist dictatorships; 4 = hybrids that combine elements of personalism and single-party governance; 5 = single-party regimes; and 6 = regimes that combine elements of all three types. In constructing cases of homogeneous dyads, we include only pairs of cases with the same pure type, those that are both coded as 1, 3, or 5.

Method

We begin by presenting the data for all levels of hostility in simple tabular form (see Table 2). We then use multivariate logit regression to estimate the impact of regime type on conflict involvement (see Table 3). We use logit splines, a technique designed by Beck et al. (1998), to address the problems associated with time dependence in analyzing time-series, cross-sectional data with a dichotomous dependent variable. We add a countervariable to the model recording the years of peace between a state's involvement in a militarized dispute and a subsequent involvement. The occurrence of a MID resets the counter to 0. We then generate three splines for each logit equation (see Beck et al. 1998; Enterline 1998, 394). The dependent variable in the results reported in Table 3 takes the value of one in any year in which a dyad is involved in a MID of any intensity and 0 when a dyad has not participated in any type of conflict behavior during a given year. We also estimated our models at each level of hostility and found consistent results across all levels of hostility short of war, suggesting that the dynamics of participation in MIDs is not dissimilar to the dynamics of the escalation of disputes among authoritarian regimes. See Table 4 for the results of these regressions.

Authoritarian Regimes and War

Our examination of the relationship between homogeneous authoritarian dyads and interstate wars between 1945 and 1994 shows that no two personalist dictators have fought one another.9 The same is true for military regimes. Only single-party regimes have fought wars with one another during this era and they have fought three times. See Table 2. The lack of variance in three of the regime variables makes it impossible to test the complete model using logit. 10 We can say, however, that the absence of war between democracies is not unique. Other types of political regimes have managed to avoid war with similar regimes in the post-World War II era.

Scholars have raised the question of whether the rarity of war and the rarity of democracy in the international system renders the finding of no wars between democracies statistically insignificant (Spiro 1994). This problem is considerably worse in the case of personalist dictatorships and military regimes than for democracies. States initiated wars in only .04% of the dyad years between 1945 and 1994. Personalist dictatorships and institutional military regimes are also rare. Whereas joint democratic dyads constitute 9.8% of the total dyad years during this era, pairs of personalist dictatorships accounted for only 1.27% of the total dyad years. Military regimes were even rarer, with joint military dyads accounting for only .34% of the total dyad years. The absence of war between pairs of personalist dictatorships and pairs of military regimes may, therefore, be the result of random chance.

Authoritarian Regimes and Militarized Interstate Disputes

Table 2 indicates that militarized disputes are also rare among pairs of military regimes or personalist dicatorships, but their proportion of all disputes roughly matches their share of all regime dyad years. What stands out in an examination of all militarized disputes in Table 2 is the comparison of the dispute behavior of democracies and single-party regimes. Single-party dyads have experienced more militarized disputes than democratic dyads even though there are nearly three times as many democratic dyads in the data set. Singleparty dyads were involved in 5.84% of all disputes, despite representing only 3.35% of all dyad years. Therefore, a simple bivariate chi-square test of the dispute participation of single-party regimes suggests that they are significantly more likely to engage in disputes with one another than are other dyads.

&lt;sup>7</sup> A dyad is considered contiguous if the two states share a land border or are within 400 mi of one another by sea (Gochman 1991).

8 For this time period, the United States, the Soviet Union/Russia, the United Kingdom, France, and China (from 1950) are considered major powers.

&lt;sup>9</sup> Personalist dictatorships have fought several wars with democracies, however, suggesting that a simple version of the institutional constraint argument and "dovishness" does not apply to the incidence of war.

Since we took our war data from the MID data set, the number of war dyad years reported in Table 2 is somewhat inflated compared to data taken from the Correlates of War interstate war data set. This is because the MID data set codes cases at the highest level of hostility for the entire dispute even if the dispute began at a level short of war. Since we do not report separate logit results for wars, this discrepancy does not affect our results.

TABLE 2.		Threat of Force	zed Interstate Disp Display of Force	Use of Force	War	Total
	No MID	Threat of Force		63	- 11	37,770
Democracy	37,687	6	14			100.00
Row	99.78	0.02	0.04	0.17	0.00
Column	9.82	13.33	5.79	5.75	0.00	9.80
Cell	9.78	0.00	0.00	0.02	0.00	9.80
Personalist	4,871	0	4	17	0	4,892
Row	99.57	0.00	80.0	0.35	0.00	100.00
Column	1.27	0.00	1.65	1.55	0.00	1.27
Cell	1.26	0.00	0.00	0.00	0.00	1.27
Military	1,297	0	0	3	0	1,300
Row	99.77	0.00	0.00	0.23	0.00	100.00
	0.34	0.00	0.00	0.27	0.00	0.34
Column Cell	0.34	0.00	0.00	0.00	0.00	0.34
Cell	0.54	0.00	0.00
Single-party	12,820	2	13	72	3	12,910
Row	99.30	0.02	0.10	0.56	0.02	100.00
Column	3.34	4.44	5.37	6.57	1.90	3.35
Cell	3.33	0.00	0.00	0.02	0.00	3.35
OCII	0.00	0.00
Mixed	327,052	37	211	941	155	328,396
Row	99.59	0.01	0.06	0.29	0.05	100.00
Column	85.23	82.22	87.19	85.86	98.10	85.24
Cell	84.89	0.01	0.05	0.24	0.04	85.24
Total	383,727	45	242	1,096	158	385,268
Row	99.60	0.01	0.06	0.28	0.04	100.00
Colun		100.00	100.00	100.00	100.00	100.00
Cell	99.60	0.01	0.06	0.28	0.04	100.00

Since militarized interstate disputes are more common than wars and pairs of each type of regime have engaged in disputes, we can use multivariate logit regression to analyze the relationship between regime type and MIDs. Table 3 presents the logit spline regression results of four models. 11 The first one examines the possibility of a general dictatorial peace. To do this, we include an independent variable that takes a value of one for dyads in which both countries have authoritarian governments coded by Geddes and 0 for all others. We also include a dummy for democratic dyads along with the five control variables, the peace years counter-variable, and logit splines to control for time dependence. The second model includes the three homogeneous authoritarian regime dyads as independent variables instead of the general dictatorial dummy. The third model substitutes a modified measurement for single-party dyads. In this model we include a variable, "NoTaiwan," which is the same as the single-party dummy except that dyads including Taiwan are coded 0. The final model includes all four homogeneous dyads as well as one hybrid of democracy and personalist dictatorship dyads.

ative and significant, suggesting that autocratic dyads and autocratic regimes.12 In Models 2-4 in Table 3 and both models in Table 4, dyads made up of two personalist dictatorships or two military regimes are not significantly different from mixed dyads in their propensity to engage in MIDs. The single-party regime dyad is the only one of the homogeneous authoritarian dyads that is strongly significant across each of these models. The sign for this variable is negative, suggesting that single-party regimes are less likely to engage in MIDs with similar regimes than with other types of regimes. This finding contradicts the expectations of Bebler (1987). It also seems to be result surprising given our concern with the significant variation among authoritarian regimes. Nevertheless, this result confirms the findings of Oneal and Russett

(1997), Gleditsch and Hegre (1997), and Raknerud

and Hegre (1997) and suggests that autocratic dyads broadly conceived are less likely to be involved in militarized disputes than are mixed dyads of democracies at odds with the data presented in Table 2, which suggest that single-party regimes are more likely to engage in disputes with other single-party regimes than with other regimes. These results support those of Oren and

In the first model, the autocratic dyad dummy is negare more peaceful than mixed dyads. We found this

<sup>11</sup> The logit models in Table 3 include fewer cases than reported in Table 2 because we possessed control data only through 1992.

<sup>12</sup> Russett and Oneal (2001) suggest that the "cats and dogs effect" that they had found in their 1997 study disappeared once they controlled for time dependence in their more recent analyses. Our tests include controls for time dependence and still find some evidence of a peace among authoritarian dyads.

	egressions: Depend Model 1	Model 2	Model 3	Model 4
Autocracies	-0.438
	(6.51)
Personalist		0.167	0.155	0.234
		(0.71)	(0.66)	(1.00)
Military		-0.368	 0.380	-0.300
0		(0.62)	(0.64)	(0.51)
Single-party		-0.739	, ,	-0.691
N		(5.87)		(5.47)
NoTaiwan		, ,	-0.915	(•)
-			(6.55)
Personalist/democracy			,	0.654
_				(6.61)
Democracy	–1.187	–1.184	-1.204	-1.136
	(9.08)	(8.93)	(9.05)	(8.54)*
Contiguous	2.965	2.964	`2.962	2.993
	(47.35)	(47.40)	(47.46)	(47.63)
Major-power dyad	2.261	2.349	` 2.346́	2.335
	(31.96)	(32.58)	(32.69)	(32.45)*
Allied	0.084	0.064	` 0.08Ó	0.040
	(1.19)	(0.89)	(1.12)	(0.56)
Higher/lower ratio	-0.326	-0.331	~ 0.33´1	-0.325
·	(14.96)	(15.23)	(15.23)	(14.97)
Economically advanced	0.341	-0.270	`0.2 5 0	-0.244
	(3.51)	(2.76)	(2.54)*	(2.48)*
Time since last dispute	-0.382	-0.385	-0.3 é 3	-0.388
	(19.00)	(19.16)	(19.07)	(19.28)*
Cubic spline 1	-0.004	-0.004	`0.0Ó4	-0.004
	(8.75)	(8.83)	(8.77)	(8.87)
Cubic spline 2	0.002	0.002	`0.002	0.002
	(6.52)	(6.62)	(6.57)	(6.66)
Cubic spline 3	-0.001	-0.001	~ 0.001	-0.001
_	(4.34)	(4.47)	(4.45)	(4.54)
Constant	-3.954	-4.031	~4.034	-4.090
	(52.58)	(53.98)	(53.96)	(53.98)*
Observations  Vote: Absolute value of z-statistics	376728	`3767 2 8	376728	376728

Hayes (1997), however, especially in model 3, which substitutes the NoTaiwan variable for the single-party dummy. When Taiwan is taken out of the single-party category, the coefficient increases substantially.

The control variables help account for why the single-party regime variable is negative in the logit models when the simple bivariate test suggested a positive relationship. Consistent with previous research, the results in all models in Table 3 indicate that contiguous dyads and those containing a major power are significantly more likely to experience militarized disputes than noncontiguous dyads or those without a major power. Dyads with large disparities in relative power are less likely to experience disputes. Only the alliance variable was not significant.

Single-party dyads were more likely to be contiguous than the norm and two of the five major powers, the Soviet Union and China, were governed by single-party regimes, which should increase the likelihood of conflict among these dyads. Indeed, a substantial majority of militarized disputes among single-party regimes involved either China or the Soviet Union in disputes with contiguous states. Many of these disputes pitted the USSR and China against one another. Almost none of the 90 disputes noted in Table 2 involved conflicts between two of the USSR's East European allies. The peaceful relationship among the Eastern European single-party regimes provides the strongest evidence for a separate peace among such regimes.

These results may mean that the high frequency of militarized disputes among single-party regimes is an artifact of the traditional great power behavior of China and the Soviet Union in their spheres of influence. The relative absence of conflicts among the smaller members of the Warsaw Pact could reflect Soviet hegemony. As Kennan suggested, however, conflicts between China and the Soviet Union and between the Soviet Union and its satellite states may have flowed directly from the character of their political regimes. At the core of the Sino-Soviet split was a struggle for ideological leadership in the socialist camp (Low 1976; Wich 1980; Kramer 1997a). Soviet interventions in the Eastern bloc reflected a desire, as suggested by the Brezhnev Doctrine, to enforce ideological unity in "conditions of unabating ideological war," to "preserve the indivisible socialist system," (LaFeber 1993, 258-9; Valenta 1991; Kramer 1997b). In any event, there may be a separate peace among single-party regimes, but the

TABLE 4. Logit Spline Regressions: Dependent Variable, MID (Various Hostility Levels)

Leveis)
	Model 1	Model 2
	(Dep. Var.,	(Dep. var.,
	Display of Force	Use of Force
	or Higher	or Higher
	Hostility Level)	Hostility Level)
Personalist	0.203	0.191
	(0.87)	(0.74)
Military	-0.341	-0.132
•	(0.58)	(0.22)
Single-party	-0.740	-0.682
	(5.82)	(5.04)
Democracy	-1.244	-1.223
•	(9.08)	(8.19)
Contiguous	2.939	2.945
· ·	(46.33)	(43.19)
Major-power dyad	2.349	2.281
	(32.26)	(29.16)
Allied	0.082	-0.017
	(1.13)	(0.21)
Higher/lower	-0.332	-0.318
ratio	(15.06)	(13.54)
Economically	-0.237	-0.307
advanced	(2.40)*	(2.83)
Time since last	 	-0.365
display or use	(18.58)	(16.69)
Cubic spline 1	-0.003	-0.004
	(8.45)	(8.59)
Cubic spline 2	0.002	0.003
•	(6.37)	(7.07)
Cubic spline 3	~ 0.0Ó1	~ 0.001
	(4.40)	(5.59)
Constant	~ 4.072	-4.277
	(53.91)	(51.92)
Observations	`37672́8	`3767 2 8
Note: Absolute value	of z-statistics in paren	theses. *Significan
	-1 -1 40/ 1-1-1	•

nt at 5% level; **Significant at 1% level.

ambiguous roles of China and the USSR in the socialist world are cause for caution in the interpretation of these results.

Only joint democracy was consistently related to a lower frequency of militarized disputes. Democratic dyads were more peaceful despite the fact that they were more likely to be contiguous, as well as to include major powers and states of relatively equal power. The fact that only democratic dyads were consistently more peaceful than the norm, even at the lowest level of hostility where conflicts among transparent democracies are likely to be overrepresented in the MID data, adds further support for the empirical power of the democratic peace.

Furthermore, Model 4 provides some evidence that it is the greater war-fighting effectiveness of democracies that helps account for that peace. The variable for dyads that include a democracy and a personalist dictatorship is positive and significant. A focus on institutional constraints would have suggested that democraticpersonalist dictatorship dyads would be more peaceful than other types of dyads. The increased likelihood of conflict between these dyads noted in Model 4 suggests that strong and capable democracies pick weak personalist regimes as targets.

While we have focused our analysis on authoritarian regimes, the finding that democracy-personalist dictatorship dyads are more likely to experience militarized disputes expands our knowledge of the broader relationship between regime type and conflict. Our findings support recent research on the democratic peace that it is the efficiency of democratic regimes in picking fights that they are likely to win and in fighting harder and better than their adversaries that accounts for the distinctive patterns found in the conflict behavior of democracies.

CONCLUSION

We found some evidence that suggests that there may be a dictatorial peace. No pair of personalist dictatorships fought wars in the post-World War II era. The same is true for military regimes. Authoritarian regimes in general were less likely to engage in militarized interstate disputes than were mixed dyads. Single-party regimes were less likely to conflict with one another than were mixed dyads when appropriate controls were included in the model. This was especially true when Taiwan was not counted as a homogeneous regime to the predominantly socialist regimes in the single-party category. All of these findings suggest that the separate peace among democracies may not be unique among political regimes.

We found no unambiguous evidence of a dictatorial peace, however. The rarity of war and of personalist and military regimes makes it difficult to ascertain whether the lack of war between these types of regimes reflects a causal relationship or random chance. While single-party dyads exhibited a strongly significant negative relationship with participation in militarized disputes, they are the only type of homogeneous dyad to have fought wars with one another in the post-World War II era. Furthermore, single-party regimes have been involved in numerous militarized disputes with one another. How one understands the conflict record of such regimes depends on how one interprets the role of the Soviet Union and China in the socialist world.

In the end, only shared democracy exhibits a clear and consistent negative impact on the incidence of wars and militarized interstate disputes. Furthermore, the increased possibilities for conflict found between personalist dictatorships and democracies provides evidence suggesting that it is the war-fighting capabilities of democracies that best explains the distinctive conflict behavior of democratic regimes.

While we may not have discovered an unambiguous dictatorial peace, we have shown that different types of authoritarian regimes exhibit varying patterns of conflict behavior. The analysis presented here demonstrates that studies of the impact of regime type on conflict behavior must work from a more sophisticated conception of authoritarianism. More broadly, efforts to integrate perspectives from comparative politics and international relations must concentrate as much on the impact of authoritarianism on foreign policy as they do on the impact of democracy.

REFERENCES

- Andreski, Stanislav. 1980. "On the Peaceful Disposition of Military Dictatorships." Journal of Strategic Studies 3 (3): 3-10.
- Bebler, Anton. 1987. "Conflicts Between Socialist States." Journal of Peace Research 24 (1): 31-46.
- Beck, Nathaniel, Jonathan Katz, and Richard Tucker. 1998. "Taking Time Seriously: Time-Series Cross Section Analysis with a Binary Dependent Variable." American Journal of Political Science 42 (4):
- Bratton, Michael, and Nicholas van de Walle. 1994. "Neopatrimonial Regimes and Political Transitions in Africa." World Politics 46 (4):
- Bremer, Stuart. 1992. "Dangerous Dyads: Conditions Affecting the Likelihood of Interstate War, 1816-1965." Journal of Conflict Resolution 36 (June): 309-41.
- Bueno de Mesquita, Bruce, and David Lalman. 1992. War and Reason. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Bueno de Mesquita, Bruce, James Morrow, Randolph Siverson, and Alastair Smith. 1999. "An Institutional Explanation of the Democratic Peace." American Political Science Review 93 (4): 791-
- Dixon, William. 1994. "Democracy and the Peaceful Settlement of International Conflict." American Political Science Review 88 (1):
- Doyle, Michael. 1983. "Kant, Liberal Legacies, and Foreign Affairs, Part 1." Philosophy and Public Affairs 12 (3): 205-35.
- Enterline, Andrew. 1998. "Regime Changes and Interstate Conflict, 1816-1992." Political Research Quarterly 51 (2): 385-409.
- Farber, Henry, and Joanne Gowa. 1995. "Polities and Peace." International Security 20 (2): 123-46.
- Gaubatz, Kurt Taylor. 1991. "Election Cycles and War." Journal of Conflict Resolution 35 (2): 212-44.
- Gaubatz, Kurt Taylor. 1996. "Democracy and Commitment." International Organization 50 (1): 109-40.
- Geddes, Barbara. 1999a. "Authoritarian Breakdown: Empirical Test of a Game Theoretic Argument." Paper presented at the 95th Annual Meeting of the American Political Science Association, Atlanta, GA, September 2-5.
- Geddes, Barbara. 1999b. "What Do We Know About Democratization After Twenty Years." Annual Review of Political Science 2: 115 - 44
- Gleditsch, Kristian, and Michael Ward. 1997. "Double Take: A Re-Examination of Democracy and Autocracy in Modern Polities." Journal of Conflict Resolution 41 (3): 361–83.
- Gleditsch, Nils Petter, and Håvard Hegre. 1997. "Peace and Democracy: Three Levels of Analysis." Journal of Conflict Resolution 41 (2): 283-310.
- Gochman, Charles. 1991. "Interstate Metrics: Conceptualizing, Operationalizing, and Measuring the Geographic Proximity of States Since the Congress of Vienna." International Interactions 17: 93-
- Huntington, Samuel. 1957. The Soldier and the State: The Theory and Politics of Civil-Military Relations. Cambride, MA, Harvard University Press.
- Jackson, Robert, and Carl Rosberg. 1982. Personal Rule in Black Africa. Berkeley, University of California Press.
- Jaggers, Keith, and Ted Robert Gurr. 1995. "Tracking Democracy's Third Wave with the Polity III Data." Journal of Peace Research 32 (4): 469-82
- Jones, Daniel, Stuart Bremer, and J. David Singer. 1996. "Militarized Interstate Disputes, 1816-1992: Rationale, Coding Rules, and Empirical Patterns." Conflict Management and Peace Science 15 (2):
- Kant, Immanuel. [1795] 1983. To Perpetual Peace: A Philosophical Sketch. Hackett: Indianapolis.

- Kennan, George. 1947. "The Sources of Soviet Conduct." Foreign Affairs 25 (4): 566-82.
- Kramer, Mark. 1997a. "The Soviet Foreign Ministry Appraisal of Sino-Soviet Relations on the Eve of the Split." Cold War International History Project Working Paper Series, Woodrow Wilson Center for International Scholars, http://cwihp.si.edu/ publications.htm.
- Kramer, Mark. 1997b. "The Prague Spring and the Soviet Invasion of Czechoslovakia: New Interpretations." Cold War International History Project Working Paper Series, Woodrow Wilson Center for International Scholars, http://cwihp.si.edu/publications.htm.
- LaFeber, Walter. 1993. America, Russia and the Cold War 1945-1992. New York: McGraw-Hill.
- Lake, David. 1992. "Powerful Pacifists: Democratic States and War." American Political Science Review 86 (1): 24-37.
- Linz, Juan. 1975. "Totalitarian and Authoritarian Regimes." Macropolitical Theory. Reading, MA: Addison Wesley.
- Low, Alfred. 1976. The Sino-Soviet Split. London: University Press. Mansfield, Edward, and Jack Snyder. 1995. "Democratization and the Danger of War." International Security 20 (1): 5-38.
- McLaughlin, Sara, Scott Gates, Håvard Hegre, Ranveig Gissinger, and Nils Petter Gleditsch. 1998. "Timing Changes in Political Structures: A New Polity Database." Journal of Conflict Resolution 42 (2): 231-42.
- Morgan, T. Clifton, and Sally Campbell. 1991. "Domestic Structure, Decisional Constraints and War: So Why Kant Democracies Fight?" Journal of Conflict Resolution 35 (2): 187-211.
- Oneal, John, and Bruce Russett. 1997. "The Classical Liberals Were Right: Democracy, Interdependence and Conflict, 1950-1985." International Studies Quarterly 41 (2): 267-94.
- Oren, Ido, and Jude Hays. 1997. "Democracies May Rarely Fight One Another, but Developed Socialist States Rarely Fight at All." Alternatives 22: 493-521.
- Quinlivan, James. 1999. "Coup-Proofing: Its Practice and Consequences in the Middle East." International Security 24 (2): 131-65.
- Raknerud, Arvid, and Håvard Hegre. 1997. "The Hazard of War: Reassessing the Evidence for the Democratic Peace." Journal of Peace Research 34 (4): 385-404.
- Reiter, Dan, and Allan Stam III. 1998. "Democracy, War Initiation and Victory." American Political Science Review 92 (2): 377-
- Remmer, Karen. 1989. Military Rule in Latin America. Boston, MA, Unwin Hyman.
- Remmer, Karen. 1998. "Does Democracy Promote Interstate Cooperation? Lessons From the Mercosur Region." International Studies Quarterly 42 (1): 25-51.
- Russett, Bruce. 1993. Grasping the Democratic Peace. Princeton, NJ, Princeton University Press.
- Russett, Bruce, and John Oneal. 2001. Triangulating Peace: Democracy, Interdependence, and International Organizations. New York, Norton.
- Singer, J. David, and Melvin Small. 1994. "Correlates of War Project: International and Civil War Data, 1816-1992" [Computer file 9905]. Ann Arbor, MI: Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research.
- Spiro, David. 1994. "The Insignificance of the Liberal Peace." International Security 19 (2): 50-86.
- Stohl, Michael, and George Lopez, eds. 1986. Government Violence
- and Repression. Westport, CT, Greenwood Press.
  Tucker, Richard. 1999. BTSCS: A Binary Time-Series—Cross-Section Data Analysis Utility, Version 4.0.4. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University. http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~rtucker/programs/ btscs/btscs.html.
- Valenta, Jiri. 1991. Soviet Intervention in Czechoslovakia 1968: Anatomy of a Decision. Baltimore, MD, Johns Hopkins University
- Weart, Spencer. 1994. "Peace Among Democratic and Oligarchic Republics." Journal of Peace Research 31 (3): 299-316.
- Wich, Richard. 1980. Sino-Soviet Crisis Politics. Cambridge, MA, Harvard University Press.

On the Vote-Purchasing Behavior of Incumbent Governments

MATZ DAHLBERG Uppsala University

EVA JOHANSSON Uppsala University and Institute for Labor Market Policy Evaluation

In this paper we investigate whether there are any tactical motives behind the distribution of grants from central to lower-level governments. We use a temporary grant program that is uniquely suitable for testing theories of vote-purchasing behavior of incumbent governments. The temporary grant program differs from traditional intergovernmental grants in several aspects, most importantly in the sovereign decision-making power given to the incumbent central government. We find support for the hypothesis that the incumbent government used the grant program under study to win votes. In particular, we find strong support for the Lindbeck—Weibull/Dixit—Londregan model, in which parties distribute transfers to regions where there are many swing voters. This result is statistically as well as economically significant. We do not, however, find any support for the model that predicts that the incumbent government transfers money to its own supporters.

re grants from central to lower-level governments tactical, in the sense that the incumbent government uses grants to enhance its reelection probabilities? According to several theoretical models that have evolved in the literature over the past 20 years, this question can be answered positively. Until now, thorough empirical tests of the theoretical models have been lacking, however, since suitable data have been rare. The fact is hence that we do not know whether or not grants are used tactically. It is important, however, to know this, both from a researcher's point of view and from a policy maker's point of view. Since we want to have appropriate models of the political process, researchers need to know whether or not the theoretical models of tactical allocation of grants are valid. A policy maker needs to know whether or not the incumbent government acts tactically when designing grant programs. In this paper, we have access to a data set that is uniquely suitable for use when investigating the vote purchasing behavior of incumbent

In the spring of 1998, a few months before the Swedish elections, 2285 million SEK was distributed to 42 of 115 applying Swedish municipalities. These grants were the first wave of a specially designed support program intended to support, by means of intergovernmental grants, local investment programs aimed at an ecological sustainable development and at increasing municipal employment. The decision-making design for these "ecological" grants differs a lot from how the distribution of intergovernmental grants is traditionally performed: The preparation as well as the final decision is made by the incumbent government and there is no explicit formula describing how the grants should be distributed. Furthermore, the grants are not related to the efficiency and equity goals otherwise typically attached to intergovernmental grants. Hence, the government has the opportunity to choose freely which municipalities to distribute money to, taking the effect on their reelection possibilities into account.

The purpose of the paper is to use these "ecological grants" to test two competing theories. The prediction from the first model, put forward by Lindbeck and Weibull (1993) and Dixit and Londregan (1996), is that the incumbent government purchases votes by distributing money to regions in which there are many swing voters. In contrast, the prediction from the other model, presented by Cox and McCubbins (1986), is that, due to risk aversion, the incumbent government purchases votes by investing in regions where it already has high support (for example, in regions where the party in power in the local government is the same as the party in power at the central level).

A SUITABLE DATA SET

To test theories that claim that the incumbent central government uses intergovernmental grants for tactical purposes, we would ideally like to have a situation in which (1) the incumbent central government decides on its own whether or not a lower-level government shall be granted, (2) we may disentangle any possible strategic use of grants from the equity and efficiency purposes typically attached to intergovernmental grants, (3) the granting decisions are made in close connection to an election, and (4) voters know that their Matz Dahlberg, Department of Economics, Uppsala University, P.O. Box 513, SE-751 20 Uppsala, Sweden (matz.dahlberg@nek.uu.se). Eva Johansson, Department of Economics, Uppsala University, and Institute for Labor Market Policy Evaluation, P.O. Box 513, SE-751 20 Uppsala, Sweden (eva.johansson@nek.uu.se).

We thank Sören Blomquist, Avinash Dixit, Per Johansson, Henry Ohlsson, and seminar participants at Göteborg University, NTNU, in Trondheim, Stockholm University, Uppsala University, the Research Institute of Industrial Economics (IUI), and the Institute for International Economic Studies (IIES) in Stockholm for helpful comments.

&lt;sup>1</sup> One could argue that, since the money is already distributed, there is no need for voters to reelect the incumbent government and that what ought to matter for voters' decisions is election promises. There is, however, empirical evidence (see, e.g., Stein and Bickers 1994; Levitt and Snyder 1997) that increased spending in fact affects voters' behavior. This could have at least two explanations: One is that voters feel obliged to support those who have treated them well; the other is that voters believe that a party that has supported them in the past also will support them in the future and hence see the actions of the incumbent government before the election as an indicator of how it will act in the future. Whatever the reason is, what matters in the end is that the incumbent government believes that voters react positively if the municipality in which they live is granted. In this paper we assume that this is the case. See also footnote 6.

municipality has/has not been granted. In this study, we use data that we claim fulfills all four conditions, concerning the decision-making process, the aim, the timing, and the information. This has not been the case in any of the earlier empirical studies<sup>2</sup> since in most countries the systems for intergovernmental grants are prescribed by laws that cannot be changed overnight: condition 1 above has hence not been fulfilled. Furthermore, the prescribed formulas are typically linked to different need variables in the municipalities, implying that condition 2 has not been fulfilled. One way to separate political factors and equity and efficiency aspects of grants (and thereby try to fulfill condition 2) is to include a number of sociodemographic variables in the regressions and thereby try to control for redistributive motives of intergovernmental grants and federal spending. It is, however, far from obvious how to do this. The problem is well described by Levitt and Snyder (1997): If we do not control for equity and efficiency variables, we risk exaggerating the political impact of grants, but on the other hand, targeting grants to specific minorities might be a perfect way for politicians to buy support, and by including them we might fail to identify tactical aspects that actually are present. In fact, in many countries, for example, Sweden, the rules for intergovernmental grants are set up in such fashion that it is only through these demographic factors that regions can be targeted. Ideally, one would like to test the tactical theories on a grant program that is not intended to equalize income and that is free from specific formulas describing how the grants are to be distributed.3

The grant program we study in this paper was introduced in 1997, when it was decided that the Swedish central government should construct a specially designed support program to support, by means of intergovernmental grants, local investment programs aimed at an ecological sustainable development.4 These grants were supposed to be temporary and supplementary to the usual intergovernmental grants that are motivated by efficiency and equity reasons. The grants are economically important; 7.4 billion SEK was to be distributed during four years (1998-2001).5 Only municipalities could apply for these grants. For a municipality to be eligible for the grants, four main criteria had to be fulfilled: (i) the proposed investment project must be fully detailed and developed in the application, (ii) the estimated cost for the project must be given, (iii) the investment program must be designed for an ecological sustainable development, and (iv) the project must increase the employment in the municipality. The applications were sent to the incumbent central government (ministry of environment), and the incumbent central government had the final say about which municipalities should be granted.

There are mainly four aspects that make this data set suitable for the purpose of this paper, besides its economic significance. First, and most importantly, the decision-making process on which of the municipalities are to receive grants differs from the traditional way of distributing grants to municipalities. The usual intergovernmental grants are distributed among the municipalities according to rather strict predefined rules based on equity and efficiency arguments and are handled by central authorities that are independent of the incumbent central government. But for the temporary grants for an ecological sustainable development, it is solely the incumbent central government that decides which municipalities are to be granted (after preparation at the ministry of environment). Furthermore, one of the important decision makers at the Ministry of Environment is a former member of the Swedish parliament for the incumbent government (the Social Democrats). Second, the grant program is not intended to fulfill equity and efficiency objectives but, rather, to "support an ecological sustainable development." It is, however, far from clear what exactly is meant by that phrase. In fact, there existed no predefined guidelines on how the "ecological" grants were supposed to be distributed (see Riksdagens Revisorer 1999). Third, the decisions were made five to six months before the 1998 elections.<sup>6</sup> Finally, the yes-or-no nature of the decision makes it easy to apprehend and the question has also attracted much attention in the local, as well as the central, press, giving us reason to expect voters to be aware of how their own municipality has been treated. The grants for an ecological sustainable development hence fulfill all four desirable conditions and are thus very well suited for use for studying the question of vote-purchasing behavior.

The applications for the grants designed for an ecological sustainable development will be made in several waves. We use data from the first wave of applications; hence the analysis in this paper is cross sectional. The final day for the first wave of applications was February 16, 1998. One hundred fifteen out of a total of 288 Swedish municipalities applied for the grants. Decisions were made during March and April. Forty-two of the 115 applying municipalities received grants amounting to a total of 2.3 billion SEK. Housing and construction constitute the largest part ical Sustainable Development.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See, e.g., Bungey, Grossman and Kenyen (1991), Grossman (1994), and Johansson (2002).

Rich (1989) in fact shows that the structure of a grant program, not the specific purpose of the program, shapes the politics of how the grants are distributed. Further, he notes that political factors are more evident in project grant programs than in formula grant programs.
 The grant program was initiated by the Committee for an Ecolog-

&lt;sup>5</sup> In 1998, total grants to the municipalities in Sweden amounted to 57.7 billion SEK. Total grants constitute approximately 20% of the municipalities' total revenues. In 1998 1 USD was approximately equal to 8.5 SEK.

&lt;sup>6</sup> We can also note that the grant program can be considered a repeated game: it is a four-year program in which the incumbent government distributes money in each of the years 1998–2001. Voters might hence consider the decision made before the election to be an indication of how the incumbent government will act in the future if they win the election (see footnote 1).

&lt;sup>7</sup> There are at least two reasons for concentrating on the first wave: First, the Swedish Election Survey which we use to estimate one important variable is not yet available for more recent elections; second, the rules for the distribution of ecological grants have been made more structured for the following waves, partly as a consequence of this paper.

of investment projects granted, followed by energy projects, sanitation, and nature and water conservation.

TACTICAL REDISTRIBUTION: THEORIES AND EMPIRICAL EVIDENCE

The idea that the incumbent government considers political strengths of regions when distributing resources across the country is old. Investigating New Deal spending, Arrington (1969) found the somewhat mysterious fact that spending did not seem to promote equity between states but rather to favor states with a high income. In fact, economic variables did a very bad job explaining New Deal spending. 8 Wright (1974) attacked this "oddity" by incorporating a number of political variables in the analysis. Starting out with a theoretical model where the president maximizes the probability of winning and where voters react positively to new spending programs, he predicted that spending will be higher in states with higher "political productivity," a measure depending on the electoral votes per capita, the variability in the vote share of the incumbent government in past elections, and the predicted closeness of the presidential elections. Running cross-section regressions for the period 1933-1940 on 48 states. Wright found a considerably higher  $R^2$  in the political regression than in the economic regression. He therefore concluded that interstate inequalities in federal spending, to a large extent, were consequences of vote maximizing behavior of politicians. Anderson and Tollison (1991) claimed that it was not the result of the presidential election alone that mattered; the congressional influence was important as well, perhaps even more important. Their idea was that states whose representative in the congress has great power (e.g., length of tenure, speaker in House or congress) would be favored. Using the same data as did Wright, they found that many of these congressional variables entered with the expected signs and statistical significance. Wallis (1996) examined the findings of Wright and of Anderson and Tollison closer using panel data. He found that economic variables did matter and that, excluding Nevada<sup>9</sup> from the sample, the impact of Anderson and Tollison's congressional variables disappeared, while Wright's presidential variables still entered significantly. Wallis further expanded the investigated period beyond the New Deal, using data on federal government grants to states for the years 1932, 1942, 1962, 1972, and 1982. He found that (i) the results change dramatically when controlling for fixed effects, (ii) taking the simultaneity between spending and grants into account, the result that high-income states are favored disappears and economic variables does matter, and (iii) while Wright's presidential <sup>8</sup> Reading (1973) examines the political rhetoric behind the New Deal. There were three goals of the New Deal: relief, recovery, and reform. He finds no support for the hypothesis that spending and loans were directed to poorer regions, which he takes as evidence that the New Deal did not fulfill the reform goal.

<sup>9</sup> Nevada was the state receiving the largest per capita grants during that period. In addition, Nevada has a 1 in the dummy variable for Senate leadership during the whole period.

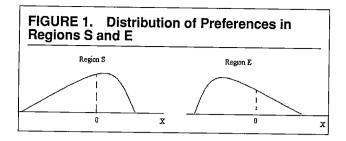

variables seem to matter much during the New Deal, congressional factors are more important in the long

Many of the early studies lack a strict theoretical ground and are rather ad hoc about which political variables to include. During recent years, some more stringent theoretical models have been developed. In this paper we concentrate on two competing theoretical models that yield quite different testable empirical implications. <sup>10</sup> The first model takes its roots in the papers by Lindbeck and Weibull (1987, 1993) and Dixit and Londregan (1996, 1998) (hereafter LW/DL), and the second model is the one presented by Cox and McCubbins (1986).

The most commonly used theory today is perhaps the one originating from the papers by Lindbeck and Weibull and by Dixit and Londregan. They consider a two-party system where parties, facing an election, promise different groups of voters transfers to win their votes. Voters have preferences over the parties (hereafter ideological preferences) and decide which party to vote for taking these preferences into account, as well as the consumption levels promised by the two parties. In each region there is a distribution of ideological preferences, and given a certain level of regional transfers, there will be a critical value (cutpoint) that divides voters into those voting for one party and those voting for the other party. The parties try to move this cutpoint and thereby increase their vote shares, by using regional transfers. <sup>11</sup> Figure 1 illustrates an example $<sup>^{10}</sup>$  There are a number of additional hypotheses in the literature, more tailored to the U.S. system, that have been investigated empirically (see, e.g., Stein and Bickers 1994; Levitt and Snyder 1995). Stein and Bickers (1994) investigate the use of pork barrels by incumbent congressmen in the U.S. Congress in the 1988 election. They put forward and find support for the following hypotheses: (i) It is not the dollars spent that matters but, rather, the number of new projects initiated; (ii) not all incumbents need to use grants to improve their electoral fortune—only those in a vulnerable situation (vulnerable meaning that they got elected by a very small margin); (iii) it is not the number of projects per se that makes people like the incumbent but rather, the awareness of these new projects; (iv) awareness increases with the number of new projects; and (v) the electoral support of an incumbent increases with voters' awareness of new projects. Levitt and Snyder (1995) investigate the impact of political parties on federal spending. Underlying the analysis is the assumption that politicians would, if they could, support their own. Levitt and Snyder contrast three models: a "weak party" model, where parties play no role and what matters is whether the representatives of a district have powerful positions in the chamber; a "strong party" model, where parties play a crucial role and where the distribution of outlays changes quickly if the political identity of the district's representatives changes; and an intermediate model, where a party with a sufficiently strong position during a sufficiently long time period is able to favor its own districts. These models are tested empirically by using district-level data on election outcomes and federal assistance programs for the period 1984-1990. Dividing the sample according to geographical concentration, allocation rules, and initiation time, they find that (i) spending is an increasing function of the number of Democratic votes in the district, (ii) spending favors groups that are geographically concentrated being favored, (iii) programs that are allocated through formulas are more heavily skewed to democrats, and (iv) the pattern is strongest for programs initiated during the period 1975-1981, when the Democrats had a strong majority in both the House and the Senate.

<sup>11</sup> More formally, the theoretical model is as follows: Assume that all inhabitants in a region have identical income levels (these are,

with two regions, S and E, where X denotes the voters' preferences for the incumbent government. The vote share of the incumbent government is given by the proportion of voters with positive values on X, that is, the share to the right of the cutpoint. By giving a region grants, the incumbent government tries to move the cutpoint to the left and thereby increase its vote share. We see from Fig. 1 that a dollar spent in region S will yield a larger number of votes gained than the corresponding dollar spent in region E, since there is a higher density at the cutpoint (i.e., more swing voters) in region S than in region E.

The amount of transfers a region receives will hence be positively correlated with the density at the cutpoint. The theory further predicts grants to be targeted at regions with a low income, since voters with a low income have a higher marginal utility of income and thus can be more easily persuaded to vote for a party promising them high transfers than high-income earners can (i.e., the cutpoint moves more in a poor region). Note that the size of the population in the region does not matter. Under some assumptions about the distribution functions (i.e., symmetry and single peakedness) and parties' objective functions, there will be a one-to-one correspondence between the density at the cutpoint and the closeness of the last election. Johansson however, allowed to differ between regions). There are two parties, A and B, maximizing the number of votes. An individual living in region i will vote for party B if  $U(C_{iB}) - U(C_{iA}) > X$ , where X is the voter's preference for party A over party B and C is the consumption level promised by party A (when indexed with an A) and party B (when indexed with a B), respectively. The cutpoint in region i is hence defined as  $X_i = U(C_{iB}) - U(C_{iA})$ . In each region, there is a distribution of X given by  $\Phi_i(X)$ , with density  $\phi_i(X)$ . The vote share for party B is then given by  $\sum_{i} N_{i} \Phi_{i}(X_{i})$ , where  $N_{i}$  is the share of the population living in region i. Parties maximize their vote shares by choosing  $T_{ip}$ , p = A, B (the amount of grants to distribute to each region), subject to  $\sum_{i} N_{i} T_{ipk} = R$ , where R is the available resources. At equilibrium both parties choose the same transfer promises, given by the condition  $U_C(C_{ip})\phi_i(X_i) = U_C(C_{jF})\phi_j(X_j)$ . Grants will hence be an increasing function of the density at the cutpoint  $[\phi_i(X_i)]$  and a decreasing function of income (since a higher income means a lower marginal utility of consumption). Since Sweden has proportional election rules, the same results emerge if we assume instead that parties maximize the probability of winning the election. See Dixit and Londregan (1996) for a more detailed description.

12 One main difference between the LW/DL theoretical model and the grant program we study is that the model describes monetary transfers directed directly to individuals, while, in our case, transfers are given to the municipalities to use in investments, which, in the end, affects individual utility positively. It is therefore not obvious how we should expect municipal income to affect the amount of grants the municipality receives.

<sup>13</sup> Note that the closeness proxy is not valid if the distribution functions deviate from the assumptions, for example, if the distribution functions are double-peaked or skewed.

(2002) uses this closeness proxy as well as an estimate<sup>14</sup> of the densities at the cutpoints and tests the model for Swedish municipalities. While she finds no statistically significant support for grants being used as a tactical instrument when using the closeness measure, she does find support for the tactical hypothesis when using the latter proxy. In this paper we use both the closeness proxy and the estimated density at the cutpoints. If both variables indicate the same result, we would be more inclined to believe these results, since the validity of both proxies rests on some underlying assumptions which we do not know are fulfilled.

The second theory tested is presented by Cox and McCubbins (1986). They divide voters into three groups: support groups, opposition groups, and swing groups. Parties invest in votes by promising redistribution to these groups. Assuming that parties are riskavert and that swing groups are riskier investments, they predict that politicians will invest little (if at all) in opposition groups, somewhat more in swing groups, and more still in their support groups. It is the assumption of risk aversion together with the assumption that investing in the support groups is the least risky investment which leads Cox and McCubbins to empirical implications different from those of LW/DL. These assumptions can of course be criticized, but they are the ones used by the authors. When testing this model, we use two variables, both assumed to capture the strength of the political support for the incumbent (socialist) government in each municipality. The first is a dummy indicating if there is a socialist majority in the municipal council. The other variable measures the share of inhabitants in each municipality that cast their votes in favor of the incumbent government (the Social Democrats) in the last election. 15

Our empirical strategy is as follows. First, we estimate the models developed by LW/DL and Cox-McCubbins

&lt;sup>14</sup> This estimate is obtained using survey data from the Swedish Election Studies. See the Appendix for a description.

<sup>15</sup> It can be noted that an alternative model exists that has been investigated somewhat in the empirical literature, namely, that of Grossman (1994). He takes as a starting point the fact that the same parties appear at both the state and the federal level, and therefore, some interaction between local and central politicians is likely to occur. In the model, federal politicians transfer money to the state level, making it possible for state politicians to raise public spending and thereby increase their reelection possibilities. In return, state politicians invest their political capital in efforts to increase the support of state voters for the federal politicians. The model hence predicts that states where politicians are effective in raising political support will receive large grants from the federal government. The problem, however, is that it is not obvious how to measure political effectiveness, a problem that is illustrated by the fact that the three studies testing this model (Bungey, Grossman and Kenyen 1991; Grossman 1994; Worthington and Dollery 1998) all use different sets of political variables and even predict different signs for some of them. As a consequence of the different views about how political variables influence grants, the empirical evidence is rather hard to interpret. However, the political variables used in these empirical studies closely resemble those implied by the two models discussed in this paper; the closeness of the local elections is very closely correlated with the closeness proxy from the LW/DL model, and two other variables are the same as used by us when testing the Cox-McCubbins model.

TABLE 1. Variables Used to Test the Different Models and Their Expected Signs
Variable/Model	Lindbeck-Weibull/ Dixit-Londregan	Cox-McCubbins	Encompassing ("Sensitivity")
Cutpoint density	+		+
Distance between blocs	_		_
Income	-		=
Socialist majority in municipal council		+	+
Share of votes for social democrats			+

TABLE 2. Number of Municipalities Within Each Group that Applied for Grants and that Were Granted

	Applying Mu	Applying Municipalities		Granted Municipalities
Group of Municipalities	No./Total		No./Total	%	No./Applying	%
Big cities	3/3	100	3/3	100	3/3	100
Suburbs	12/36	33.3	5/36	13.9	5/12	41.7
Larger cities	15/26	57.7	10/26	38.5	10/15	66.7
Middle-sized cities	19/40	47.5	6/40	15.0	6/19	31.6
Industry	19/53	35.8	5/53	9.4	5/19	26.3
Rural	13/30	43.3	3/30	10.0	3/13	23.1
Sparsely populated municipalities	11/29	37.9	0/29	0	0/11	0
Other larger municipalities	11/31	35.5	7/31	22.6	7/11	63.6
Other smaller municipalities	12/40	30.0	3/40	7.5	3/12	25.0

Note: Big cities: Municipalities with more than 200,000 inhabitants. Suburbs: More than 50% of the municipalities employed travel to another municipality to get to their work. Larger cities: Municipalities with more than 50,000 inhabitants and with less than 40% employed in industry. Middle-sized cities: Municipalities with 20,000 to 50,000 inhabitants and with less than 40% employed in industry. Industry: Municipalities with more than 40% employed in industry and which are not sparsely populated. Rural: Municipalities with more than 8.7% employed in agriculture and forestry and which are not sparsely populated. Sparsely populated municipalities: Municipalities with <5 inhabitants per km² and with less than 20,000 inhabitants. Other larger municipalities: Other municipalities with 15,000 to 50,000 inhabitants. Other smaller municipalities: Other municipalities with less than 15,000 inhabitants.

separately. 16 Thereafter, as a "sensitivity analysis," we estimate an encompassing model in which we include political variables from both these models. In constructing the variable "cutpoint density," we follow Johansson (2002). In short, the technique is the following: First, we use survey data from the 1994 Swedish Election Study to estimate the distributions of political preferences, and second, we decide the locus of the cutpoints using the 1994 elections to the parliament. In the 1994 Swedish election study, 2296 individuals answered a number of questions regarding their feelings and attitudes toward different Swedish parties and politicians. Using these answers, we construct, through factor analysis methods, a variable that measures voters' preferences for the conservative bloc over the socialist bloc. Since respondents in the election survey are observed at the level of constituency, we can then estimate the constituency-specific distributions of these preferences. Finally, we use the results from the 1994 election to the parliament in each municipality to define cutpoints and, thereafter, measure the densities at these cutpoints, yielding a variable for each municipality (except for Gotland, for which there are very few observations in the election survey).<sup>17</sup>

The variables used to test the models and their expected signs are summarized in Table 1.

DESCRIPTIVE STATISTICS

Before going into detail about the econometric specifications and the estimation results, we take a quick look at the data here. Is there any pattern that can be observed from data concerning which types of municipalities, on the one hand, apply for grants and, on the other, are granted?

In Table 2 we divide the municipalities into different types depending on their size and population. In the first two columns, we study the applying municipalities, and in the last four columns we study the granted municipalities. From Table 2, we note that all three of the big cities (Stockholm, Malmö, and Göteborg) have applied for grants. Otherwise, the fraction of municipalities applying within each group of municipalities ranges from 30% (for "other smaller municipalities") to 57.7% (for "larger cities"). Turning to the type of

&lt;sup>16</sup> A difference between the theoretical models and our empirical specification is that the models discuss election promises, made by both parties (blocs), whereas we, in the empirical investigation, investigate actual decisions made by the incumbent government. This means that we are not able say anything about how the opposition bloc would have acted, had it been in the same position as the government. In addition, the theoretical models discuss a situation in which there are only two parties. Sweden, on the other hand, has a multiparty system. However, the political situation has been characterized by the parties divided into two blocs, and this division has been stable over time, meaning that we can consider Sweden a two-bloc system.

 $<sup>^{17}\,\</sup>mbox{For}$  a detailed description on how the variable is constructed, see the Appendix.

TABLE 3. Descriptive Statistics: A Comparison, on One Hand, Between Municipalities Applying for Grants (Applicants) and Municipalities Not Applying for Grants (Nonapplicants) and, on the Other Hand, Between Granted and Nongranted Municipalities

		Mean (Standard	Deviation)
Variable	Applicants	Nonapplicants	Granted	Nongranted
Controls for "needs"
Vacancy rate	0.160	0.153	0.144	0.169
	(0.126)	(0.095)	(0.072)	(0.148)
Social welfare spending	1.003	0.882	1.232	0.872
	(0.565)	(0.382)	(0.734)	(0.388)
Tax base	92737	91578	93978	92022
	(11862)	(11189)	(8933)	(13263)
Cash flow	5.10	4.95	5.12	`5.10 ´
	(2.98)	(3.51)	(2.87)	(3.06)
Young	20.42	20.46	20.32	20.48
	(1.77)	(1.73)	(1.77)	(1.77)
Old	16.80	18.25	14.81	17.94
	(5.23)	(5.07)	(5.70)	(4.61)
Political	, ,	` '	, ,	( /
Cutpoint density	0.029	0.029	0.032	0.028
•	(0.006)	(0.007)	(0.003)	(0.007)
Distance between blocs	`0.212 ′	`0.221 ′	0.143	0.252
	(0.160)	(0.163)	(0.105)	(0.172)
Socialist majority in municipal council	0.504	`0.509	0.452	0.534
	(0.502)	(0.501)	(0.504)	(0.502)
Share of votes for Social Democrats	`0.444	`0.451 ′	0.431	0.452
	(0.091)	(0.094)	(0.059)	(0.105)
Environmental	,	(,	(/	(51.55)
Environmental rating in 1997	18.16	16.09	20.14	17.01
•	(5.67)	(4.85)	(6.29)	(4.97)
Share of votes for environmental party	0.045	0.047	0.054	0.039
[ .,	(0.024)	(0.027)	(0.024)	(0.023)

municipalities that was granted, we see that the fraction of municipalities that was granted within each group of municipalities is more unevenly distributed over the different groups of municipalities than is the case for the applying municipalities. From the last four columns in Table 2, it seems that large municipalities (i.e., "big cities," "larger cities," and "other larger municipalities") have been favored, while the opposite seems to be true for "industry," "rural," "sparsely populated municipalities," and "other smaller municipalities." The most extreme case in the latter group is "sparsely populated municipalities," where none of the 11 applying municipalities was granted.

Next we turn to a comparison of the variables used in the empirical analysis. These summary statistics are listed in Table 3. We use the following variables: <sup>18</sup> As controls for the municipalities' socioeconomic, demographic, and financial needs we use the vacancy rate in the municipality (i.e., number of vacant jobs/number of unemployed persons in the municipality), social welfare spending in the municipality, the municipality's tax base, the municipality's financial result (cash flow), and the demographic structure in the municipality (fraction young and fraction old). These variables are the ones typically used when controlling for the equity and/or efficiency purposes normally attached to intergovernmental grants. The vacancy rate, which is a measure of labor market tightness, gives the probability for a job searcher of finding a job in a given municipality (the higher the vacancy rate, the tighter is the labor market and the higher is the probability of finding a job) and is also motivated by the fact that one of the purposes of the grant program under study was to increase the employment rate in the municipalities. If the incumbent government uses this grant program to increase an unemployed person's chances of getting a job in municipalities characterized by "less tight" labor markets, we would expect a negative sign for the vacancy rate.<sup>19</sup> When testing the political models discussed in Section 3, we use the political variables presented in Table 1: the estimated cutpoint densities, the distance between the blocs at the election at the central government level, a dummy indicating whether there is a socialist majority in the municipal council, and the share of votes for the Social Democrats (in the election to the central government). Since the main purpose of the grant program under study was to enhance the environmental activities in the municipalities, we must somehow control for this. We have chosen to use

&lt;sup>18</sup> The definitions of the variables are given in the Appendix (under Data Appendix). Summary statistics of the full sample and the raw correlations between the variables are available upon request.

&lt;sup>19</sup> We have also experimented with the unemployment rate instead of the vacancy rate. The unemployment rate, however, had a low explanatory power (in a statistical as well as in an economical sense). In this paper, we report only the results using the vacancy rate.

two environmental variables: the municipality's environmental rating in 1997 and the share of votes for the environmental party in the last election to the municipal council.<sup>20</sup>

Starting with a comparison between municipalities applying for grants (applicants) and municipalities not applying for grants (nonapplicants), we note that there are very small differences in the means and standard deviations of the variables. The only variables that seem to differ somewhat are the welfare spending per capita in the municipality and the environmental rating.

Turning to a comparison between granted and nongranted municipalities, we see from the last two columns in Table 3 that several of the variables differ in mean values, notably the political and environmental variables. Starting with the political variables, we note that the granted municipalities are to a lesser extent ruled by a socialist majority (45.2 compared to 53.4%, respectively), a finding that contradicts the prediction derived from the Cox-McCubbins model. The granted municipalities also have a higher estimated cutpoint density (0.032 compared to 0.028) and witnessed closer races between the blocs in the last election (0.143 compared to 0.252 in the election to the central government). These differences are all in line with the predictions derived from the LW/DL model. For the environmental variables, the granted municipalities have a higher environmental rating (20.14 compared to 17.01) and a higher share of votes for the environmental party in the last election to the municipal council (0.054 compared to 0.039). Finally, looking at the "needs" variables, except for the social welfare spending variable, there seem to be no clear differences between the granted and the nongranted municipalities. This fact strengthens our belief that this grant program is free from the equity and efficiency considerations typically attached to traditional intergovernmental grants.

ECONOMETRIC STRATEGY AND EMPIRICAL RESULTS

Econometric Strategy

In the empirical analysis we concentrate on the 115 applying municipalities. That is, we investigate the determinants of whether a municipality receives any grants given that the municipality has applied (that is, in analogy with the program evaluation literature, we investigate the "treatment of the treated"). This is a suitable method to use when trying to determine whether the incumbent government used the specific grant program tactically, which is the main question of interest in this paper.<sup>21</sup> As mentioned earlier, we concentrate on the first wave of applications and granting decisions.

There are, in principle, two questions that one could be interested in investigating: (i) What determines whether an applying municipality receives grants or not? and (ii) What determines how much the applying municipalities receive? The first question can be investigated by estimating a probit (or logit) model (0/1 variable on the left-hand side, 1 indicating that the municipality was granted and 0 that the municipality's application was rejected) on the 115 municipalities that have applied for grants.<sup>22</sup> When examining the second question, we must bear in mind that we have (left) censored data; of the 115 applying municipalities, 42 received grants, implying that we have 73 observations censored at 0. This can be taken into account by estimating a Tobit model, where the independent variable is received grants per capita. An assumption behind the Tobit model is, however, that the same model describes the decision of whether a municipality is to be granted and the decision of how much the municipality will receive. It is possible that these decisions differ, in which case the probability of a limit observation is independent of the regression model for the nonlimit observations (see, e.g., Lin and Schmidt, 1984). It turns out that when we test whether it is appropriate to use a Tobit specification, we reject the null that this is the case in all cases but one.<sup>23</sup> We therefore concentrate on the probit analysis, that is, on the first of the two questions stated above. This strategy is further strengthen by the findings of Rich (1989), who concludes that it is better to study which of a number of eligible jurisdictions are granted rather than studying the distribution of funds among recipient jurisdictions.

In the analysis, we use two sets of regressors. In the first, and most parsimonious, one (Model 1), we &lt;sup>20</sup> We have also experimented with other specifications of the rating variable and with survey data, but this does not seem to affect the qualitative results. The survey data used are from the Swedish Election Survey, and from this survey we create variables capturing whether the respondents stated that environmental-related questions are important to them when making their election decisions, the respondents' attitudes to the environmental movement, the importance of a nonpolluting society to the respondents, and, finally, the respondents' worries about pollution.

&lt;sup>21</sup> If, for some reason, we instead want all municipalities (whether or not they apply) to be the population of interest, we must make sure that the applying municipalities constitute a random sample. If they do not, we will end up with biased estimates. To investigate whether selection matters we have estimated the probit model with selection correction as well. The probit model is given by  $y_i = (\beta'x_i + \varepsilon_{1i} > 0)$ ; the selection equation, by  $y_i^{select} = (\gamma'z_i + \varepsilon_{2i} > 0)$ ; and the correlation between the two, by  $corr(\varepsilon_{1i}, \varepsilon_{2i}) = \rho$  [where  $\varepsilon_{1i}, \varepsilon_{2i} \approx N(0, 1)$ ]. When selection-correcting the model, we found that (i) we could never reject the null hypothesis that  $\rho = 0$ , implying that there seems to be no problems with selection bias, and (ii) the qualitative results were the same as those in Tables 4–6 when we selection-corrected the model.

&lt;sup>22</sup> In this paper we present results obtained with the probit estimator. We have also estimated the model assuming that the error terms are logistically distributed (the logit model). This gave results that were very similar to the probit estimates.

&lt;sup>23</sup> We use a likelihood-ratio test (for a description see Lin and Schmidt 1984). The test statistic, which is distributed as  $\chi^2$  under the null, is given by  $\lambda = -2[lnL_T - (lnL_P + lnL_{TR})]$ , where  $L_T$  is the likelihood from the Tobit model and  $L_P$  and  $L_{TR}$  are the likelihoods from a probit model and a truncated regression, respectively. However, since we do not know how well the likelihood-ratio test works in samples of 115 observations and with a rather high degree of censoring (73 of 115, or 63%, of the observations are censored at 0), we have also estimated the models with the Tobit estimator. The qualitative results (in terms of which variables enter significantly and the signs of these variables) in the Tobit model are very similar to those in the probit specification. The Tobit results and the likelihood-ratio tests are available upon request.

Variable	Model 1	Model 2	Model 1	Model 2
Vacancy rate	-2.502	-2.750	-3.127*	-3.688*
	(1.593)	(1.732)	(1.690)	(1.899)
Tax base.	1.61e-05	3.77e-06	2.22e-05	1.33e-05
	(1.39e-05)	(1.77e-05)	(1.43e-05)	(1.79e-05)
Social assistance		0.429	,	0.335
0 1 4		(0.368)		(0.355)
Cash flow		0.068		0.072
V		(0.051)		(0.050)
Young		-0.086		-0.145
Old		(0.095)		(0.101)
Old		-0.057		-0.050
Cutpoint density	07.040	(0.043)		(0.043)
Outpoint density	87.618	102.356
Distance between blocs	(29.063)	(32.886)	0.000	4.50.4
Distance between blocs			-3.902	-4.584
Environmental rating in 1997	0.057	0.025	(1.078) 0.038	(1.247) 0.006
= 1007	(0.026)	0.023	(0.025)	(0.030)
Share of votes for environmental party	9.730	10.312*	10.576*	11.765*
- man of the same	(6.107)	(6.261)	(6.016)	(6.265)
	(/	(0.201)	(0.010)	(0.200)
Constant	-5.587	-2.373	-2.358	2.272
	(1.666)	(3.645)	(1.171)	(3.550)
No. of observations	`114 ´	`114´	115	115
Pseudo- R <sup>2a</sup>	0.185	0.244	0.206	0.265
log-likelihood	-61.11	-56.73	-59.89	55.49

Note: Standard errors in parentheses. **Significant at the 5% level. *Significant at the 10% level.  ${}^aPseudo-R^2=1-(L_1/L_0)$ , where  $L_1$  and  $L_0$  are the constant-only and full-model log-likelihoods, respectively.

use the two variables that are predicted to matter in the LW/DL model (i.e., the municipality's tax base and the political variable) or the Cox-McCubbins model and control only for those variables that are supposed to be important for the grant program under study (i.e., the vacancy rate in the municipality, the municipality's environmental rating in 1997, and the fraction of votes for the environmental party in the last election to the municipal council). In the second one (Model 2), we also control for some different "municipality needs" (i.e., demographic structure, spending on social welfare, and financial result). As argued in the introduction, the setup of the grant program under investigation gives us no reason to suspect these variables to matter. It might, however, be the case that the incumbent government takes equity considerations into account anyway.

Which Municipalities Are Granted? Results of Probit Estimates

In this section, we investigate the determinants of grant recipience. The probit results are given in Tables 4–6. When testing the LW/DL model, two variables are used to capture the density at the cutpoints: the cutpoint densities and the closeness proxy (i.e., the distance between the political blocs at the central government level).

The results for the LW/DL model are presented in Table 4. From the results in the first two columns, where we use the estimated cutpoint density variable, we note that this political variable is clearly significant in both estimations and has the expected positive sign: the more swing voters there are at the cutpoint, the higher is the probability that a municipality receives money from the incumbent government. This conclusion does not change when we use the closeness proxy instead. From the last two columns in Table 4 we note that this variable, as is the cutpoint density variable, is significant, with the expected sign: the farther apart the two blocs were from each other in the last election (in the election to the central government), the lower is the probability that the municipality will receive any grants. In other words, the closer the race in the last election, the more swing voters there are, and the higher is the probability of getting money from the central government.

Among the other regressors, only the environmental variables and the vacancy rate seem to matter (in a statistical sense), even though none of them enters significantly in all models. Looking at the estimated coefficients, it turns out that the less tight a municipality's labor market (i.e., the lower the vacancy rate) is, the higher is the municipality's environmental rating (in 1997), and the more people there are voting for the environmental party in the municipal election, the higher is the probability that the municipality will get money from the "ecological" grant program. Since all the other control variables are insignificant in all four estimations, it seems that the grant program under study is not used for the equity and/or efficiency purposes that intergovernmental grants traditionally are. We consider the results in Table 4 to lend strong support for the LW/DL model.

Variable	Model 1	Model 2	Model 1	Model 2
Vacancy rate	-1.674	-1.904	-1.865	-1.938
	(1.495)	(1.613)	(1.526)	(1.611)
Tax base	6.22e-06	-4.61e-06	2.62e-06	-8.82e-06
	(1.19e-05)	(1.52e-05)	(1.17e-05)	(1.44e-05)
Social assistance		0.556*		0.501
		(0.330)		(0.332)
Cash flow		0.061		0.062
		(0.046)		(0.046)
Young		-0.071		-0.063
		(0.093)		(0.092)
Old		-0.050 (0.007)		-0.049 (0.037)
	0.054	(0.037)		(0.037)
Socialist majority in municipal council	-0.351 (0.070)	-0.606
01	(0.270)	(0.306)	-2.649*	-3.548
Share of votes for Social Democrats			-2.649° (1.551)	_3.546 (1.680)
For the control antique in 1007	0.052	0.017	0.051	0.017
Environmental rating in 1997		(0.028)	(0.024)	(0.028)
Chara of votas for anvironmental party	(0.024) 12.589	12.492	13.271	13.639
Share of votes for environmental party	(5.806)	(5.991)	(5.763)	(5.947)
	(5.666)	(0.001)	(0.700)	(0.017)
Constant	-2.031*	1.164	-0.685	2.659
Oonstant	(1.061)	(3.164)	(1.315)	(3.348)
No. of observations	115	115	115	115
Pseudo-R <sup>2a</sup>	0.117	0.182	0.125	0.185
log-likelihood	-66.68	-61. 7 7	-66.06	-61.52

Note: Standard errors in parentheses. **Significant at the 5% level. *Significant at the 10% level.  $^aPseudo-R^2=1-(L_1/L_0)$ , where  $L_1$  and  $L_0$  are the constant-only and full-model log-likelihoods, respectively.

Variable	Model A	Model B	Model C	Model D
Vacancy rate	-2.511	-2.615	-3.111*	-3.063*
	(1.607)	(1.617)	(1.736)	(1.924)
Tax base	`1.60e-05	1.47e-05	2.59e-05*	2.73e-05*
	(1.39e-05)	(1.40e-05)	(1.54e-05)	(1.58e-05)
Cutpoint density	87.100	81.850
,	(31.547)	(31.349)
Distance between blocs	, ,	, ,	-5.994	-5.226
			(1.661)	(1.694)
Socialist majority in municipal council	0.013		0.760*
, ,	(0.303)		(0.412)
Share of votes for Social Democrats	, ,	-0.843		3.029
		(1.805)		(2.785)
Environmental rating in 1997	0.058	0.058	0.023	0.032
-	(0.026)	(0.026)	(0.027)	(0.026)
Share of votes for environmental party	9.711	9.815	12.246	11.059*
	(6.124)	(6.126)	(6.161)	(6.068)
Constant	-5.564	-4.916 	-2.507	-3.874
	(1.752)	(2.183)	(1.257)	(1.859)
No. of observations	`114 ´	`114 ´	`115 ´	`115 ^
Pseudo-R <sup>2a</sup>	0.185	0.187	0.230	0.215
log-likelihood	–61.11	–61.00	-58.11	-59.23

Next we turn to the results for the Cox-McCubbins model. We use two political variables, intended to capture the size of the support group, to test this model: "socialist majority in municipal council" (a variable indicating if the party in power in the central government and  $L_0$  are the constant-only and full model log-likelihoods, respectively.

is also in power in the municipal government) and "share of votes for social democrats" (which measures the share of votes in each municipality that the social democrats got in the election to the central government). We see from the results, listed in Table 5, that

TABLE 7. The Change in the Probability of Being Granted Caused by a one-standard deviation Change in the Explanatory Variables and the Elasticities, for the Lindbeck–Weibull/Dixit–Londregan Model

viation change in	the explanatory vari	iables
-0.098 0.221	0.106 0.255	-0.121	-0.140
		-0.225	-0.259
0.109	0.047	0.071	0.011
0.091	0.095	0.098	0.107
Elasticities	3
-0.432	-0.482	-0.547	-0.660
2.827		0.0 11	0.000
	0.000	-0.953	-1.147
1.077	0.481		0.117
0.494	0.532	0.544	0.620
	0.221 0.109 0.091 Elasticities -0.432 2.827 1.077	0.221 0.255  0.109 0.047 0.091 0.095  Elasticities  -0.432 -0.482 2.827 3.355  1.077 0.481	0.221 0.255 -0.225 0.109 0.047 0.071 0.091 0.095 0.098  Elasticities -0.432 -0.482 -0.547 2.827 3.355 -0.953 1.077 0.481 0.714

these political variables have mixed success when it comes to explanatory power. While the variable "socialist majority in municipal council" is insignificant in Model 1 and significant at the 5% level in Model 2, the variable "share of votes for social democrats" is significant in both models: at the 10% significance level in Model 1 and at the 5% level in Model 2. The real problem for the Cox-McCubbins model is, however. that both variables enter negatively in all models, thus contradicting the hypothesis that the government gives money to its own supporters to a larger extent than to supporters of other parties. Among the other regressors, only the two environmental variables enter statistically significantly. Our reading of the results in Table 5 is hence that we do not find any support for the Cox-McCubbins model.

Finally, we turn to the encompassing models to investigate how sensitive the results for the LW/DL model are to the inclusion of other political variables (that is, political variables predicted by the Cox-McCubbins model). The results from the encompassing models are presented in Table 6.24 In the first two columns of Table 6 we test the robustness of the estimated cutpoint density variable to the inclusion of the variable measuring socialist majority in the municipal council (Models A) and the share of votes for the Social Democrats (Model B). The results in the first two columns, reveal that the political variable predicted by the LW/DL model, the estimated cutpoint density variable, is significant, with its expected sign, while the political variables predicted by the Cox-McCubbins model do not enter significantly. These results lend further support for the LW/DL model. In the last two columns in Table 6 we test the robustness of the other political variable predicted by the LW/DL model (distance between the blocs). Also, this variable seems to be robust to the inclusion of other political variables; it enters with the expected negative sign and is highly significant in both Model C and Model D. For the included Cox–McCubbins variables, the share of votes for Social Democrats enters insignificantly, while the dummy capturing the socialist majorities in the municipal council is significant at the 10% significance level but has the wrong sign.

Given the outcome from this sensitivity analysis, we consider the results for the LW/DL model in Table 4 to be quite robust.

Is the Tactical Use of the "Ecological" Grants of Any Economic Significance?

To investigate whether the tactical use of the intergovernmental grants is of any economic importance, we calculate the marginal effects for those variables that were significant in the LW/DL model (Table 4). More specifically, we calculate the change in probability of being granted caused by one-standard deviation changes in the explanatory variables, while the other variables are held at their sample means. In addition, we have calculated the elasticities for these explanatory variables. (These figures are listed in Table 7).

Starting with the results at the top of Table 7, we see that the political variables seem to be economically more important than the labor market and environmental variables; a one-standard deviation increase in the density at the cutpoint or a one-standard deviation decrease in the distance between the blocs yields an increase in the probability that a municipality will be granted with 22–25%. This is to be compared with the corresponding figures for the vacancy rate (which are 10–14%), the environmental rating (1–10%), and for the share of votes for the environmental party (approximately 10%).

&lt;sup>24</sup> To save space, we present only the results for the parsimonious Model 1. When the control variables used in Model 2 were included, the political variables from the LW/DL model all entered significantly, with their expected signs, while the political variables from the Cox-McCubbins model were all insignificant.

TABLE 8. Questions Asked in the Swedish Election Study, 1994
Variable	Question	Range
VAR 88	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place the Center Party (C)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5
VAR 89	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place the Conservative Party (M)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5
VAR 90	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place the Leftist Party (V)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5
VAR 91	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place the Liberal Party (Fp)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5
VAR 92	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place the Social Democrats (S)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5
VAR 93	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place the Green Party (Mp)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5
VAR 94	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place the Christian Democratic Party (Kds)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5
VAR 95	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place New Democracy (NyD)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5
VAR 96	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place Olof Johansson (party leader C)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5
VAR 97	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place Carl Bildt (party leader M)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5
VAR 98	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place Gudrun Schyman (party leader Vp)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5
VAR 99	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place Bengt Westerberg (party leader Fp)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4,
VAR 100	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place Ingvar Carlsson (party leader S)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4,
VAR 101	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place Birger Schlaug ("språkrör" Mp)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4,
VAR 102	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place Alf Svensson (party leader Kd)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4,
VAR 103	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place Vivianne Franzén (party leader NyD)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4,
VAR 104	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place Ann Wibble (Fp)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4,
VAR 105	On a scale from dislike strongly to like strongly, where would you place Mona Sahlin (S)?	-5, -4, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4,
VAR 380	Comparing your own current economic situation to what is was two or three years ago, has it improved, remained about the same, or gotten worse?	-1, 0, 1
VAR 381	How has, in you opinion, the Swedish economy changed in the last two or three years? Has it improved, remained about the same, or gotten worse?	-1, 0, 1
VAR 510	Constituency, election to the parliament	There are 29 constituencies

Turning to the elasticities in the lower part of Table 7, the same picture emerges. Given model; increasing the density at the cutpoint by 1% or decreasing the distance between the blocs by 1% increases the probability of being granted more than a 1% change in any of the other variables does. This difference is most pronounced for Model 2, where the cutpoint density variable is used, while increasing the density at the cutpoint with 1% increases the probability of being granted with 3.4%, a 1% increase in any of the environmental variables or a 1% decrease in the labor market variable only increases the probability of being granted with approximately 0.5%. When using the distance variable instead, the difference is smaller; a 1% decrease in the distance yields a 0.9% change in the probability of being granted, to be compared with a 0.55-0.7% changes caused by 1% changes in the other variables (Model 1).

CONCLUSIONS

Despite the frequent use of theoretical models describing vote-purchasing behavior of political parties, and despite the common view held by many citizens that the government acts tactically, we have not, until now, been able to investigate empirically whether or not incumbent governments use grants to lower-level government tactically. In this paper a uniquely suitable grant program is used to study the vote-purchasing behavior of incumbent governments. Hence, for the first time we have been able to test theories that have been widely used by economists and political scientist empirically. The findings in this paper are of interest for both researchers and policy makers.

We find support for the hypothesis that the temporary "ecological" grants that we study are used tactically by the incumbent (socialist) government. In

	Factor Loading	Uniqueness	Score
M	0.86037	0.2597	0.29471
Fp	0.1744	0.96958	0.01602
C	0.20945	0.95613	0.0195
Kd	0.55457	0.69245	0.07127
S	-0.73679	0.45717	-0.14347
V	-0.67132	0.54934	-0.10876
Мр	-0.40985	0.83202	-0.04384
NyD	0.27807	0.92268	0.02683
Carl Bildt	0.79034	0.37533	0.18736
Olof Johansson	0.04423	0.99804	0.00394
Bengt Westerberg	0.04116	0.99831	0.00367
Ann Wibble	0.66908	0.55232	0.1078
Alf Svensson	0.54438	0.70365	0.06884
Ingvar Carlsson	-0.62202	0.6131	-0.09027
Mona Sahlin	-0.60318	0.63619	-0.08437
Birger Schlaug	-0.32923	0.89161	-0.03286
Vivianne Franzén	0.18573	0.96551	0.01712
Gudrun Schyman	-0.45721	0.79097	-0.05143
Private economy	0.13692	0.98125	0.01242
Swedish economy	0.1694	0.9713	0.01552
Variance	4.88332
log-likelihood	-6206.096

particular, we find strong support for the prediction derived from the LW/DL model saying that the incumbent government purchases votes by investing in those municipalities where there are a lot of swing voters. This result is statistically as well as economically significant. The conclusion is strengthened by a sensitivity analysis: It turns out that even though we extend the LW/DL model by political variables predicted by other models, the original variables are unaffected while the added variables enter insignificantly.

We do not find support for the hypothesis that the incumbent government purchases votes by investing in their own supporters (measured as socialist majority in the municipal council and fraction of votes cast for the Social Democrats in the municipality in the last election), a prediction derived from the model presented by Cox and McCubbins (1986).

A resulting question is, of course, Can we generalize our results in some way, or is the formulation of the grant program under study so atypical that no generalizations can be made? It turns out that grant programs similar to the one we study here exist, in Sweden as well as in other countries. It can, for example, be noted that in Sweden, the ecological grants have been followed by other grant programs (for example, to support municipalities that have run into financial problems as a consequence of a balanced-budget law that has recently been put into action) whose allocation principles are very similar to those of the grant program under study in this paper. We can hence expect our results to hold for these other programs as well. At the same time it might be worth stressing that a good way to test the robustness of our results is to investigate how they would fare under other, but similar, grant programs in different countries. If future studies would point in the same direction as ours, we would be more prone to generalize from our results.

Are there any policy implications to be drawn from this study? Well, even though our results strongly indicate that the incumbent government will, if it can, use available resources to win votes, we cannot, from this study, tell whether this leads to a less efficient distribution of grants than if the incumbent did not exhibit any vote-purchasing behavior. However, if one believes that an inefficient distribution of grants is the likely outcome of such behavior, the policy recommendation would be that one should be careful when designing grant programs. In particular, one should avoid programs with vague rules and where the incumbent government has sovereign decision-making power.

APPENDIX

Data Appendix

A description of the variables used in this paper is given below.

Controls for "Needs." Vacancy rate: The number of new and remaining vacancies divided by the number of unemployed persons.

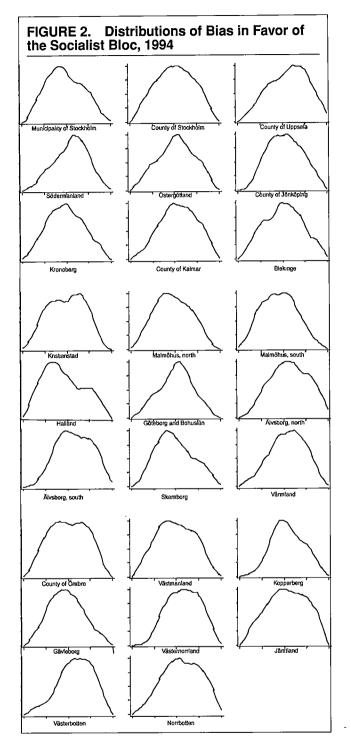

Tax base: The municipality's tax base per capita.

Social welfare: Social welfare spending divided by the number of residents in the municipality.

Cash flow: The municipality's cash flow after financial and other costs have been paid.

Young: Share of the population younger than 16. Old: Share of the population older than 64.

Political Variables. Cutpoint density: The density at the cutpoint, where the distributions of bias in favor of the opposition are estimated at the constituency level using data from the Swedish Election Studies and the cutpoints are given by the vote share of the winning bloc in the election. See Estimation of the Cutpoint Density, below, for a more detailed description.

Distance between blocs: The difference in vote shares between the socialist and the conservative bloc in the central election, expressed as absolute values. The socialist bloc consists of S, V, and Mp, and the conservative bloc of M, Fp, C, Kd, and NyD.

Socialist majority in municipal council: A dummy taking the value of 1 if S and V have more than 50% of the votes in the municipal council and 0 otherwise.

Share of votes for social democrats: The share of votes in each municipality for S in the central government election.

Environmental Variables. Environmental rating in 1997: The rating is conducted every year by the environmental journal Miljö Eko. The 1997 rating was presented in Miljö Eko No. 5, 1997. The higher the ratio is, the better is the municipality at environmental work.

Share of votes for environmental party: The share of votes in each municipality for Mp in the local government election.

Estimation of the Cutpoint Density

Following Johansson (2002), the variable CUTPOINT DEN-SITY is estimated using data from the Swedish Election Study of 1994, which is a large survey performed in connection with the election. The data sets are handled and distributed by the Swedish Social Science Data Service (SSD) at Göteborg University. The 1994 study used in this paper was carried out by Mikael Gilliam and Sören Holmberg at the Department of Political Science, Göteborg University. Among the many questions available we picked out variables that we believe capture people's preferences. These variables are listed in Table 8. Respondents are observable at the level of constituency for the parliament. In 1994 there were 29 constituencies. The number of observations in the survey is 2296. These data are then used when estimating the bias in favor of the socialist bloc using factor analysis. All estimations are performed in STATA. The results of the factor analysis estimations are listed in Table 9. When calculating the scores, the regression method is used. Thereafter, constituency-specific distributions of the bias in favor of the socialist bloc are estimated using a univariate kernel density estimator. The bandwidth used is the STATA default, which is the width that would minimize the mean integrated square error if the data were in fact Gaussian and a Gaussian kernel were used. In our case this width is approximately 0.55-0.80. The resulting distributions are given in Fig. 2.

REFERENCES

Anderson, Gary M., and Robert D. Tollison. 1991. "Congressional Influence and Patterns of New Deal Spending, 1933–1939." Journal of Law and Economics 34: 161–75.

Arrington, Leonard James. 1969. "The New Deal in the West: A Preliminary Statistical Inquiry." Pacific Historical Review 38: 311-6.

Bungey, Mel, Philip Grossman, and Peter Kenyon. 1991. "Explaining Intergovernmental Grants: Australian Evidence." Applied Economics 23: 659–68.

Cox, Gary W., and Mathew D. McCubbins. 1986. "Electoral Politics as a Redistributive Game." Journal of Politics 48: 370–89.

Dixit, Avinash, and John Londregan. 1996. "The Determinants of Success of Special Interests in Redistributive Politics." Journal of Politics 58: 1132–55.

Dixit, Avinash, and John Londregan. 1998. "Ideology, Tactics, and Efficiency in Redistributive Politics." Quarterly Journal of Economics 113: 497–529.

Grossman, Philip J. 1994. "A Political Theory of Intergovernmental Grants." Public Choice 78: 295–303.

Johansson, Eva. 2002. "Intergovernmental Grants as a Tactical Instrument: Empirical Evidence from Swedish Municipalities." Journal of Public Economics (in press).

Levitt, Steven D., and James M. Snyder. 1995. "Political Parties and the Distribution of Federal Outlays." American Journal of Political Science 39: 958-80.

Levitt, Steven D., and James M. Snyder. 1997. "The Impact of Federal Spending on House Election Outcomes." Journal of Political Economy 105: 30–53.

- Lin, Tsai-Fen, and Peter Schmidt. 1984. "A Test of the Tobit Specification Against an Alternative Suggested by Cragg." Review of Economics and Statistics 66: 174-7.
- Lindbeck, Assar, and Jörgen Weibull. 1987. "Balanced-Budget Redistribution as the Outcome of Political Competition." Public Choice 52: 273-97.
- Lindbeck, Assar, and Jörgen Weibull. 1993. "A Model of Political Equilibrium in a Representative Democracy." Journal of Public Economics 51: 195–209.
- Reading, Don C. 1973. "New Deal Activity and the States." Journal of Economic History 36: 792–810.
- Rich, Michael J. 1989. "Distributive Politics and the Allocation of Federal Grants." American Political Science Review 83: 193–213.
- Riksdagens Revisorer. 1999. "Statligt stöd till lokala investerings-

- program för en ekologiskt hållbar utveckling" ["Support to Local Investment Programs Aimed at an Ecological Sustainable Development"]. Rapport 1998/1999: 8.
- Stein, Robert M., and Kenneth N. Bickers. 1994. "Congressional Elections and the Pork Barrel." Journal of Politics 56: 377–99.
- Wallis, John Joseph. 1996. "What Determines the Allocation of National Government Grants to the States?" NBER Historical Paper 90.
- Worthington, Andrew C., and Brian E. Dollery. 1998. "The Political Determination of Intergovernmental Grants in Austria." Public Choice 94: 299-315.
- Wright, Gavin. 1974. "The Political Economy of New Deal Spending: An Econometric Analysis." Review of Economics and Statistics 56: 30–8.

Becoming a Habitual Voter: Inertia, Resources, and Growth in Young Adulthood

ERIC PLUTZER The Pennsylvania State University

This paper reframes our inquiry into voter turnout by making aging the lens through which the traditional resource and cost measures of previous turnout research are viewed, thereby making three related contributions. (1) I offer a developmental theory of turnout. This framework follows from the observation that most citizens are habitual voters or habitual nonvoters (they display inertia). Most young citizens start their political lives as habitual nonvoters but they vary in how long it takes to develop into habitual voters. With this transition at the core of the framework, previous findings concerning costs and resources can easily be integrated into developmental theory. (2) I make a methodological contribution by applying latent growth curve models to panel data. (3) Finally, the empirical analyses provide the developmental theory with strong support and also provide a better understanding of the roles of aging, parenthood, partisanship, and geographic mobility.

very presidential election raises questions about voter turnout in the United States and, in particular, the very low turnout of young voters. Why is voter turnout so much lower among the youngest citizens? Can interventions addressed specifically toward young voters likely to have a lasting impact? Are some groups of young citizens especially cut off from the political system, and could this have consequences for their participation later in life?

How can we generate better answers to questions such as these? I argue that we need to reframe our approach to voter turnout by subsuming the familiar costs—resources framework within a developmental perspective. Doing so leads to more precise and qualified questions and spurs use of more appropriate models. I show that doing so can yield more valid and satisfying answers to questions about voting behavior.

REFRAMING INQUIRY INTO VOTER TURNOUT

Turning out to vote is the most common and important act citizens take in a democracy and, therefore, is one of the most important behaviors for scholars of democratic politics to understand. And yet, it is not well understood. (Aldrich 1993, 246)

Our poor understanding of turnout does not stem from neglect. Rather, scholars have struggled to find a unify-

Eric Plutzer is Associate Professor of Political Science and Sociology, Department of Political Science, 107 Burrowes Building, The Pennsylvania State University, University Park, PA 16802 (plutzer@psu.edu).

This research was supported in part by the Character and Competence Program of the Alfred E. Murray Research Center and by the Research and Graduate Studies Office of Penn State's College of the Liberal Arts. I thank Christopher Reenock, Andrew Shults, and Nancy Wiefek for their research assistance and Don Hedeker for statistical and software advice. Lee Ann Banaszak, Suzanna DeBoef, Michael Guge, Ben Highton, Quan Li, Jeff Manza, Nancy Wiefek, Susan Welch, and several anonymous reviewers provided helpful comments on early versions of this paper. Michael Guge deserves special thanks for first encouraging me to examine latent growth curve analysis. Data analyzed in the paper were originally collected by M. Kent Jennings, Richard Niemi, and Gregory Markus and distributed for secondary analysis by the Inter-university Consortium for Political and Social Research.

ing framework that might integrate the many findings and explanations. Most research on turnout has been guided by a focus on resources that help voters overcome the costs of voting. Dozens of resources have been linked to turnout, including, most conspicuously, various aspects of socioeconomic status, especially education (Verba and Nie 1972; Verba, Schlozman, and Brady 1995; Miller and Shanks 1996). Scholars also have examined cognitive resources such as political knowledge (Verba, Schlozman, and Brady 1995), indicators of political engagement such as newspaper readership and political interest (Campbell et al. 1960; Strate et al. 1989), and indicators of community involvement and stake-holding such as home ownership (Milbrath 1965; Verba and Nie 1972), social networks (Zipp and Smith 1979; Rosenstone and Hansen 1993), marriage (Stoker and Jennings 1995), and church and civic involvement (Verba, Schlozman, and Brady 1995).

Scholars have also examined factors that increase the costs of voting. Geographic mobility, for example, can substantially increase the barriers to voter registration (Squire, Wolfinger, and Glass 1987). Others have explored the disruptive effects of severe hardship (Rosenstone 1982) and the exhaustion and time demands associated with raising young children (Plutzer 1998).

The twin foci of resources and costs have yielded a large number of research findings but not a good sense of how the many factors fit together or when and where variables will matter most. That is, the many findings do not yield a set of conditions and qualifications that marks a mature theory.

The many variables associated with turnout make much more sense when viewed through the lens of aging and the development of the habit of voting. Consistent with this idea, I offer a developmental framework for understanding turnout. Highlighted in this framework are the notions of starting level (the probability that citizens vote in their first eligible election) and inertia (the propensity for citizens to settle into habits of voting or nonvoting). The developmental framework distinguishes among factors influencing the starting level, factors that can shift a voter from one inertial state to another, and factors that interrupt established habits. Methodologically, the developmental perspective lays bare many questionable assumptions and practices characterizing almost all previous research on life-cycle and life-experience explanations for turnout. To address these problems I apply latent growth curve models and explain their applicability to developmental processes more generally. I go on to test key assumptions of the developmental theory and to reassess conclusions drawn from cross-sectional analyses.

AGING, INERTIA AND THE TWO HABITS OF VOTING

The distinctive relationship between age and voter turnout has intrigued students of electoral behavior since at least the early 1960s. Milbrath (1965, 134) cites eight early reports of steep rise in turnout in young adulthood followed by gradual increases until voters reach their sixties. Verba and Nie (1972) proposed a number of "life-cycle" explanations; this in turn spurred many others to consider how and why this rise-and-fall pattern occurs in virtually every survey of U.S. electoral behavior (e.g., Jennings and Markus 1988; Strate et al. 1989; Miller and Shanks 1996; Highton and Wolfinger 2001).

In fact, the effect of age is comparable to the strong effect of education. The 1998 Current Population Survey, for example, shows a 40-point turnout gap between those who completed less than ninth grade (24% turnout) and those with an advanced degree (64%). But the gap between those 18–24 years old and those older than 65 is 46 points (17 compared to 63%). More important, aging may come to the fore because as citizens get older, experience can compensate for low levels of education (Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980, 60).

Nevertheless, scholars in the resource and SES tradition rarely pay much attention to age (exceptions include Strate et al. 1989; Jankowski 2001). Indeed, they sometimes leave the effect of age unreported along with those of other "control" variables. The developmental framework takes aging and development as the starting point rather than an afterthought. The framework complements and integrates previous research by focusing on factors that increase or decrease the costs of voting—placing them in a new and more informative light.

Voting as a "Habit" and Path Dependence

Virtually all major works on turnout have concluded that voting behavior is, in part, a gradually acquired habit. Milbrath explicitly invokes psychological concepts of reinforcement and "habit strength" to characterize habitual voting (1965, 31; see also Verba and Nie 1972, 148; Miller and Shanks 1996, 17, 62). In short, although the terminology varies, there is a longstanding agreement that voting behavior is habitual. Thus, it is useful to think about civic development as a largely path-dependent process.

The process begins as young citizens confront their very first election. Each has a latent probability of voting resulting from parental, demographic, and personal factors. Some will vote and become habitual voters, but most will not and are likely to remain nonvoters in subsequent elections. That is, most new citizens show evidence of inertia. Inertia is rather different from persistence, a central organizing concept in political socialization research (Sears 1990; Searing, Schwartz, and Lind 1973). The notion of persistence suggests that one can find the origins of adult attitudes and ideology in events and influences that occurred many years earlier. In contrast, inertia suggests that the roots of current turnout can be found in voting behavior in the previous one or two elections.

Almost all habitual nonvoters gradually increase their probability of voting and eventually make the transition to being habitual voters. Some do so almost immediately, but others remain habitual nonvoters for many elections. From this perspective, the key explanatory task is identifying the factors that influence how quickly different voters make the transition from one inertial state to another. Of course, habitual voters are sometimes thwarted from voting in a particular election. But failing to vote once does not shift them back to nonvoting. In most cases, the disruption is short-term and they return to their habitual behavior. Once voters are on the path of regular voting, factors that were once important (parental influences, educational attainment) diminish.

A DEVELOPMENTAL THEORY OF TURNOUT

This simple framework allows a new and useful integration of prior research, as I now attempt to demonstrate.

Starting Levels of Turnout

As young citizens confront their first election, all of the costs of voting are magnified: they have never gone through the process of registration, may not know the location of their polling place, and may not have yet developed an understanding of party differences and key issues. Moreover, their peer group consists almost entirely of other nonvoters: their friends cannot assure them that voting has been easy, enjoyable, or satisfying.

Young people also lack many of the resources that can promote participation. Because they have little disposable income, they are not attractive targets for parties seeking campaign contributions or for interest groups mounting direct mail campaigns. Few of them own homes, have stakes in community politics, or have completed college. Thus it is not surprising that few young citizens are registered to vote (Timpone 1998) and their turnout is relatively low.

Nevertheless, many young citizens do vote—presumably because "the start-up costs of voting are not borne equally by all young people" (Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980, 60). A few have resources that allow them to overcome the high costs of first-time registration and first-time voting. These resources can come from their parents or from their own achievements. Verba, Schlozman, and Brady (1995, chap. 15) distinguish between parental socioeconomic status and parental political involvement. Parental education promotes offspring education and offspring political knowledge, including such mundane information as how to register and where to vote. Thus political knowledge is an asset that can directly offset costs of initial turnout. Parental political involvement can provide both behavior to model and campaign-relevant information that children rarely get from formal schooling.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See, e.g., many tables of Verba, Schlozman, and Brady (1995, chaps. 12, 15). To be fair, the authors of Voice and Inequality acknowledge that "there is more to the impact of age than the analysis in this chapter can reveal—but that must wait for future research" (p. 423).

Parental resources combine with young citizens' own achievements before their first election. Although they may not have yet completed their formal education, they may have acquired some political knowledge and may have developed an interest in public affairs (reflected, e.g., in reading newspapers or weekly news magazines). They may also have some partisan attachments, though these are likely to be malleable over the long term and may therefore have weak or transient effects (Jennings and Niemi 1981).

In sum, a variety of factors—all previously identified by other authors—should be expected to influence starting levels of turnout. However, it is unclear whether any of these factors will matter in the future or whether their effects will dissipate because of the inertia that typically follows.

The Nature of Inertia and the Habits of Turnout

A citizen's voting history is a powerful predictor of future behavior. This is easily illustrated by using self-reports of turnout from those who completed the 1972–1976 National Election Studies (NES) panel study (Center for Political Studies 2000). Of the 516 respondents who reported voting in both 1968 and 1972, only 3% missed voting in both the 1974 and the 1976 elections. In contrast, of the 57 respondents who reported missing two consecutive elections (either 1968–72 or 1972–74), more than two-thirds did not vote in the next election.

Unfortunately, the nature of inertia is undertheorized. Here, I offer some speculations, the specifics of which will remain for future research to fill in. First, the two inertial states are very different. The stability of habitual nonvoting is one that most citizens "outgrow" and is, therefore, weaker. Citizens can outgrow the nonvoting habit if the costs of voting remain relatively constant over the life course but the resources available to overcome those costs increase. Income, for example, tends to increase in young adulthood, and this may gradually increase the likelihood of being recruited into electoral politics (Verba, Schlozman, and Brady 1995, chap. 5). Second, cognitive resources—especially political knowledge-should increase with age (Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980; Strate et al. 1989; delli Carpini and Keeter 1996). Third, life events such as marriage, home ownership, and having children in school often increase community ties, enhance the relevance of local elections, and increase the perceived stakes of electoral outcomes (Verba and Nie 1972). Fourth, even constant activities can have cumulative impacts. For example, young voters who attend weekly religious services may gradually acquire politically relevant resources [information from politicized sermons, opportunities for leadership and public speaking, etc. (see Verba, Schlozman, and Brady 1995)].

Overall, many resource (e.g., socioeconomic status, cognitive assets, political engagement, social networks) and life-cycle variables (e.g., marriage, home ownership) act on habitual nonvoters by increasing their probability of voting in subsequent elections. Each resource variable should be expected to speed the transition from nonvoter to habitual voter.

The Inertia of Habitual Voters and Temporary Disruptions

Both habitual nonvoters and habitual voters display inertia, but the nature of that inertia differs. Nonvoters must overcome bureaucratic barriers (most notably registration) and costs of various types (e.g., information costs). These same factors, however, contribute to stability once a citizen has crossed the threshold and voted once. Although residential mobility is common, most voters do not move in a four-year period. So once they register and vote, the barrier of registration is unlikely to come into play in the next election or two. Similarly, once voters attain a certain degree of political knowledge—for example, finally understanding some key differences between the parties—they are unlikely to forget it or find that their knowledge has become obsolete in the next few elections.

Norms also contribute to inertia. Voting for the first time is likely to bring positive reenforcement from friends, family, and co-workers. As voters age, their peer cohort has increasingly higher participation rates and they eventually move out of age-homogeneous settings (e.g., college residences) and into others (work-places, community organizations) where the average levels of political knowledge and turnout are higher. Thus, as young citizens take on more adult roles, they are likely to be subject to more and more intense participation norms.

For all of these reasons, after young citizens vote once, they should only occasionally experience an increase in the costs of voting relative to their resources and social pressures. A reversal may occur as a result of a major life event that creates immediate demands for one's time and attention. For example unemployment has a noticeable effect on voter turnout but only if the onset of unemployment was very close to the election; if more than a few months pass, voters seem to rebound (Rosenstone 1982). This pattern of a "rebound" raises the question, "Rebound to what?"

A rebound implies that severe economic dislocations will show up as major factors discouraging habitual voters, but severe disruptions may be largely irrelevant to nonvoters because most would not vote anyway. At most, hardships are just one of many barriers facing habitual nonvoters or newly eligible citizens. Therefore, smaller hardship effects should be evident among the very young because so few are habitual voters.

The central disruption factor that has been studied to date is residential mobility (Squire, Wolfinger, and Glass 1987). Habitual voters who move from one precinct to another usually must reregister to vote and discover the location of a new polling place. Thus, residential mobility may temporarily disrupt their regular pattern. Like other disruptive factors, residential mobility is primarily a factor affecting habitual voters, and its effects should be considerably less evident among younger citizens than their older counterparts.

To summarize, voter turnout is developmental and characterized by modest inertia for nonvoters and strong inertia for voters. Key explanatory variables from previous research can be characterized in terms of whether they affect starting levels or the speed of transition or whether they function primarily to disrupt established patterns. This relatively simple framework provides the basis for more precise hypotheses (e.g., that the effects of parental characteristics dissipate rather than persist and that disruptions such as mobility and parenthood are likely to have increasing explanatory power as citizens age).

Before moving putting these expectations to the test, it is useful to examine the methodological challenges involved in analyzing turnout via cross-sectional survey data and to introduce an analytic approach that has not previously been exploited in research on turnout.

THE LIMITATIONS OF CROSS-SECTIONAL AND COHORT METHODS

Several scholars have focused specifically on understanding life-cycle effects. Yet previous efforts are characterized by data and models that do not correspond to each other. Using cross-sectional data to make inferences about the life-cycle or the life-experience process is risky for several reasons. First, it is extremely difficult to avoid the "fallacy of assumed reversibility." Lieberson (1985) observes that we tend to interpret a regression slope of +1 as meaning both that "a one unit increase in X is associated with a one unit increase in Y" and that "a one unit decrease in X is associated with a one unit decrease in Y." If the developmental theory is essentially correct in its core assertion of inertia, this may be theoretically implausible. For example, consider two individuals whose earnings at age 30 place them in the 99th percentile. Based on current research, each is expected to have higher than average political participation. Suppose that four years later, one's earnings plummet to the median. If voting is an acquired habit, it makes no sense to predict that her participation will fall to average levels. Nevertheless, this is exactly what most cross-sectional models force the researcher to assume. The degree of misspecification is directly proportional to the extent to which certain life events produce gains in participation that are more difficult to reverse than they were to acquire. This developmental asymmetry can be modeled cross sectionally if different variables are used to distinguish income gains from income losses (e.g., Plutzer and Wiefek 1998). However, a developmental statistical model provides a much better fit between theory and method.

A second problem is endogeneity. If voting is an acquired habit, then the proximate causes of voting in election t are largely contained in the information represented by the turnout variable for election t-1, which in turn is largely determined by turnout in prior elections. The older the respondent, the longer the causal chain. If voting in the current election is an indicator of one's long-term probability of voting, then many "independent variables," such as income and marital status, are endogenous to the latent variable that cross-sectional turnout actually measures. Crosssectional studies could deal with this if turnout could be decomposed into a latent long-term probability and a short-term response to recent personal, macroeconomic, and political conditions. Yet this could be accomplished only with reliable and valid turnout histories for each respondent. Thus, the potential problems of irreversibility and ambiguous causal order in cross-sectional models make a developmental analysis preferable.

A third limitation in most cross-sectional studies is the confounding of age with generation. Even in the most careful analyses (e.g., Strate et al. 1989) it is never clear whether age is helping to explain life-cycle, lifeexperience, or generational effects.

Cohort analysis has complementary problems (e.g., Miller and Shanks 1996, chap. 4): they do not permit inferences about individual behavior and rarely contain enough cases to enable subgroup analysis. Moreover, subgroups based on changeable statuses (e.g., married, employed, childless, Southern, or home owner) cannot be studied at all (Riley 1973; see also Converse 1976). In short, cohort analysis cannot support reliable inferences concerning the effects of individual experiences that lie at the heart of the life-cycle and life-experience perspectives.

THE LATENT GROWTH CURVE MODEL

A superior approach, when appropriate data are available, is provided by latent growth models. To build such a model, one first theorizes about a single individual who is first eligible to vote in election t and continues to be eligible to vote in subsequent elections, t+1, t+2, etc. At each election the citizen is observed to vote or not and this is conceived as an indicator of a latent probability of turnout. This can be modeled as where Y is a dummy variable denoting whether the individual voted in election t, ELECTION is a variable coded  $0, 1, 2, \ldots T_1 - 1$ , and  $T_1$  is the number of elections observed for each individual. Two parameters describe an individual's latent growth curve, with  $\beta_0$  corresponding to the height of the curve as it crosses the y axis and  $\beta_1$  the steepness of the increase or decrease. Each respondent's first eligible election is coded as ELECTION = 0, so that the intercept,  $\beta_0$ , indicates the individual's starting level and the slope,  $\beta_1$ , estimates the growth in the latent probability of voting—hence, the characterization of a "latent growth curve." This model can be estimated by logistic (or probit) regression. If the number of elections is three or more, the model will have a residual, which is designated r here. Therefore, the model for each individual is

$$p(Y_t = 1) = f(\beta_0 + \beta_1 ELECTION),$$
 (1)

$$logit(Y_t) = \beta_0 + \beta_1 ELECTION + r.$$
 (2)

A sample of N individuals is thus conceived of varying among themselves in two ways. First, citizens have varying probabilities of voting in their first eligible election, leading to N different values of  $\beta_0$ . Second, each has a unique developmental trajectory, leading to N different values of  $\beta_1$ . Thus, in a sample, the parameters for the *i*th individual,  $\beta_{0i}$  and  $\beta_{1i}$ , are conceived as random variables. In all past studies, these two components of turnout have been combined in cross-sectional turnout and predicted by the same set of variables. This failure to separate out starting level from growth (or decline) has both methodological and theoretical consequences. Methodologically, it means that part of turnout is exogenous to many independent variables (the starting level for most individuals is determined before most predictor variables are observed), reversing the usual assumptions of causal inference.

The developmental theory implies that variables determined before an individual reaches voting age, such as parent's education, will have a greater impact on the starting point than on subsequent growth. Most other factors will affect growth rates. This distinction is reflected in two equations that capture the effects of various independent variables on  $\beta_0$  and  $\beta_1$ , respectively. The first equation predicts one's likelihood of voting in one's first eligible election:

$$\beta_{0i} = \gamma_{00} + \gamma_{01} Z + u_{0i}, \qquad (3)$$

where  $\beta_{0i}$  is the intercept term from Eq. (2) (in units of logged odds),  $\gamma_{00}$  is an intercept term, Z is a variable that affects initial turnout and (potentially) long-term growth,  $\gamma_{01}$  is the effect of Z on initial turnout, and  $u_{0i}$  is the unexplained variance in person i's starting level. And the second model predicts each individual's rate of growth over time:

$$\beta_{1i} = \gamma_{10} + \gamma_{11}Z + \gamma_{12}X + u_{1i}, \qquad (4)$$

where  $\beta_{1i}$  is the slope parameter from Eq. (2),  $\gamma_{10}$  is an intercept term, Z is a predictor of the rate of turnout growth that occurs before t = 0,  $\gamma_{11}$  is the effect of Z on the rate of turnout growth, X is a predictor of the rate of turnout growth that occurs after t = 0,  $\gamma_{12}$  is the effect of X on the rate of turnout growth, and  $u_{1i}$  is the unexplained variance in person i's growth rate.

Equations (3) and (4) comprise the essential model (sometimes called a hierarchical linear model; HLM), but they cannot be estimated separately. By substituting for  $\beta_0$  and  $\beta_1$ , and subscripting for the *i*th person, Eq. (2) can be written

$$logit(Y_{it}) = \gamma_{00} + \gamma_{01}Z + u_{0i} + (\gamma_{10} + \gamma_{11}Z + \gamma_{12}X + u_{1i})ELECTION + r_i.$$
 (5)

Rearranging terms gives

$$logit(Y_{it}) = \gamma_{00} + \gamma_{01}Z + \gamma_{10}ELECTION$$
$$+ \gamma_{11}Z * ELECTION + \gamma_{12}X * ELECTION$$
$$+ u_{1i} * ELECTION + u_{0i} + r_{i}.$$
(6)

This model cannot be estimated by OLS or traditional methods of maximum likelihood because of the multiplicative term between the disturbance from Eq. (4)  $(u_{1i})$  and ELECTION, because of the correlation between the two disturbance terms  $(u_{1i})$  and  $u_{0i}$ , and because of the need to estimate the variance of the disturbances prior to estimation of the slopes and their standard errors. However, several reliable solutions are available. These use a doubly iterative procedure in which MLE iterations are augmented by empirical Bayes estimates. The models reported here were estimated by MIXOR 2.0 (Hedeker and Gibbons 1996).<sup>2</sup>

DESCRIPTION OF DATA AND SEQUENCE OF MODEL ESTIMATION

I employ data from Jennings and Niemi's three-wave Student-Parent Socialization Study (Jennings 1972; Jennings and Niemi 1991; Jennings, Markus, and Niemi 1991; remerged in order to include respondents who did not complete the panel). High school seniors and one or both of their parents were interviewed in 1965, 1973, and 1982. The 1973 interview included questions concerning turnout in the 1968 and 1972 elections and the 1982 survey asked about voting in 1976 and 1980, providing self-reported turnout in four consecutive presidential elections. Analysis is restricted to students who were 21 years old on or before election day in 1968. The 1968 election is coded as election 0, with 1972, 1976, and 1980 coded as 1, 2, and 3, respectively. A summary of the marginal distributions of turnout in each election and a detailed description of how I treated missing data is provided in the Appendix.<sup>3</sup>

Independent variables are in four blocks that lie at different points in a funnel of causality. These blocks correspond to the intergenerational transmission model of Verba, Schlozman, and Brady (1995, chap. 15). This framework presumes that the effects of early events are partially mediated by later ones, and this suggests using a block recursive strategy in which the total effects of variables early in causal chain are compared to their net effects after the addition of variables from later blocks [see Miller and Shanks (1996) for a similar approach]. Next I provide a summary of the independent variables.<sup>4</sup>

&lt;sup>2</sup> Bryk and Raudenbush (1992) provide a thorough introduction containing detailed references for those interested in the evolution of estimation solutions. For a more detailed discussion of estimation issues unique to problems with binary dependent variables, see Hedeker and Gibbons (1994, 1996), who also provide helpful references to the technical statistical literature.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Timpone (1998) shows that a model's failure to distinguish between registration and turnout among the registered can lead to misleading interpretations. Unfortunately, the data include registration questions only for two of the four elections examined here, making it impossible to estimate a separate registration model or a two-stage selection model. However, it seems appropriate to assume that starting level is determined largely by the motivation to register and the resources to overcome registration hurdles. As citizens get older, registration becomes a smaller component of nonvoting.

Block I. Demographic and Parental Characteristics

Block I variables include sex, race, and three indicators of parents' socioeconomic status: educational attainment, reported family income, and the Duncan Occupational Prestige score for the head of household.

Five additional variables measure the political environment created by the parents. The first is a standard question about the parents' interest in politics; the second is the parents' score on a political knowledge quiz consisting of six factual items. Additional measures are scores on a three-item scale of political trust, parents' strength of party identification, and parents' self-reported vote in the 1964 presidential election.<sup>5</sup>

Unless otherwise noted, all predictors that are numeric scales (e.g., family income and years of education) or have arbitrary metrics (attitude measures with agreedisagree responses) are standardized (mean of 0 and standard deviation of one), while dummy variables remain in their natural metric. This coding ensures that all predictors have a meaningful value of 0, aiding in interpretation of the intercept.

Block II. Youth Characteristics at the Completion of High School

This block includes resource measures based on interviews three years before the seniors became eligible to vote. I use self-reported high school GPA as an indicator of educational achievement. An index of activity in student politics and student organizations addresses activities whose recall was found to be important by Verba, Schlozman, and Brady (1995, chap. 14); here they are measured as a scale composed of indicators of having run for student office and of a holding leadership role in any student organization. A measure of church attendance serves as an indicator of community-based resources.

Three variables tap into psychological resources and political engagement. The first is a three-item engagement in politics scale, which is a standardized composite of expressed interest in politics and the frequency of both newspaper and newsmagazine readership.<sup>6</sup> The second item is the same six-item political knowledge scale that was administered to the parents. Third is the student's strength of partisanship.

Block III. Events and Achievements Between High School and the First Election

Although the youth were not interviewed between 1965 and the 1968 election, the 1973 interview was sufficiently detailed to enable construction of measures for four key life transitions during this period. Two are potential resources and two are presumed disruptions. Dummy variables indicate whether each young adult had attended college (63% of the sample did so), was married in 1968 (28%), or became a parent before the 1968 election (15%).

A simple measure of geographic mobility was impossible to construct because the questionnaire did not ask when each move between 1965 and 1973 occurred. However, respondents indicated if and when they moved to another state, permitting the computation of a dummy variable indicating if a respondent moved across state lines between 1965 and 1968.

Block IV. Life Events and Achievements After the First Election

The last causal block includes a wide array of resources and disruptive factors. The resources include both events/achievements (reports of final educational level, economic status, marriage, parenthood, and community ties) and psychological/subjective measures (political engagement and political knowledge).

The reports of events and behaviors include most of the usual variables suggested in life-cycle research. All are measured as of 1973—less than a year after the 1972 election and prior to subsequent elections in 1976 and 1980. Thus, they capture events during the first five years of voting eligibility for each respondent. Three variables tap various aspects of socioeconomic status. An ordinal measure of "final" educational achievement is coded -1 for those who did not attend college, 0 for those with some college attendance, and +1 for those who completed a college degree. Family income is measured by an 18-category variable that has been standardized. Income differences tend to widen with age and may be a poor indicator of one's position in the stratification system at age 25. At that age, young attorneys and management trainees earn less than many skilled blue-collar workers even though the former understand that they are on a track toward an upper middle-class standard of living. I therefore include a dummy variable denoting whether the head of household has a professional, technical, or high managerial position.

Three variables tap aspects of community involvement and social ties: a dummy variable indicating home ownership, a four-category measure of frequency of church attendance (also standardized), and marital status (measured by two dummy variables indicating whether the respondent was married or divorced; never married is the omitted category). Divorce can be thought of as a disruption that can lower turnout.

Additional disruption measures include the number of residential changes since 1965 (standardized) and parenthood, as measured by two dummy variables. The

&lt;sup>4</sup> Documentation of the exact question wording of all variables descriptions of how items were combined into composite measures of various kinds is available from the author upon request.

The maximum amount of information was extracted from the parent interview data. The mother was interviewed in one-third of the cases, the father in one-third, and both parents in one-third. In cases where both parents gave valid answers to questions about politics the answers were averaged.

&lt;sup>6</sup> Factor analysis yields loadings that range from 0.69 (magazine readership) to 0.79 (newspapers) for the three items with an estimated reliability (Cronbach's  $\alpha$ ) of 0.61.

first indicates the presence of school-age children (age six or older), and the second is coded 1 if the respondent has one or more children under six (but none older). Childless respondents are the omitted category.

Limitations of the Data

The Jennings and Niemi study constitutes the best (perhaps the only) data set that will permit estimating latent growth models of turnout. However, certain features of the data set bear on generalizibility. Most obviously, the period between 1965 and 1973 encompasses the escalation of the Civil Rights, antiwar, and campus free speech movements, along with related movements and political events. Undoubtedly, some of the parameter estimates would differ if a different cohort of high school seniors were studied (although it is difficult to anticipate which these might be).

Second, the study's design eliminates those who dropped out of high school prior to their senior year. In 1965 this was roughly 27% of the cohort. Thus, the restricted range of education almost surely narrows the range of several variables including parent education and SES, parent and student turnout, and youth's 1973 income. These probably have the effect of attenuating some relationships, yielding fairly conservative hypothesis tests and downwardly biased slopes (and relatively high percentages of self-reported turnout). The restriction in range almost surely exaggerates the speed with which high-resource and low-resource segments of the population converge in their turnout rates as they age.

Finally, with only four elections observed for each respondent, the smooth curves suggested by latent growth curve models represent a simplification. With a longer series of observations, life events producing dramatic short-term increases or temporary disruptions could be modeled more precisely (indicators of shocks preceding particular elections could be added to equation two). In the analyses summarized below, shocks will be reflected in substantial changes in the steepness of estimated growth curves, but these curves will nevertheless be estimated as smooth, monotonic functions.

Issues of Model Specification

Previous research suggests that all variables in Blocks I, II, and III are plausible predictors of turnout in the 1968 election. However, if these contribute to each individual's underlying probability of turnout in their first eligible election, it is not clear whether they should be expected to have additional impact on the rate of increase. Consider, for example, the impact of having parents with high levels of education, income, and political involvement. On the one hand, a rich cognitive environment could have a lasting legacy that provides an additional impetus toward political interest and participation, reflecting the idea that education provides the basis for further learning throughout the life course. Thus, a cognitively rich and politically engaged parental environment in childhood and adolescence might result in an acceleration turnout growth, reflected in a hypothesized positive effect on  $\beta_1$ . Such a growth hypothesis will be tested for each predictor.

However, the effect of parental resources could diminish over time as the young citizen leaves home and is exposed to more recent effects of community transitions, socioeconomic achievements, and family formation. Thus, in the absence of strong theory or previous research, hypotheses of no effect on growth are at least as plausible as hypotheses of positive effects. Thus, the question of whether the  $\beta_1$  side of the model is overspecified cannot be resolved on theoretical grounds.

The initial model, therefore, will start with all Block I variables modeled as predictors of  $\beta_0$  and of  $\beta_1$ . My standing expectation, however, is that all effects on  $\beta_1$  will be 0. For reasons of parsimony and to avoid potential problems of multicollinearity, insignificant predictors of  $\beta_1$  will not be retained when models add additional variables further along in the causal chain. This strategy strikes a balance between concerns about collinearity and the weak theoretical bases for hypotheses concerning long-term growth.

Table 1 lists the independent variables by temporal block and shows each variable's expected effect. The table has several notable features. First, the expected dissipation of effects of youth experiences is reflected in expected slopes of 0 for all pre-1968 measures on growth rate. Second, it is impossible for achievements occurring after 1968 to influence turnout in the 1968 election; therefore, all of these slopes are constrained to 0 a priori. Resources all have expected positive slopes. Disruptions occurring before the first eligible election are not expected to have any effects, but disruptions occurring later should lower turnout and this will be reflected in flatter growth rates (negative slopes).

RESULTS I: PARENTAL INFLUENCE ON INITIAL TURNOUT AND GROWTH

The initial model, reported in Table 2, includes sex, race, three measures of parental socioeconomic status, and five measures of parental political involvement including self-reported vote in the 1964 election. For each regressor, there are two estimated slopes: on  $\beta_0$ (reflecting the impact on starting level) and on  $\beta_1$  (the impact on growth). The intercept in the  $\beta_0$  column corresponds to  $\gamma_{00}$  in Eq. (3) and represents the log-odds of initial election turnout for a white male whose parent did not vote in the 1964 election and has the mean value for all SES and political variables (i.e., coded 0 for all 10 regressors). Similarly, the intercept in the equation predicting  $\beta_1$  represents an increase in the log-odds of turnout associated with each subsequent election  $[\gamma_{10}]$ in Eq. (4)]. Thus the prediction equation for a white man (race and sex equal 0) from an average parental environment (all parental variables equal 0) with a nonvoting parent is

$$logit(Y_{it}) = -0.192 + 1.024 \times ELECTION.$$
 (7)

&lt;sup>7</sup> I also estimated a saturated model containing all possible main effects and interactions for variables in all four blocks. Comparing these results with those in Table 7 reveals no sign changes and only two changes in statistical significance; the saturated model is not reported because of space constraints but the results are available from the author upon request.

TABLE 1.	Summary of Independent Variables
and Their I	Hypothesized Effects

and Their Hypothesized Eff	ects
	Predicting $\beta_0$	Predicting β <sub>1</sub>
Block I: Demographic and paren	tal character	istics
Demographic controls
Sex (female $= 1$ )	NH	0
Race (black = 1)	NH	0
Parental SES
Parental average education	+	Ō
Family income Head of household	+	0
occupational prestige	+	0
Politics at home
Parental political interest	,	0
Parental political knowledge	+ +	0
Parental political trust	+	0
Parental strength of	+	0
partisanship	'	J
Parent voted in 1964	+	0
(voted = 1)	•	•
Block II: Youth factors in 1965
Youth resources acquired before	re high coho	al.
graduation	e nign schol	וכ
High school GPA	+	0
High school activities	+	Ö
Church attendance	+	Ö
Engagement in politics	.	Ö
Political knowledge	+	Ö
Trust in government	+	0
Strength of partisanship	+	0
Block III: Factors occurring betwe election	en 1965 and	first
Resources acquired before first	election
Attended college (yes $= 1$ )	+	0
Married in 1968 (yes $= 1$ )	+	0
Disruptions before first election
Toddler in home in 1968	0	0
(yes = 1)
Interstate move 1965–1968 (yes = 1)	0	0
Block IV: Factors occurring/compl	eted after fire	st election
Hesources aquired after first ele
Educational achievement (-1 to +1)	Fixed = 0	+
Professional in 1973 (yes = 1	\ Fixed — 0
Family income 1973	Fixed $= 0$	+
Home ownership in 1973	Fixed = 0	+
(yes = 1)	· ixou — o	-
Church attendence 1973	Fixed = 0	+
Married in 1973 (yes $= 1$ )	Fixed = 0
Political knowledge 1973	Fixed = 0	;
Engagement in politics 1973	Fixed = 0	+
Disruptions after first election		-
Number of moves	Fixed = 0	-
1965-1973 Divorced/separated in 1973	Eivad 0
Privorocuracparateu III 1973	Fixed = 0	- 1

Note: NH: no hypothesis. Fixed = 0: estimates constrained to 0 because future achievements/events cannot influence starting level.

Fixed = 0

That is, the predicted odds of turnout in one's first election (when ELECTION and all other independent variables = 0), is  $e^{-0.192}$  (or 0.83 to 1), corresponding to a probability of about 0.45. To aid in interpreting the magnitudes of growth curve estimates, Eq. (7) is plotted as the lower curve in Fig. 1. This shows an initial turnout rate (intercept) of 45% and the familiar rise in turnout associated with age. The estimated growth rate of 1.024 represents the average rate of increase (in logged odds) in the sample.

The estimates of  $\gamma$  in Table 2 show that neither sex, race, nor parental income achieve statistical significance. Parental education has a modest effect on their children's initial turnout, with a 1-unit change (i.e., one standard deviation) raising the intercept by about 0.28 so that the predicted probability of voting (for average youth with nonvoting parents) increases from 0.45 to 0.52.

The largest effect on initial turnout is parents' reported turnout. When all other variables are at the mean (or at 0 for sex and race), parents voting in 1964 increases the probability of initial turnout from 0.45 to 0.66. Thus, the 15% of parents who said that they did not vote leave their offspring substantially behind in the acquisition of the habit of voting. However, the convergence of the upper and lower curves in Fig. 1 shows that this disadvantage dissipates over time.

The estimates show that only one variable, parental strength of partisanship, has an impact on the slope  $\beta_1$ . The magnitude of this effect is illustrated in Fig. 2 (which, again, holds other measures at 0). The effect is relatively small and mirrors Verba, Schlozman and Brady (1995, 449), who show that "politics in the home" at age 16 has a small direct effect on participation that is not explained away by a wide variety of SES, community, psychological, and resource measures. The finding

(yes = 1)

(yes = 1)

Has one or more children

	Predicting $\beta_0$		Predicting $\beta_1$
	γ	SE	γ	SE
Controls
Intercept	-0.192	0.211	1.024	0.168*
Sex (female $= 1$ )	-0.016	0.159	-0.119	0.122
Race (black = 1)	-0.070	0.314	0.418	0.279
Parental SES
Parental average education	0.276	0.106	0.113	0.083
Family income	-0.067	0.098	0.014	0.075
Head-of-household occ. prestige	0.171	0.103	-0.043	0.072
	0.171	0.100	0.0.10
Politics at home	0.074	0.086	-0.043	0.064
Parental political interest	•	0.098*	0.077	0.074
Parental political knowledge	0.211		-	0.070
Parental political trust	-0.093	0.090	-0.016
Parental strength of partisanship	-0.008	0.080	0.124	0.062*
Parent voted in 1964 (voted = 1)	0.862	0.234	0.117	0.171
$N_1 = 1$ Note: $N_1$ refers to number of respondents; $N_1 = 1$		ihood ratio $= -1870.8$ raises the question of why this is the only parental resource whose influence does not dissipate over time.

Independents.

To save space, this reported model includes both "structural" variables (demographics and status measures) and subjective/behavioral measures. A nested model including only structural variables shows that the total effect of education is about double the net effect ( $\gamma$  of 0.501 compared to 0.276). Thus half the total effect of parental education on initial turnout is mediated by parental political engagement, knowledge, and turnout.

To summarize the results so far, parental education and political knowledge each have modest effects on the probability of voting. Complementing these are two distinctly political variables, with parents' reported vote having a large impact on 1968 turnout and strength of partisanship providing a longer-term boost to turnout's growth rate. Measures of political alienation and engagement had no impact of any kind.

RESULTS II: HIGH SCHOOL INFLUENCES ON TURNOUT

This section explores achievements, activities, and psychological engagement in politics while respondents were high school seniors. The model reported in Table 3 retains from the first model both intercepts, all main effects, and one significant growth variable (parent's strength of partisanship) and adds the high school period measures. High school GPA is a rough measure of cognitive skill, work habits, and future socioeconomic success. It has a small and marginally significant (t=1.82) impact on initial turnout. Our measure of high school student activities fails to achieve significance in either portion of the model.

Church attendance is consistently found to be a predictor of turnout in cross-sectional studies (e.g., Verba, Schlozman, and Brady 1995). Turnout scholars have never been entirely sure whether church involvement provides resources that have a causal impact on political participation or whether both are indicators of a general propensity to participate in community life. However, Table 3 shows that church attendance as a teenager in 1965 has no impact on turnout three years later or on the subsequent rate of growth.

The model also includes two measures of psychological engagement in politics. The first is a three-item engagement in politics scale, which is a standardized composite of expressed interest in politics and the frequency of both newspaper and newsmagazine readership. The second is the same six-item political knowledge scale that was administered to the parents.

TABLE 3.	The Effects of High School Resources and Accomplishments on Starting Level and Growth	Sales and Accomplishments on Starting Level and Predicting $\beta_0$		Predicting $\beta_1$

	γ	SE	γ	SE
Variables in previous model
Intercept	-0.166	0.231	1.055	0.093
Sex (female = 1)	-0.019	0.155	7.000	0.030
Race (black $= 1$ )	0.400	0.286
Parental average education	0.246	0.097
Family income	-0.046	0.086
Head-of-household occ. prestige	0.108 '	0.095
Parental political interest	0.018	0.078
Parental political knowledge	0.153	0.089*
Parental political trust	-0.126	0.083
Parental strength of partisanship	-0.053	0.084	0.135	0.065*
Parent voted in 1964 (voted = 1)	0.802	0.248		0.000
Youth resources before HS graduation	•
High school GPA	0.152	0.083*	-0.034	0.070
High school activities	0.061	0.105	-0.018	0.062
Church attendance 1965	0.057	0.083	0.059	0.063
Engagement in politics	0.269	0.088	-0.015	0.067
Political knowledge	0.371	0.092	0.101	0.072
Trust in government	0.085	0.078	-0.029	0.059
Strength of partisanship	0.031	0.083	-0.042	0.065
				0.000

 $N_1 = 1068$ ,  $N_2 = 3829$ , likelihood ratio = -1800.0Note:  $N_1$  refers to number of respondents;  $N_2$  refers to number of observations in the level 1 analysis. *p < 0.05; **p < 0.01 (one

Both are significant predictors of 1968 turnout (but not subsequent rate of growth), and together they can have a fairly large effect. Being one standard deviation above the mean on both increases the log odds by 0.64, nearly as much as having a voting parent (illustrated in Fig. 3). Table 3 also shows that the effect of parental political knowledge drops by about 25%—implying that knowledge

FIGURE 3. Effect of Engagement and Knowledge While in High School on Turnout

(----) Those 1 SD above the mean on political engagement and knowledge. (----) Those 1 SD below the mean on political engagement and knowledge.

Election

2.0

3.0

1.0

edgeable parents enhance turnout in part by fostering a similar attentiveness to public affairs in their children.

Although not reported here, I inspected an intermediate model that included high school grades but excluded the political engagement measures and found the effect of GPA to be about 60% larger ( $\gamma=0.244$  compared to 0.152). None of the other structural variables showed noticeable changes. Thus high school achievement seems to matter but mostly indirectly through knowledge and political engagement.

None of the Block II variables, however, are significant in the  $\beta_1$  (slope) portion of the model. To ensure against Type II errors due to overspecification, the effects on growth were explored serially, with each variable entered alone to minimize multicollinearity. None achieved statistical significance, providing additional confidence for the idea that none of the high school period variables have lasting effects throughout the life course.

RESULTS III: LIFE EVENTS BETWEEN 1965 AND 1968

In this section, I examine the effects of four life transitions that occurred between the seniors' 1965 interview and their first eligible election. The next model adds dummy variables for having attended college (63% of the sample did so) and being married in 1968 (28%). The model also includes two variables hypothesized to have negative effects: being a parent in 1968 (15%) and whether or not the respondent made an interstate move between 1965 and 1968 (59%). Only two variables tailed).

0.0

achieved statistical significance. Moving across state lines decreases the odds of voting by a small amount and is significant in a one-tailed test (t=-1.91). Attending college gives a substantial positive boost to initial turnout (about two thirds the size of the parental turnout effect illustrated in Fig. 1). The introduction of college attendance also causes the estimate for high school GPA to drop by more than 50% and its t value to drop below 1.00. Thus the small effect of high school grades appears to lead to a greater likelihood of college attendance, which directly affects turnout.

The model also shows that none of these variables achieves conventional levels of significance predicting growth. However, the lasting impact of being a parent is intriguing. The one-tailed probability is 0.07 and the coefficient estimate is negative and fairly large. In this sample, youth who became parents before the age of 22 start with no disadvantage but their rate of turnout growth is somewhat retarded.

Pre-1968 Factors: A Summary

Many events and social characteristics occurred or were fixed before the class of 1965 confronted its first election. Among these, having highly educated parents who voted in the 1964 election, being psychologically engaged with politics as high school seniors, and attending college boosted initial turnout, while mobility between 1965 and 1968 depressed it.

These findings supporting and clarify recent scholarship about education's role in political participation. Verba, Schlozman, and Brady (1995, 437-8) conclude that effects of parent's education are mediated largely by offspring's own socioeconomic status and interest in politics. Table 2 shows that parental education and political knowledge have no effect (neither direct nor indirect) on turnout growth. Their modest effects on initial turnout in the baseline model ( $\gamma$ 's of 0.276 and 0.211) drop by only 25% (to  $\gamma$ 's of 0.225 and 0.150, respectively) after accounting for offspring political engagement and college attendance (Table 4). Thus, the mechanism translating parental resources into children's initial political involvement is not captured by the variables in the model—perhaps because of poor specification (the transmission processes are captured by different variables entirely) or measurement error (high school grades and a simple indicator of college attendance may not adequately capture underlying variance in youth's educational achievements). One implication for cross-sectional studies, however, is that the effects of parental environment diminish over time and should, therefore, be modeled as interactions with age.

Among 21 pre-1968 variables, only parental strength of partisanship influenced turnout's rate of increase. Since partisanship is presumably a stable trait, the 1965 measure may be a reliable indicator of levels of partisanship many years in the future. Thus having partisan parents may accelerate the acquisition of knowledge and resources implicated in the lifelong learning process that underlies Rosenstone and Hansen's (1993) life experience approach.

RESULTS IV: LIFE EVENTS AFTER 1968

The fourth block includes measures at the heart of the life-cycle and life-experience explanations for turnout growth. All of these occurred after the 1968 election and, therefore, cannot have any effect on the initial probability of voting. Thus the effects of all subsequent variables will be modeled only as predictors of  $\beta_1$ . We first model reports of events and behaviors and then add psychological measures to see if they mediate the effects of other variables.

Table 5 reports a model that adds 10 structural variables measured in 1973 (about half a year after the cohort's second eligible election in November 1972). By now, most members have completed their education and are forming families and careers. The effects of three socioeconomic resources are generally consistent with the extant literature on turnout, which points to education as the most powerful component of SES with respect to turnout. Neither holding a professional position nor having a high income is significant but education has a sizable effect above and beyond the effect college attendance had on starting levels.

It is useful to see how the impact of education cumulates over the life course. The prediction equation for someone who never attended college (coded 0 for the 1968 dummy and coded -1 for the 1973 ordinal measure) who has values of 0 on all other variables is

$$logit(Y_{it}) = -0.316 + (0.972 - 0.163) \times ELECTION$$

=  $-0.316 + 0.809 \times ELECTION$ .

For those who attained a college degree (coded 1 for both variables) the prediction equation is

$$logit(Y_{it}) = (-0.316 + 0.420) + (0.972 + 0.163)$$

  $\times ELECTION = 0.104 + 1.135 \times ELECTION.$

These two growth curves are plotted in Fig. 4 and show that college education contributes to both a headstart and a more rapid rate of increase. Extrapolating beyond the range of the data gives a projection of a turnout gap of only 1% in three additional elections, when the typical respondent was 45 years old. Thus, the steeper slope does not prevent, but substantially delays, the point at which the less educated catch up. This supports Wolfinger and Rosenstone's (1980, 60) characterization that life experience can, over time, become a substitute for school. However, because this sample includes no respondents who lack a high school diploma, it is possible that those who dropped out of the class of 1965 never catch up with the college educated.

The next three variables—home ownership, geographic mobility, and church attendance—have been interpreted as tapping citizens's ties to their communities. These ties provide motivation to be informed and involved, as well as opportunities to gain political knowledge that reduce participation costs. Mobility may also raise the costs of maintaining registration (Squire, Wolfinger, and Glass 1987). Surprisingly, only frequency of church attendance in 1973 is a significant predictor of the growth rate. Unfortunately, this

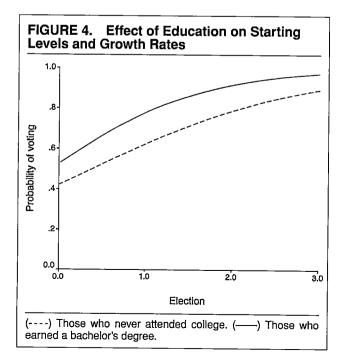

TABLE 4. The Effects of Life Events Between High School and First Election on Starting Levels and Growth

	Predicting $\beta_0$		Predicting $\beta_1$
	γ	SE	γ	SE
Variables in previous model	•
Intercept	-0.438	0.277	1.097	0.152
Sex (female $=$ 1)	-0.004	0.157		0.102
Race (black = 1)	0.243	0.286
Parental average education	0.225	0.097*
Family income	-0.080	0.086
Head-of-household occ. prestige	0.078	0.094
Parental political interest	-0.011	0.078
Parental political knowledge	0.150	0.088*
Parental political trust	-0.139	0.082*
Parental strength of partisanship	-0.064	0.084	0.136	0.062*
Parent voted in 1964 (voted = 1)	0.869	0.247	41.00	0.002
High school GPA	0.074	0.077
High school activities	0.028	0.099
Church attendance 1965	0.066	0.074
Engagement in politics	0.249	0.076
Political knowledge	0.385	0.089
Trust in government	0.062	0.069
Strength of partisanship	0.004	0.074
Resources acquired before first election
Attended college (yes = 1)	0.548	0.188	0.071	0.137
Married in 1968 (yes = 1)	0.125	0.193	0.041	0.146
Disruptions before first election			0.0	0.140
Toddler in home in 1968 (yes = 1)	0.077	0.236	-0.281	0.183
Interstate move 1965–1968 (yes $= 1$ )	-0.312	0.163*	-0.084	0.125
N ₁ =1063	B, $N_2 = 3812$ , likeliho	od ratio = -1781.3

= 38 12, likelinood ratio = -1/81.3 Note:  $N_1$  refers to number of respondents;  $N_2$  refers to number of observations in the level 1 analysis. *p < 0.05; **p < 0.01 (one variable is measured right in the middle of the trajectories of most people. It is not possible to tell whether church involvement has a causal impact on turnout or whether both are indicators of a more general propensity to be involved in community life. At the very least. church attendance is a part of a dynamic complex of community involvements that includes voting.

Home Ownership and Mobility: Additional Considerations

Home ownership has long been regarded as an enhancer of turnout (e.g., Verba and Nie 1972, 139) and mobility a major barrier, but the estimates show that neither has an impact on growth rates. In each case the null findings could be (a) an artifact of the data and methods used here, (b) a peculiar characteristic of this particular cohort, or (c) a serious challenge to prior work.

The developmental model suggests that mobility effects will be greatest for habitual voters and, therefore, negligible for young voters and the estimates are consistent with that argument. Yet the possibility of an artifact is also high because the mobility measure is imprecise and stretches back to 1965. To get more leverage, I tried to replicate this finding using cross-sectional data from the American National Election Studies cumulative file (Miller and National Election Studies 1999). I pooled data from the same four presidential elections and estimated a model of turnout for four age groups. The youngest were 21-33 and correspond to the ages of those in the latent growth models. Table 6 tailed).

TABLE 5. The Effects of Life Events Aft	After the First Election on Turnout $\theta$ Predicting $\beta_0$		Predicting $\beta_1$
	γ	SE	γ	SE
Variables in previous model			2.070	0.105
Intercept	-0.316	0.272	0.972	0.135
Sex (female = 1)	0.010	0.162
Race (black = 1)	0.343	0.287
Parental average education	0.246	0.097
Family income	0.083	0.086
Head-of-household occ. prestige	0.087	0.094
Parental political interest	0.000	0.078
Parental political knowledge	0.145	0.087*
Parental political trust	-0.149	0.082
Parental strength of partisanship	-0.061	0.083	0.143	0.063*
Parent voted in 1964 (voted = 1)	0.840	0.247
High school GPA	0.063	0.078
High school activities	0.033	0.100
Church attendance 1965	0.042	0.074
	0.260	0.077
Engagement in politics	0.395	0.090
Political knowledge	0.054	0.069
Trust in government	-0.009	0.073
Strength of partisanship	0.420	0.180
Attended college (yes = 1)		0.173
Married in 1968 (yes = 1)	0.100
Toddler in home in 1968 (yes = 1)	0.047	0.237
Interstate move 1965–1968 (yes = 1)	-0.352	0.152*
Resources/disruptipons after election			0.400	0.088*
Educational achievement $(-1 \text{ to } +1)$	_	_	0.163
Professional in 1973 (yes $=$ 1)		_	-0.108	0.120
Family income 1973		_	0.038	0.057
Home ownership in 1973 (yes = 1)	_	_	-0.036	0.137
Church attendence 1973	_	_	0.177	0.055*
Number of moves 1965–1973	_	-	0.000	0.055
Marriage/family events
Married in 1973 (yes = 1)	_		0.442	0.156
Divorced/separated in 1973 (yes = 1)	_	_	-0.266	0.264
Has toddler in home in 1973 (yes = 1)	_	_	-0.230	0.150
School-age child in home 1973 (yes = 1)	_		-0.312	0.197
$N_1 = 1061$ , Note: $N_1$ refers to number of respondents; $N_2$ refers	$N_2 = 3773$ , likelihoo	d ratio = $-1749.8$

reports the estimated slopes for geographic mobility, controlling for the year surveyed, age, race, education, sex, home ownership, family income, children in household, married, and folded party identification. The effect of mobility is substantively small and insignificant for young citizens and is large and significant for voters over 33 years old. These striking results provide strong corroboration that disruptions from mobility have an increasing impact throughout the life course. This conclusion suggests that an interaction with age may be the best way to specify the effects of mobility with cross-sectional data.

In contrast, pooled NES data (analysis not reported here but available on request) casts doubt on my estimates for the effect of home ownership; it has a robust effect at all age groups. After some exploration, I have concluded that the null effects here are probably due to a combination of factors—both substantive and methodological. First, home ownership is largely cumulative—most first time home owners continue to own homes for a long period thereafter—and therefore tracks closely with age and turnout. Thus, if unreliably measured, its true effects are likely to be absorbed by age or (in this research design) time.

Second, home ownership status changes very rapidly in the age range represented by our data. According to the Census's (1993) analysis of 1982 home ownership, only 19% of those under 25 owned a home but that number soars to 57% for those 30 to 34. Pooling Census data for a number of years (details available on request) shows the home ownership rate increases by 3.4% per year between age 21 and age 34. In 1973 38% of the sample reports owning a home and the Census data suggest that nearly 60% would own a home by the time of the 1980 election. Thus, the single measure has the benefit of being prior to voting outcomes but the corresponding disadvantage of being an extremely poor indicator of ownership status at the times of the last two elections.

TABLE 6. Effect of Geographic Mobility on Turnout in Presidential Elections, by Age Group (Subset of NES Cummulative File: 1968 through 1980, High School Graduates)

	Age Group		Effect of Mobility on Turnout: Logistic Regression Slopes
Model	(Years)	β	SE	Ν
1	21-33	0.242	0.195	576
2	34–50	0.513	0.276*	518
3	51–65	1.025	0.391	324
4	≥66	0.552	0.677	156

Note: Other variables in each model: year of election, age, age2, race, education, sex, homeownership, family income, children in household, married, and folded party identification. *p < 0.05; **p < 0.01 (one tailed).

The null effects, combined with consistent and robust effects in cross-sectional studies, suggest that the positive impact of home ownership is probably immediate and therefore poorly captured by the developmental specification used here.

Family Life and Voter Turnout

The final set of objective variables measure aspects of family life: two dummy variables measuring marital status in 1973 and indicators of whether there are young children or school-age children in the household. The distinction between younger and older children derives from the idea that school-age children get parents involved in secondary associations such as the PTA and that schools provide a personal link to government policy. This implies that while very young children drain time and energy and lead to lower turnout, older children enhance networks that would result in greater political knowledge, mobilization, and an interest in outcomes. Taken together, these four variables paint a complex picture of the relationship between family life and turnout.

Although marriage when very young (most respondents were 22 or younger in 1968) had no effect on initial turnout, the same measure in 1973 had a substantial positive impact on turnout growth. In contrast, those who were married and divorced by 1973 (eight years after graduating from high school) had distinctively low growth rates (although the divorce measure does not achieve statistical significance, the two variables as a set improve the fit of the model). These growth rates, however, are higher than those of the never married-so divorce reverses only a portion of the marriage benefit. Yet, as Milbrath speculated, marriage is a mixed blessing for turnout because marriage is most often accompanied by children that erode about half the gain in turnout associated with marriage. Neither measure of the presence of children achieves significance and the two estimates are similar in magnitude. Given the similarity in effect estimates, I substituted a summary measure that simply indicates the presence of children. This did achieve significance ( $\gamma = 0.253$ , one-tailed p = 0.035) and is included in results reported in Table 7.

Psychological Engagement in Politics

Table 7 reports a model that adds the political engagement and political knowledge scales, both of which are significant predictors of turnout growth. Individually, the effects are modest but their combined impact can be substantial. Note also that the effect of education on growth is no longer statistically significant and the estimate has declined by about a third. Thus the two cognitive measures used here mediate about a third of the effect of higher education.

SUMMARY AND IMPLICATIONS

The developmental framework provides a new way to understand how resources and disruptions influence turnout in U.S. elections. When a cohort of young citizens becomes eligible to vote for the first time, parental socioeconomic and political resources largely determine who votes. Inertia ensures that parental resources continue to distinguish voters from nonvoters in succeeding elections. The influence of the parental resources, however, diminishes gradually as young adults' own accomplishments and status come to the fore. As the cohort ages, more and more members become habitual voters and the differences between the high- and the low-resource groups shrink. Among habitual voters, major life disruptions can interrupt the voting habit but only temporarily.

Analyses employing latent growth curve models and panel data produced results that are consistent with the general contours of the developmental theory. Table 4, for example, identifies seven significant predictors of initial turnout and none of these had an additional impact beyond the inertia that they helped to create.

Substantively, the most intriguing finding may be the enduring effect of parental partisanship, which speaks to how declining partisanship may contribute to long-term declines in turnout. If adults in their 30s, 40s, or 50s become disenchanted with parties, they tend to continue voting if that was their habit. However, the results suggest that their children will be slightly less likely to vote (perhaps decades later) as a consequence. To be sure, this cannot be the only long-term mechanism accounting for turnout decline but it could be a major one.

The findings also speak indirectly to issues concerning class bias of the electorate. High-SES parents pass on advantages to their children (both political behavior that children learn from and indirect gains through children's educational attainment). In the absence of other factors, these would lead to class bias of one cohort being reproduced in the next. However, as life expectancy increases, the gradual erosion of inherited advantages means that class bias may decline somewhat [as it may have done in recent decades (see Leighley and Nagler 1992)] because a larger portion of the electorate is at a life stage in which socioeconomic status matters little for turnout.

Married in 1973 (yes = 1)

Political knowledge 1973

Engagement in politics 1973

Divorced/separated in 1973 (yes = 1)

Has one or more children (yes = 1)
Psychological resources after first election

TABLE 7. Final Model Predicting Starting Level and Turnout Growth, Including 1973 Political Knowledge and Engagement Predicting  $\beta_0$ Predicting  $\beta_1$ SE SE γ γ Variables in previous model 0.964 0.138\*\* 0.263 0.317 Intercept 0.157 0.045 Sex (female = 1) 0.278 0.315 Race (black = 1) 0.097\*\* 0.246 Parental average education 0.084 Family income -0.068 0.077 0.092 Head-of-household occ. prestige 0.007 0.076 Parental political interest Parental political knowledge 0.085 0.126 -0.1240.079 Parental political trust 0.062\* 0.080 0.143 -0.061 Parental strength of partisanship 0.242\*\* 0.810 Parent voted in 1964 (voted = 1) 0.076 0.061 High school GPA 0.098 0.039 High school activities 0.072 0.039 Church attendance 1965 0.076\*\* 0.201 Engagement in politics 0.090\*\* 0.350 Political knowledge 0.067 0.067 Trust in government Strength of partisanship -0.005 0.071 0.174\*\* Attended college (yes = 1) 0.437 0.096 0.170 Married in 1968 (yes = 1) 0.015 0.203 Toddler in home in 1968 (yes = 1) 0.147\*Interstate move 1965-1968 (yes = 1) -0.3180.112 0.089 Educational achievement (-1 to +1)0.124 -0.096Professional in 1973 (yes = 1) 0.015 0.060 Family income 1973 0.144 -0.047Home ownership in 1973 (yes = 1) 0.057\*\* 0.162 Church attendence 1973 -0.0490.058 Number of moves 1965-1973

 $N_1 = 1061$ ,  $N_2 = 3764$ , likelihood ratio = -1731.2

Note:  $N_1$  refers to number of respondents;  $N_2$  refers to number of observations in the level 1 analysis. *p < 0.05; **p < 0.01 (one tailed).

More generally, latent growth models should spur scholars toward better theories of the social bases of turnout. The simple conclusion that turnout is always a product of both starting level and growth rate (each with rather different predictors) is itself important and should lead to new questions about turnout, which, in turn, should produce better hypotheses and a cumulation of new findings. A major limitation, of course, is the dearth of appropriate longitudinal data. In this regard, the completion of a fourth wave of the Student-Parent Socialization Study and its release to the larger community in coming years can only mean good news for the study of political behavior over the life course. However, as illustrated in my supplemental analysis of geographic mobility, careful use of age × resource and  $age \times disruption$  interactions should allow tests of some developmental hypotheses with cross-sectional data.

Finally, latent growth curve models may have wider applicability in political science. Whenever theory or previous research suggests a monotonic trend of growth or decline, this approach allows asking "time series questions" even when the number of time points is as few as three or four. As such, applications of this method may extend to such diverse phenomena as the life cycles of social movements, the escalation phase of arms races, economic growth in developing nations, transitions to democracy, and various diffusion processes. Thus, in many areas of inquiry, growth models have the potential to bring theory and empirical analysis into closer alignment.

0.511

-0.244

-0.226

0.162

0.238

0.165**

0.282

0.146

0.064**

0.062**

APPENDIX: FREQUENCIES AND TREATMENT OF MISSING DATA FOR THE DEPENDENT VARIABLE

Among all youth interviewed in 1965 this paper's analysis is based on those who were 21 years old at the time of the 1968

TABLE A1.	Distributio	n of Voter 1	urnout by	Year, With and	d Without Mis	sing Data
		Including M	lissing Data			Excluding M	issing Data
Voted Did not vote Missing data	58.6 40.3 1.0	71.4 28.4 0.2	67.1 14.3 18.6	66.3 10.8 22.9	59.2 40.8	71.5 28.5	82.4 17.6	85.9 14.1
Total	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0
N	1153	1153	1153	1153	1141	1151	939	889

general election. Among these, 1153 responded to at least one of the four turnout questions. The marginal distribution for the four turnout measures is presented in Table A1.

The Bayesian estimation method of random effects models means that "both the number of observations per person and the spacing of observations may vary" (Bryk and Raudenbush 1992, 133). That is, any respondent who has a valid turnout code for at least one election can be included in the analysis, maximizing the amount of information used in generating the parameter estimates. The nature of Bayesian estimators is such that individuals with more data points are weighted more heavily. As a result, the number of usable observations—designated as  $N_1$  in all tables—exceeds the 862 respondents who have valid data for all four elections.  $N_2$  in the tables refers to the total number of valid turnout codes, which is  $N_2 = \sum (k_i)$ , where  $k_i$  is the number of valid data points for the ith respondent.

REFERENCES

Aldrich, John H. 1993. "Rational Choice and Turnout." American Journal of Political Science 37 (February): 246–78.

Bryk, Anthony S., and Stephen W. Raudenbush. 1992. Hierarchical Linear Models. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Campbell, Angus, Philip E. Converse, Warren E. Miller, and Donald E. Stokes. 1960. The American Voter. New York: Wiley.

Center for Political Studies. 2000. American National Election Series: 1972, 1974, 1976 [computer file]. (Study 7607) Conducted by University of Michigan, Center for Political Studies. 3rd ICPSR ed. Ann Arbor, MI: Inter-university Consortium for Political and Social Research [producer and distributor].

Hedeker, Donald, and Robert P. Gibbons. 1994. "A Random-Effects Ordinal Regression Model for Multivariate Analysis." Biometrics 50 (December): 933-44.

Hedeker, Donald, and Robert P. Gibbons. 1996. MIXOR: A Computer Program for Mixed-Effects Ordinal Probit and Logistic Regression Analysis, software manual. Chicago: University of Illinois at Chicago School of Public Health.

Highton, Benjamin, and Raymond E. Wolfinger. 2001. "The First Seven Years of the Political Life Cycle." American Journal of Political Science 45 (January): 202-9.

litical Science 45 (January): 202–9.

Jankowski, Thomas B. 2001. "The Aging American Voter: Changes in Participation Over the Life Span." Paper presented at the Annual Meetings of the Midwest Political Science Association, Chicago, April 19–22.

Jennings, M. Kent. 1972. Student-Parent Socialization Study, 1965 [computer file] (Study 7286) Conducted by M. Kent Jennings, University of Michigan. ICPSR ed. Ann Arbor, MI: Inter-university Consortium for Political and Social Research [producer and distributor].

Jennings, M. Kent, and Gregory B. Markus. 1988. "Political Involvement in Later Years: A Longitudinal Survey." American Journal of Political Science 32 (May): 302-16.

Jennings, M. Kent, and Richard Niemi. 1981. Generations and Politics. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Jennings, M. Kent, and Richard G. Niemi. 1991. The Youth-Parent Socialization Panel Study, 1965–1973 [computer file] (Study 7779). Conducted by University of Michigan, Center for Political Studies. 2nd ICPSR ed. Ann Arbor, MI: Inter-university Consortium for Political and Social Research [producer and distributor].

Jennings, M. Kent, Gregory B. Markus, and Richard G. Niemi. 1991. Youth-Parent Socialization Panel Study, 1965–1982: Wave III [computer file] (Study 9134) Conducted by University of Michigan, Center for Political Studies/Survey Research Center. 3rd ICPSR ed. Ann Arbor, MI: Inter-university Consortium for Political and Social Research [producer and distributor].

Social Research [producer and distributor].
Leighley, Jan E., and Jonathan Nagler. 1992. "Socioeconomic Class Bias in Turnout, 1964–1988: The Voters Remain the Same."

American Political Science Review 86 (September): 725–36.

Lieberson, Stanley. 1985. Making It Count: The Improvement of Social Research and Theory. Berkeley: University of California Press.
 Milbrath, Lester W. 1965. Political Participation. Chicago: Rand McNally.

Miller, Warren E., and National Election Studies. 1999. American National Election Studies Cumulative Data File, 1948–1998 [computer file] (Study 8475), 10th ICPSR version. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan, Center for Political Studies [producer], Inter-university Consortium for Political and Social Research [distributor].

Miller, Warren E., and J. Merrill Shanks. 1996. The New American Voter. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Plutzer, Eric. 1998. "Family Structure and the Political Participation of African American Women." In The Development of Character and Competence Through Life, eds. Anne Colby, Jacqueline James, and Daniel Hart. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Riley, Matilda White. 1973. "Aging and Cohort Succession: Interpretations and Misinterpretations." Public Opinion Quarterly 37 (Spring): 35–49.

Rosenstone, Steven J. 1982. "Economic Adversity and Voter Turnout." American Journal of Political Science 26 (February): 25-46

Rosenstone, Steven J., and John Mark Hansen. 1993. Mobilization, Participation, and Democracy in America. New York: Macmillan. Searing, Donald D., Joel J. Schwartz, and Alden E. Lind. 1973. "The Structuring Principle: Political Socialization and Belief Systems." American Political Science Review 67 (June): 415–32.

Squire, Peverill, Raymond Wolfinger, and David Glass. 1987. "Residential Mobility and Voter Turnout." American Political Science Review 81 (March): 45–65.

Stoker, Laura, and M. Kent Jennings. 1995. "Life-Cycle Transitions and Political Participation: The Case of Marriage." American Political Science Review 89 (June): 421–33.

Strate, John M., Charles M. Parrish, Charles D. Elder, and Coit Ford III. 1989. "Life Span Civic Development and Voting Participation." American Political Science Review 83 (June): 443–64.

Timpone, Richard J. 1998. "Structure, Behavior, and Voter Turnout in the United States. American Political Science Review 92 (March): 145–58.

United States Bureau of the Census. 1993. "First-Time Homeowners in 1989: A Comparative Perspective." Current Housing Reports, H121/93-1.

Verba, Sidney, and Norman Nie. 1972. Participation in America. New York: Harper and Row.

Verba, Sidney, Kay Lehman Schlozman, and Henry Brady. 1995. Voice and Equality: Civic Voluntarism in American Politics. Cambridge, MA. Harvard University Press.

Wolfinger, Raymond, and Steven J. Rosenstone. 1980. Who Votes. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Zipp, John F., and Joel Smith. 1979. "The Structure of Electoral Political Participation." American Journal of Sociology 85 (July): 167–77.

The Social Calculus of Voting: Interpersonal, Media, and Organizational Influences on Presidential Choices

PAUL ALLEN BECK The Ohio State University RUSSELL J. DALTON University of California, Irvine STEVEN GREENE Texas Tech University ROBERT HUCKFELDT Indiana University

Toting choices are a product of both personal attitudes and social contexts, of a personal and a social calculus. Research has illuminated the personal calculus of voting, but the social calculus has received little attention since the 1940s. This study expands our understanding of the social influences on individual choice by examining the relationship of partisan biases in media, organizational, and interpersonal intermediaries to the voting choices of Americans. Its results show that the traditional sources of social influence still dominate: Interpersonal discussion outweighs the media in affecting the vote. Media effects appear to be the product of newspaper editorial pages rather than television or newspaper reporting, which contain so little perceptible bias that they often are misperceived as hostile. Parties and secondary organizations also are influential, but only for less interested voters—who are more affected by social contexts in general. Overall, this study demonstrates that democratic citizens are embedded in social contexts that join with personal traits in shaping their voting decisions.

ow are political choices shaped by a decision maker's immediate social and informational context? This question has interested scholars of both elite and citizen decision making across many different political systems. The recognition that these contexts can vary to a considerable degree and that the cost of acquiring political information is high has created an appreciation for how much political choices are circumscribed by the social and informational contexts within which individuals reside.

These considerations apply to the occasional political decisions made by citizens just as much as they apply to the routine decisions of their leaders. At any given time, in any given place, citizens confront specific sources of political information: their own personal networks of social interaction and political communication, particular newspapers, a range of electronic media outlets, and a variety of organized efforts at political persuasion. Political choice takes on meaning within these contexts. Thus, theories of democracy and democratic citizenship increasingly focus on the sources and consequences of political information. These contexts are especially important because alternative sources of information typically vary in the extent to which they carry distinctive political biases. By relying on one information source rather than another, citizens are more or less likely to encounter information that encourages some choices and outcomes while it discourages others.

Paul Allen Beck is Professor of Political Science, The Ohio State University, Columbus, OH 43210-1373 (beck.9@osu.edu). Russell J. Dalton is Professor of Politics and Society, University of California, Irvine, CA 92697-5100 (rdalton@uci.edu). Steven Greene is Assistant Professor of Political Science, Texas Tech University, Lubbock, TX 79409-1015 (steven.greene@ttu.edu). Robert Huckfeldt is Professor of Political Science, Indiana University, Bloomington, IN 47405 (huckfeld@indiana.edu).

This project was funded by the National Science Foundation under a grant to Paul Beck, Russell Dalton, and Robert Huckfeldt (SES-9123578) for the citizen and discussant surveys, by the Joyce Foundation for the media content analysis, and by the Center for Labor Research at Ohio State University for the party surveys. We are especially indebted to Holli Semetko for the television content analysis data and to Audrey Haynes for her efforts in the collection of the party leader data. The study data are archived by the Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research (Beck et al. 1992).

These spatial and temporal variations in information would be less important if citizens were able and willing to undertake comprehensive searches for political information, but the willingness to undertake a comprehensive search is limited by the high costs of political information (Downs 1957). Indeed, the acquisition of information is perhaps the primary cost of political participation, and hence citizens regularly pursue informational alternatives that limit these costs, typically by relying on readily available information sources. Even among individuals who are willing to pay higher costs for a more comprehensive information search, cognitive limits circumscribe individual capacities (Lodge, Steenbergen, and Brau 1995). These inherent limitations on information processing abilities suggest that individual capacity is vulnerable to being swamped by readily available information sources in the immediate context. None of this suggests that individual preferences and capacities are unimportant but, rather, that limits on individual capacities and resources make the immediate contexts of political choice particularly important.

Most studies of voting behavior in the United States and other democracies have paid little attention to context, viewing vote choices as the product of a "personal" rather than a "social" calculus. Through application of social-psychological (Campbell et al. 1960) and rational-choice (Fiorina 1981) perspectives, scholars have developed a rich understanding of the role that individuals' personal characteristics, attitudes, and interests play in their voting decisions. The modern study of voting behavior did not begin this way. A social context perspective guided the first survey studies of voting, conducted at Columbia University in the 1940s (Lazarsfeld, Berelson, and Gaudet 1944; Berelson, Lazarsfeld, and McPhee 1954). By the 1960s, however, this focus had given way to an almost-exclusive concentration on the voter as an autonomous actor independent of social context. Despite a revival of attention to social factors in recent decades, a comprehensive treatment of the social context for voting has not been attempted since the Columbia studies more than half a century ago.

The present study comprehensively addresses this social calculus of voting by drawing upon a unique collection of data on the 1992 American presidential election campaign. At its core is a nationwide survey of the adult electorate. Survey respondents were questioned about the variety of individual attitudes, perceptions, and characteristics that previous scholars have shown influence the vote decision. Our interest in the effects of social context led the survey beyond normal election-study questions to probe the nature of various social sources of political information, which we refer to as information "intermediaries" because they mediate messages from the parties, candidates, and campaigns to the voter (Bennett and Entman 2001).

The social context for the survey respondents was constructed from both their own perceptions of their various intermediaries and direct information on the intermediaries themselves. We asked respondents about messages coming from personal discussants, newspapers, television network news, secondary organizations, and political parties. The study also gathered information directly from all of these intermediaries except for secondary organizations. An innovative clustering of the citizen sample enabled us to examine the local social context in detail, yet still maintain a nationally representative study. We measured the presidential campaign coverage of the principal newspaper in each sample county and the presidential campaign activities of the county party and presidential campaign organizations. We also interviewed personal discussants identified by the main survey respondents. (See Appendix A for a more detailed description of the data collections.)

This paper addresses two specific research questions about voting behavior within the social context defined by these data. First, what candidates did the intermediaries to which voters were exposed in the 1992 presidential election campaign favor? This is an inquiry into variations in the partisan bias of political information—that is, the favorability of the intermediaries toward one presidential candidate or another. Second, what was the relationship between the biases of their intermediaries and voters' choices in 1992? If the flow of information coming to voters is skewed in favor of one candidate over another, we hypothesize that this will influence their electoral decisions, even after their own partisan orientations and other enduring personal influences on the vote are taken into account. In short, ours is an inquiry into how a social calculus supplements the well-established personal calculus of voting.

THE CHANGING SOCIAL CONTEXT OF CITIZEN DECISION MAKING

Our research agenda builds upon voting studies by Paul Lazarsfeld and his colleagues at Columbia University conducted in 1940 in Erie County, Ohio (Lazarsfeld, Berelson, and Gaudet 1944), and in 1948 in Elmira, New York (Berelson, Lazarsfeld, and McPhee 1954). After this auspicious beginning, research on the role of social context was largely neglected until recent times. Important recent studies have illuminated the influence on citizen attitudes and behavior of interpersonal networks (e.g., Huckfeldt and Sprague 1995; Mutz and Mondak 1998; Huckfeldt, Sprague, and Levine 2000b) and the mass media (e.g., Iyengar and Kinder 1987; Just et al. 1996; Dalton, Beck, and Huckfeldt 1998a). Some studies (e.g., Patterson 1980; Mutz and Martin 2001) even have analyzed social intermediaries in combination. Our study goes beyond recent research through its comprehensiveness and its depth in the coverage of multiple key intermediaries. Its national scope demonstrates the role of social context in contemporary times, fulfilling the research agenda initiated by the early Columbia studies.

Both political intermediaries and citizens have changed markedly since the 1940s. Television is now the principal mass medium for modern campaigns, displacing radio and newspapers, which were the twin foci of the Columbia studies. The competitive local newspaper markets of yesteryear have been replaced by newspaper monopolies in most locales and fewer partisan papers overall. Labor unions are not as strong as they were in that earlier era, but churches seem to be more involved in politics than they were then. With the increased presence of women in the workforce, more Americans now are likely to be exposed to political discussions outside of the family and intimate friends. Americans also seem to be less anchored by political party loyalties (Wattenberg 1998; but see Bartels 2000), less involved in organizational and political life (Putnam 2000), and less exposed to grass-roots party contacts (Gerber and Green 2000) than they were a half-century ago.

These and myriad other changes make it questionable that inferences about the relative influence of social intermediaries on voting behavior, founded upon studies conducted more than half a century ago in two communities, remain accurate today. In particular, the principal Columbia studies finding that interpersonal communications were more important than the media may well have been rendered obsolete by the rise of television and the decline of other intermediaries. As Austin Ranney (1983, 181) has observed,

... The advent of television is the most profound change that has occurred in all advanced industrial societies, including American, since the end of World War II. There is no going back to the old days when most people got their political cognitive maps mainly from newspapers and magazines and from conversations with their families and friends.

&lt;sup>1</sup> This study of the 1992 presidential election in the United States was part of the five-nation Cross-National Election Project (CNEP). The CNEP employed the same intermediation framework and study design to examine the social intermediation process in the first national election of the 1990s in Britain, East and West Germany, Japan, and Spain as well as the United States.

The empirical evidence on which such a claim is based, however, is thin. A systematic examination of the influence of political intermediaries on citizen decision making is long overdue.

CONCEPTUALIZING POLITICAL COMMUNICATIONS IN ELECTION CAMPAIGNS

The first step in our research determines the content of the messages from various intermediaries during the 1992 campaign. Following John Zaller's (1992) theory of political communication, we submit that the most important characteristic of these messages is which candidate, if any, they favor. That is, what is the partisan "bias" of the communication?<sup>2</sup> Zaller distinguishes "one-message" from "two-message" political communications, with one-message models leading to consensus in public opinion and two-message models fostering dissensus and debate. Two (or multi-) message models naturally fit a competitive election setting, as each side makes its best case to the public. This does not mean, however, that the typical voter is necessarily exposed to competing messages about the candidates. Individual intermediaries may carry messages favorable to a single candidate or to no candidate at all, instead of favoring multiple candidates. Collectively, a voter's social intermediaries may convey reinforcing, competing, or no political messages. A study of the influence of social intermediaries on the vote decisions, therefore, must begin by assessing the partisan bias of their messages, both individually and collectively.

Evaluating the bias of political communications across a range of intermediaries is a challenging enterprise. Because of selective exposure and selective perception, the message sent is not necessarily the message received (Eagly and Chaiken 1993). First, the receiver has to be exposed to the intermediary and its messages. Voters can control exposure to political messages to some degree. They can, for example, refrain from reading the local paper or its political coverage, and they can avoid discussing politics with a relative or neighbor. Yet selective exposure is not always easy to accomplish. Receiving an intermediary's political message may be an inadvertent by-product of exposure for other purposes. It is difficult, for instance, to ignore the local paper and its political stories or to avoid personal discussions that turn to political topics. Second, people can selectively perceive the messages that are sent. Consciously or unconsciously, disagreeable political messages can be tuned out or interpreted in ways that render them compatible with one's own views.

These considerations raise the issue of whether political bias should be measured at the source or at the receiver. On the one hand, measurement of the message should be done at its source because it is difficult to maintain that a message is influential if it is transformed upon its receipt. Except where there is an actual record (e.g., for newspapers and television), however, it is hard to know what signal was sent, and an individual's perceptions of the signal may not be reliable. Even where the exact message can be reproduced, moreover, we cannot know the receiver's degree of exposure to it. On the other hand, what matters is the message received rather than the message sent, so it may be better to know the partisan bias of the message as perceived by its recipients (Mutz and Martin 2001). Given the various ways in which messages can be mis- or selectively perceived, however, relying solely upon the receiver also can be problematic (Niemi 1974).

To understand better the influence of intermediaries, therefore, it is important to know the partisan nature of the messages emanating from various intermediaries as well as the voter's perception of them. The simultaneous assessment of these multiple factors enables us to see the information flows that provide the social and political context for vote choice.

DATA SOURCES

Our study of voters in context is based on an innovative sampling design that included five interconnected data collections. The full details of the design are described in Appendix A, but a brief summary will help to orient the reader. First, at the core of our analysis is a nationally representative telephone survey of the American electorate (N = 1318). An innovation was to cluster this sample in 39 counties, selected by stratified sampling to represent the American population. Second, we generated a "snowball" sample of discussants mentioned by the respondents in our main survey, which enables us to study personal discussion networks directly. Third, for each of these counties we coded news reports and editorials in the major daily newspaper read by county residents for a sample of days during the election campaign. Fourth, we conducted content analyses of the national network news programs during the same period. Fifth, in each county we surveyed county party and presidential organizations on their activities during the campaign. These data collections create the unique ability to examine voting choice in the context of the political intermediaries that surround the citizen.

THE PARTISAN BIASES OF POLITICAL INTERMEDIARIES IN THE 1992 ELECTION

This study thus estimates the partisan bias of communications from political intermediaries by relying, in most instances, on reports from both sources and recipients. Figure 1 displays the distributions of partisan bias regarding the two major-party candidates<sup>3</sup> in 1992 for each intermediary and, except for secondary organizations, from both perspectives. The first column in each panel contains respondents who reported that they were not exposed to a particular intermediary. The remaining columns show respondents in various conditions of bias toward Bush and Clinton, employing reasonable rules for categorizing what in many cases were continuous variables.<sup>4</sup> (The coding of variables is fully described in Appendix B.)

&lt;sup>2</sup> By bias, we mean which party or candidate is directly favored by messages from a particular intermediary. This bias can be direct, as in Zaller's (1992) conceptualization, or it can be indirect through agenda setting, priming, and framing. Both direct and indirect biases are important, but our study focuses only on direct bias.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Perot voters are not the focus of this paper, but they are included in Fig. 1 and in the base of the Democratic and Republican vote columns in Table 1.

Interpersonal Discussion Networks

Interpersonal discussion networks have been shown in previous research to be important influences on political behavior (e.g., Huckfeldt and Sprague 1995; Huckfeldt et al. 1998, 2000b). People with whom we have close relationships, especially relatives, typically dominate these networks; but they also may contain regular contacts, such as co-workers (Mutz and Mondak 1998), who are not intimates. Discussants with whom ties of intimacy are weakest play an especially important role in discussion networks. Most likely to come from different backgrounds and thereby to have dissimilar political views, they become agents of change or deviation in one's political orientations (Granovetter 1973).

In constructing discussion networks, therefore, it is important to look beyond the most intimate discussants. For this reason, our respondents were asked to report which candidate each of up to five discussants supported in the 1992 presidential election. The first four were to be discussants "with whom they discussed important matters;" and the fifth-named discussant was prompted to be an explicitly political discussant who was not already mentioned. Sixty percent of the sample added the fifth discussant, and only a slight majority of them were relatives. The partisan biases reflected in both perceptions of discussants and actual discussants' voting preferences are reported in the top panel in Fig. 1.<sup>5</sup>

Whether measured by main respondent perceptions or discussant self reports, a substantial majority of Americans found themselves in either pro-Clinton or pro-Bush discussion networks, with Clinton enjoying an advantage comparable to his edge over Bush in the popular vote.<sup>6</sup> These networks met the conditions of Zaller's (1992) one-message model, suggesting a surprising amount of embeddedness in partisan personal networks in this allegedly antipartisan age. It is noteworthy that networks remained so overwhelmingly partisan through five possible perceived discussants. No other intermediary was as one-sided in its candidate favoritism in 1992 as interpersonal discussant networks.

While more respondents were in discussion networks favorable to Clinton, a quarter of them were embedded in a homogeneously pro-Bush discussion network. These patterns show how discussion networks may insulate minorities from the prevailing climate of opinion (Finifter 1974; Huckfeldt et al. 1995). In a year when little seemed to be going their way, many Bush partisans found refuge in a protective environment of similarly minded discussants, who may have provided valuable support in resisting powerful forces arrayed against the Bush candidacy. Finally, about 30% of Americans in 1992 were not located in a discussion context noticeably favorable to a single candidate. This is a substantial share of the electorate to lack partisan anchoring through personal networks-more than found in the early Columbia studies (Berelson, Lazarsfeld, and McPhee 1954, 104-6).

The Mass Media

Although the media, especially television, are seen as the most important political intermediaries in contemporary America, there is little agreement regarding the partisan tone of their messages. Some analysts view the media as biased in favor of Democrats and liberals (Lichter, Rothman, and Lichter 1986), and this appears to be an article of faith among conservatives. Others conclude that the media pursue a probusiness and consequently a more mainstream agenda (Bennett 1996) or that the direction of partisan bias varies across outlets in line with their different ideological persuasions (Page 1996). Some of the most systematic studies of media content, in contrast, find little evidence of blatant partisanship in the contemporary media (Hofstetter 1976; Robinson and Sheehan 1983).<sup>7</sup>

To be sure, media partisanship was manifested in earlier times when the partisan press was little more than a propagandist for its favored party. That overtly partisan style seems to have given way in modern times to a media more concerned with expanding audience than political proselytizing and a press corps protective of its independence from any particular party or politician (Rubin 1981).

&lt;sup>4</sup> For presentation purposes, Fig. 1 breaks the mostly continuous bias variables used in Tables 1 and 2 into several discrete categories. In some cases, the categories are straightforward. In others, especially for media content and party activities, where there were no natural breaks, we had to establish our own cutting points (as described in Appendix B) to represent essential differences in intermediary bias. <sup>5</sup> The difference between actual and perceived discussant presidential preferences is modest, making reliance upon preferences less vulnerable to distortion than might be supposed. The correlations (r's) between voters' perceptions of their discussants' vote preferences among Bush, Clinton, and Perot (located in the center) and the discussants' own reports ranged from 0.70 to 0.78 across the five discussants. (Potential problems of multicollinearity are avoided, though, when we combine discussants to create our network measures.)

&lt;sup>6</sup> None of this is meant to suggest that the pervasive partisan biases within networks shield individuals from the frequent experience of political disagreement (see Huckfeldt et al. 1998, 1003–5). Based on respondent perceptions, approximately 70% of both Bush and Clinton voters were located in networks where 50% or more of their discussants shared the same vote preference. At the same time,

less than a majority of Bush and Clinton voters reported that all of their discussants shared the same vote preference. Hence, the modal condition among these respondents is to be located in networks that convey a clear but less than unanimous partisan bias. (See Huckfeldt, Johnson, and Sprague 2002.)

&lt;sup>7</sup> Rather than search for explicitly partisan favoritism, the most influential studies of the media have pursued more subtle and indirect effects (e.g., Iyengar and Kinder 1987; Iyengar 1991). Researchers also find that media coverage of campaigns adopts a critical posture toward politics, parties, and politicians; focuses on the "horse race" and strategy rather than substance; concentrates on action and controversy; and elevates news bites over in-depth coverage (Ranney 1983; Robinson and Sheehan 1983; Patterson 1993). These tendencies have profound political consequences, but they are only indirectly partisan and are ignored in our study.

The middle panel in Fig. 1 reports the distributions of media bias in the 1992 presidential election. It contains survey respondents' perceptions of which candidate was favored by the principal newspaper they read and by the television network newscast they watched the most. It also reports the results of content analyses of the partisan leanings of newspaper stories, editorial page articles, and television network evening news to which the respondents were presumably exposed during the campaign.

At first glance, these data support the view of the media as a partisan actor in presidential elections. In terms of actual content, three-quarters of all Americans in 1992 read newspapers that on average favored one of the major-party candidates in their news reports and editorials, and over 40% watched television news programs that showed similar partisan bias. Most of these media favored Bill Clinton. Even many traditionally pro-GOP newspapers did not favor Bush in either their reporting or their editorial pages. In view of the pro-Republican advantage in newspaper presidential endorsements in every year since 1944 except 1964 (Stanley and Niemi 1998, 188-9), it is surprising that so many papers favored Clinton in editorial content and endorsements in 1992.8 We surmise that this media favorability toward Clinton is less attributable to any inherent anti-Republican bias than to the media joining the bandwagon of public opinion, horse-race results, and recognition of a failing Bush campaign.

This first glance at the actual content of media messages, though, proves to be highly misleading in two important ways (Dalton, Beck, and Huckfeldt 1998a). First, where there was partisan favoritism in news reports and editorials, it was demonstrably small in most cases. A majority of those exposed to television received messages that were close to evenly balanced; similarly, biases in newspaper coverage were often slight. Averaged across their total content, none of the four television networks and only 3 of the 46 newspapers we coded were more than slightly critical of one candidate and more than slightly positive toward his major opponent. Consequently, even most respondents exposed to what we label as biased media coverage received information giving the candidate what we characterize as an "edge" rather than the "dominance" the one-message model requires.9

<sup>8</sup> Stanley and Niemi (1998), citing data from Editor and Publisher (October 24, 1992, p. 9) that weighted newspapers by their circulation, report that 27% of editorials in 1992 favored Clinton, 18% favored Bush, and 55% were uncommitted. Our measure includes these editorials as well as op-ed columns.

&lt;sup>9</sup> At least 74% of the individual news stories and editorials on the major party candidates in 1992 were coded as balanced (4) or in its adjacent categories of either slightly critical or slightly positive (3 or 5) on a 7-point scale. The percentages in these categories for each media source coded were as follows.

		Television stories		Newspaper stories		Newspaper editorials
	Bush	Clinton	Bush	Clinton	Bush	Clinton
Balanced	33%	41%	33%	35%	35%	31%
Slightly unbalanced	47%	34%	43%	40%	40%	43%

Second, even where they showed net candidate favoritism, most newspapers and all television newscasts presented both favorable and unfavorable stories on each candidate during the campaign. Eleven of the 46 newspapers had only unfavorable editorials on one of the candidates, but only the pro-Clinton New York Daily News combined them with no unfavorable editorials on the other. Overall, even when the average bias ended up in the imbalanced category, this location was typically leavened by contrasting stories, either favorable to the other side or unfavorable to the apparently "favored" candidate. 10 Excluding the media outlets labeled as balanced, all but a handful of the remaining media disseminated mixed partisan messages over the course of the 1992 campaign, making them in Zaller's (1992) terminology "two-message" sources. This picture of a largely balanced, rather than biased, media squares with our respondents' perceptions of their newspapers and television news programs. 11 Over 60% of those watching television newscasts saw them as balanced, and almost 50% of those reading newspapers perceived theirs as balanced.

Our interpretation of the media as a largely unbiased source is further supported by a persistent curiosity in perceptions of the media among those who see it as biased. Previous research has shown that when media reporting of competing sides in a conflict is balanced, partisans often perceive the reporting as biased in favor of the side that they oppose (Vallone, Ross, and Lepper 1985). This so-called "hostile media phenomenon" appears when partisans view balanced coverage as bias against their side, which unquestionably (in their view) deserves highly favorable treatment. Partisans in our data were more likely to perceive their newspaper and television news as biased in favor of the candidate of the other party (Dalton, Beck, and Huckfeldt 1998a). This is almost entirely a function of Republicans who saw their media sources as pro-Clinton. In many cases, of course, their perceptions were accurate, because content analysis showed pro-Clinton coverage in many newspapers and two of the network news shows. Even where the particular newspaper or television news program was either balanced or only slightly imbalanced. however, many Republicans (almost always a plurality of those using that source) saw it as favoring Clinton. Consequently, the operation of the hostile media phenomenon among Republicans in 1992 produced systematic misperceptions of bias where it did not, based on our content analysis, actually exist.

Compared to discussion networks, then, the media were considerably less likely to be sources of partisanbiased information during the 1992 presidential election campaign. They were less partisan overall, and their partisanship was inconsistent across their stories. Our respondents also were somewhat less exposed to the media than to personal discussants. Perhaps the only compensating factor in the potential for media influence on presidential choices in 1992 was the sizable Clinton advantage in media coverage, which was considerably more skewed than the bias in interpersonal networks. Whether that potential was realized is a question for later consideration.

&lt;sup>10</sup> The standard deviations across stories in each specific source averaged 0.99 and 1.06 in newspaper reports, 1.17 and 1.18 in editorials, and 1.02 and 1.07 in television reports, for Bush and Clinton, respectively, on a 7-point scale. In virtually all of the media, these variations were large enough to place at least one-third of all coded stories on the other side of the scale's pure balance midpoint (=4).

&lt;sup>11</sup> Because we did not ask respondents to report the extent of perceived favoritism by their media and include only one source (because few use more than one), all perceived bias is coded as giving the candidate an "edge."

Organizations

Party and secondary organizations often are credited with playing important roles for both turnout and vote choice during an election campaign. Groups serve as reference points in evaluating candidates (Miller, Wlezien, and Hildreth 1991) and are fundamental building blocks of the party coalitions. Formally organized groups also make explicit or implicit endorsements of candidates, which serve as valuable voting guides for their members and followers as well as for their opponents. Moreover, organizations often actively proselytize their members on behalf of candidates for office through normal channels of membership communication and by making personal contacts during the campaign.

The bottom panel in Fig. 1 reports the frequencies of perceived exposure to partisan bias from secondary organizations generally and also for the most politically specialized organizations, the political parties. In addition, Fig. 1 depicts relative party activity levels as reported by the parties operating in the respondent's county of residence.

Political parties are inherently partisan organizations. Mere contact from them in mobilizing voters to get to the polls and to vote for the right candidates necessarily exposes the voter to partisan influence. Such grass-roots party contacts were common in the 1992 election campaign. More than two-fifths of the respondents said that they had been contacted or had received literature in support of a presidential candidate. This contact corroborates earlier evidence of still-vibrant local parties (Gibson et al. 1985), yet it falls well short of the percentage of respondents who were exposed to partisan messages through personal discussion networks or the media. Moreover, over 40% of those perceiving party contacts in 1992 were reached by both parties, suggesting that the organizations may have moved away from the traditional strategy of concentrating their efforts on mobilizing their own supporters (Wielhouwer and Lockerbie 1994). Where voters were exposed to grass-roots contact from only one of the major parties, alternatively, it was somewhat more likely to come from the Democrats.

The picture is different once we turn to party reports of activity. The Democratic and Republican parties each performed some activities in every county, yet one party outperformed the other in all but one county (also see Beck et al. 1997). Over the years, Democrats have been more active than Republicans at the local level (Gibson et al. 1985), and their activity advantage was so substantial in 1992 that the Democrats enjoyed at least a clear edge in about three-quarters of all counties, dominating in close to a majority. Such a lopsided Democratic lead in grass-roots party activity provided another social context advantage for the 1992 Clinton campaign.

Many secondary organizations also actively support candidates for president. Labor unions, veterans' organizations, business associations, and, in recent years, religious groups, especially fundamentalist Christian organizations, are conspicuously active in attempting to mobilize their followers on behalf of presidential candidates (Asher et al. 2001; Leege and Kellstedt 1993). Our survey asked respondents about their membership in up to three organizations, including whether each supported a candidate in the election. The number of specific organizations named was very large, precluding direct measurement of each organization's partisan preferences, so we rely entirely upon perceptions of organizational bias.

The data on organizations tell a story of little organizational bias overall, but it generally favors the Democrats where it does appear. America is a nation of joiners, and 85% of the sample reported membership in at least one organization. The organizations Americans join are overwhelmingly nonpolitical, however; fewer than one-quarter of the respondents claimed that an organization to which they belonged supported one of the presidential candidates. Unions were perceived as most commonly exhibiting a candidate preference, with churches a distant second. In 1992, where there was organizational bias, it favored the Democrats by a two-to-one margin. Whether this represents a change from earlier years cannot be said for sure, but it is reasonable to suppose that, as politically conservative churches have joined unions in making presidential endorsements, a traditional Democratic advantage in organizational partisan activity may have been reduced.

THE BIASES OF INTERMEDIARIES AND THE PRESIDENTIAL VOTE

Our ultimate question is whether partisan biases in voters' information sources influence their vote choices. We believe that social context is important in giving content and meaning to the political issues and attitudinal orientations that are prominent in individual-actor theories of voting behavior. In addition, we have hypothesized that this context has a direct impact on voting choice by providing new information and voting cues to the individual. Thus, if the vote decision really is subject to social influence, then the partisan cues of intermediaries' messages should relate to the vote even after we have taken into account the enduring personal characteristics that normally predict voting behavior. Moreover, we can assess which intermediaries carried the greatest weight in the 1992 election.

We included several personal characteristics as baseline variables in our social calculus model. The most important is long-term party preference, which anchors the social-psychological perspective on voting behavior (Campbell et al. 1960). The rational-choice perspective offers a second predisposition that is presumed to guide voting choices—the voters' political ideology. Although a role for highly developed ideologies is limited (Converse 1964), voters' self locations along a liberal-to-conservative continuum seem to be increasingly relevant for voting behavior (Miller and Shanks 1996, 289–94). Standard demographic characteristics also are causally antecedent to the vote decision and have been theoretically and empirically linked to the presidential vote in previous studies (Abramson, Aldrich, and Rohde 1998). We include race, education, income, religion (both denominational affiliation and evangelical Christian identification), and gender as additional baseline controls in our model.

Such important short-term components of the vote decision as evaluations of candidates, issues, and retrospective evaluations of party performance are excluded from our model on theoretical grounds. They typically are endogenous to the election campaign and are influenced by intermediaries and long-term baseline variables rather than influencing them. Moreover, the ideological liberal/conservative scale already represents broad and enduring issue orientations to some extent. Taking these considerations into account, our analysis gauges whether the partisan cues of intermediaries add explanatory power to a "baseline" model built around long-term forces in voting behavior.

Our social calculus model also includes the Clinton percentage of the major-party vote in each respondent's county. The political tendencies of geographical units such as a neighborhood or a county are staples of contextual analysis (Berelson, Lazarsfeld, and McPhee 1954; Huckfeldt et al. 1998). In a properly specified intermediation model, which includes the various carriers of this contextual influence, the effects of the aggregate contextual variable should be reduced to insignificance. The county presidential vote variable, therefore, performs a different function from the preceding "control" variables. Because our model includes many of the primary ingredients of the county context (i.e., the partisan biases of discussants, local newspapers, local party activities, and local organizations), we expect the county presidential vote variable to lack statistical significance in the full model.

Estimating the Impact of Social Context in Voting

Table 1 presents logit equations for the various intermediaries and control variables in predicting the Clinton vote, the Bush vote, and the Clinton share of the two-party vote. The first column under each "vote" heading contains the logit coefficients and measures of fit; the second columns provide estimates of the impact of each variable across its range when other predictor variables are set at their mean values. <sup>12</sup> All voters, including Perot voters, are contained in the base category of the first two equations (columns 2–5). The final equation (columns 6 and 7) is restricted to Bush and Clinton voters only.

The results show a substantial relationship between the partisan cues provided by a number of intermediaries and the presidential vote in 1992, even after standard personal characteristics are considered. Our results also demonstrate that party identification and ideology, key explanatory variables in the social-psychological and rational-choice perspectives, respectively, and a few other fixed personal characteristics remain important even after taking the social context into account. Party identification, as expected, emerges as by far the most powerful predictor of the vote in each equation. Clearly, social considerations take their place alongside, rather than displace, personal considerations in voting.

Personal Discussants. Both actual and perceived presidential preferences of personal discussants are significantly related to the Democratic vote, the Republican vote, and the two-party vote. In each case, the candidate favored by the discussion network is advantaged. Of the two measures, perceived discussant preferences consistently turn out to be more important than actual discussant preferences, but each adds significantly to the account. It is theoretically understandable that both the message sent and the message received are consequential for voting choices. Given the potential for slippage between the original message and how it is received (Huckfeldt et al. 1998), moreover, it seems entirely reasonable that perceptions have a stronger relationship to the vote. Because four of five discussants were identified as people with whom "important matters" are discussed, not necessarily politics, the likelihood that respondents initially chose discussants to support their political views is minimized. This makes the relationships all the more impressive and signals an importance for personal discussants in the social calculus of voting that many analysts thought had eroded by the 1990s.

Newspapers and Television. Our research provides suggestive evidence of mass media influence that varies across media sources and measures in theoretically interesting ways. As we have shown in earlier analysis of media effects (Dalton, Beck, and Huckfeldt 1998a), newspaper editorial content is significantly related to each of the vote variables. Neither actual newspaper news content nor voter perceptions of newspaper bias, on the other hand, comes close to having a significant relationship with the vote. These results make theoretical sense. Even though newspapers showed a persistently pro-Clinton bias in 1992, their partisan cues were so slight and inconsistent that many voters could come away with the sense that their paper was unbiasedand they did. However, newspapers still reserve their editorial pages for opinion taking as is reflected in our data.<sup>13</sup> This sharper partisan image of editorials, we surmise, makes possible their stronger, and significant,

&lt;sup>12</sup> First differences are computed using the Tomz et al. (2000) CLARIFY routine.

&lt;sup>13</sup> That editorials provide a sharper partisan image than news reports is demonstrated by a comparison of their standard deviations. Editorial page standard deviations are 0.55 for Bush, 0.55 for Clinton, and 0.82 for the difference between Bush and Clinton. News report standard deviations are 0.28 for Bush, 0.28 for Clinton, and 0.64 for their difference.

TABLE 1. The 1992 Presidential Vote by the Partisan Bias of Social Intermediaries, with Controls

for Personal Factors	Democr	atic Vote	Republi	can Vote	Two-Pa	rty Vote
		First		First		First
	В	Difference	В	Difference	В	Difference
Perceived discussants	1.021	44.9	-1.591	-55.4	1.631	64.4
	(0.189)		(0.218)		(0.258)
Actual discussants	0.475	22.0	–`0.459́*	-16.8	0.886	39.0
Actual discussarits	(0.207)		(0.215)		(0.287)
Perceived paper	0.035	1.8	0.117	4.2	–0.145́	-6.2
Perceived paper	(0.159)	1.0	(0.166)	1.4	(0.222)
A 1 1		16.3		-1.0	0.009	0.2
Actual news	0.223	10.3	-0.031	-1.0	(0.234)	0.2
	(0.168)		(0.177)	047		61.2
Actual editorials	0.338	30.6	-0.289*	24.7	0.699	61.2
	(0.127)		(0.143)		(0.193)
Perceived TV	-0.337	–15.9	0.602	19.9	-0.836	-34.9
	(0.206)		(0.212)		(0.286)
Actual TV	0.062	2.3	`0.315 °	8.5	~ 0.318	-11.1
Actual IV	(0.186)	2.0	(0.206)	0.0	(0.265)
B t d		27.2	0.012	0.9	0.212	17.5
Perceived party contacts	0.295*	27.2		0.9		17.5
	(0.170)		(0.177)		(0.240)	0.0
Actual party activities	0.022	11.3	0.009	3.7	0.004	2.3
	(0.018)		(0.020)		(0.028)
Organizations	0.528	61.0	-0.293	-32.0	0.587*	64.3
o.gaauo	(0.182)		(0.201)		(0.272)
County vote	-0.010	0.0	-0.314	-5.0	`0.392	8.4
County vote	(0.495)	0.0	(0.533)	0.0	(0.672)
Dt ID		-64.1	0.629	62.6	-0.822	-82.2
Party ID	-0.530	-04.1		02.0		-02.2
	(0.055)	100	(0.064)	00.0	(0.083)	00.0
Ideology	-0.093*	-19.3	0.168	26.6	-0.175	-33.9
	(0.051)		(0.057)		(0.073)
Black	1.057*	25.2	-0.599	- 7.9	0.973	17.9
	(0.492)		(0.672)		(0.748)
Education	0.004	0.4	`0.005´	0.0	`0.007	0.1
Education	(0.099)	011	(0.106)	••	(0.143)
lm a a ma a	-0.168	-19.5	0.109	10.2	-0.272 * *	-30.0
Income		-19.5		10.2		-50.0
	(0.070)		(0.077)	0.7	(0.103)	40.4
Catholic	0.574	14.1	0.027	0.7	0.474	10.4
	(0.239)		(0.267)		(0.340)
Evangelical	0.010	0.5	0.234	. 4.6	-0.125	-3.2
. 3	(0.287)		(0.292)		(0.377)
Female	0.209	4.8	0.116	2.1	–̀0.113́	-2.4
1 Onlaid	(0.198)		(0.217)		(0.285)
			, ,		700
Number	892		892	•	738
% Predicted	82.3		85.5		90.1
Pseudo-R <sup>2</sup>	0.615		0.670		0.793
% reduction in error	60.0		62.4		78.8

Note: Columns 1, 3, and 5 present the logit coefficients (and their standard errors) for the probability of voting for Clinton, Bush, and Clinton (two-party vote only), respectively. Columns 2, 4, and 6 present the enhanced probability (in percentage terms) that a change from minimum to maximum value in the particular variable would have on a vote for Clinton or Bush while holding all other independent variables at their sample mean. \* $p \le 0.05$ ; \*\* $p \le 0.01$ ; \*\*\* $p \le 0.001$  (one-tailed tests).

relationship to the vote. In contrast, news page biases, while present in most cases, are too faint to be consequential.

For television, perceptions rather than content are linked to the vote, albeit in a puzzling way. Perceptions of television bias are significantly related to both the Bush vote and the Clinton share of the two-party vote, but in the direction opposite that expected: As pro-Clinton bias increased across network news shows, the vote for Bush grew. We interpret this as a product of the hostile media phenomenon, with partisans tending to see balanced television news and even news slightly favorable to their candidate as favoring the opposition. In 1992, this phenomenon was most prevalent among Republicans. These perceptions of television bias remain after controls for actual news content, while the ones for newspapers do not. Paradoxically, Republicans single out television as a more "hostile" medium than newspapers despite its objectively more balanced coverage of the 1992 presidential campaign. We suspect that Republicans' perceptions of network television news as especially unfriendly to their cause have been many years in the making rather than an immediate product of the 1992 contest.

Party Activity. Given the concentration on media advertising rather than grass-roots activity by modern presidential campaigns, it may seem unsurprising that local party activity had a limited relationship to voting in 1992. The coefficients for perceived contacting and party activity attain significance for only one of six possibilities: the relationship of perceived contacts to the Democratic vote. The sign of this relationship is in the expected direction, with more contact perceived with a party increasing its electoral support. The actual level of party activity in a county relative to its opposition, in contrast, does not exhibit a significant relationship to the vote. This result may be attributable to the lack of residual influence for party activity once its contacting efforts are taken into account. The presence of significant party activity effects in even one case, though, is a tantalizing hint that there may be more payoff from grass-roots activities than presidential campaigns seem to assume, and we will explore the matter further in subsequent analysis.

Secondary Organizations. Membership in an organization that communicates a presidential preference is not common. When it occurs, though, it is significantly related to the Clinton and two-party votes for president, but not to the vote for Bush—an asymmetry that is investigated further below. Because secondary organization memberships are typically set well before the particular election campaign, we can interpret this relationship as evidence of organizational influence rather than vote preferences dictating what organizations to join, even if the latter can happen over the long run.

County Partisan Context. The remaining result of interest is a comforting null finding: County context is not significantly related to the vote in the multivariate model. The bivariate relationships between the Clinton share of the two-party countywide vote and respondents' votes for Clinton (r=0.19), Bush (r=-0.20), and Clinton in the two-party contest (r=0.23) are all significant. When the contextual variable is embedded in a multivariate model including direct agents of that context, however, its coefficients are reduced to insignificance. We have conceptualized discussion networks, secondary organizations, local parties, and newspapers as carriers of the county's social context. Our data support this hypothesis.

Theoretical Reflections. It is perilous to infer influence from relationships in cross-sectional surveys. Therefore, we have taken great pains to use temporally antecedent explanatory variables as much as possible and to measure them beyond the conventional reliance on perceptions. On the basis of our evidence, therefore, we feel that it is justifiable to conclude that the social context of individuals affects the vote choices of the contemporary electorate. The partisan cues of personal discussants, newspaper editorials, and secondary organizations seem most influential in presidential vote choices in 1992. Television and newspaper reporting and party activity, in contrast, appear to have had no direct impact on the vote.

Why might discussants, organizations, and editorials exert such influence? The primary reasons may be the clarity and credibility of their messages (Lupia and McCubbins 1998). Some organizations and newspapers make candidate endorsements or other explicit attempts to influence the presidential vote. Typically sent as one-message communications in Zaller's (1992) terms, these cues are hard to mistake. Personal political communications may be more ambiguous, but their messages are often so repetitive and reinforced in such a variety of ways that our respondents had little difficulty in accurately detecting the presidential preferences of their discussants. Messages from these sources also have an aura of credibility. Secondary organizations' and newspaper editorials' endorsement are reasoned products of a process in which the different presidential candidates have been carefully evaluated. Organizations and newspapers also may be assumed to speak on behalf of the interests of their followers, which enhances their credibility, at least to those audiences. To the degree to which personal discussants come from the same backgrounds as the voter-and they typically do-the potency of their messages is similarly enhanced. Of course, it must not be forgotten that exposure is a necessary ingredient for influence. Personal discussants enjoy the advantage of having close and continuing relationships with the voter. No other intermediary can match the level of attention that discussants' political messages receive.

Why do television and newspaper reports and political parties, in contrast, seem to lack an influence on the vote? What is missing from the news reports, as we have suggested, is a clear partisan bias to their messages. Whatever their lineage, and for newspapers it is highly partisan, most newspapers and television are now "twomessage" communication sources in presidential politics, trying to balance their reporting so as not to unduly favor either candidate. As Fig. 1 shows, their coverage is often balanced, and where it is not, it is so mildly partisan that voters may have difficulty discerning any bias—or misperceive bias against their candidate from even supportive sources. Therefore, despite their nonpartisan credibility and wide (albeit shrinking) audiences, the direct influence of newspaper and television reporting is constrained. This leaves it to the more subtle and indirect processes of agenda setting, priming, and framing to carry the media's effects.<sup>14</sup>

&lt;sup>14</sup> Incorporating these complex processes into a vote model is well beyond the scope of this paper (but see Dalton et al. 1998b). Moreover, newspapers and television hardly are the only media sources of information during election campaigns. Talk radio and television and the Internet (plus even MTV in 1992) have become increasingly important, and news magazines traditionally have been a source of campaign news. We asked our respondents about their exposure to such sources. While many reported relying upon each, the numbers fell far short of those reporting regularly reading newspapers or watching national network news about the campaign, and the specific sources they mentioned were so segmented that they defied systematic analysis. A fully comprehensive study of media effects in contemporary times, though, needs to find ways to take these sources and others into account.

The opposite situation prevails for political parties. Their messages are so clearly partisan that many voters may find them offensive or at least do not treat them as new information that updates their preferences. Consequently, party messages lack the credibility of less partisan sources, which acts as a counterbalance to their clarity. Even though we found an unexpected amount of presidential-campaign party activity at the grass roots in the counties we studied, moreover, only a minority of our respondents perceived direct contact from a political party. Perceived party contacting seems to have declined in recent decades (Wielhouwer and Lockerbie 1994), and the most efficacious of those contacts personal meetings rather than impersonal telephone contacts and literature drops—presumably has fallen off even more (Gerber and Green 2000). Party efforts also may be redundant, consequently adding nothing, when focused on the most committed and informed partisans.

The Special Role of Political Awareness

Americans vary in their awareness of politics, and numerous scholars have found that this variation profoundly affects political reasoning and choice. Yet, as Zaller (1992, 18) has observed, "Most of the time, when scholars attempt to explain public opinion and voting behavior..., they build models that ignore the effects of political awareness." We should not fail to look in our data, therefore, for differences by political awareness.

Although little previous work has addressed the role of political awareness in social influences on the vote, some theoretical expectations do emerge. Zaller's (1992) theory predicts that the influence of messages received from intermediaries will grow as political awareness declines, at least as long as the person is exposed to political messages. While inattentiveness makes reception of political messages less likely, once they are received people with little political information find them difficult to resist. Converse (1964) and Sniderman, Brody, and Tetlock (1991, 164-78) also posit that partisanship and ideology become more important guides for voting behavior as political awareness increases. This leaves less informed voters more open to influence by short-term considerations and other forces including, perhaps, their immediate social context.

We can test these theoretical expectations by reestimating the logit model for voters under contrasting conditions of campaign interest. The number of low-interest respondents is already depleted by the removal of nonvoters, so we combined them with moderate-interest respondents to yield a sufficient number of cases for analysis. While using campaign interest rather than factual information to measure political awareness is not ideal (Zaller 1992, 333–7), it is the best alternative our study offers. The results of this analysis are presented in Table 2 for the two-party vote.

Differentiation by campaign interest yields parallel coefficients for most intermediation variables, but two differences of special theoretical importance emerge. First, though the differences are small and our inferences necessarily tentative, the social context variables have more substantial relationships to the vote for less interested than for more interested respondents. For every intermediary measure except actual discussants, the relationship between the bias of the intermediary and the vote of less interested voters is stronger. Based on these results, one can conclude that the social context is more important for less politicized than for more politicized members of the American electorate.

Second, the largest differences under political interest conditions appear for political parties and organizations. Among less interested voters, the candidate bias of secondary organizations was significantly and positively related to the vote. What was a significant relationship for the Clinton vote in Table 1 proves to be solely the effect of organizational support among lower-interest voters in Table 2. Similarly, the party that enjoyed the advantage in contacting voters and in overall activity countywide won relatively more votes among the politically inattentive, whereas the relationship was insignificant and negative among those who were interested in the campaign. These relationships for perceived party contacts and actual party activities among less interested voters (at p = 0.070 and p = 0.065, respectively) fall just short of significance at the 0.05 level. Suspecting that they may be competing against one another as indicators of local party effort, we held each out of our logit analysis in turn and reestimated the parameters. In each case, the party coefficient attained significance at the 0.04 level for lowerinterest voters—and was far short of being significant for higher interest voters. Party and secondary organization efforts appear to matter, but only for those who are less attentive to politics!

These results signal a persistence into modern times of the important role organizations have been found to play in providing political motivation and direction to less politicized citizens (Rosenstone and Hansen 1993). Politically aware voters may be immersed in so rich a milieu of political information that party and organizational efforts are redundant. Even in an era when political campaigns are waged largely through the airways and restricted attention is given to grass-roots voter contacts, though, there are citizens who still respond to messages from a local party organization. Similar influence from secondary organizations is perhaps less surprising, although its pro-Democratic skew may be. That most voters apparently did not receive or heed party and organization directions, though, may be as much the result of lesser effort, and a consequently shrunken electorate, than of a citizenry that has become more adept at processing political information.

SOCIAL CONTEXT AND VOTING CHOICE

In the mid-20th century, electoral researchers thought of voters in terms of their social characteristics and social context. In subsequent decades, researchers developed a more atomistic model of voting choice in which long-standing partisan loyalties and interests, as well as short-term attitudes and perceptions, were seen to influence voting choices and less emphasis was placed on social forces. Our research has attempted to reposition

TABLE 2. The 1992 Presidential Vote by the Partisan Bias of Social Intermediaries, with Controls for Personal Factors: High Interest vs. Medium/Low Interest

	Hig	h Interest	Medium	/Low Interest
		First Difference	В	First Difference
Perceived discussants	1.640	59.8	2.002	73.9
	(0.367)		(0.439)	, 0.0
Actual discussants	ì.050	41.1	0.611	28.4
	(0.382)		(0.500)	20.4
Perceived paper	-0.015	-0.5	-0.486	-20.9
	(0.273)	0.0	(0.471)	-20.3
Actual news	-0.146	-8.8	0.668	38.3
	(0.320)	5.5	(0.427)	30.3
Actual editorials	0.680	56.3	0.872	64.8
3 3 3 3 3 3 3 3 3 3 3 3 3 3 3 3 3 3 3 3	(0.286)	30.0	(0.327)	04.0
Perceived TV	-0.660*	-23.3	(0.327) -1.497	50.0
1 0/00/100 1 1	(0.376)	-23.3		-59.2
Actual TV	-0.159	4.6	(0.559)	447
Actual IV		-4.6	-0.446	-14.7
Perceived party contacts	(0.367)	0.0	(0.439)
reiceived party contacts	-0.006	-2.0	0.831	57.6
Actual posts activities	(0.280)		(0.562)
Actual party activities	-0.038	-16.7	0.083	39.3
O	(0.036)		(0.055)
Organizations	0.410	42.2	1.136*	79.5
•	(0.362)		(0.540)
County vote	0.872	15.9	-1.586	30.2
	(0.891)		(1.302)
Party ID	-0.920	-83.3	-0.822	-82.7
	(0.116)		(0.150)
Ideology	-0.182*	-30.9	-0.256	-46.2
	(0.090)		(0.163)
Black	1.017	12.5	2.245*	39.9
	(1.102)		(1.214)
Education	0.086	5.2	_0.38 9	-25.8
	(0.189)		(0.272)
Income	_0.291 *	-27.7	-0.242	-26.4
	(0.138)		(0.186)	2011
Catholic	0.503	9.4	-0.506	-11.8
	(0.442)		(0.660)	71.0
Evangelical	-0.339	- 7.9	261	-5.7
3	(0.499)	7.0	(0.660)	-5.7
Female	0.081	2.1	-0.422	-9.8
	(0.396)	2.1	(.499)	-9.0
Number	463		275
% predicted	90.7		89.8
Pseudo-R <sup>2</sup>	0.815		0.802
% reduction in error	78.9		80.0
Note: Columns 1 and 3 present th				01-1 (1

Note: Columns 1 and 3 present the logit coefficients (and their standard errors) for the probability of voting for Clinton (two-party vote only) for high interest and medium/low interest respectively. Columns 3 and 5 present the enhanced probability (in percentage terms) that a change from minimum to maximum value in the particular variable would have on a vote for Clinton while holding all other independent variables at their sample mean.  $p \le 0.05$ ; \*\*\*  $p \le 0.01$ ; \*\*\*  $p \le 0.001$  (one-tailed tests).

this image of the voter as an autonomous decision maker by examining the role of social intermediaries in contemporary presidential voting.

Our major research contributions have been to show that, first, Americans vary considerably in the partisan nature of the political messages to which they are exposed. If voters look for party cues in their environments, they will find no shortage of such cues. The primary sources of these cues are personal networks and groups, not the modern mass media, which has often been ceded greater electoral significance. Second, these partisan cues have a direct influence on voting behavior. To be sure, personal characteristics are key factors in voting: partisanship, ideologies, and fixed personal characteristics play powerful roles in determining the vote. Our evidence indicates, however, that these personal forces are only part of the voting calculus.

Because the intermediaries we have considered serve as the major channels through which information flows in American elections, they are the relevant influences to consider in establishing a social "calculus" of voting. The mass media, of course, have become paramount in modern times as carriers of candidates' messages. In 1992, the partisan bias in newspaper editorial pages seemed to directly affect the vote, but the bias of newspaper and television news reports appeared to be unimportant. The primary reason for this failure of influence, where one might most expect it, we think lies in the subtlety and inconsistency of media biases in straight news reporting. In effect, the media appear to most voters to fit Zaller's (1992) "two-message model"—even in a year when they gave more favorable coverage overall to one of the candidates. Viewed from this perspective, then, the media are promoting deliberation in the electoral process rather than playing the partisan role sometimes ascribed to them.

Organizations and personal discussants serve as more consequential carriers of partisan messages than the media. Although many Americans receive balanced partisan messages from them, for many others organizational and personal messages favor one of the candidates, and our evidence suggests that voters tend to be responsive to this bias. The powerful effect of personal networks is one of the most significant findings of this study. It signals the continuing influence of an important traditional source of political communication and reaffirms in modern times the message of the Columbia studies half a century ago. Secondary organizations and political parties, on the other hand, are less important across the entire electorate because their effects are restricted to the Americans who are least attentive to politics, which confirms a continuing role for mobilization in contemporary society.

While the social forces we have examined do not tell the complete story of voting behavior in presidential elections, they add an important chapter. American voters do not operate in the social vacuum that much of the contemporary voting literature seems to assume. Rather, voters' enduring personal characteristics interact with the messages they are receiving from the established social context in which they operate. This context cannot be ignored in trying to understand voting and electoral outcomes in any election. Moreover, the social context can have a cumulative impact across elections in shifting standing party preferences and ideological positions. Over the long run, then, we expect that consistent messages from intermediaries may contribute to the social learning process, just as new voting preferences can weaken old partisan predispositions (Fiorina 1981).

How the context in 1992 compares with other elections, in the United States and elsewhere, particularly where political cleavages are deeper and social contexts more biased, also needs to be understood in building a general theory of voting that includes both personal and social factors. For right now, it seems reasonable to conclude that the outcome of the 1992 election was rooted, in part, in the pro-Clinton skew of the social intermediation process. The media had given a strong advantage to the Democratic challenger by the campaign's end, not because they are naturally Democratic but rather because they were candidly reporting a faltering presidency and a failing GOP campaign. Secondary organizations and grass-roots party activity too were more supportive of the eventual winner. Given the positions of the other intermediaries, the advantage in personal discussions of Clinton over Bush seems surprisingly modest, but it added to the Democrat's edge nonetheless. Whether the operation of this intermediation process in 1992 was customary or unique, though, necessarily awaits a continuation of research on the social calculus of voting.

Finally, our study affirms, for citizens playing their fundamental role in the democratic political process, that political choices are affected to a significant degree by the flow of information from the decisionmaker's immediate social context. Hence, even within one particular democratic system, the United States in 1992, the analysis of democratic political behavior is inherently comparative—not only across individuals and their personal characteristics, but also among the settings in which these individuals reside (Przeworski and Teune 1970). By identifying these ties between individuals and their environments—by bringing into perspective the social calculus of voter choice—we move closer to a better understanding of citizenship and political choice within, and potentially among, democratic political systems (Huckfeldt, Ikeda, and Pappi 2000a; Ikeda and Huckfeldt 2001).

APPENDIX A

Design of Data Collections

Citizen Survey. Respondents for the survey of citizens (main respondents) were chosen by a stratified cluster sample. Forty counties were drawn with replacement by probabilities proportionate to population size from strata defined by population size, mean educational level, and population change. (Los Angeles County was randomly drawn twice, so it had double the number of interviews.) Within counties. Survey Sampling, Inc., identified sample phone numbers through random-digit-dialing methods. At each residential phone number, we chose respondents by a modified version of the Kish (1949) method. In all, we interviewed 1318 main respondents, an average of 33 per county, from the day after the election through the end of January. The interviews averaged more than an hour in length and were conducted using the CATI facilities of the Center for Survey Research at Indiana University. The response rate for the survey was 48%, calculated as the ratio of completions to the sum of completions, refusals, and partial completions. The resulting sample overestimates voters and educated adults compared to census figures, but the estimated vote percentages are within 1.6% of the official vote.

Discussant Identification and Selection. Each of the 1318 main respondents was asked to identify four people with whom they had "talked with about matters that are important to you" in the last 6 months and a fifth person they had "talked with most about the events of the recent presidential election ... aside from anyone ... already mentioned." We asked these main respondents to specify key personal characteristics and political views of each of the discussants they identified and to provide phone numbers or addresses so that their discussants themselves could be interviewed. We drew a random "snowball" sample of spouse and nonspouse discussants from the named discussants for whom contact information was available. From this pool, we interviewed 271 spouses and 841 nonspouse discussion partners. These interviews were conducted by the Center for Survey Research at Indiana University and the Polimetrics Laboratory of the Department of Political Science at Ohio State University.

Newspaper Content Analysis. We performed a content analysis of the largest circulation newspaper in each county (and a second newspaper in a few counties). The first step was to identify all campaign stories in the first half of the news section, the editorial and op-ed pages, and any special election coverage section. We selected articles on every third day plus Sundays from Labor Day through election day, coding a total of 6537 articles in 46 newspapers. See Appendix B for specific coding instructions.

Television Content Analysis. This study relies upon Holli Semetko's (1995) content analysis of coverage of the presidential campaign and its candidates by the ABC, CBS, CNN, and NBC evening news using the same coding scheme as for the newspapers. Nightly news coverage was coded for every third day (plus Sundays) between Labor Day and election day on the same schedule as the newspapers. See Appendix B for specific coding instructions.

County Party and Campaign Chairs Surveys. We gathered information through mail questionnaires and telephone interviews from the county party chairs and the local leaders of the presidential campaign organizations for the Democrats in all 39 counties and for the Republicans in 38 of the 39 counties, for a response rate of 99.5%. For the county party organizations, our questions focused solely on activities conducted on behalf of the presidential campaign or the generic party campaign, as permitted under Federal Election Commission guidelines. For the local presidential campaign organizations, we asked about all activities.

Organizational Membership Reports. We asked respondents in the citizen survey if they belonged to each of 14 types of organizations. Respondents were then asked to name the three specific organizations from their memberships that were most important to them, and questions (see Appendix B) were asked about the candidate favored by each.

APPENDIX B

Coding of Variables

Perceived Discussant Bias. The percentage of up to five named discussants perceived to support Clinton minus the percentage supporting Bush, with those having no major-party discussants coded as 0 and refusals eliminated as missing data. Fig. 1 combines the resulting scores as follows: 100 = Clinton dominant, 1 to 99 = Clinton edge, -1 to -99 = Bush edge, -100 = Bush dominant, and 0 = no net bias (or balanced). For Fig. 1, respondents without discussants were coded as "no exposure," and those with no discussants supporting a major-party candidate were coded as "no net bias."

QUESTION: "Which candidate do you think [discussant name] supported in the presidential election this year?"

Actual Discussant Bias. The percentage of up to four interviewed discussants supporting Clinton minus the percentage supporting Bush, with no discussants and no majorparty discussants coded as 0 and respondents with discussants who were not interviewed eliminated as missing data. (In most cases, because no discussants or only one discussant were interviewed, the scores were -100, 0, or +100.) Support includes votes as well as preferences for nonvoters. Fig. 1 combines the resulting scores as described above for Perceived Discussant Bias.

QUESTIONS: "Would you please tell me which candidate you voted for in the presidential election?" [For nonvoters] "In the presidential election, which one of the candidates did you prefer?"

Actual Newspaper Bias. The net favoritism of the mean bias of news articles in respondent's main newspaper, Clinton minus Bush, with respondents who read no newspaper coded as 0 and those whose newspaper was not content analyzed eliminated as missing data. For Fig. 1, 2.0 or more = Clinton dominant, 0.01 to 1.99 = Clinton edge, -0.01 to -1.99 = Bush edge, -2.0 or less = Bush dominant, and 0 = no net bias. A net advantage of 2.0 or more was required for the "dominant" category because it put the difference in treatment of the major-party candidates beyond the "slightly positive" versus "slightly critical" thresholds, which was necessary for clearcut bias to emerge. Respondents who read no newspapers were coded as "no exposure" in Fig. 1.

CODING INSTRUCTIONS: "Code the overall content of the article that involves Bush, Quayle, or the Bush/Quayle campaign in terms of its favorability or unfavorability to the Bush campaign. Evaluate the article from the perspective of the Bush campaign and assess the content of the article from this perspective. In other words, would the Bush campaign like seeing this article in print? If an article focuses only on Clinton (or other actors), then do not evaluate the Bush/Republican bias. If both candidates/campaigns are mentioned in the same article, then treat these as separate coding judgments; that is, an article might be negative to both candidates, positive to both, or a mix." Parallel instructions were given for the coding of Clinton stories. Each story was scored on a 7-point scale as extremely critical (or negative), critical, slightly critical, balanced, slightly positive, positive, or extremely positive.

Actual Editorial Bias. The net favoritism of the mean bias of editorials and op/ed articles in the respondent's main newspaper, Clinton minus Bush, based on content analysis. The same procedures were followed as for Actual News Bias above, except this variable is based on the editorial content of each newspaper.

Actual Television Bias. The net favoritism of the mean bias of stories on the main television network that the respondent watched for news, Clinton minus Bush, based on content analysis. The same procedures were followed as for Actual News Bias above, except this variable is based on the content of each story on the evening network news.

Perceived Newspaper Bias. The perceived bias of respondent's main newspaper, coded as Clinton = 1, Bush = -1, and no bias or balance between Bush and Clinton = 0. Respondents who said "don't know," perceived another candidate as favored, or read no newspaper are coded as 0; refusals are excluded as missing data. For Fig. 1, because only one newspaper was included, 1 = Clinton edge, -1 = Bush edge, and 0 = no net bias. Perceived bias for nonmajor-party candidates and "don't know" were coded as no net bias (regarding Bush and Clinton), and respondents not reading a newspaper as no exposure.

QUESTIONS: "I'll begin by asking about various ways you might have kept informed about the elections and other political matters during the recent presidential campaign. Please base your responses on what you did in a normal week during the campaign. In a normal week, did you read one or more daily newspapers? What is the name of the daily newspaper you read most often? Which presidential candidate do you think the (name of newspaper) favored during the campaign, or didn't it favor any candidate?"

Perceived Television News Bias. The same procedures were followed as for Perceived Newspaper Bias above, except that this variable is based on perceptions of television network news, and those who watched another evening news program are excluded as missing data.

Actual Party Activities. The number of party activities conducted by the Democratic party and campaign organizations minus the number conducted by the Republicans, with the one county lacking full reports excluded as missing data. Each organization could report up to 14 activities, for a total of 28 for each party. Fig. 1 combines the resulting scores as follows: 6 or more = Clinton dominant, 1 to 5 = Clinton edge, -1to -5 = Bush edge, -6 or less = Bush dominant, and 0 = nonet bias. Because the standard deviation of the original scores was between 5 and 6, we chose to dichotomize pro-Clinton and pro-Bush activity levels at 6 and -6, respectively. The activities for county party chairs were as follows: 1, contacted people to encourage them to register; 2, transported voters to the polls; 3, arranged events where presidential or vicepresidential candidates could meet voters; 4, organized campaign events such as rallies, parades, drive-throughs; 5, mailed literature to potential voters; 6, distributed literature doorto-door to potential voters; 7, telephoned potential voters to encourage them to support party candidates; 8, arranged for billboard advertisements; 9, arranged television advertisements on broadcast stations; 10, arranged television advertisements on cable stations; 11, arranged newspaper ads; 12, arranged radio ads; 13, distributed news releases; 14, arranged for endorsements from local people; 15, distributed yard or window signs; and 16, distributed slate cards or sample ballots for voters to use. In asking local party organization chairs about each activity, we always specified "for the party ticket including the presidential and vice-presidential candidates" or "for the presidential and vice-presidential candidates" to focus their attention solely on activities performed for that race.

Perceived Party Contacts. The number of contacts perceived on behalf of Clinton minus contacts on behalf of Bush, with respondents perceiving only third-party or independent-candidate contacts coded as 0. Fig. 1 combines the resulting scores as follows: 2 or more = Clinton dominant, 1 = Clinton edge, -1 = Bush edge, -2 or less = Bush dominant, and 0 = no net bias (or balanced). Respondents reporting no party contacts were coded as "no exposure."

QUESTIONS: "Now I'd like to ask about any contact you have had with the political parties or candidates during the recent election campaign. Were you contacted either by phone or in person by a political party or candidate...on behalf of a candidate running for president? For which candidates?...Did you receive any materials, such as letters, flyers or brochures,...on behalf of a candidate for president? For which candidate?"

Organizational Influence. The net number of up to three organizations to which respondent belonged that favored a major-party candidate, Clinton minus Bush, with no organizations favoring a candidate coded as 0 and refusals eliminated as missing data. Fig. 1 combines the resulting scores as follows: 2 or more = Clinton dominant, 1 = Clinton edge, -1 = Bush edge, -2 = Bush dominant, and 0 = no net bias, with respondents who belonged to no organizations coded as "no exposure."

QUESTIONS: "I am going to mention various types of groups and organizations that people might belong to. For each type, please tell me whether or not you belong to any organization like it...labor unions? business or professional associations? farmers' associations? women's rights groups?

church groups or religious organizations? environmental groups? public interest groups? fraternal organizations, lodges, or sororities? sports or gun clubs? neighborhood associations? veterans' organizations? civic groups? ethnic, racial, or nationality associations? support groups? any other type of organization I have not mentioned? . . . We have been talking about general types of groups and organizations rather than any one specific group or organization. . . . (Among the organizations you had in mind), please tell me the name of the one specific group or organization that is most important to you? . . . next most important to you? . . . any other specific group or organization that is particularly important to you? . . . I'd like to ask you about each organization you said is important to you. . . . Did (it) support a candidate in the presidential election? Which candidate?"

Presidential Vote. Responses to the question were coded to yield three variables, with nonvoters and refusals eliminated as missing data: Democratic vote—1 if voted for Clinton, 0 if voted for another candidate; Republican vote—1 if voted for Bush, 0 if voted for another candidate; and two-party vote—1 if voted for Clinton, 0 if voted for Bush, with other voters excluded.

QUESTION: "Would you please tell me which candidate you voted for in the presidential election?"

County Vote. The percentage of the vote for Clinton minus percentage of the vote for Bush in respondent's county (source: official vote returns for 1992).

Party Identification. Measured on a 7-point scale with strong Democrat at 7 and strong Republican at 1, "don't know" coded as independent and "other party" and refusals eliminated as missing data.

For comparability with the other nations in the crossnational research project that included our study, a variant of the standard National Election Study party identification question was used: "Some people lean toward a particular political party for a long time, although they may occasionally vote for a different party. Do you generally lean toward a particular party? Which one? [If independent, don't lean, or don't know] If you had to choose, do you think of yourself as closer to the Republican or to the Democratic party? [If named party] Taken altogether, how strongly or weakly do you lean toward the party?

Ideology. Location on a 10-point scale from most liberal (1) to most conservative (10), with (volunteered) "don't think along those lines" (N=12), "don't know" (N=14), "depends" (N=7), or "refused" (N=3) eliminated as missing data.

QUESTION: "Many people use the terms 'liberal' and 'conservative' to recognize different political opinions. I have a scale that runs from 1 to 10, where 1 is the most liberal position and 10 is the most conservative position. Using any number between 1 and 10, where do you place yourself on this scale when you think of your own political views?"

Black. Coded 1 if black, 0 otherwise, with refusals eliminated as missing data.

QUESTION: "Are you white, black, American Indian, Asian, or some other race?"

Education. Highest degree of education received, from grade 4 (=4) through Ph.D./M.D. (=18).

QUESTION: "What is the highest grade of school or level of education you have completed?"

Income. Annual household income on a six-category scale from low to high (<$15K, $15K to <25K, $25K to $35K. >$35K to $50K, >$50K to $75K, >$75K), with "don't know" and refusals eliminated as missing data.

QUESTION: "Considering all sources of income and all salaries, was your household's total income last year, before taxes and other deductions, less than $25,000, or $25,000 or more? [If less] Is it less than $15,000? [If more] Is it more than $35,000? [If yes] Is it more than $50,000? [If yes] Is it more than $75,000?

Catholic. Coded 1 if Catholic, 0 otherwise, with refusals eliminated as missing data.

QUESTION: "Do you currently consider yourself Protestant, Roman Catholic, Jewish, or something else?"

Evangelical. Coded 1 if born-again, 0 otherwise, with refusals eliminated as missing data.

QUESTION: [Asked of all Protestants and Roman Catholics] "Some Christians consider themselves to be "bornagain" because they have had a personal conversion experience. Do you consider yourself to be "born-again"?

Gender. Coded 1 for female, 0 for male.

Interest. Coded high [1] if "very interested," and medium/low [0] if respondent indicated "somewhat interested" or "not very interested," with "don't know" eliminated as missing data.

QUESTION: "Some people don't pay much attention to political campaigns. During this recent election, were you very much interested, somewhat interested, or not much interested in the political campaign?"

REFERENCES

- Abramson, Paul R., John H. Aldrich and David W. Rohde. 1998. Change and Continuity in the 1996 Elections. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly Press.
- Asher, Herbert B., Eric S. Heberlig, Randall B. Ripley and Karen Snyder. 2001. American Labor Unions in the Electoral Arena. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield.
- Bartels, Larry M. 2000. "Partisanship and Voting Behavior, 1952-1996." American Journal of Political Science 44 (January): 35-50.
- Beck, Paul Allen, Russell J. Dalton, Audrey Haynes and Robert Huckfeldt. 1997. "Presidential Campaigning at the Grass Roots." Journal of Politics 59 (November): 1264-75.
- Beck, Paul, Russell J. Dalton and Robert Huckfeldt. 2000. Cross-National Election Studies: United States Study, 1992 [computer file] (Study 6541), 2nd ICPSR version. Columbus: Ohio State University/Irvine: University of California/Bloomington: Indiana University [producers], 1992. Ann Arbor, MI: Inter-university Consortium for Political and Social Research [distributor],
- Bennett, W. Lance. 1996. News: The Politics of Illusion. White Plains, NY: Longman.
- Bennett, W. Lance, and Robert M. Entman. 2001. Mediated Politics: Communication in the Future of Democracy. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Berelson, Bernard R., Paul F. Lazarsfeld and William N. McPhee. 1954. Voting. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Campbell, Angus, Philip E. Converse, Warren E. Miller and Donald E. Stokes. 1960. The American Voter. New York: Wiley.
- Converse, Philip E. 1964. "The Nature of Belief Systems in Mass Publics." In Îdeology and Discontent, ed. David E. Apter. New York: Free Press. pp. 206-61.
- Dalton, Russell J., Paul Allen Beck and Robert Huckfeldt. 1998a. "Partisan Cues and the Media: Information Flows in the 1992 Presidential Campaign." American Political Science Review 92 (March):
- Dalton, Russell J., Paul Allen Beck, Robert Huckfeldt and William Koetzle. 1998b. "A Test of Media-Centered Agenda Setting: News-

- paper Content and Public Interests in a Presidential Election." Political Communication 15 (October-December): 463-81.
- Downs, Anthony. 1957. An Economic Theory of Democracy. New York: Harper & Row.
- Eagly, Alice, and Shelly Chaiken. 1993. The Psychology of Attitudes.
- New York: Harcourt, Brace, Jovanovich.
  Finifter, Ada W. 1974. "The Friendship Group as a Protective Environment for Political Deviants." American Political Science Review 68 (June): 607-25.
- Fiorina, Morris P. 1981. Retrospective Voting in American National Elections. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Gerber, Alan S., and Donald P. Green. 2000. "The Effects of Canvassing, Telephone Calls, and Direct Mail on Voter Turnout: A Field Experiment." American Political Science Review 94 (September): 653-63.
- Gibson, James L., Cornelius P. Cotter, John F. Bibby and Robert J. Huckshorn. 1985. "Whither the Local Parties?" American Journal of Political Science 29 (February): 139-60.
- Granovetter, Mark J. 1973. "The Strength of Weak Ties." American Journal of Sociology 78 (6): 1360-80.
- Hofstetter, C. Richard. 1976. Bias in the News. Columbus: Ohio State University Press.
- Huckfeldt, Robert, and John Sprague. 1995. Citizens, Politics, and Social Communication. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Huckfeldt, Robert, Paul Allen Beck, Russell J. Dalton and Jonathan Levine. 1995. "Political Contexts, Cohesive Social Groups, and the Communication of Public Opinion" American Journal of Political Science 39 (November): 1025-54.
- Huckfeldt, Robert, Paul Allen Beck, Russell J. Dalton, Jeffrey Levine and William Morgan. 1998. "Ambiguity, Distorted Messages, and Nested Environmental Effects on Political Communication." Journal of Politics 60 (November): 996-1030.
- Huckfeldt, Robert, Ken'ichi Ikeda and Franz Urban Pappi. 2000a. "Political Expertise, Interdependent Citizens, and the Value Added Problem in Democratic Politics." Japanese Journal of Political Science 1 (2): 171-95.
- Huckfeldt, Robert, John Sprague and Jeffrey Levine. 2000b. "The Dynamics of Collective Deliberation in the 1996 Election: Campaign Effects on Accessibility, Certainty, and Accuracy." American Political Science Review 94 (September): 641-51.
- Huckfeldt, Robert, Paul E. Johnson and John Sprague. 2002. "Political Environments, Political Dynamics, and the Survival of Disagreement." Journal of Politics 64 (in press).
- Ikeda, Ken'ichi, and Robert Huckfeldt. 2001. "Political Communication and Disagreement among Citizens in Japan and the United States." Political Behavior 23 (March): 23-52.
- Iyengar, Shanto. 1991. Is Anyone Responsible? Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Iyengar, Shanto, and Donald R. Kinder. 1987. News That Matters. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Just, Marion R., Ann Crigler, Dean E. Alger, Timothy E. Cook, Montague Kern, and Darrell M. West. 1996. Crosstalk: Citizens, Candidates, and the Media in a Presidential Campaign. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Kish, Leslie. 1949. "A Procedure for Objective Respondent Selection within the Household." Journal of the American Statistical Association 44 (September): 380-7.
- Lazarsfeld, Paul F., Bernard R. Berelson and Hazel Gaudet. 1944. The Peoples' Choice. New York: Duell, Sloan, and Pearce.
- Leege, David C., and Lyman A. Kellstedt, eds. 1993. Rediscovering the Religious Factor in American Politics. Armouk, NY: M. E. Sharpe. Lichter, S. Robert, Stanley Rothman and Linda S. Lichter. 1986. The - Media Elite. New York: Adler and Adler.
- Lodge, Milton, Marco R. Steenbergen and Shawn Brau. 1995. "The Responsive Voter: Campaign Information and the Dynamics of Candidate Evaluation." American Political Science Review 89 (June): 309-26.
- Lupia, Arthur, and Mathew D. McCubbins. 1998. The Democratic Dilemma: Can Citizens Learn What They Really Need to Know? New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Miller, Arthur H., Christopher Wlezien and Anne Hildreth. 1991. "A Reference Group Theory of Partisans Coalitions." Journal of Politics 53 (November): 1134–49.
- Miller, Warren E., and J. Merrill Shanks. 1996. The New American Voter. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Mutz, Diana C., and Paul S. Martin. 2001. "Facilitating Communication Across Lines of Political Difference: The Role of the Mass Media." American Political Science Review 95 (March): 97-114.

Mutz, Diana C., and Jeffery J. Mondak. 1998. "Democracy at Work: Contributions of the Workplace Toward a Public Sphere." Presented at the Annual Meeting of the Midwest Political Science Association, Chicago.

Niemi, Richard G. 1974. How Family Members Perceive Each Other. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Page, Benjamin I. 1996. Who Deliberates? Mass Media in Modern Democracy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Patterson, Thomas. 1980. The Mass Media Election: How Americans Choose Their President. New York: Praeger.

Patterson, Thomas. 1993. Out of Order. New York: Knopf.

Przeworski, Adam, and Henry Teune. 1970. The Logic of Comparative Social Inquiry. New York: Wiley.

Putnam, Robert D. 2000. Bowling Alone: The Collapse and Revival of American Community. New York: Simon and Schuster.

Ranney, Austin. 1983. Channels of Power. New York: Basic Books.

Robinson, Michael J., and Margaret A. Sheehan. 1983. Over the Wire and on TV: CBS and UPI in Campaign '80. New York: Russell Sage

Rosenstone, Steven J., and John Mark Hansen. 1993. Mobilization, Participation, and Democracy in America. New York: Macmillan.

Rubin, Richard L. 1981. Press, Party and Presidency. New York:

Semetko, Holli A. 1995. "Cultures Apart: TV News and Campaigning in Europe and the U.S." Presented at the Annual Meeting of American Political Science Association, Chicago.

Sniderman, Paul M., Richard A. Brody and Philip E. Tetlock. 1991. Reasoning and Choice: Explorations in Political Psychology. New York: Cambridge University Press. Stanley, Harold W., and Richard G. Niemi. 1998. Vital Statistics on American Politics 1997-1998. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly, Inc.

Tomz, Michael, Jason Wittenberg and Gary King. 2000. CLARIFY: Software for Interpreting and Presenting Statistical Results, Version 1.2.2. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, March 3.

Wattenberg, Martin P. 1998. The Decline of American Political Parties, 1952-96. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Wielhouwer, Peter W., and Brad Lockerbie. 1994. "Party Contacting and Political Participation." American Journal of Political Science 38 (February): 211-29.

Vallone, Robert P., Lee Ross and Mark R. Lepper. 1985. "The Hostile Media Phenomenon: Biased Perceptions and Perceptions of Media Bias in Coverage of the Beirut Massacre." Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 49 (3): 577-85.

Zaller, John. 1992. The Nature and Origins of Mass Opinion. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Cues that Matter: How Political Ads Prime Racial Attitudes During Campaigns

NICHOLAS A. VALENTINO, VINCENT L. HUTCHINGS, AND ISMAIL K. WHITE University of Michigan

Recent evidence suggests that elites can capitalize on preexisting linkages between issues and social groups to alter the criteria citizens use to make political decisions. In particular, studies have shown that subtle racial cues in campaign communications may activate racial attitudes, thereby altering the foundations of mass political decision making. However, the precise psychological mechanism by which such attitudes are activated has not been empirically demonstrated, and the range of implicit cues powerful enough to produce this effect is still unknown. In an experiment, we tested whether subtle racial cues embedded in political advertisements prime racial attitudes as predictors of candidate preference by making them more accessible in memory. Results show that a wide range of implicit race cues can prime racial attitudes and that cognitive accessibility mediates the effect. Furthermore, counter-stereotypic cues—especially those implying blacks are deserving of government resources—dampen racial priming, suggesting that the meaning drawn from the visual/narrative pairing in an advertisement, and not simply the presence of black images, triggers the effect.

he public expression of racist attitudes has dramatically declined over the last several decades (Schuman et al. 1997). Racial issues have also been approached rather obliquely in most federal and state election campaigns since 1968 (Mendelberg 2001). Still, there are indications that contemporary mainstream media reinforce negative stereotypes about minorities (Coltrane and Messineo 2000; Entman 1990, 1992; Entman and Rojecki 2000; Gray 1995). For example, crime news coverage often employs racial imagery, reinforcing linkages between blacks and violence (Dixon and Linz 2000; Gilliam and Iyengar 2000; Peffley, Shields, and Williams 1996). Reporting about poverty and social welfare has also become racialized, even though African Americans remain a minority of those in poverty or on government assistance (Gilens 1999; Mendelberg 2001).

The racial "coding" of crime and welfare in the minds of many Americans leads to the possibility that invoking these concepts, even without explicitly referring to race, can activate racial thinking (Gilens 1996, 1998; Jamieson 1992; Mendelberg 1997, 2001; Valentino 1999). Some have argued that elites foster and reinforce Nicholas A. Valentino is Assistant Professor of Communication Studies and faculty associate at the Center for Political Studies, University of Michigan. His mailing address is 4244 Center for Political Studies, Institute for Social Research, 426 Thompson Street, P.O. Box 1248, Ann Arbor, MI 48106-1248 (nvalenti@umich.edu). All correspondence regarding the manuscript should be directed to the first author. Vincent L. Hutchings is Assistant Professor of Political Science and faculty associate at the Center for Political Studies, University of Michigan. Ismail K. White is a graduate student in political science at the University of Michigan.

This research was supported by generous grants from the College of Literature, Sciences, and the Arts, the Office for the Vice President of Research, and the Marsh Center for Journalistic Performance at the University of Michigan. This research would not have been possible without the extraordinary efforts of several research assistants including Tasha Philpot, Dmitri Williams, Lara Rusch, Matthew Beckmann, and Dara Faris. We thank Ted Brader, Martin Gilens, Ben Highton, Don Kinder, Tom Nelson, Wendy Rahn, David Sears, Mike Traugott, and Nick Winter for helpful feedback at various stages of this project. Errors are the authors' alone.

these connections to gain a strategic political advantage. For example, Edsall and Edsall (1991) argue that Ronald Reagan nurtured the linkages among "special interests," "big government," and particular minority groups during the 1980s. The result, they claim, was that Americans perceived unpopular groups such as trade unionists, blacks, Hispanics, feminists, and homosexuals, to be united in making unreasonable demands for rights and resources they did not deserve (p. 203). These requests for "special preferences" were repeatedly juxtaposed against the interests of "ordinary" Americans. According to this argument, opinions about certain policies and programs became linked to attitudes about minority groups, thereby creating a powerful tool for strategic communicators to exploit during campaigns.

Coded language, understood by large segments of the public, affords elites the opportunity and incentive to activate racial thinking without explicitly "playing the race card." Obvious examples are the 1988 "Willie Horton" appeal and its next of kin, the "Turnstile" ad that invoked the same issue (Massachusetts' prison furlough program under Governor Dukakis) without mentioning Horton specifically. The Horton ad paired nonracial narratives with racial imagery to produce an "implicitly" racial message (Jamieson 1992), and news about the ad primed racial attitudes in opinions about various policies (Mendelberg 1997).

Mendelberg (2001) has outlined a theoretical approach for understanding the impact of racialized campaign messages. This argument has four components. First, white Americans are torn between the "norm of equality" and resentment toward blacks for their perceived failure to abide by the American creed of individualism and hard work. Second, racial priming works because certain cues make racial schemas more accessible in memory so that they are automatically employed during subsequent political decision making. Third, becoming aware of the racial content of a message would lead most people to reject it because they would not want to violate the norm of equality. Therefore, fourth, racial appeals are effective only if they are not recognized as such by the audience. Mendelberg argues that "implicit" (i.e., visual but not verbal) cues rather than "explicit" (i.e., visual plus verbal) ones are likely to meet this fourth requirement. Experimental and survey data support her claim that implicitly racial messages can powerfully prime racial attitudes during campaigns.

Underlying Mendelberg's approach is the assumption that racial attitudes are still a potent force in American politics, a claim supported by research linking such attitudes to opposition to racially redistributive policies (e.g., Bobo and Kluegel 1997; Bobo. Kluegel, and Smith 1997; Sears 1988; Kinder and Sanders 1996) and to ideological transformations in general (Carmines and Stimson 1989). But the precise nature and extent of the role of racial attitudes in mass political preferences are still hotly debated (Sears, Sidanius, and Bobo 2000). Some argue that a fundamental change in the politics of race in America has taken place over the last four decades, such that most Americans now evaluate policies and candidates according to their resonance with basic nonracial values such as individualism (Sniderman and Hagen 1985; Sniderman and Piazza 1993), egalitarianism, and the ideal size of government (Hurwitz and Peffley 1998; Sniderman and Carmines 1997). If so, one might predict that standard political appeals involving government spending or taxation activate more global values. and not attitudes about race in particular, even if racial cues are present. Or, finally, exposure to political messages might simply activate existing predispositions. such as party identification, bringing candidate preferences into line with these attachments (Campbell et al. 1960; Finkel 1993).

We find Mendelberg's theoretical approach convincing, and her findings persuasive, but additional conceptual clarity and more precise testing of the fundamental assumptions of the model are necessary to understand fully the nature and extent of racial priming in modern American politics. We explore three related questions here. First, do subtle racial cues in standard political appeals actually prime racial attitudes? Much of the research demonstrating race priming via political advertisements focuses on the issue of crime or welfare spending (Gilens 1999; Jamieson 1992; Mendelberg 1997, 2001), indicating some of the ways racial attitudes can be brought to bear on political judgments. We further explore the race priming effect by testing the impact of racial cues embedded within appeals involving references to wasteful government spending and taxation, not crime or welfare.

Second, which types of cues most powerfully prime racial attitudes? Current research draws a distinction between "implicit" and "explicit" racial messages, with the Horton ad exemplifying the former because the narrator never uttered a noun such as "black" or "race" (Mendelberg 2000). We agree that explicit and implicit racial appeals should have different effects, but also suspect that variation among implicit cues is important. The set of racial cues that one might consider to be "implicit" might vary widely along several dimensions.

Some advertisements make only oblique narrative references to racialized issues, such as crime, welfare, or government spending, without presenting images of blacks or other minorities at all. For example, an advertisement run by Bob Dole's campaign in 1996 criticized Bill Clinton for sponsoring several "wasteful spending proposals" such as "midnight basketball" and "alpine slides in Puerto Rico," but contained no visual images of blacks. Other appeals might emphasize racial or ethnic group comparisons with regard to access to jobs or other resources, with the goal of implying that one group is disadvantaged relative to another. An advertisement sponsored by the California Democratic Party in 1996, for example, highlighted Clinton's efforts to stop illegal immigration. The ad was filled with images of Hispanics coming across the Mexican/American border, while the narrator claimed that these "foreign workers" were stealing jobs from "American workers." When the narrator claimed that Clinton was working to halt the flow of illegal immigrants in order to protect "our jobs and our values." a white family appeared on screen. Finally, advertisements could contain narrative references to these same issues accompanied by racial imagery that simply make one-sided, negative attributions about blacks without comparisons with any other group. Each of these appeals is "implicitly" racial, because none makes direct verbal reference to race. Yet the size of the priming effect they produce might vary considerably because the cues they employ differ in the perceptual salience of race or the type of racial problem invoked. In this paper, we compare three types of implicit racial cues (narrative only, visual race comparisons, and visual onesided negative cues) to determine which produces the largest racial priming effect. We expect more salient. yet still implicit, racial cues to produce larger priming effects, thus the latter two types of cues should be strongest.2

Third, what is the psychological mechanism underlying racial priming? Previous work has assumed that cognitive accessibility moderates media-based priming effects (e.g., Iyengar and Kinder 1987; Kinder and Sanders 1996; Mendelberg 2001; Price and Tewksbury 1997; Valentino 1999). In other words, ideas and considerations that have been activated recently or often, those at the "top-of-the-head," are more likely to be used automatically in subsequent decision-making tasks (Taylor and Fiske 1978). No study to date, however, has demonstrated that news or political advertising primes concepts in memory via this automatic process.3 In fact, recent evidence suggests a much more intentioned psychological mediator: inferences about the importance of a given criterion for the decision at hand (Miller and Krosnick 2000; Nelson, &lt;sup>1</sup> With this type of appeal, one could presume that it was racialized only by observing its effects.

&lt;sup>2</sup> For reasons we delineate below, we do not make a directional prediction with regard to whether group comparisons or one-sided negative depictions of blacks will produce the largest effects negative depictions of blacks will produce the largest effects.

<sup>3</sup> Fazio and Williams (1986) show that more accessible attitudes have a larger impact on preferences for the 1984 presidential candidates, but they do not manipulate the accessibility of these attitudes.

Clawson, and Oxley 1997). We argue, however, that racial priming must be mediated by the cognitive accessibility of racial attitudes in memory. The reason is that people are motivated to suppress the outward expression of racist attitudes and behaviors (Gaertner and Dovidio 1986). When people pay close attention to a racial message, they are better able to identify and suppress priming effects (Blair and Banaji 1996). For most people, the theory goes, negative racial attitudes affect political thinking automatically or not at all.

Additional evidence about the psychological mechanism underlying race priming can be gathered by examining whether the effect is always triggered by images of blacks or if it depends upon whether the ad resonates with negative stereotypes in particular. It has been suggested that exposure to stereotype-discrepant information boosts attention to the stimulus, so that the information can be explained and either incorporated into the existing cognitive structure or rejected entirely (Brewer, Dull, and Lui 1981; Hastie 1981). If racial priming takes place automatically, the added thought stimulated by a stereotype-inconsistent cue might reduce priming (Mendelberg 2001).4 Therefore, we expect that appeals that violate the stereotype of blacks as undeserving beneficiaries of government spending, or those that challenge the notion that whites deserve those same benefits, will diminish the priming effect.

To summarize, we predict that racial cues embedded in standard political appeals prime racial attitudes during campaigns. This effect should manifest itself as an increase in the impact of racial attitudes on candidate preference. Since racial cues activate primarily racial attitudes, the power of nonracial global values such as egalitarianism and individualism, or predispositions such as party identification, should not be affected as strongly. Second, we attempt to determine which types of implicit cues—those in which the narrative alone invokes racialized issues, those wherein a comparison of racial group access to valued resources is visually presented (with whites apparently disadvantaged), or those that visually imply that blacks are undeservingmost powerfully prime attitudes toward blacks. Third, we investigate whether racial priming is mediated by the cognitive accessibility of racial considerations in memory. We expect racially counter-stereotypical cues to undermine priming, ostensibly by stimulating conscious processing of the racial content of the

Determining the scope of racial priming, and the mechanism by which it occurs, is important for several reasons. First, if such a phenomenon exists, it suggests that racial attitudes continue to exert a powerful influence on American politics and, at least to some extent, this role is dependent on elite communication strategies. Furthermore, it would indicate that racial attitudes can be activated by basic appeals about government spending, not just issues that touch directly on negative stereotypes about blacks (e.g., welfare and crime). In other words, such findings would undermine the current perception among most whites that the power of racism in American politics has largely disappeared (Schuman et al. 1997).

Second, implicit racial priming is inherently manipulative, as it encourages voters to evaluate candidates based on criteria they would likely ignore if they were aware of the intent of the appeal. Finally, implicitly racial messages may heighten social group conflicts not only by propagating negative stereotypes about racial minorities, but by reinforcing their political relevance. If we are ever to resolve the "American dilemma" (Mrydal 1944), therefore, we must understand whether and how elite communication strategies activate racial considerations in contemporary American politics. If implicit racial priming is rare or relatively weak in its effects, then our continued focus on the phenomenon would be at best a waste of intellectual energy. At worst, it might distract us from the damage that obvious and blatant racism produces.

METHODS AND PROCEDURES

Experiments are now widely accepted as a valid method for studying political communication processes and effects such as agenda setting, priming, and framing (e.g., Iyengar and Kinder 1987; Nelson and Kinder, 1996; Nelson, Clawson, and Oxley 1997; Miller and Krosnick 2000; Iyengar 1991; Mendelberg 1997, 2001; Domke, McCoy, and Torres 1999; Valentino 1999). The method's greatest strength is its ability to isolate the causal impact of communication factors on political attitudes and behavior. The direct manipulation of media content, coupled with random assignment of subjects to treatment and control conditions, produces strong inferences about specific elements of a message that alter citizens' decision-making criteria. This methodology is especially useful for studying the psychological processes underlying media effects. We therefore employ an experiment to test our hypotheses about the extent and nature of implicit racial priming.

Several experimental studies of media-based priming rely on undergraduate student samples [(Miller and Krosnick 2000; Mendelberg 1997; Nelson, Clawson, and Oxley 1997); but see Iyengar and Kinder (1987); Iyengar (1991); and Mendelberg (2000) for examples of experiments employing adult samples]. The use of such samples raises concerns about the generalizability of results, since undergraduates usually have limited personal experience with the political process and therefore may be especially vulnerable to persuasive campaign communication. Therefore nonstudent adult subjects are desirable in studying the impact of political advertising on candidate evaluations.

Most racial priming studies focus exclusively on white Americans. One justification for the decision to restrict such analyses to whites is the particular interest in the impact of white racial attitudes on race-relevant policy opinion. The concept of symbolic racism (Kinder and Sears 1981; Sears 1988), in particular, was designed solely with white Americans in mind. Subsequent studies that utilize this concept, or its next-of-kin racial resentment, analyze exclusively nonblack respondents (Kinder and Sanders 1996; Mendelberg 1997, 2001). In keeping with this practice, we too focus on nonblacks. though we do so reluctantly. We believe that the theory of implicit communication applies to blacks as well as whites, though individual differences will certainly moderate the size of the effect (Lau 1988; Devine 1989). Indeed, when we run our analyses with blacks included. our results are essentially identical. We do not, unfortunately, have enough African American respondents to test adequately the theory on different racial groups separately. Ultimately, however, the theory of racial priming must be extended to include and understand the reactions of all audience members.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Mendelberg (2001) also examines the effects of counter-stereotypic images on racial priming. However, she examines only the effects of negative portrayals of whites rather than positive portrayals of African Americans. As described more fully below, we test both

Our study was conducted in a computer lab at the Marsh Center for Journalistic Performance at the University of Michigan, with a total of 346 adult, nonstudent subjects in late June through early July of 2000.<sup>5</sup> Subjects were recruited with flyers in a downtown area, at local businesses, and in university office buildings. Our convenience sample is not perfectly representative of the nation as a whole: it contains too many college-educated respondents (42%) and too few Republicans (19%). The sample does, however, contain reasonable variation along several important demographic and attitudinal dimensions.<sup>6</sup>

Respondents were told they would receive $15 for watching several television advertisements and answering questions about "current events." As subjects entered the lab they were randomly assigned to one of several advertising conditions, which are described below, and then escorted to a computer terminal. To minimize interviewer biases, subjects interacted solely with the computer throughout the interview. Once the subjects completed a demographic questionnaire, the computer instructed them to don a pair of headphones and watch a series of television advertisements. Each subject viewed three advertisements. The control group viewed three common product commercials.<sup>7</sup> Those in the treatment conditions viewed two product ads and a political spot that we constructed. After viewing the ads, subjects immediately performed a lexical task designed to measure the accessibility of racial attitudes in memory. Following this task, respondents answered an extensive posttest questionnaire that included candidate evaluations, issue importance ratings, and racial and political attitudes.<sup>8</sup> Subjects were then debriefed, paid, and dismissed.<sup>9</sup>

THE EXPERIMENTAL MANIPULATION

One limitation of many experimental media effects studies is the absence of realistic stimuli. Producing and manipulating realistic political advertisements is technically challenging and resource intensive. As a result, most priming studies utilize news coverage, which is plentiful and easy to edit, as stimulus material (Gilliam and Iyengar 2000; Iyengar and Kinder 1987; Mendelberg 1997, 2001; Miller and Krosnick 2000; Nelson, Clawson, and Oxley 1997). Since political advertisements and campaign news coverage are likely to differ in terms of the source's perceived credibility and motivation, we decided that it was critical to manipulate particular racial cues embedded in standard political appeals. The only way to achieve this kind of control is to construct the advertisements from the ground up. We first produced a narrative focusing on general government spending, taxes, and funding for health care. We chose George W. Bush as the sponsoring candidate because Republicans are typically viewed as most competent on economic and spending issues (Petrocik 1996). Furthermore, the Republican Party has targeted government spending on "wasteful" programs that benefited particular groups in society (Edsall and Edsall 1991). The narrative plays into these assumptions intentionally.10

A complete description of the experimental treatments used in the first part of the study is presented in Table 1. After invoking Bush's "dedication to an America with strong values," the male narrator contrasts Bush with Democrats who would "spend your tax dollars on wasteful government programs." Bush, the narrator continues, pledges to cut taxes because "you know best how to spend the money you earn." The second half of the narrative focuses on health care, with the claim that Bush will reform an "unfair system"

&lt;sup>5</sup> After excluding black subjects, our sample size drops to 293.

&lt;sup>6</sup> Women also made up about half of our sample, and conservatives represented about 30%. There were no significant differences across cells of the design in the proportions of these sociodemographic and partisan variables. Therefore, differences we observe between conditions can be attributed to the stimuli.

These were Distributed to the stimuli.

&lt;sup>7</sup> These were Duralast Batteries, Staples Office Supplies, and Wallside Windows, in that order. In the treatment conditions, those who viewed the political spot did not see the Staples commercial.

&lt;sup>8</sup> We treat political and racial attitudes as independent variables in our analyses. Technically, then, we should have placed all these items in the pretest. Unfortunately, we would then run the risk of priming respondents to think about race and politics before exposure to the advertisement, thereby confounding the potential effects of the cues we manipulated. We decided, therefore, to place these measures in the posttest. We were concerned that what we describe as "priming" effects (where candidate evaluations are brought into line with attitudes about race) might in fact be "projection" effects (where attitudes about race are brought into line with candidate evaluations). Given that racial attitudes and other political predispositions are acquired at an early age and stable throughout the life span, we felt that this was unlikely. This is also the standard procedure in many priming studies (Iyengar and Kinder 1987; Mendelberg 1997; 2001; Valentino 1999). Mean levels of racial and political predispositions did not change substantially as a function of exposure.

&lt;sup>9</sup> Since we expose subjects to fictitious ads sponsored by an actual candidate, we provided an extensive debriefing interview to ensure that no one left with the mistaken impression that the advertisement they saw was authentic.

We do not assume that only George W. Bush or only Republican candidates in general are capable of or motivated to prime racial attitudes. Either party may have incentives, depending on the circumstances, to activate racial or other group dimensions.

Narrative	Neutral Visuals	Race Comparison	Undeserving Blacks
George W. Bush, dedicated to building an America with strong values	George Bush in crowd shaking hands	George Bush in crowd shaking hands	George Bush in crowd shaking hands
Democrats want to spend your tax dollars on wasteful government programs, but George W. Bush will cut taxes because you know best how to spend the money you earn.	Image of Statue of Liberty, Treasury building Bush sitting on couch, residential street (no people)	Black person counting money, black mother and child in office Bush sitting on couch, white person writing check, white person counting money, white teacher	Black person counting money, black mother and child in office Bush sitting on couch, residential street (no people)
Governor Bush cares about families.	Laboratory workers (race unclear) looking into microscopes	White parents walking with child	Residential street (shot continued as above)
He'll reform an unfair system that only provides health care for some, while others go without proper treatment because their employer can't afford it.	Medical files	White nurse assisting black mother, child White mother holding child	White nurse assisting black mother, child Medical files
When he's president, every hard-working American will have affordable, high- quality health care.	X-rays against lit background	Bush talking to white family, Bush talking to white child, Bush kissing white girl	X-rays against lit background that only provides health care for some, while others go without proper treatment because their employer can't afford it." The narrator closes the 30-sec spot with the refrain, "George W. Bush, a fresh start for America."
George W. Bush, a fresh start for America	Bush, arm around wife. Screen reads "George W. Bush" and "A Fresh Start"	Bush, arm around wife. Screen reads "George W. Bush" and "A Fresh Start"	Bush, arm around wife. Screen reads "George W. Bush" and "A Fresh Start"

By itself, the advertisement's narrative carries no obvious racial significance. Only if the language of wasteful government, unfair allocation of government resources, and taxation carries racial connotations for some viewers could this appeal prime attitudes about blacks. In the neutral visuals condition, presented in Table 1, we insert racially neutral visuals such as the Statue of Liberty, the Treasury building, and residential neighborhoods (devoid of people) over this narrative. When health care is invoked, racially ambiguous images of the medical profession appear. 11 The resulting ad contains no visual race cues but delivers the "wasteful government spending" message quite clearly.

racial cues are substituted for some of the neutral symbolism overlaying the basic narrative. In what we call the race comparison condition, an image of a black person counting money is followed by that of a black woman and child in an office setting. At this point, the narrator says, "Democrats want to spend your tax dollars on wasteful government programs." As the narrator notes that Bush supports tax cuts "because you know best how to spend the money you earn," white images appear. Further, as the narrator highlights Bush's intention to "reform an unfair system that only provides health care for some ...," an image of a black mother and child in a hospital bed are on screen. When the narrator refers to other Americans going without proper medical treatment "because their employer can't afford it," a white mother and child appear. The other visuals in the ad remain identical to those in the neutral version. Finally, in what we refer to as the undeserving blacks condition, the white images in the racial comparison cell are removed, so that only black images with negative connotations remain. These three versions of the ad all carry implicit racial cues: the first simply refers to issues that might carry racial significance; the second visually highlights racial comparisons, with the implication that whites are receiving fewer resources than blacks; and the third visually depicts blacks as undeserving.

In the second and third versions of the ad, visual

&lt;sup>11</sup> The individuals shown are wearing full-body lab coats and masks that obscure racial characteristics.

Narrative	Deserving Blacks	Deserving Whites	Undeserving Whites
George W. Bush, dedicated to building an America with strong values	George Bush in crowd shaking hands, black woman with American flag in the background, black veteran smiling	George Bush in crowd shaking hands	George Bush in crowd shaking hands Image of Statue of Liberty
Democrats want to spend your tax dollars on wasteful government	Treasury building	Treasury building	White person counting money, white mother and child in office programs, but George W. Bush will cut taxes because you know best how to spend the money you earn.	Bush sitting on couch, black person laying money on a counter	Bush sitting on couch, white person writing a check, white person counting money	Bush sitting on couch, residential street (no people)
Governor Bush cares about families.	Black family using a computer, black family eating at a restaurant	White teacher, white parents walking with child	Residential street (shot continued as above)
He'll reform an unfair system that only provides health care for some, while others go without proper treatment because their employer can't afford it.	Laboratory workers (race unclear) looking into microscopes Black women holding baby	Laboratory workers (race unclear) looking into microscopes White mother holding child	White mother holding newborn receiving care in hospital Medical files
When he's president, every hard-working American will have affordable, high- quality health care.	Bush shaking hands with black children, black kids sitting in school yard, Bush sitting in classroom reading with black kids	Bush talking to white family, Bush talking to white child, Bush kissing white girl	X-rays against lit background
George W. Bush, a fresh start for America	Bush, arm around wife. Screen reads "George W. Bush" and "A Fresh Start"	Bush, arm around wife. Screen reads "George W. Bush" and "A Fresh Start"	Bush, arm around wife. Screen reads "George V Bush" and "A Fresh Start"

To test the impact of stereotype-inconsistent cues, three additional versions of the ad are constructed by rearranging the timing of the visual race cues. Transcriptions of these versions are detailed in Table 2. First, we attempt to produce positive connotations about blacks by inserting images of blacks at the point when the narrator claims, "You know best how to spend the money you earn." Blacks are also shown when the narrator mentions that Bush "cares about families" and when he states that under Bush "every hardworking American will receive affordable, high-quality health care." We call this condition the deserving blacks condition, it provides a direct, counter-stereotypical comparison to the cell involving blacks as undeserving beneficiaries of government spending. The final two versions of the ad depict whites as either deserving (labeled deserving whites, in column 3) or undeserving (labeled undeserving whites, in column 4) beneficiaries of government spending. These additional cells create a comparison between stereotype consistent versus inconsistent cues that target either whites or blacks.

RESULTS

Our first hypothesis predicts racially coded appeals will boost the explanatory power of racial attitudes on candidate evaluations. To test this, we estimate the impact of racial attitudes on vote choice across the conditions of the design. The dependent variable ranges from 0 to 1, with higher values indicating greater support for Bush relative to Gore. We examine three measures of racial attitudes: racial resentment, laissez-faire racism, and perceived influence of blacks. Though they are composed of different survey items, these indicators are conceptually interrelated. The racial resentment scale is based on the contention that "blacks do not try hard enough to overcome the difficulties they face and that they take what they have not earned" (Kinder and Sanders 1996, 106). The concept of laissez-faire racism springs from the idea that maintenance of racial

&lt;sup>12</sup> See the Appendix for exact question wordings. Cronbach's  $\alpha$  for the racial resentment scale was 0.78.

TABLE 3. Predicting Candidate Preference with Racial Attitudes and Racialized Issue Opinions, by Condition

		Racial Attitudes		Racialized Is	sue Opinions
Dependent Variable Is Candidate Preference (Bush = High)	Racial Resentment	Laissez-Faire Racism	Blacks Have Too Much Influence	Opposition to Affirmative Action	Opposition to Welfare Spending
Attitude or opinion
(see column heading)	0.0 1	-0.30	-0.12	-0.19	-0.09
	(0.19)	(0.20)	(0.17)	(0.16)	(0.19)
Neutral visuals	_0.18	-0.23	-11	-0.23	-0.10
	(0.17)	(0.15)	(0.15)	(0.15)	(0.14)
Race comparison	_0.11 ′	_`0.26 ´	_0.18´	_0.03 °	-0.01
	(0.18)	(0.17)	(0.16)	(0.17)	(0.15)
Undeserving blacks	-0.22	-0.31*	_0.27*	_`0.25 ´	_0.18´
	(0.19)	(0.16)	(0.15)	(0.16)	(0.14)
Attitude or opinion $\times$ neutral visuals	0.41	0.49*	`0.25 °	`0.45*	`0.24 ´
	(0.29)	(0.26)	(0.25)	(0.24)	(0.27)
Attitude or opinion $\times$ race comparison	0.35	0.61*	0.46*	0.18	`0.17 ′
	(0.29)	(0.30)	(0.26)	(0.27)	(0.30)
Attitude or opinion $\times$ undeserving blacks	0.61*	0.77	0.60	0.51*	`0.53 *
	(0.37)	(0.31)	(0.25)	(0.25)	(0.28)
Number of cases	156	156	156	156	156
Adjusted R <sup>2</sup>	0.21	0.22	0.23	0.21	0.20

Note: Entries are ordinary least-squares regression coefficients. The dependent variable is the 5-point candidate preference item, running from strong support for Gore to strong support for Bush. This variable has been recoded to run from 0 to 1. The impact of each attitude scale is estimated separately. Baseline effect corresponds to the main effect of racial attitude/issue opinion in the control condition. Incremental effects are estimated with interactions between treatment dummy variables and the attitude/issue. Controls in each analysis, not shown here, include political ideology, gender, and educational attainment. Sample sizes for each cell were as controls: control = 49; Neutral visuals cell = 43; race comparison cell = 31; undeserving blacks cell = 35. *p < 0.05; **p < 0.01. Predictions are unidirectional; significance tests are one-tailed.

hierarchies no longer requires widespread endorsement of the idea that blacks are genetically inferior to whites (Bobo, Kluegel, and Smith 1997). Instead, it presumes only that all major obstacles facing blacks as a group have been removed. As a result, governmentsponsored efforts to address racial inequality are unnecessary.<sup>13</sup> A third indicator focuses more narrowly on perceived racial conflict: the extent to which blacks have "too much influence in American life and politics." We include results for all three of these indicators in part to check the robustness of the priming effect across measures of similar concepts. However, one might expect that the last two concepts, which tap into competition between whites and blacks for societal resources, should be primed most powerfully by the race comparison cues, while racial resentment may be activated most powerfully by the undeserving blacks condition.

Table 3 displays the results of our first test. Each column represents a separate OLS regression equation where the candidate preference scale is regressed upon a given racial attitude or issue opinion measure (listed in the column head), dummy variables for each treatment condition (with the control group as the excluded category), and interactions between the racial attitude measure and each dummy variable to capture the slope shift associated with exposure to each ad. With this specification, we can compare the baseline

Candidate Preference =  $B_1$ (Racial Attitude)

- $+ B_2$ (Neutral Visuals)
- $+ B_5$ (Neutral Visuals * Racial Attitude)
- $+ B_3$ (Race Comparison)
- $+ B_6$ (Race Comparison * Racial Attitude)
- $+ B_4$ (Undeserving Blacks)
- $+ B_7$ (Undeserving Blacks * Racial Attitude)
- $+ B_{8-10}(Controls) + Constant$

Our hypotheses hinge most directly on the direction and magnitude of coefficients  $B_1$ ,  $B_5$ ,  $B_6$  and  $B_7$ . Tables 3 and 4 present all the coefficients in the model effect of racial attitudes with the impact of those same attitudes in the presence of various primes. To guard against the possibility that differences in the distribution of sociodemographic or political variables across cells of the design might account for differences we observe, controls for global ideology, gender, and education are included. The functional form of the model is as follows:

 $<sup>^{13}</sup>$  See the Appendix for exact question wordings. Cronbach's  $\alpha$  for the laissez-faire racism scale was 0.79.

&lt;sup>14</sup> There are no significant differences in the distributions of these variables across cells, and excluding these controls does not alter the direction or magnitude of the results.

TABLE 4.	The Impact of Partisan Identification and Global Values on Candidate Preference, by Condition	•

Dependent Variable Is Candidate Preference (Bush = High)	Party Identification	Individualism	Egalitarianism
Attitude (see column heading)	0.91	0.20	0.06
	(0.18)	(0.17)	(0.15)
Neutral visuals	0.19	0.03	0.10
	(0.14)	(0.14)	(0.11)
Race comparison	0.25*	0.08	`0.14 ´
	(0.15)	(0.16)	(0.11)
Undeserving blacks	0.05	-0.08	`0.11
	(0.14)	(0.15)	(0.11)
Attitude $\times$ neutral visuals	-0.27	-0.03	_`0.17 ´
	(0.26)	(0.23)	(0.20)
Attitude × race comparison	-0.30	_`0.05 ´	_`0.15 ´
	(0.27)	(0.26)	(0.21)
Attitude × undeserving blacks	-0.02	0.16	_`0.17 ´
·-	(0.25)	(0.25)	(0.20)
Number of cases	156	156	156
Adjusted R <sup>2</sup>	0.32	0.04	0.05

Note: Entries are ordinary least-squares regression coefficients. The dependent variable is the 5-point candidate preference item, running from strong support for Gore to strong support for Bush. This variable has been recoded to run from 0 to 1. The impact of each attitude scale was estimated separately. Baseline effect in first row corresponds to the main effect of racial attitude in the control condition. Incremental effects are estimated with interactions between treatment dummy variables and the attitude/issue opinion listed in the column head. Controls in each analysis include gender and educational attainment. Sample sizes for each cell were as follows: control = 49; neutral visuals cell = 43; race comparison cell = 31; undeserving blacks cell = 35. *p<0.05; **p<0.01. Significance tests are one-tailed.

except for the controls.<sup>15</sup> Our predictions are directional: If racial attitudes are primed, the interactions will be positive.

Entries in the first row in Table 3 are estimates of the baseline effect of each racial attitude/issue measure on the candidate preference scale. The intercept shifts associated with exposure to each advertising condition are located in the second, third, and fourth rows. All of these coefficients, across all attitudinal dimensions, are negative. This means that for those very low in racial resentment or other forms of racial conservatism, seeing any of our ads boosts support for Gore. These main effects make sense intuitively, since subjects these subjects are perhaps prone to vote for Gore to begin with. However, these coefficients are rarely statistically significant. More important for our hypothesis are the slope shifts between the control group and each treatment group, presented in rows 5 through 7. To calculate the overall effect of a given attitude among those exposed to a particular ad, one must combine the baseline effect in the first row with the slope shift represented by the interaction coefficient of interest in that same column.

Reading down the rows in the first column, we see that racial resentment has little effect on support for Bush among those subjects who did not view a political advertisement. The interaction in the fourth row indicates that, among those who saw an ad with neutral visual cues, the impact of racial resentment is boosted.

The resulting association between this racial attitude and preference for Bush over Gore in this condition is  $0.42\,(0.01+0.41)$ . In the fifth row, we see that the priming effect of the race comparison cues is substantively similar to that of the neutral version (0.35). Neither of these slope shifts is statistically significant, but their direction is consistent with the first hypothesis. Finally, in the undeserving blacks condition, the impact of racial resentment reaches its zenith, at  $0.62\,(0.01+0.61)$ . This statistically significant shift indicates a large substantive effect: In the presence of the undeserving blacks cue, moving from the lowest to the highest level of racial resentment produces a shift across more than half of the entire candidate preference scale running from Gore to Bush.

The basic pattern of results is strongly replicated when our attention shifts to other measures of racial attitudes. The impacts of laissez-faire racism and blacks have too much influence are statistically indistinguishable from 0 in the control group but grow large and positive for respondents who see ads containing implicit racial primes. The racial comparison condition strongly primes both of these attitude dimensions. Across all three measures, however, the race priming effect is largest in the undeserving blacks condition.

The last two columns in Table 3 examine whether implicit race cues prime racialized policy opinions as predictors of candidate preference. Opposition to affirmative action is statistically unrelated to candidate preference among those who saw no political advertisement. All three versions of the advertisement, however, produce a positive relationship between these variables, and the difference reaches statistical significance for the neutral visuals and undeserving blacks conditions. The same basic pattern is replicated for opposition to welfare spending for the poor. In other words, the impact of the race comparison cues is somewhat weak as a prime for opinions about these racialized policies, while the undeserving blacks condition produces a large effect.

 $^{\rm 15}$  Results for the full model are available upon request from the first author.

These results confirm our suspicion about the power of subtle racial cues. However, it is possible that some other set of predispositions or values is actually activated by these appeals and that our indicators of racial attitudes simply covary with those other dimensions. Next, therefore, we focus on partisanship and global values such as individualism and egalitarianism. If our ads prime these dimensions, the pattern of relationships between them and candidate preference should be similar to that observed for racial attitudes across the cells of the design. The evidence presented in Table 4, however, suggests that this is not the case. The results for party identification are presented in the first column. In the first row, we see that party identification is a powerful predictor of candidate preference in the baseline condition. Exposure to racial cues, however, does nothing to boost this relationship.<sup>16</sup> In fact, the impact of partisanship declines slightly, though not significantly, in the presence of race cues.

These ads may also activate nonracial values such as individualism and egalitarianism.<sup>17</sup> Indeed, the narrator invokes the size of government, taxation, and fairness in the distribution of health care resources. However, the results in the second and third columns in Table 4 do not provide much support for these alternative hypotheses. Individualism is never very strongly or significantly related to vote preference. The impact of individualism is smaller in the neutral visuals and race comparison visuals cells, and slightly larger in the undeserving blacks condition, but none of these differences approaches statistical significance. The case for egalitarianism is also weak. If the our ads primed that dimension, then egalitarians should be more likely to support Bush after seeing it because he makes a special plea for equal treatment. In fact, the relationship is negative in the control group and is more negative in each of the ad conditions, as the interactions in the fifth through seventh rows suggest. In other words, these cues make egalitarians slightly less likely to support Bush. None of these differences is statistically significant, however, and the overall pattern suggests that nonracial political orientations were not primed at all.18 scale running from strong Democrat to strong Republican.

17 These concepts are measured with standard National Election Study items. For question wording, see the Appendix.

would have produced a large and unwieldy model to present. We therefore tested each of these dimensions separately, assuming that the absence of changes in the bivariate relationship indicates an absence of priming. It is difficult to imagine how these nonracial

THE PSYCHOLOGICAL MEDIATOR OF RACIAL PRIMING: ACCESSIBILITY OR IMPORTANCE?

The results presented thus far suggest that a variety of implicit racial cues, embedded in appeals about nonracial issues, can serve as racial primes, especially those implying that blacks are undeserving recipients of government spending. However, we still know little about the particular psychological process underlying these effects. The theory proposed by Mendelberg (2001) identifies accessibility as the mediator: racial attitudes are made more accessible in memory such that they are automatically employed in subsequent decisions. We tested for accessibility affects in the standard way, using a lexical task identical to the one employed by Nelson, Clawson, and Oxley (1997), who in turn draws on a technique developed by Fazio (1990). Immediately after viewing the ads, subjects were told that they would need to discriminate between words and nonsense letter strings flashed on the computer screen by pressing keys marked on the keyboard. 19 Subjects were asked to perform this task "as quickly and accurately as possible" and were given several trial letter strings for practice. A randomized series of letter strings was then flashed on the screen, one at a time. Five words were intended to be race-relevant, including "black," "white," "lazy," "drug," and "crime." Nonracial filler words ("cars," "yellow," and "blue") were also shown as distractors. Nonsense letter strings included "awor." "clipr," "dryck," "fsapt," "gammr," "poprq," "seltf," and "lramp." The length of time between the appearance of the letter string and the pressing of a key was measured by the computer. The time to respond to the letter string was transformed via natural log to normalize the distribution, and extreme outliers were removed. The basic assumption underlying this task is that respondents will take less time to identify racerelevant words when race has been primed. Previous research has shown this technique to be a valid measure of cognitive accessibility (Fazio 1990).

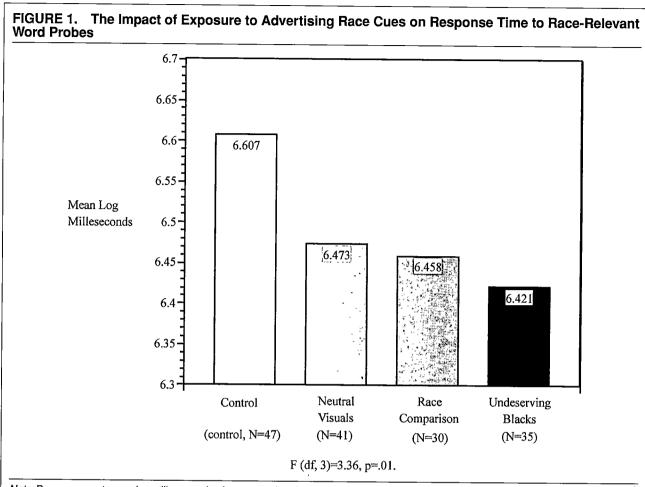

Figure 1 suggests that racial cues increased the accessibility of racial schemas in memory. Compared to the control group, each of the three advertising conditions records faster response times to race relevant words (neutral visuals, t = 2.17, p < 0.05; racial comparison visuals, t = 2.12, p < 0.05; undeserving blacks visuals, t = 3.01, p < 0.01). An analysis of variance reveals the significance of the overall trend (F = 3.36, 3 df, attitudes could be primed in the omnibus model if effects are absent using the bivariate setup.

&lt;sup>16</sup> Party identification is measured in the standard way, drawn directly from the National Election Studies, and collapsed to form a 7-point scale running from strong Democrat to strong Republican.

&lt;sup>18</sup> We could have tested these alternatives with a saturated model containing all condition dummies, each attitude dimension, and interactions between condition dummies and attitudinal measures. This would have produced a large and unwieldy model to present. We therefore tested each of these dimensions separately, assuming that p < 0.01). These results corroborate the previous evidence that racial cues prime viewers' attitudes about blacks, but they also illuminate the psychological mechanism: the accessibility of those attitudes in memory. The narrative alone did much of the work, but adding visual racial cues boosted the accessibility of these attitudes even further. Finally, to control for individual differences in reading speed, the response time to filler words was subtracted from the response time to race-relevant words. The pattern of results across the cells is unchanged for this relative response time measure, with the undeserving blacks and racial comparison conditions producing the fastest scores (F = 2.91, 3 df, p < 0.05).

&lt;sup>19</sup> We choose to measure accessibility immediately after the stimulus for all subjects. Other studies, including those by Nelson et al. (1997) and Miller and Krosnick (2001), do not measure accessibility and importance for every subject, because of the concern that the accessibility task might signal what the experimenters deem important, thereby creating a demand that might affect importance ratings appearing later in the questionnaire. We find this implausible in the current study, because the judgment made (word versus nonsense string) is unrelated to racial attitudes, the advertising stimuli, or politics in general. Still, if such demands exist, this test is a conservative one because they should depress differences between control and treatment groups.

Note: Bars represent mean log milleseconds of response time for race-relevant word probes. Race-relevant word probes included "white," "black," "drug," "lazy," and "crime." The analysis of variance used to estimate the significance of differences between conditions included controls for education, gender, and ideology.

Extending the work of Nelson, Clawson, and Oxley (1997) and Miller and Krosnick (2001), we hypothesize that these ads may alter the level of importance viewers assign to group representation in candidate evaluations. Their results suggest that this difference in importance, and not simply the increased accessibility of racial schemas in memory, could drive the slope shifts displayed in Table 3. We examine this possibility by asking respondents to rate the importance of various criteria in their own voting calculus. One item read, "When you evaluate a candidate for president, how important are the groups in society the candidate cares about?" Racial cues might boost the mean score on this item if the importance of group representation mediates the impact of the appeal. There is some evidence that this occurs. The importance of group concerns is slightly higher in the neutral and racial comparison cells (5.23) and 5.13, respectively, on a 1-7 scale) than in the control (4.82), though neither of these differences reaches statistical significance. However, the mean importance of groups in the undeserving blacks condition is even higher (5.71), and this difference is significant (t = 2.46, p < 0.01). The overall trend, however, falls short of statistical significance (F = 1.44, 3 df, p = 0.23). In sum, the undeserving blacks condition seems to boost the importance of groups as a voting criterion, while the neutral and racial comparison cues do not.

These results suggest that exposure to implicit racial cues, especially the undeserving blacks cues, makes racial attitudes more accessible and makes group concerns more important in the voting calculus. Therefore, we need another test to determine whether accessibility or importance ratings actually mediates the racial priming effect. According to the technique employed by Miller and Krosnick (2000), accessibility will be determined to mediate priming if the interaction between

TABLE 5.	Accessibility Versus Importance as Mediators of Priming Effects of Ads on Candidate
Preference

Dependent Variable Is Candidate Preference	Model
(Bush = High)	Racial Accessibility	Group Importance	Joint Racial resentment	-0.07	0.49	0.24
	(0.17)	(0.39)	(0.41)
Accessibility of race	_`0.23 <sup></sup>	` —	0.23
	(0.12)		(0.12)
Group importance		0.04	`0.04
		(0.04)	(0.04)
Racial resentment × accessibility of race	0.44*	`_ ′	`0.44*
, adda , odd mineria , addada ani, a , raida	(0.22)		(0.22)
Racial resentment × group importance		-0.04	—`0.05 °
The state of the s		(0.07)	(0.07)
Number of cases	153	156	153
Adjusted R <sup>2</sup>	0.23	0.21	0.22

Note: Entries are unstandardized ordinary least-squares regression coefficients. The dependent variable is the 5-point candidate preference item, running from strong support for Gore to strong support for Bush. This variable has been recoded to run from 0 to 1. Controls in these analyses include gender, education, and political ideology. *p < 0.05. Significance tests are one-tailed.

accessibility and racial resentment is positive and statistically significant. In our study, this would mean that racial resentment would be boosted as a predictor of candidate evaluations primarily among those for whom race is accessible in memory. The alternative hypothesis is that citizens employ a more intentioned psychological process when evaluating candidates, such that racial resentment plays a larger role among those who decide that "the groups in society that the candidate cares about" is an important vote criterion. The results of these analyses appear in Table 5.

In the first column in the table, we estimate the effects of accessibility, racial resentment, and the interaction between the two on candidate evaluations.<sup>20</sup> For ease of interpretation, we split the response time difference scores at the median.<sup>21</sup> The coefficient in the second row corresponds to the effect of race accessibility on candidate preference when the racial resentment score is 0. This term is negative, suggesting that among those lowest in racial resentment, making race accessible leads to support for Gore. The interaction term captures the difference in the impact of accessibility as racial resentment grows. This interaction is positive and significant, implying that at higher levels of racial resentment, the accessibility of race boosts support for Bush.<sup>22</sup> The second column tests the alternative hypothesis, that inferences about the importance of group concerns mediates racial priming. If so, racial attitudes should be a better predictor of candidate evaluations among those for whom group concerns are considered important. This does not appear to be the case. The interaction between group importance and racial attitudes is small and in the wrong direction. The third column presents the estimates for the joint model and finds accessibility undiminished as a mediator of racial priming. Overall, these results suggest that racial cues make racial concerns more accessible in memory, subsequently boosting the impact of these concerns on candidate evaluations.<sup>23</sup>

To this point, the analyses focus on stimuli that conform to racial stereotypes. Blacks are depicted as undeserving beneficiaries of, and whites are shown bearing the tax burden for, "wasteful government programs." In the second set of experimental conditions, we compare the power of stereotype consistent versus inconsistent cues as racial primes. Remember from Table 2 that we create a "deserving blacks" condition that implies that blacks are hardworking Americans supporting unidentified "others." Next we replace images of blacks in the undeserving blacks condition with whites, thereby producing an "undeserving whites" condition. Finally, we create a condition that places whites in a positive light, without any images of blacks, as a baseline against which to compare the undeserving whites cell. These additional three cells contain a total of 135 subjects beyond those analyzed above.

The prediction is that stereotype inconsistent cues might lead to more intentioned thought, thereby suppressing racial priming effects. Table 6 replicates the basic analyses from Table 3, with regard to the strength of racial attitudes as predictors of candidate preference when the black stereotype is violated. In the first row we import the previous results from the undeserving blacks condition. Recall that this cell produced powerful race priming effects, as indicated by the positive relationship

&lt;sup>20</sup> The constant and controls for ideology, gender, and education are not presented here.

Results are substantively equivalent and remain statistically significant when the full linear measure is employed.
 Note that this effect is pooled across all the cells of the design. The

&lt;sup>22</sup> Note that this effect is pooled across all the cells of the design. The three-way interaction, accessibility  $\times$  racial attitudes  $\times$  exposure to ad, would test the hypothesis that accessibility would mediate priming differentially, depending on the salience of race in the ad. This is possible, but not predicted by the theory of implicit communication.

&lt;sup>23</sup> We also ran these analyses for the other two racial attitude measures (laissez-faire racism and "blacks have too much influence"). The results are almost-identical in direction and magnitude.

TABLE 6. Violating Negative Black Stereotypes and the Effect of Racial Attitudes on Candidate Preference

Dependent Variable Is Candidate Preference (Bush = High)	Racial Resentment	Laissez-Faire Racism	Blacks Have Too Much Influence
Racial attitude (see column head)	0.67*	0.45	0.46*
	(0.38)	(0.29)	(0.21)
Deserving blacks	`0.35´	`0.35 *	0.02
	(0.22)	(0.18)	(0.17)
Deserving blacks × racial attitude	_`0.80 <sup></sup>	–`0.83 <sup></sup>	-0.09
	(0.43)	(0.35)	(0.28)
N .	79	79	79
Adjusted R <sup>2</sup>	0.11	0.13	0.17

Note: The dependent variable is the 5-point candidate preference item, running from strong support for Gore to strong support for Bush. The impact of each attitude scale on candidate preference is estimated separately. Controls in each analysis, not shown here, include gender, educational attainment, and ideology. Cell sizes are as follows: negative black visuals = 35; positive black visuals = 45. *p < 0.05. Significance tests are one-tailed.

TABLE 7. Violating Positive White Stereotypes and the Effect of Racial Attitudes on Candidate Preference

Dependent Variable Is Candidate Preference (Bush = High)	Racial Resentment	Laissez-Faire Racism	Blacks Have Too Much Influence
Racial attitude (see column head)	0.22	-0.04	0.02
	(0.21)	(0.18)	(0.16)
Undeserving white visuals	_`0.12 ′	_0.14 ′	-0.19
	(0.19)	(0.17)	(0.16)
Undeserving white visuals × racial attitude	`0.22´	`0.27 ′	0.35
	(0.31)	(0.30)	(0.27)
Number of cases	88	88	88
Adjusted R <sup>2</sup>	0.20	0.17	0.19

Note: The dependent variable is the 5-point candidate preference item, running from strong support for Gore to strong support for Bush. The impact of each attitude scale on candidate preference is estimated separately. Controls in each analysis, not shown here, include gender, educational attainment, and ideology. Cell sizes are as follows: positive white cue = 57; negative white cue = 33. *p < 0.05. Significance tests are one-tailed.

between all three racial attitude measures and the vote. When the black racial cues are stereotype-inconsistent, however, the relationship between racial attitudes and the vote disappears, as indicated by the large negative interaction term in the third row. Violating racial stereotypes with positive images of blacks dramatically undermines racial priming. The presence of black images alone, therefore, does not prime negative racial attitudes. The effect emerges only when the pairing of the visuals with the narrative subtly reinforces negative stereotypes in the mind of the viewer.

Table 7 compares the impact of white stereotypeconsistent versus inconsistent cues, and a somewhat different pattern emerges. First, none of the coefficients in the deserving white condition is very large, suggesting that this cue did not produce a strong relationship between racial attitudes and candidate preference. However, cues implying that whites are the undeserving beneficiaries of government spending boost the impact of racial attitudes on the vote. Only the increase in the impact of the blacks have too much influence item even approaches statistical significance (p = 0.09, onetailed), but the overall pattern implies that violating positive stereotypes of whites is not the same as violating negative stereotypes of blacks in terms of racial priming.<sup>24</sup>

Violating the negative black stereotype did not make racial considerations more accessible in memory relative to the control group (mean difference = 0.04 log msec, p = 0.87). Violating the white stereotype did produce slightly faster response times to race relevant words, but the difference was not statistically significant (mean difference = 0.30 log msec, p = 0.19). On the other hand, the deserving blacks condition boosted the self-reported importance of group considerations in the vote calculus relative to the control (mean difference = 0.65 on a 1–7 scale, p=0.03). The undeserving whites condition also significantly boosted the importance of group considerations compared to the control (mean difference = 0.91, p=0.01). This pattern suggests that counter-stereotypical cues do not make racial attitudes more accessible but, instead, may induce conscious processing of the racial content of the message, thereby increasing the self-reported importance of groups. We speculate about the explanation for this last set of results in the discussion.

&lt;sup>24</sup> These findings also allay our concern that the lexical task, and not simply our ads, primed respondents to think about race in the visually neutral condition. If such a task were powerful enough to racialize the neutral stimulus, we would expect that it might also racialize the versions of the ads with positive or negative depictions of whites. This does not happen. The impact of racial attitudes is not significantly different in the control condition compared to the positive or negative white conditions. The absence of visual race cues in the neutral cell must permit viewers to "fill in" the stereotypical group, blacks.

DISCUSSION

We set out to explore how standard political appeals alter the criteria citizens use to select candidates. Three major findings emerge. First, our evidence is consistent with Edsall and Edsall's (1991) claim that the language of government spending and taxation has become racially "coded," such that its invocation in political appeals primes racial considerations even in the absence of racial imagery. More powerful effects emerge, however, when the imagery in political ads links blacks to the narrator's comments about undeserving groups. Ads that visually compare the interests of whites and blacks are slightly less powerful racial primes. Furthermore, none of the cues we manipulate prime individualism, egalitarianism, or partisan identification. We also find that racial priming is mediated by the accessibility of race in memory, not the self-reported importance of group representation. Finally, counter-stereotypic black cues suppress racial priming, while violating positive stereotypes of whites has, if anything, a positive racial priming effect.

Though the differences are small, the particular effects of the racial comparison versus the undeserving black cues conditions warrant further attention. One somewhat subtle pattern emerges from the finding that racial comparison cues primed racial attitudes that tapped the notion of resource competition in society (laissez-faire racism and "blacks have too much influence") more powerfully than they primed direct resentment toward blacks or opinions about affirmative action or welfare. The undeserving blacks cues, however, powerfully primed all three racial attitude dimensions, as well as opinions about redistributive policies such as affirmative action and welfare. This pattern suggests that raising negative attributions about blacks, without referring to implications for whites, is a powerful political strategy. Highlighting resource competition is a somewhat weaker priming agent. Why might this be the case? Two explanations seem plausible. First, the salience of the racial stimulus in the comparison condition may have been diluted by the presence of white images. On the other hand, the salience of the racial stimulus in that condition may have been so high that subjects became conscious of it and consequently suppressed racial criteria in evaluating candidates. Given that the salience of the racial stimulus and the specific problem that it raised are confounded in these two conditions, we must reserve judgment with regard to which explanation is correct.

Interesting differences in priming effects appear when racial stereotypes are violated in different ways. Although neither the black nor the white counterstereotypic cells significantly boosted the accessibility of race compared to the control group, both significantly raised the self-reported importance of group representation as a voting criterion. However, violating black stereotypes produces far weaker associations between racial attitudes and candidate evaluations than conforming to them did. Finally, violating the white stereotype slightly boosted the impact of racial attitudes compared to reinforcing the white stereotype. This pattern suggests that violating stereotypes may trigger increased attention and conscious processing of the stimulus, but the result for racial priming depends on the group involved. When the violated stereotype involves blacks, white respondents who wish to avoid race-based decision making suppress race as a criterion in their vote, even as they claim that group representation is important. When the white stereotype is violated, however, racial criteria are not suppressed because there is no obvious way that responding one way or another could be considered racist. Ironically, then, the increased importance of groups slightly boosts the association between racial attitudes and candidate evaluations in that instance.

The above speculation about the overall pattern of findings presented here is consistent with research demonstrating that priming is more powerful when subjects do not attend closely to the stimulus (Lombardi, Higgins, and Bargh 1987; Strack et al. 1993). Research on social categorization and group stereotyping also suggests that these processes operate mostly below the level of conscious awareness (Banaji and Hardin 1996; Bargh and Pietromonaco 1982). Mendelberg (2001) finds support for this as well, though she draws a dichotomous distinction between "implicit" appeals whose narratives do not mention racial groups and "explicit" ones that do. We think that it would be more useful to think of the underlying racial salience dimension as continuous: As the salience of race increases, the power of racial priming grows, until some point at which each viewer becomes conscious of the prime and begins to suppress race as a criterion. Our present findings merely provide a hint of evidence to support this claim: Some implicit cues seem more powerful than others in priming racial attitudes.

Our central finding, that subtle racial cues in political advertising can prime racial attitudes, should encourage investigations of racial priming effects beyond the classic instances of the 1988 Willie Horton ads, the Helms "White Hands" ad, and other racial appeals. It seems reasonable to expect that candidates will attempt to infuse particular group cues into the political debate, to shape the criteria that citizens use when evaluating candidates. If, as many suggest, attitudes about groups help voters organize the political world (Campbell et al. 1960; Converse 1964; Conover 1984), then priming those attitudes should comprise an effective communication strategy for candidates when they expect a large proportion of the "activated" group to vote for them.

Our results are consistent with Mendelberg's (2001). but we do not agree with all of her conclusions. Highly salient, or explicit, racial appeals may be less effective than more subtle or implicit ones, because some voters might intentionally avoid racial criteria when they become aware of them. Similarly, stereotypeinconsistent cues may also suppress priming by making people spend time thinking about how to reconcile the new information with prior beliefs. However, this does not necessarily mean that a different candidate will be preferred. Sensitizing people to the racial content of an appeal may undermine its persuasive impact, or it may lead to a more involved set of rationalizations to justify support for a prior choice. Individuals might suppress the expression of racial conservatism while leaving their candidate preference unchanged, thereby reducing the correlation between racial attitudes and vote choice. Further research on the behavioral consequences of long-term exposure to racial cues, varied across a wide range of perceptual salience, is needed.

These results leave several questions unanswered. First, further exploration is needed to determine the message characteristics that drive automatic, versus intentioned, priming effects. Prior work has found little evidence that accessibility mediates the impact of media exposure. Why do we get such strong and consistent results in this regard? One speculation is that the stimuli and the judgment tasks used in previous studies demand more conscious thought, thereby overwhelming subtler, automatic effects. Nelson, Clawson, and Oxley (1997), for example, had subjects view news stories about a Ku Klux Klan rally, framed in terms of either free speech or public order. The dependent variable in their analysis was tolerance for racist groups. Perhaps these stimuli, and the judgments they were designed to affect, required more careful consideration than was present in the political appeals and judgments we are concerned with in this paper. When either the priming stimulus or the target decision requires a great deal of conscious attention, we expect racial priming to be diminished. In the case of exposure to 30-sec advertisements and candidate preference formation, however, racial priming may exhibit quite pervasive effects.

Our results are based on a disproportionately educated and Democratic sample compared to the nation as a whole. We are somewhat reluctant, therefore, to generalize our findings to all citizens. However, studies employing entirely different samples have discovered similar effects (Mendelberg 2001; Reeves 1997; Valentino 1999). Further, by exposing a largely Democratic audience to a Republican message, ours is probably a conservative test of the theory, because priming may be more powerful when the party of the sponsor matches the partisan leanings of the viewer (Ansolabehere and Iyengar 1995). Nevertheless, studies that vary source characteristics and test racial priming hypotheses across a wider demographic and partisan range are warranted.

CONCLUSION

The evidence provided here, in combination with recent theoretical and empirical advances, suggests that a broadening of the debate about race in American politics is necessary. Far from being a spent force, the impact of race and racism in America can emerge from some of the most common political messages that mainstream candidates rely upon as their stock-in-trade. But this force is not overwhelming and constant, nor is it beyond the power of elites and masses to control. When campaigns emphasize policies that have been linked previously to blacks, they boost the impact of racial attitudes on candidate evaluations. When they reinforce negative stereotypes, the impact of racial attitudes grows. But when they violate those stereotypes by presenting blacks in a favorable light, or present images of nonstereotyped groups in these negative roles, that impact declines. When citizens are aware of the racial cues in a particular message, they seem to suppress racial thinking.

Unfortunately, the potential remedies for race priming we can offer-violating negative stereotypes, avoiding overemphasis on racialized issues—are meager, short-term fixes for a larger problem. By priming group attitudes, candidates take advantage of the ways citizens store political information in memory and attempt to simplify decision making. How, then, might one control some of the more pernicious effects of implicit racial priming during campaigns? A start would be to reduce elite incentives to prime racial attitudes in the first place, by breaking down invalid linkages between groups and social problems from which stereotypes spring. For example, the public's misperception of the proportion of welfare recipients who are African American could perhaps be remedied if news organizations took a proactive stance against perpetuating these inaccurate, negative stereotypes (Gilens 1999). Subsequently, invoking welfare issues, even coupled with images of blacks, might not pack the same punch when it comes to priming racial attitudes. The more general version of this plea is as controversial in some circles as it is commonsensical in others: We must engage in honest public discussion of the ways in which race, gender, and other group cleavages affect policymaking, election outcomes, and day-to-day living conditions in America. To begin this dialogue, we must recognize that implicit racial cues have been, and continue to be, cues that matter.

APPENDIX: SCALE/INDEX CONSTRUCTION

Racial resentment consisted of four items, agree strongly to disagree strongly, recoded so that high values mean more racially conservative responses. Four items were additively scaled. (1) "The Irish, Italians, Jews and many other minorities overcame prejudice and worked their way up. Blacks should do the same without any special favors." (2) "Generations of slavery and discrimination have created conditions that make it difficult for blacks to work there way out of the lower class." (3) "It is really a matter of some people not trying hard enough; if blacks would only try harder they could be just as well off as whites." (4) "Over the past few years, blacks have gotten less than they deserve." Cronbach's  $\alpha = 0.78$ .

Laissez-faire racism consisted of the three items, coded so that higher values indicate denial of discrimination, and additively scaled. The battery began with the statement, "Some people think that discrimination against blacks is a big problem in this country, while others think that it is not a big problem. We would like to know what you think about it." (1) "How much discrimination would you say there is that hurts the chances of blacks to get good-paying jobs?" (1 = a lot through 5 = none at all). (2) "How much discrimination would you say there is that makes it hard for blacks to buy or rent housing wherever they want?" (1 = a lot through 5 = none at all). (3) "On average blacks have worse jobs, income, and housing than white people. Do you think these differences are mainly due to discrimination?" (1 = yes, 3 = don't know, 5 = no). Cronbach's  $\alpha = 0.79$ .

For blacks have too much influence, the following single item was used: "Some people think that certain groups have too much influence in American life and politics, while others feel that they don't have enough influence. You will see three statements about how much influence a group might have (1 = not enough to 3 = too much).

Individualism consisted of three agree—disagree items, coded so that high values correspond to stronger endorsement of individualism, were additively scaled. (1) "Most people who do not get ahead should not blame the system. They have only themselves to blame" (1 = strongly agree to 5 = strongly disagree). (2) "Any person who is willing to work hard has a good chance of succeeding" (1 = strongly agree to 5 = strongly disagree). (3) "Even if people try hard they often cannot reach their goals" (1 = strongly agree to 5 = strongly disagree). Cronbach's  $\alpha = 0.51$ .

Egalitarianism consisted of three agree–disagree items, coded so that higher values mean higher endorsement of egalitarianism, were additively scaled. (1) "Our society should do whatever is necessary to make sure that everyone has an equal opportunity to succeed" (1=strongly agree to 5=strongly disagree). (2) "The country would be better off if we worried less about how equal people are" (1=strongly agree to 5=strongly disagree). (3) "If people were treated more equally in this country, we would have many fewer problems" (1=strongly agree to 5=strongly disagree). Cronbach's  $\alpha=0.58$ .

For party identification the standard 7-point party identification scale as measured in the National Election Studies, with a three-item, skip pattern design, was used: (1) "Generally speaking, do you usually think of yourself as a Republican, a Democrat, and Independent, or what?" (2) [If R answers Rep or Dem] "Would you call yourself a strong Republican/Democrat or a not very strong Republican/Democrat?" [3] [If R answers Independent] "Do you think of yourself as closer to the Republican Party or the Democratic Party?

The candidate preference measure was based on a five-item sequence with skip patterns. (1) "So far as you know now, do you expect to vote in the national election this coming November or not?" (1 = yes, 5 = no, 8 = don't know). (2) [If R plans to vote] "We all know the election is some time away and people are not certain at this point who they will vote for. Still, who do you think you will vote for in the election for President?" (Bush, Gore, Nader, other, don't know, undecided). (3) "Would you say that your preference for (candidate specified in item 2) is strong or not strong?" (4) [If R plans not to vote] "If you were going to vote, who do you think you would vote for in the election for president?" (same response options as in item 2). (5) [For those who answered item 4] "Would you say that your preference for (candidate specified in item 4) is strong or not strong?" An index was constructed, running from 1 (strong support for Gore) to 5 (strong support for Bush). Those preferring a third-party candidate (Nader, Buchanan, or other) were placed at the midpoint (3). Several versions of this variable were tested, including ones that discarded subjects with non-major-party candidate preferences and one which employed a three-level variable (1 = support for Gore; 2 = neither, other, 3 = support for Bush). Results were nearly identical for these alternative specifications.

REFERENCES

- Ansolabehere, Stephen, and Shanto Iyengar. 1995. Going Negative:
  How Political Advertisements Shrink and Polarize the Electorate.
  New York: Free Press.
- Banaji, Mahzarin R., and Curtis Hardin. 1996. "Automatic Stereotyping." Psychological Science 7 (May): 136–41.
- Bargh, John A., and Paula Pietromonaco. 1982. "Automatic Information Processing and Social Perception: The Influence of Trait Information Presented Outside of Conscious Awareness on Impression Formation." Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 43 (September): 437–49.
- Blair, Irene V., and Mahzarin R. Banaji. 1996. "Automatic and Controlled Processes in Stereotype Priming." Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 70 (June): 1142–63.
  Bobo, Lawrence. 2000. "Race and Beliefs About Affirmative Ac-
- Bobo, Lawrence. 2000. "Race and Beliefs About Affirmative Action: Assessing the Effects of Interests, Group Threat, Ideology, and Racism." In Racialized Politics, eds. David O. Sears, Jim Sidanius, and Lawrence Bobo. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, Pp. 137–64.
- Bobo, Lawrence, and James R. Kluegel. 1997. "Status, Ideology, and Dimensions of Whites' Racial Beliefs and Attitudes: Progress and Stagnation." In Racial Attitudes in the 1990's: Continuity and Change, eds. Steven A. Tuch and Jack K. Martin. Westport, CT: Praeger. Pp. 93–120.
- Bobo, Lawrence, James R. Kluegel, and Ryan A. Smith. 1997. "Laissez-Faire Racism: The Crystallization of a Kinder, Gentler, Antiblack Ideology." In Racial Attitudes in the 1990's: Continuity and Change, eds. Steven A. Tuch and Jack K. Martin. Westport, CT. Praeger. Pp. 15–41.
- Brewer, Marilyn B., Valerie Dull, and Layton Lui. 1981. "Perceptions of the Elderly: Stereotypes as Prototypes." Journal of Personality & Social Psychology 41 (October): 656–70.
- Campbell, Angus, Philip E. Converse, Warren E. Miller, and Donald E. Stokes. 1960. The American Voter. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Carmines, Edward G., and James A. Stimson. 1989. Issue Evolution: Race and the Transformation of American Politics. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Coltrane, Scott, and Melinda Messineo. 2000. "The Perpetuation of Subtle Prejudice: Race and Gender Imagery in the 1990's Television Advertising." Sex Roles 42 (March): 363–89.
- Conover, Pamela. 1984. "The Influence of Group Identifications on Political Perception and Evaluation." Journal of Politics 46 (August): 760–85.
- Converse, Philip E. 1964. "The Nature of Belief Systems in Mass Publics." In Ideology and Discontent, ed. David Apter. New York: Free Press. Pp. 206-61.
- Devine, Patricia. 1989. "Stereotypes and Prejudice: Their Automatic and Controlled Components." Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 56 (January): 5–18.
- Dixon, Travis L., and Daniel Linz. 2000. "Overrepresentation and Underrepresentation of African Americans and Latinos as Lawbreakers on Television News." Journal of Communication 50(2): 131–54.
- Domke, David, Kelley McCoy, and Marcos Torres. 1999. "News Media, Racial Perceptions, and Political Cognition." Communication Research 26 (October): 570–607.
- Edsall, Thomas B., and Mary D. Edsall. 1991. Chain Reaction: The Impact of Race, Rights, and Taxes on American Politics. New York: Norton
- Entman, Robert M. 1990. "Modern Racism and the Images of Blacks in Local Television News." Critical Studies in Mass Communication 7 (4): 332–46.

- Entman, Robert M. 1992. "Blacks in the News: Television, Modern Racism, and Cultural Change." Journalism Quarterly 69 (Summer):
- Entman, Robert M., and Andrew Rojecki. 2000. The Black Image in the White Mind: Media and Race in America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Fazio, Russell H., and Carol J. Williams. 1986. "Attitude Accessibility as a Moderator of the Attitude-Perception and Attitude-Behavior Relations: An Investigation of the 1984 Presidential Election." Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 51 (September):
- Fazio, Russell H. 1990. "A Practical Guide to the Use of Response Latency in Social Psychological Research." In Review of Personality and Social Psychology, Vol. 11. Research Methods in Personality and Social Psychology, eds. C. Hendrick and Margaret S. Clark. Newbury Park, CA: Sage. Pp. 74-97.
- Finkel, Steven E. 1993. "Reexamining the 'Minimal Effects' Model in Recent Presidential Campaigns." Journal of Politics 55 (February):
- Gaertner, Samuel L., and John F. Dovidio. 1986. "The Aversive Form of Racism." In Prejudice, Discrimination, and Racism, eds. John F. Dovidio and Samuel L. Gaertner. Orlando, FL: Academic Press. Pp. 61-89.
- Gilens, Martin. 1996. "Race Coding' and White Opposition to Welfare." American Political Science Review 90(3): 593-604.
- Gilens, Martin. 1998. "Racial Attitudes and Race-Neutral Social Policies: White Opposition to Welfare and the Politics of Racial Inequality." In Perception & Prejudice, eds. Jon Hurwitz and Mark Peffley. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press. Pp. 171-201. Gilens, Martin. 1999. Why Americans Hate Welfare. Chicago: Uni- versity of Chicago Press.
- Gilliam, Franklin D. Jr., and Shanto Iyengar. 2000. "Prime Suspects: The Influence of Local Television News on the Viewing Public." American Journal of Political Science 44 (July): 560-73.
- Gray, Herman. 1995. Watching Race: Television and the Struggle for "Blackness." Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Hastie, Reid. 1981. "Schematic Principles in Human Memory." In Social Cognition: The Ontario Symposium, Vol. 1, eds. E. Tory Higgins, C. Peter Herman, and Mark P. Zanna. Hillsdale, NJ: Erlbaum. Pp. 39-88.
- Hurwitz, Jon, and Mark Peffley. 1998. Perception and Prejudice: Race and Politics in the United States. New Haven, CT: Yale University
- Iyengar, Shanto. 1991. Is Anyone Responsible? Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Iyengar, Shanto, and Donald R. Kinder. 1987. News that Matters: Television and American Public Opinion. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Jamieson, Kathleen Hall. 1992. Dirty Politics: Deception, Distraction, and Democracy. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Kinder, Donald R., and Lynn Sanders. 1996. Divided by Color: Racial Politics and Democratic Ideals. Chicago: University of Chicago Press
- Kinder, Donald R., and David Sears. 1981. "Prejudice and Politics: Symbolic Racism versus Racial Threats to the Good Life." Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 40 (March): 414-32,
- Lau, Richard. 1989. Individual and contextual influences on group identification. Social Psychology Quarterly 52 (September): 220-
- Lombardi, Wendy J., E. Tory Higgins, and John A. Bargh. 1987. "The Role of Conscious in Priming Effects on Categorization: Assimi-

- lation versus Contrast as a function of Awareness of the Priming Task." Personality and Social Psychology Bulletin 13 (September): 411-29.
- Mendelberg, Tali. 1997. "Executing Hortons: Racial Crime in the 1988 Presidential Campaign." Public Opinion Quarterly 61 (Spring): 134-57.
- Mendelberg, Tali. 2001. The Race Card: Campaign Strategy. Implicit Messages, and the Norm of Equality. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press
- Miller, Joanne, and Jon A. Krosnick. 2000, "News Media Impact on the Ingredients of Presidential Evaluations: Politically Knowledgeable Citizens are Guided by Trusted Sources" American Journal of Political Science 44 (April): 301-15.
- Myrdal, Gunnar. 1944. An American Dilemma: The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy. New York: Harper & Row.
- Nelson, Thomas, and Donald R. Kinder. 1996. "Issue Frames and Group-Centrism in American Public Opinion." Journal of Politics 58 (November): 1055-78.
- Nelson, Thomas, Rosalee Clawson, and Zoe Oxley. 1997. "Media Framing of a Civil Liberties Conflict and Its Effect on Tolerance." American Political Science Review 91 (September): 567-83
- Peffley, Mark, Todd Shields, and Bruce Williams. 1996. "The Intersection of Race and Crime in Television News Stories: An Experimental Study." Political Communication 13 (July/September):
- Petrocik, John R. 1996. "Issue Ownership in Presidential Elections, with a 1980 Case Study." American Journal of Political Science 40 (August): 825-50.
- Price, Vincent, and David Tewksbury. 1997. "News Values and Public Opinion: A Theoretical Account of Media Priming and Framing." In Progress In Communication Sciences, Vol. 13, eds. G. A. Barnett and F. J. Boster. Greenwich, CT: Ablex. Pp. 173-212.
- Reeves, Keith. 1997. Voting Hopes or Fears?: White Voters, Black Candidates, and Racial Politics in America. Oxford: Oxford University
- Schuman, Howard, Charlotte Steeh, Lawrence Bobo, and Maria Krysan. 1997. Racial Attitudes in America. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Sears, David O. 1988. "Symbolic Racism." In Eliminating Racism: Profiles in Controversy, eds. Phyllis A. Katz and Dalmas A. Taylor. New York: Plenum Press. Pp. 53-84.
- Sears, David O., Jim Sidanius, and Lawrence Bobo. 2000. Racialized Politics: The Debate About Racism in America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Sniderman, Paul M., and Edward G. Carmines. 1997. Reaching Beyond Race. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Sniderman, Paul M., and Michael G. Hagen. 1985. Race and Inequality: A Study in American Values. Chatham, NJ: Chatham House.
- Sniderman, Paul M., and Thomas Piazza. 1993. The Scar of Race. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Strack, Fritz, Norbert Schwarz, Herbert Blass, Almut Kubler, and Michaela Wanke. 1993. "Awareness of the Influence as a Determination of Assimilation Versus Contrast." European Journal of
- Social Psychology 23 (January/February): 53–62.
  Taylor, Shelley E., and Susan Fiske. 1978. "Salience, Attention, and Attribution: Top of the Head Phenomena." In Advances in Experimental Social Psychology, ed. Leonard Berkowitz. New York: Academic Press. Pp. 249-88
- Valentino, Nicholas A. 1999. "Crime News and the Priming of Racial Attitudes During Evaluations of the President." Public Opinion Quarterly 63 (Fall): 293-320.

Sex, Lies, and War: How Soft News Brings Foreign Policy to the Inattentive Public

MATTHEW A. BAUM University of California, Los Angeles

This study argues that, due to selective political coverage by the entertainment-oriented, soft news media, many otherwise politically inattentive individuals are exposed to information about high-profile political issues, most prominently foreign policy crises, as an incidental by-product of seeking entertainment. I conduct a series of statistical investigations examining the relationship between individual media consumption and attentiveness to several recent high-profile foreign policy crisis issues. For purposes of comparison, I also investigate several non-foreign crisis issues, some of which possess characteristics appealing to soft news programs and others of which lack such characteristics. I find that information about foreign crises, and other issues possessing similar characteristics, presented in a soft news context, has indeed attracted the attention of politically uninvolved Americans. The net effect is a reduced disparity in attentiveness to select high-profile political issues across different segments of the public.

eople who are not interested in politics often get their news from sources quite different from those of their politically engaged counterparts (Chaffee and Kanihan 1997; Key 1961). While alternative news sources for the politically uninvolved have long been available, the last two decades have witnessed a dramatic expansion in the number and diversity of entertainment-oriented, quasi-news media outlets, sometimes referred to collectively as the soft news media.

Political scientists, including public opinion scholars, have mostly ignored the soft news media. And, indeed, most of the time these media eschew discussion of politics and public policy, in favor of more "down-market" topics, such as celebrity gossip, crime dramas, disasters, or other dramatic human-interest stories (Patterson 2000; Kalb 1998b). Yet, as I shall demonstrate, on occasion, the soft news media do convey substantive information concerning a select few high-profile political issues, prominently among them foreign policy crises. This suggests the proliferation of soft news may have meaningful implications for politics, including foreign policy.

Scholars have long pondered the barriers to information and political participation confronting democratic citizens. The traditional scholarly consensus has held that the mass public is woefully ignorant about politics and foreign affairs (Delli Carpini and Keeter 1996; Converse 1964; Almond 1950), and hence, with rare exceptions, only relatively narrow segments of the public—the so-called "attentive public" or "issue publics"—pay attention to public policy or wield any meaningful influence on policymakers (Graebner 1983; Cohen 1973; Rosenau 1961; Key 1961). By, in effect, broadening access to information about some political issues, soft news coverage of politics may challenge this perspective, at least in part. If a substantial portion of the public that would otherwise remain aloof from politics is able to learn about high-profile political issues, such as foreign crises, from the soft news media, this may expand the size of the attentive public, at least in times of crisis. And a great deal of research has shown that intense public scrutiny, when it arises, can influence policymakers, both in Congress and the White House (Baum 2000; Powlick 1995; Bosso 1989; Rosenau 1961; Key 1961).

This possibility raises a number of questions. First, to what extent and in what circumstances do the entertainment-oriented, soft news media convey information about serious political issues? Second, what types of political topics appeal to such media outlets? Third, how might their coverage differ from that found in traditional news sources? Finally, who is likely to consume political news presented in this entertainment-oriented media environment, and why? These are the primary questions motivating the present study.

I argue that for many individuals who are not interested in politics or foreign policy, soft news increasingly serves as an alternative to the traditional news media as a source of information about a select few political issues, including foreign policy crises. This is because the soft news media are in the business of packaging human drama as entertainment. And, like celebrity murder trials and sex scandals—the usual fare of soft news outlets—some political issues, prominently among them foreign crises, are easily framed as compelling human dramas.<sup>1</sup> As a result, the soft Matthew A. Baum is Assistant Professor, Department of Political Science, 4289 Bunche Hall, Box 951472, University of California, Los Angeles, Los Angeles, CA 90095-1472 (mbaum@ucla.edu).

Portions of this research were funded by the University of California Institute on Global Conflict and Cooperation. I wish to thank the following individuals for their valuable comments and suggestions: Jeeyang Rhee Baum, Richard Baum, Neal Beck, Andrea Campbell, Ann Crigler, James Druckman, Marty Gilens, Tim Groeling, Miles Kahler, Sam Kernell, David Lake, Angela O'Mahony, Paul Papayoanou, Mark Rosenblum, Michael Schudson, David Sears, John Zaller, and several anonymous referees. I also wish to thank Phil Gussin for research assistance.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Gamson and Modigliani (1987, 143) offer the following operational definition of a frame: "a central organizing idea or story line that provides meaning to an unfolding strip of events, weaving a connection among them. The frame suggests what the controversy is about, the essence of the issue." This definition adequately captures my use of the term in this study [but see Druckman (2002) for a discussion of differing definitions and uses of the term].

Sex, Lies, and War March 2002

news media have increased many politically inattentive individuals' exposure to information about select high-profile political issues, primarily those involving scandal, violence, heroism, or other forms of human drama. Yet public opinion scholars have largely failed to consider how this might influence public views of politics.

This study focuses primarily on foreign policy crises. My argument, however, is general, and so not unique to foreign policy. Indeed, it also applies to a fairly narrow range of domestic political issues. Nonetheless, I focus on foreign crises for three reasons. First, ceteris paribus, foreign crises are more likely than most issues to transcend traditional partisan boundaries. Hence, public attention to foreign crises is relatively less likely to be affected by heightened public cynicism regarding partisan politics (Nye, Zelikow, and King 1997; Dionne 1991). Second, beyond celebrity murder trials and sex scandals, few issues are as likely to capture the public's imagination as the prospect of large-scale violence and the potential death of large numbers of Americans at the hands of a clearly identifiable villain. Combined, these two factors make foreign crises an appealing subject matter for the largely apolitical, entertainmentoriented soft news media. Third, Americans know and care less about foreign than domestic affairs (Kegley and Wittkopf 1996; Reilly 1995; Sobel 1989; Graber 1984), especially in the post-Cold War era (Moisy 1997; Holsti 1996), and most foreign policy news is typically ignored entirely by the soft news media. Hence, while my argument extends beyond foreign policy, I nonetheless focus on foreign crises as, in effect, a "most difficult" test of the argument.

The remainder of this study proceeds as follows. In the next section, I introduce and define my key independent variable, soft news. I also discuss my dependent variable, attentiveness to foreign crises (or other similarly accessible political issues). I begin the section by considering the distinguishing characteristics of a soft news outlet, and the propensity of the soft news media to cover select political issues, including foreign crises. I then consider the types of political issues covered by soft news programs and the manner in which such programs frame those political issues they elect to cover. Finally, building on previous theories of passive learning (Neuman, Just, and Crigler 1992; Zukin with Snyder 1984), I develop an "incidental by-product" model of information consumption (e.g., Popkin 1994). I argue that by repackaging news about select political issues, including foreign crises, as entertainment, soft news dramatically reduces the cognitive costs of paying attention. As a result, even individuals who are not interested in politics may be willing to pay attention to such information.

To test my hypotheses, in the third section I conduct a series of statistical investigations into the correlates of attentiveness to a series of foreign crisis issues, plus, for purposes of comparison, several noncrisis issues. Across each test, my results strongly support the incidental by-product model. Finally, the Conclusion summarizes my findings and considers several implications for politics, public policy, and democracy.

POLITICS, FOREIGN POLICY, AND SOFT NEWS

The Soft News Media

Since the early 1980s, the growth of cable—and, more recently, satellite television and the internet—has created a highly competitive media environment, especially in television (Patterson 2000; Baum and Kernell 1999; Webster and Lichty 1991). Rising competition for viewers has forced broadcasters to find new ways to raise their profit margins, such as increasing the audience for news (Grossman 2000; Zaller 1999; Kalb 1998a, 1998b; Hess 1998; Auletta 1993; Hallin 1991) and lowering production costs. To do so, they have, in part, repackaged certain types of news into inexpensively produced forms of entertainment (Davis and Owen 1998; Kalb 1998b), sometimes referred to as soft news.<sup>2</sup> This is because soft news is far less expensive to produce, and in many cases far more profitable, than original entertainment programming (Baum 2000; Davis and Owen 1998).

Though the term soft news is widely employed by media scholars (e.g., Patterson 2000; Kalb 1998b; Scott and Gobetz 1992), no commonly accepted definition exists. Patterson (2000, 3) observes that soft news has been defined, variously, as a residual category for all news that is not "hard," as a particular vocabulary in presenting the news (e.g., more personal and familiar and less distant or institutional), and as a set of story characteristics, including the absence of a public policy component, sensationalized presentation, human-interest themes, and emphasis on dramatic subject matter, such as crime and disaster. Though admittedly imprecise, for my purposes, the latter definition—based on the aforementioned story characteristics—appears most useful for distinguishing the soft news media from traditional news outlets.

While virtually all news- or information-oriented media present at least some stories possessing some or all of the above characteristics, only a subset fócuses primarily on such material, largely (though not necessarily entirely) to the exclusion of traditional—local, national, or international—political or public policy topics and themes. And it is the latter media outlets with which I am concerned. Clearly, in at least some instances, the difference between soft and hard news is one of degree rather than kind. And a few media outlets (several of which I discuss below) are not easily categorized as belonging unambiguously in either category.<sup>3</sup>

&lt;sup>2</sup> While I focus primarily on television, similar trends toward the blending of news and entertainment have also occurred in elements of the radio and print media (Patterson 2000; Davis and Owen 1998). I focus on television because, in addition to being the primary source of news for most Americans, as noted by Neuman et al. (1992, 114), television "can break the attention barrier for issues of low salience...newspapers and magazines are better sources for new information when the audience is already motivated to pay attention" (see also Patterson 1980). Nonetheless, in the statistical analyses that follow, I also account for the effects of the print and radio soft and hard news media.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Because the dividing line between the soft and the hard news media is not in every instance entirely clear, in my statistical analyses I Still, with a few notable exceptions, the differences are fairly stark.

Two examples of the dramatic proliferation of the soft news media on television are daytime and latenight talk shows and entertainment and tabloid news programs.<sup>4</sup> On the talk show circuit, where Johnny Carson once enjoyed a virtual monopoly in late-night TV talk, in recent years the late-night airwaves have grown cluttered with such competitors as David Letterman, Conan O'Brien, and Bill Maher. Even popular "shock" radio hosts, such as Howard Stern and Don Imus, have their own TV talk shows. And in the daytime, the genre pioneered by Phil Donahue in the 1980s has proliferated to the point where in 2002, over a dozen talk shows, ranging from Jenny Jones to Oprah Winfrey, air on broadcast television each day. Entertainment and tabloid news shows, in turn, pioneered in the late 1980s by A Current Affair, now dominate the early evening hours. Some of these programs (e.g., Extra, Access Hollywood) air several times per day.

One example of an arguably less clear-cut program format, in turn, is network news magazines. While such programs do cover hard news topics, particularly when major events arise, recent content analysis studies [Zaller 1999; Kalb 1998a; Committee of Concerned Journalists (CCJ) 1998] have found that they focus primarily on soft news topics, such as celebrity profiles and crime dramas.<sup>5</sup> And this genre has expanded dramatically. Prior to 1980, 60 Minutes was the only-primetime network news magazine on television. Since that time, particularly over the past decade, 60 Minutes has attracted increasing competition. Indeed, in recent years, the major networks have routinely featured news magazines in prime time virtually every evening. In Fall 1998, the three primary broadcast networks, combined, offered 10 prime-time hours per week of news magazines and CNN added 4 additional hours per week of news magazines (Weinstein 1998).

rely on empirical testing to determine the appropriate placement of several relatively ambiguous cases, such as local TV news.

TABLE 1. Nielsen Ratings for Select Soft and Hard News Programs

Program	Rating/Households
Entertainment Tonight	5.9/5,864,000
Extra	3.8/3,751,000
Oprah Winfrey	6.5/6,460,000
Live with Regis and Kathy Lee	3.6/3,624,000
Rosie O'Donnell	3.6/3,596,000
60 Minutes	12.0/11,928,000
20/20	9.8/9,692,000
Dateline	9.3/9,195,000
NBC Nightly News	6.9/6,859,000
ABC World News Tonight	6.7/6,660,000
CBS Evening News	6.0/5,964,000
CNN	0.40/376,000
Mater Detines for notwork power are for	the week of June 20 July

Note: Ratings for network news are for the week of June 28–July 4, 1999. Ratings for CNN are for 1998.

Equally important, large numbers of Americans consume soft news. Table 1 presents the average Nielsen ratings for several soft news television programs during the first 6 months of 1999.6 These are contrasted with ratings for network evening newscasts and CNN. According to these data, Entertainment Tonight and Oprah Winfrey are watched by about as many households as the evening newscasts of the major networks. And CBS's 60 Minutes, NBC's Dateline, and ABC's 20/20 typically attract substantially larger audiences than any of the network newscasts. The typical audience for CNN is tiny in comparison. Moreover, though my focus is primarily on television, these consumption patterns extend to elements of the radio (e.g., talk radio) and print (e.g., celebrity news magazines) media as well.8

Soft News Coverage of Foreign Crises. The preceding discussion begs the question of why social scientists should care about the rise of soft news. In fact, any political relevance of soft news depends on the extent to which such programs actually cover political issues, such as foreign crises. And, indeed, soft news programs have covered every major U.S. foreign military crisis since 1990. I searched program transcripts, using Lexis-Nexis, and TV Guide listings for a variety of soft news programs to determine whether and to what extent they covered the Persian Gulf War, the ongoing series of post-Gulf War crises with Iraq, and four other highprofile U.S. foreign crises of the past decade—Somalia, Haiti, Bosnia, and Kosovo. Where such transcripts were inaccessible (e.g., Oprah Winfrey), I contacted several programs directly. For purposes of comparison, I also searched Lexis-Nexis for soft news coverage of several more traditional and less dramatic political &lt;sup>4</sup> While the talk show format differs from the traditional news format, it is nonetheless similarly geared toward providing information to viewers about real-world personalities, issues, and events.

<sup>6</sup> Ratings for Network News Magazines are averages for the period September 21, 1998 to September 20, 1999.

<sup>7</sup> CNN's ratings trained to the control of the period of th

A content analysis of stories on 60 Minutes between January and June 1998 revealed that 60% of the 62 segments aired addressed soft news topics (i.e., celebrity profiles, "Can you believe?" investigative reports, and lifestyle pieces), while only 13% dealt with traditional hard news topics (Kalb 1998a). Zaller (1999) finds that between 1968 and 1998, 60 Minutes' score on a news quality index fell by over half. And the news quality score for 60 Minutes greatly exceeded those of its competitors. Finally, a 1998 study (CCJ 1998) found that five prime-time network news magazines (20/20, 48 Hours, 60 Minutes, Prime Time Live, and Dateline) devoted a combined total average of just 5.5% of their coverage during Fall 1997 to topics relating to either government, military/national security policy, foreign affairs, education, or the economy. In sharp contrast, they devoted nearly half of their total airtime to stories pertaining to entertainment/celebrities, personality/profiles, crime, or human-interest topics. During the same period, the corresponding averages for network news stories (ABC CBS, and NBC) were 35% of airtime devoted to the aforementioned hard news topics and just 12% devoted to the above soft news topics. Overall, government and foreign affairs were the two most common topics on network evening newscasts, while the top topics on network news magazines were crime, human interest, and personality/profile.

&lt;sup>7</sup> CNN's ratings typically spike during international crises. Yet the single largest audience in CNN's history, 5.4 million households (January 17, 1991), was smaller than the average audience for the lowest-rated network news program (Noah 1997).

&lt;sup>8</sup> For instance, the largest circulation newspaper in America is not the Wall Street Journal but, rather, The National Enquirer.

Sex, Lies, and War March 2002

issues (the later results are discussed below, under Statistical Investigations). Table 2 presents the results of these inquiries. These figures—which represent the number of separate broadcasts of each program that addressed a given issue—are extremely conservative, due to limited availability of transcripts, sporadic program listings, and unwillingness of some programs to provide the requested information, as well as recent start-dates or cancellation of several of the programs.

To determine whether these raw figures constitute "significant" coverage, I compared soft news coverage of four foreign crises in the 1990s with coverage of those crises on ABC's World News Tonight. The results indicated that, taken together, the number of separate broadcasts of the TV talk shows listed in Table 2 mentioning the U.S. interventions in Bosnia and Kosovo, combined, was equivalent to 73% of the total number of separate broadcasts of World News Tonight which mentioned those conflicts.<sup>9</sup> The corresponding figure for Somalia and Haiti, combined, was over half (52%) as many broadcasts. Indeed, the number of separate broadcasts mentioning Bosnia presented on one tabloid news program, Extra, is equivalent to nearly half (46%) of the total number of World News Tonight broadcasts mentioning Bosnia. While soft news programs predictably offered significantly less coverage of these crises than the network news-for instance, network newscasts more frequently present multiple stories on a given topic within a single broadcast and tend to offer greater depth of coverage—these figures nonetheless appear far from trivial.<sup>10</sup>

How Soft News Programs Cover Foreign Crises. While, like traditional news outlets, soft news programs do appear to cover foreign crises regularly, they do not necessarily do so in the same manner. Where traditional news outlets typically cover political stories in manners unappealing—either too complex or too arcane—to individuals who are not intrinsically interested in politics, the soft news media self-consciously frame issues in highly accessible terms—which I call "cheap framing"—emphasizing dramatic and sensational human-interest stories, intended primarily to appeal to an entertainment-seeking audience.

Neuman, Just, and Crigler (1992) identify five common frames readily recognized and understood by most individuals. These include "us vs. them," "human impact," "powerlessness," "economic," and "morality." To this list, Powlick and Katz (1998) add an "injustice" frame. Graber (1984) found that several of these frames—"human impact," "morality,"

9 The TV talk show figures represent the sum of between seven and and "injustice"—resonated strongly with her interview subjects.11 Not surprisingly, these are the prevalent themes found in the soft news media. For instance, a recent content analysis of tabloid TV news shows (Media Monitor 1997a) found that such programs emphasize widely accessible "morality" and "justice" frames. Overall, over half of the tabloid stories examined were framed in moralistic terms, passing judgment on the central actors. And a 1998 study by the Committee of Concerned Journalists (1998), concluded that celebrity, scandal, gossip and other "human-interest" stories have increased as a share of the total media coverage over the past 20 years from 15 to 43%. 12 By making news about foreign crises, or other high-profile political issues, accessible, soft news programs increase the likelihood that politically uninterested individuals will pay attention to, and learn about, them (Eveland and Scheufele 2000).

A review of the content of soft news coverage of several 1990s foreign crises offers support for the findings of the aforementioned studies. In each case, rather than focus on the more arcane aspects of these crises, such as military tactics or geopolitical ramifications, the soft news media tended to focus on highly accessible themes likely to appeal to viewers who were not necessarily watching to learn about military strategy or international diplomacy. For instance, during the Persian Gulf War, while CNN and the major networks filled the airwaves with graphic images of precision bombs and interviews with military experts, the daytime talk shows hosted by Oprah Winfrey, Geraldo Rivera, and Sally Jesse Raphael, as well as A Current Affair, focused on the personal hardships faced by spouses of soldiers serving in the Gulf and on the psychological trauma suffered by families of Americans being held prisoner in Iraq as "human shields."

Similarly, in mid-1995, in covering the escalating U.S. military involvement in Bosnia, a review of the nightly news broadcasts of the three major networks indicates that they addressed a broad range of issues—including international diplomacy, military tactics, the role of NATO, "nation building," and ethnic cleansing, to name only a few. In contrast, the soft news media devoted most of their coverage to a single dramatic story: the travails of U.S. fighter pilot Scott O'Grady, who was shot down over enemy territory on June 2, 1995. Captain O'Grady's heroic story of surviving behind enemy lines for 5 days on a diet of insects and grass.

nine programs (depending on the year).

10 If one counts the total number of stories on World News Tonight, soft news coverage still appears to be nontrivial. In the case of Bosnia and Kosovo, the number of TV talk show broadcasts is equivalent to over half (56%) of the total number of stories on World News Tonight. The corresponding figure for Somalia and Haiti is 40% as many stories as ABC network news broadcasts. Finally, the number of Extra broadcasts mentioning Bosnia is equivalent to 40% of the total number of Bosnia stories on World News Tonight.

<sup>11</sup> These findings complement a large literature in social psychology on individual media uses and gratification. This literature (e.g., Katz, Blumler, and Gurevitch 1973–1974; Katzman 1972; McQuail et al. 1972; Katz and Foulkes 1962) argues that individuals use the media to fulfill various social and psychological needs, including diversion, easing social tension and conflict, establishing substitute personal relationships, reinforcing personal identity and values, gaining comfort through familiarity, learning about social problems, and surveillance. In fact, the frames most frequently employed by typical individuals are directly linked to several of the predominant uses of the media identified by psychologists.

&lt;sup>12</sup> In a separate content analysis, Patterson (2000) reaches conclusions similar to those of the CCJ study. He also found substantial increases in sensationalism in news reporting and in the proportion of news stories lacking any public policy component.

			Nulliber	5	Separate broadcasis	S AUUI ESSIII U	anig issue
Program	Gulf War	Somalia	Haiti	Bosnia	lraq (1992–1999)	Kosovo	1996 Primaries	1998 Elections	Regulate Tobacco	NAFTA	WTO	Lewinsky Scandal
Network news magazines
Dateline NBC	1	4	œ	17	25	13	4	4	- -	-	0	16
20/20	42	. თ	4	: ∞	202	우	0	-	0	0	0	4
Primetime Live	36	ω	4	7	16	1	က	0	0	-	0	က
48 Hours	, ca	က	4	က	80	-	8	2	0	0	0	α
60 Minutes	4	4	ω	17	51	16	8		-	7	7	7
Average	23.5	4.4	5.6	11.2	29.4	29.0	2.2	1.6	0.40	0.80	0.40	5.4
Late-night TV talk shows
Jay Leno	1	1	33	25	102	14	48	0	0	15	0	45
David Letterman	l	4	8	32	88	7	32	-	0	27	0	37
Conan O'Brien	J	ო	52	4	53	4	33	0	0	25	0	90
Politically Incorrect	l	ł	1	19	52	15	31	τ-	2	0	-	34
Average	1	3.5	27.0	22.5	74.5	13.5	34.3	0.50	1.3	16.8	0.25	36.5
Daytime TV talk shows
Óprah Winfrey	က	9	ω	ω	4		l	I		l	1	l
Rosie O'Donnell	l	1	1	ო	4	우	l	-	0	0	0	-
Regis and Kathie Lee	1	2	7	10	13	7	0	0	0	4	0	9
Geraldo Rivera	9	ო	Ŋ	40	13	1	0	0	0	0	0	දි
Phil Donahue	[	37	56	29	28		ည		l	0	0	1
Average	4.5	12.8	11.5	24	18.4	8.5	1.67	0.33	0.0	1.0	0.0	12.0
Network TV soft news					,	1			,	,	•	į
Extra		[	16	116	62	ω	-	 .	0	0	0	24
Entertainment Tonight	1	1	4	16	7	0	0	. ·	0	o ·	0 -	ડ ડ
Inside Edition	l	1	4	-	24	ო	α	-	0	,		58
A Current Affair	4	4	-	ω	7	l	Ø	]	'	0	0	1
Average	4.0	4.0	6.3	37.8	22	4.3	1.3	1.0	0	0.25	0.25	22.3
Cable TV soft news				;	,	,	(	(	(	,	(	ć
E! Network		ო	က	5 8	φ	n	N	o	.	)	Э.	ဗို
Black Entertainment Television	1		33	ო	12	ဖ	0	0	ο.	N (	- (	Σ .
Comedy Central's Daily Show	1	1	I	ო	7	16	l	,-		ო	0	-
MTV News	1	l	7	7	4	7	19	•	0	N	0	2
Average	]	3.0	11.0	10.8	10.8	8.0	7.0	0.50	0.25	1.75	0.25	15.0
Talk radio									,	,		,
Howard Stern Show			1	18	47	35	. 5	0	-	0	0	58

Sex, Lies, and War March 2002

before being rescued by NATO forces, represented an ideal made-for-soft news human drama. To determine the nature and extent of soft news coverage of Bosnia in June 1995, I reviewed Lexis—Nexis transcripts from 12 soft news programs for which the appropriate data were accessible. If found that of 35 total broadcasts on these 12 shows addressing the conflict in Bosnia, 30 (or 86%) featured the O'Grady story. Of course, traditional news programs also covered the story. Yet, in the latter case, this was merely one of many storylines. The three major networks, combined, covered the O'Grady story in only 13 of 57 (or 23%) June 1995 national news broadcasts in which Bosnia was addressed.

More recently, when, on August 20, 1998—3 days after President Clinton's grand jury testimony regarding his relationship with Monica Lewinsky—the United States launched cruise missile strikes against suspected terrorist targets in Afghanistan and Sudan, coverage by the soft and hard news media once again differed dramatically. Whereas traditional news coverage encompassed a variety of themes—ranging from describing circumstances "on the ground" in Afghanistan and Sudan, to profiling Osama bin Laden, to reviewing military tactics, to calculating likely effects on international terrorism—that of the soft news media focused primarily on a single dramatic and highly accessible theme: the uncanny parallels between real-world events and a (until then) relatively obscure movie, called Wag the Dog. In the film, a fictional president hires a Hollywood producer to "produce" a phony war to distract the public from his involvement in a sex scandal.

Once again, using Lexis-Nexis, I reviewed transcripts from 12 soft news programs. <sup>14</sup> I found that, in the week following the attacks, 35 of 46 soft news stories on the subject (or 76%) addressed the Wag the Dog theme, repeatedly raising the question of whether the President might have launched the missile strikes to distract the nation from the Lewinsky scandal. In contrast, during that same period, the three network evening news programs, combined, mentioned Wag the Dog or Monica Lewinsky in only 11 of 69 (16%) stories on the missile strikes. <sup>15</sup>

More than ever before, consumers have a choice of consuming soft or hard news. And substantial numbers have opted primarily, if not exclusively, for the former, entertainment-oriented variety of programming. This raises the question of whether these developments have any meaningful implications for who is becoming informed about foreign crises.

<sup>13</sup> The programs I reviewed included Extra, Dateline, Jay Leno, David Letterman, Conan O'Brien, A Current Affair, Live with Regis and Kathy Lee, Entertainment Tonight, Howard Stern, E! News Daily, The E! Gossip Show, and The Geraldo Rivera Show.

Incidental Attention

The American people know little about politics (Delli Carpini and Keeter 1996; Converse 1964) and, over time, have grown less politically engaged (Niemi et al. 1989; Bennett 1986) and more cynical about all things political (Nye et al. 1997; Dionne 1991; Miller 1974). Moreover, for the past decade, Americans have been less concerned with foreign affairs than at any time since World War II (Moisy 1997; Holsti 1996). For instance, in the 1950s and 1960s, when asked by Gallup to name the most urgent problem facing the nation, about half of the public regularly mentioned issues relating to foreign affairs; in the past decade, the corresponding average fell to a postwar low of less than 8% (Baum 2000). These data suggest that, for many Americans, politics, including foreign policy, is of little interest.

Those who consider politics a waste of time are unlikely to pay attention to political information unless the time and effort required to do so (i.e., the expected costs) are extremely small, thereby removing any incentive to ignore it (Salomon 1984). One means of minimizing the costs associated with paying attention to low-benefit political information might be to attach or "piggyback" it to low-cost entertainment-oriented information. This would allow individuals to learn about politics passively (Neuman, Just, and Crigler 1992; Zukin with Snyder 1984), even if they are neither interested in the subject matter nor motivated to learn about it (Zukin with Snyder 1984; Robinson 1974; Wamsley and Pride 1972; Blumler and McQuail 1969; Fitzsimmons and Osburn 1968; Krugman 1965). Political information might thus become a free bonus, or incidental by-product, of paying attention to entertainment-oriented information. 16 In effect, piggybacking might, on occasion, render any trade-off between being entertained and learning about politics moot by, in effect, transforming a select few of the major political issues of the day into the entertainment that people seek.<sup>17</sup>

&lt;sup>14</sup> The programs I reviewed included Entertainment Tonight, Access Hollywood, Extra, The Daily Show, E! News Daily, Jay Leno, Conan O'Brien, Politically Incorrect, Howard Stern, 60 Minutes, 20/20, and Dateline. In those cases where I could not determine from the soft news program abstracts whether the Wag the Dog theme was addressed in a given story, I counted the story as non-Wag the Dogrelated coverage of the missile strikes. Hence, the figures reported below are conservative.

&lt;sup>15</sup> Because of the narrower (1-week) time frame in the latter comparison, in this instance I compared stories rather than broadcasts.

<sup>16</sup> Passive learning is possible because individuals are more likely to accept information presented in a nonconflictual manner, which does not arouse excitement (Krugman and Hartley 1970). Individuals learn passively by first choosing to expose themselves to a particular type of information (e.g., political news), say by watching the network news, but then surrendering control of the specific information to which they are exposed (Zukin and Snyder 1984). For instance, individuals unwilling to read about a political issue in the newspaper may be willing to watch a news story about the issue, even if they are not particularly interested in the subject matter, simply because watching television requires less effort (Eveland and Scheufele 2000). Incidental learning is merely an extreme form of passive learning, whereby the individual actively seeks one variety of information, say entertainment, and is unwittingly exposed to and accepts information of another sort entirely (e.g., political news).

This does not imply that the distinction between traditional and soft news has disappeared or that politically apathetic individuals have come to anticipate heightened benefits from consuming political news. Along these lines, Lutz (1975) points out an important distinction between first- and second-order cognitive effects in influencing attitude change. The former concerns information that directly addresses a given attitude object, such as an advertisement intended to convince a viewer to buy a particular brand of toothpaste. The

This does not imply that transforming news into entertainment will affect all viewers similarly. Indeed, survey evidence (e.g., Pew Center Media Consumption poll, May 1998; Media Monitor 1997b,) indicates that most people who consume traditional news do so primarily (albeit not exclusively) to learn about the issues of the day. 18 This suggests that increasing the entertainment value of news is unlikely to affect significantly these individuals' attentiveness to political news. Indeed, such individuals have already determined that political news is worth their time and effort. Watching soft news programs is unlikely to affect this calculus, even if they occasionally cover political issues. Rather, only individuals who would not otherwise be exposed to politics are likely to be affected by encountering political coverage in the soft news media, or by piggybacking.

Yet, even for the latter, politically uninterested individuals, piggybacking is possible only if information about a political issue can be attached to entertainment-oriented information without increasing the costs of paying attention. And this requires framing the information in terms accessible to even politically disengaged individuals (i.e., cheap framing).<sup>19</sup> Paying attention to news that employs highly accessible frames requires less cognitive energy than paying attention to traditional news formats, which might provoke greater cognitive conflict (Krugman and Hartley 1970). Such information is cheap. Indeed, absent cheap framing, piggybacking would almost certainly fail. In fact, for many individuals, if information about a political issue can be piggybacked to low-cost and high benefit, entertainment-oriented information, the associated costs of paying attention are virtually

This discussion suggests that by engaging in cheap framing and piggybacking, the soft news media may substantially reduce the expected costs of paying attention to those issues that lend themselves to these practices, such as political sex scandals, celebrity murder trials, and foreign policy crises. This, in turn, might induce individuals who do not normally seek information about politics or foreign affairs to attend to some latter concerns the effects of such new information, or attributes, on attitudes that are not the overt object of the information. In other words, the effects of information on attitudes tend to diffuse beyond the immediate object of attention, through a sort of cognitive branching process. So the toothpaste commercial may inadvertently trigger a change in a viewer's attitudes about other, seemingly unrelated objects. This suggests that information attended to by a viewer due to its entertainment value may have the unintended effect of influencing that individual's attitudes toward other things, such as, say, a foreign policy crisis.

policy crisis.

18 Though broadcasters have sought to make traditional news more accessible, continued falling ratings (e.g., Lichty and Gomery 1992) suggest that the audience for traditional news has not broadened.

information about such issues, even if their intrinsic interest, per se, remains low.

Summary and Hypotheses

Most of the time, the soft news media avoid politics entirely, in favor of more sensational issues, such as crime dramas, scandals, and celebrity gossip. Many entertainment-seeking television viewers may therefore remain largely uninformed about the day-to-day political issues facing the nation. When, however, an issue crosses over, via piggybacking, from network newscasts to the soft news media, a far broader audience will likely confront it. And unlike the relatively mundane or arcane presentation of political information offered by network newscasts, soft news programs employ cheap framing to appeal to entertainment-seeking audiences. Hence, for many individuals, the expected benefit of learning about politics, per se, is quite small. Yet the cognitive costs of paying attention to information about select political issues, including foreign crises, may, on occasion, be smaller still, due in no small measure to the efforts of soft news programmers to exploit such issues' previously untapped entertainment value and resulting suitability for piggybacking. A number of hypotheses follow from the theory. Four of these, which I test in the next section, are as follows

H<sub>1</sub>: People watch soft news programs to be entertained, not to learn about politics or foreign affairs.

H<sub>2</sub>: Ceteris paribus, people who are uninterested in foreign affairs and consume soft news should be more attentive to foreign crises (and other similarly accessible issues) than their counterparts who are similarly uninterested in foreign affairs but do not consume soft news.

H<sub>3</sub>: Ceteris paribus, soft news consumption should be most strongly positively related to foreign crisis attentiveness among the least politically engaged members of society and least strongly positively related to attentiveness among the most politically engaged members of the public.

H<sub>4</sub>: Ceteris paribus, other less accessible or dramatic, or more partisan, political issues are less likely to be covered by the soft news media, and hence, attentiveness to such issues should not be significantly related to consumption of soft news.

STATISTICAL INVESTIGATIONS

In this section, I conduct a series of statistical tests of each of the above hypotheses. Rather than rely on a single test or data set, I conduct multiple tests, employing five dependent variables, two data sets, and two distinct indicators of attentiveness: (1) the extent to which a respondent "followed" an issue and (2) a response of "don't know" or "not familiar" when asked about a specific issue. Both of these indicators, while differing in some respects, share a common underlying relationship with attentiveness. In other words, I argue that individuals who are attentive to a given issue are, relative to their inattentive counterparts, more likely to indicate that they have "followed" the issue and less likely to respond "don't know" or "not familiar" when asked about it. Given the difficulty in precisely measuring psychological constructs, such as attentiveness, if my hypotheses are supported across all five dependent variables, in both operationalizations of attentiveness, and in the two distinct data sets, this will represent far stronger evidence than would be possible using any single indicator or survey. (See Appendix B for a discussion of reliability and validity testing regarding the second indicator.) I begin, however, by testing the first hypothesis, concerning viewers' motivations for consuming soft news.

&lt;sup>19</sup> While there are many potential sources of accessibility, none approach the overwhelming predominance of the mass media in determining which issues command public attention, at least temporarily (Iyengar 1990; Krugman and Hartley 1970). Krugman and Hartley (1970) note that, as an ideal vehicle for passive learning, television has allowed many people to develop opinions on serious issues about which they would previously have replied "don't know" if queried (because they would have avoided learning about such issues).

Sex, Lies, and War March 2002

Why People Watch Soft News

While the preceding evidence showed that large numbers of Americans watch soft news, it did not explain why. Might some individuals tune in to soft news programs with the explicit intent of learning about foreign crises or other political issues? Such individuals may reason that, when a crisis or other major issue arises, the soft news media will offer more interesting coverage than network newscasts or newspapers. If so, the incidental by-product model would be irrelevant. Hypothesis 1, however, predicts that soft news viewers watch such programs for their entertainment value, not to learn about politics. To test this hypothesis, I employ a 1996 survey (Pew Center Media Consumption poll, May 1996), which asked respondents the extent to which they prefer news about entertainment, famous people, crime, national politics, or international affairs (among other topics), as well as to what extent they consume a variety of soft news media.<sup>20</sup>

I created an entertainment news interest index, based on the first three items mentioned above and a soft news consumption index based upon the latter series of questions.<sup>21</sup> If information about foreign crises, or other political issues, is being piggybacked to entertainment programming, primarily as an incidental by-product, then we should observe a strong positive correlation between interest in entertainment-oriented news and consumption of soft news media, but not between interest in news about international affairs or national politics and soft news consumption. In fact, this is just what I find. The entertainment news interest index correlates with the soft news consumption index at an impressive 0.40. The corresponding correlations with interest in international affairs and interest in national politics are nearly zero (-0.01 and -0.03, respectively). This strongly suggests that to the extent that individuals are receiving information about foreign crises, or other national political issues, in the soft news media, they are doing so not by design but, rather, as an incidental by-product of seeking entertainment. Any information about foreign crises or national politics appears in these data to be piggybacked to entertainment-oriented news. This result clearly supports Hypothesis 1.

Soft News Consumption and Following Foreign Crises

For the next investigation, my data are drawn from the aforementioned 1996 Pew Center survey of public media consumption habits. In addition to asking respondents which types of television and radio programming, magazines, and newspapers they watch, listen to, and read, the survey also asked if respondents had followed several foreign crisis issues.

As dependent variables, I focus on three questions, asking respondents how closely they had followed three foreign crisis-related issues: Bosnia, the Israel-Lebanon conflict, and a congressional debate on terrorism. In each case, responses fell into one of four categories: "not at all closely," "not too closely," "fairly closely," or "very closely." (Because the response categories form a reasonably symmetric ordinal scale, ordered logit is an appropriate estimator.) The independent variables, in turn, fall into three categories: socioeconomic status (age, education, family income, married, white gender), interest in and knowledge about politics (political knowledge, voted in 1992, political partisanship, approve Clinton, party Identification), and media consumption habits (cable subscriber, soft news index, hard news index). The latter two variables consist of a broad range of questions concerning respondents' interest in and attention to news and entertainment programming on television, on radio, in magazines, and in newspapers. I collapsed these variables into two indexes, the first representing the extent of respondents' exposure to a series of "hard" news sources and topics and the second capturing respondents' exposure to the soft news media. In addition to the two indexes, I separately control for respondents' level of interest in international affairs. Table 3 lists the components of each index (see Appendix A for variable coding and definitions).

Most of the items in the respective indexes fall fairly unambiguously into either the "hard" or the "soft" category. Yet several are less clear-cut. In particular, some readers might argue that network news magazines belong in the hard news category, while local television news is more appropriately characterized as soft news. Yet, as noted, recent studies have found that network news magazines cover primarily soft news topics. And local TV news, while it certainly offers large doses of soft news—and is clearly "softer" than, say, network newscasts—routinely covers traditional local, national, and international political and policy issues. In fact, according to a study of 49 stations in 15 cities (Rosenstiel, Gottlieb, and Brady 2000), "politics and government" is second only to "crime and law" as the most prevalent

&lt;sup>20</sup> The topical news interest scales run from 1 (minimum) to 4 (maximum) (see Appendix A).

&lt;sup>21</sup> The previously cited Media Monitor (1997a) study indicated that the first three items are among the primary topics of the soft news media. Five types of soft news programs are included in this additive scale, including entertainment news magazines, network news magazines, daytime television talk shows, MTV, and tabloid newspapers (i.e., The National Enquirer, The Sun, and The Star). Importantly, testing revealed that the reported results persist even when any single item is dropped from the scale.

TABLE 3. Items Included in Pew Survey Soft and Hard News Indexes

Hard News Index Items Soft News Index Items Watch network national Watch tabloid news news programs Watch local news Watch daytime talk shows Watch network news Watch business news Watch CNN magazines Watch C-SPAN Watch MTV Read tabloid newspapers Watch PBS News Hour with Jim Lehrer Follow news about entertainment Listen to National Public Radio Follow news about famous people Listen to news on radio Follow news about crime Read business magazines Read news magazines Read daily newspaper Follow news about national politics Follow news about business & finance Follow news/public affairs on Internet topic on local TV newscasts. Hence, at least by my definition, local TV news seems to be more appropriately characterized as "hard" news.

Note: In the Hard News Index, newspapers and radio are dichotomous, coded 1 if the respondent reads newspapers or listens to news on the radio and 0 otherwise.

Nonetheless, rather than prejudge the proper location of these items, I conducted a variety of tests to determine their appropriate placement in, or exclusion from, my indexes. First, I compared  $\alpha$  reliability scores with and without the suspect items and with each item moved to the opposing category. In each case, the reliability scores were highest when the items were located as in Table 3. (In fact, the hard and soft news indexes in Table 3 produce fairly strong  $\alpha$  reliability scores of 0.72 and 0.66, respectively, and correlate only modestly, at 0.19.) Next, I reran all of my models with one or both of the suspect items excluded or placed in the opposing index. The results indicated that excluding local news or network news magazines had only a modest effect on the reported results, while placing either item in the opposing index consistently weakened the results. Further testing also revealed that the results reported below persist in the absence of any single item from either index and, hence, are in no way artifacts of a particular index construction or item.<sup>22</sup>

Turning to my findings, in Table 4 I report the results from a series of ordered logit analyses employing the three dependent variables.<sup>23</sup> As one might anticipate, consumption of hard news is strongly positively associated with attentiveness to each foreign crisis (p < 0.001), as is political knowledge in the terrorism and Lebanon models. Interest in international affairs national news, local news, or internet news was removed.

<sup>22</sup> For instance, the hard news index performed similarly when national news local news or internet news was removed.

23 I employ probability weighting ("pweight" in Stata) in all models.

is also positively and significantly related to respondents' attentiveness to the three issues (p < 0.001).<sup>24</sup> Most importantly for my purposes, however, exposure to the soft news media is positively and significantly associated with attentiveness to each crisis, thereby, in each instance, supporting Hypothesis 2.

To determine whether exposure to soft news exerts differing effects on respondents with varying levels of overall interest in international affairs, I interact the latter variable with the soft news index. The results strongly support Hypothesis 3.25 The interaction term is significant, or nearly so, and correctly signed, in all three models (p < 0.01, p < 0.056, and p < 0.073). Because logit coefficients are difficult to interpret, I translate the coefficients on the key variables into probabilities, with all controls held constant at their mean values. The results indicate that, for individuals who report following international affairs "very" or "fairly" closely, exposure to soft news matters little for attentiveness to any of the three foreign crisis issues. Yet individuals who follow international affairs less closely (representing over one-third of the respondents) do appear to learn about each issue through the soft news media. Consistent with Hypothesis 3, the relationships are strongest for respondents who claim to follow international affairs "not at all" closely. Hence, I focus on this group.<sup>26</sup> Figure 1 presents three graphics showing the influence of exposure to the soft news media on the probability of following more than "not at all" closely, respectively, the Israel-Lebanon conflict (upper-right quadrant), the terrorism debate (lower-left quadrant), and Bosnia (lower-right quadrant).27

&lt;sup>24</sup> Many of the political interest and participation variables, however, are insignificant in some or all of the models. In several instances, this is attributable in part to multicollinearity among the control variables. For example, approval of President Clinton and party ID are correlated at 0.43. Nonetheless, for three reasons, this is not a major concern for my analyses. First, multicollinearity weakens, rather than strengthening, coefficients on collinear variables. Second, all of the suspect variables are included in my models only as controls, and hence, their substantive interpretations are not important for testing my hypotheses. Third, and most important, additional testing revealed that including or excluding these controls does not materially affect the coefficients or significance levels for the key causal variables.

&lt;sup>25</sup> The coefficients on the soft news index are also significant at p < 0.05 or better in all three models when the interaction terms are omitted (not shown).

&lt;sup>26</sup> The corresponding effects on respondents' probability of following the three issues "not very" closely, though not insignificant, are somewhat smaller in magnitude. Overall, the magnitude of the effects of increased soft news consumption declines as respondents' self-reported interest in news about international affairs increases.

&lt;sup>27</sup> One potential problem with my approach concerns the possibility of reverse causality between interest in international affairs and interest in the three foreign crisis issues. It is possible that respondents interested in these issues report systematically greater interest in international affairs because of their interest in those issues. (Indeed, the "interest in news about international affairs" question was asked after the foreign crisis questions, thereby perhaps increasing the possibility that the former may have influenced responses to the latter.) To investigate this, I constructed a system of two equations (not shown), simultaneously estimating the influence of attentiveness to a foreign crisis on interest in news about international affairs and the influence of the latter on the former. I then estimated the system, employing three-stage least squares ("reg3" in Stata). I repeated this

Independent Variable   Lebanon <sup>a</sup>   Terrorism <sup>a</sup>   Media usage   Soft News Index   0.097 (0.049)   0.148 (0.047)   0.090 (0.012)   0.109 (0.013)   0.090 (0.012)   0.0972 (0.037)   0.090 (0.013)   0.090 (0.013)   0.090 (0.013)   0.090 (0.013)   0.090 (0.013)   0.090 (0.013)   0.090 (0.013)   0.090 (0.041)   0.090 (0.041)   0.090 (0.041)   0.090 (0.033)   0.090 (0.033)   0.090 (0.033)   0.090 (0.033)   0.090 (0.033)   0.090 (0.033)   0.090 (0.033)   0.090 (0.033)   0.090 (0.033)   0.090 (0.033)   0.090 (0.090)   0.090 (0.060)	* *	1996 Primaries <sup>a</sup> 0.062 (0.044) 0.081 (0.014) 0.990 (0.342)	1998 Elections <sup>b</sup> 0.005 (0.016) 0.949 (0.158)	Tobacco <sup>b</sup>	Lewinsky <sup>b</sup>
0.097 (0.049)* 0.090 (0.012) 1.465 (0.334) 0.246 (0.137) 0.015 (0.004) 0.015 (0.040)* 0.024 (0.033) 0.012 (0.115) 0.012 (0.115)	* *	0.062 (0.044) 0.081 (0.014) 0.990 (0.342) 0.074 (0.140)	0.005 (0.016) 0.949 (0.158)	0 000 (0 045)
1.465 (0.334)  0.246 (0.137)  0.015 (0.004)  -0.096 (0.040)*  -0.024 (0.033)  -0.122 (0.115)  -0.023 (0.038)	*	0.990 (0.342) 0.074 (0.140)		1.059 (0.164)	0.054 (0.016) 0.227 (0.163)
0.246 (0.137) 0.015 (0.004) -0.096 (0.040)* -0.024 (0.033) -0.122 (0.115) -0.023 (0.038) -0.073 (0.167)		0.074 (0.140)	- CO CO CO	——————————————————————————————————————
0.015 (0.004) -0.096 (0.040)* -0.024 (0.033) -0.122 (0.115) -0.023 (0.038)			0.502 (0.081) -0.138 (0.143)	0.000 (0.144)	0.832 (0.088) -0.045 (0.148)
-0.096 (0.040)* -0.096 (0.040)* -0.024 (0.033) - -0.122 (0.115) -0.023 (0.038) - -0.173 (0.167)		(1000)
-0.024 (0.033) -0.056 -0.122 (0.115) 0.117 -0.023 (0.038) -0.081 -0.173 (0.167) -0.330	-0.043 (0.041)	0.003 (0.004) 0.060 (0.040)	0.008 (0.004)* 0.033 (0.046)	0.003 (0.005) 0.024 (0.047)	0.006 (0.005)
-0.122 (0.115) 0.117 -0.023 (0.038) -0.081 -0.173 (0.167) -0.330	-0.019 (0.034)	0.004 (0.032)	0.054 (0.037)	-0.005 (0.037)	0.004 (0.036)
-0.023 (0.038) -0.081 -0.173 (0.167) -0.330	-0.138 (0.118)	0.178 (0.119)	-0.211 (0.128)	-0.105 (0.128)	0.117 (0.126)
	0.004 (0.038)	0.019 (0.036)	-0.041 (0.041)	0.041 (0.043)	0.048 (0.040)
Political interest & knowledge			-0.013 (0.131)	0.459 (0.192)	0.102 (0.130)
0.151 (0.063)*	0.078 (0.064)	0.122 (.063)*	l	i	I
0.109 (0.148)		0.253 (0.138)	0.546 (0.153)	-0.146(0.155)	-0.273(0.154)
np —0.093 (0.110)		0.205 (0.112)	0.215 (0.081)	0.122 (0.079)	0.153(0.085)
Failty   U.C.45	-0.043 (0.039) 0.026 (0.106)	0.172 (0.038)	0.047 (0.042)	-0.023(0.042)	-0.031 (0.043)
(00:0)	0.053 (0.100)	0.000 (0.104)	-0.203 (0.13 t )	-0.021 (0.130)	-0.442 (0.151)
Soft News Index ×
International Affairs —0.031 (0.017) —0.032 (0.017)	-0.048 (0.018)	ľ	1	I	I
National Politics — — — — —	l	-0.016 (0.017)	I	i	I
5.217 (1.059)	4.621 (1.105)	5.019 (0.957)	3.769 (0.558)	2.514 (0.544)	1.755 (0.517)
Constant 2 6.932 (1.069) 7.662 (1.060)	6.459 (1.119)	6.559 (0.971)	5.088 (0.572)	3.833 (0.547)	3.197 (0.524)
0.13  (N = 1319)	8.624 (1.126) 0.10 (N=1322)	8.561 (0.984) 0.11 ( $N = 1322$ )	7.013 (0.591) 0 11 (N – 1048)	5.896 (0.563) 0.08 / N=1049)	5.182 (0.538)

100

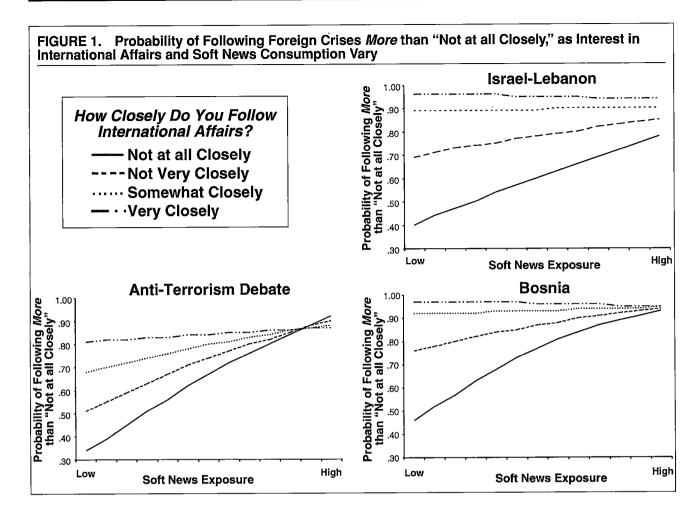

Figure 1 indicates that, among respondents who follow international affairs "not at all closely," as attentiveness to the soft news media increases from its lowest to its highest levels, the probability of following the Israel–Lebanon conflict more than "not at all closely" increases by 38 percentage points (from 0.40 to 0.78). The corresponding increases for the congressional antiterrorism debate and Bosnia are 58 percentage points (from 0.34 to 0.92) and 47 percentage points (from 0.46 to 0.93), respectively.<sup>28</sup>

Figure 1 does not reveal how much attention respondents paid to the three issues. To estimate the magnitude of the effect of soft news, we can observe the extent of self-declared attentiveness as soft news consumption increases. In fact, a majority of respondents whose likelihood of following the three issues "not at all closely" declined as their soft news consumption increased appear, in these data, to have instead followed them "fairly closely." This suggests that the soft news effect is substantial. As soft news consumption increases, the corresponding probabilities of following the Israel-Lebanon conflict, antiterrorism debate, and Bosnia intervention "fairly closely" increase by 19 (from 0.09 to 0.28), 34 (from 0.08 to 0.42), and 41 (from 0.10 to 0.51) percentage points, respectively.<sup>29</sup> Each of these results clearly supports Hypothesis 3, suggesting that respondents who are uninterested in international affairs are nonetheless exposed to information about all three crisis issues through the soft news media.30 process for each of the three crisis attention variables. In each case, the results—which were robust across numerous specifications of the exogenous variables—indicated that interest in international affairs increased the likelihood of being attentive to foreign crises, while being attentive had no effect on interest in international affairs. Such results are, of course, only as good as the instruments created for the endogenous variables. In this case, the  $R^2$  values for the various models suggest that the instruments for interest in international affairs (0.40 for Bosnia, 0.29 for Lebanon, and 0.38 for terrorism) were superior to those for attentiveness to the three crisis issues (0.23, 0.26, and 0.20, respectively). Hence, these results must be interpreted with caution.

<sup>29</sup> Variations in soft news consumption produce somewhat weaker effects on the probability of following the three issues "not too closely" or "very closely" (not shown).

&lt;sup>28</sup> Among the highest soft news consumers, those most interested in international affairs are modestly less likely to have followed the terrorism debate than their less intrinsically interested counterparts. This suggests that for politically engaged individuals, soft news represents something of a distraction. These differences, however, are extremely small and thus are most likely substantively meaningless.

&lt;sup>30</sup> The relationships are strongest for the antiterrorism debate (which is clearly linked by the public to international terrorism). This is most likely due, in large measure, to the national trauma produced by the World Trade Center and Oklahoma City bombings. Millions of Americans perceived themselves as holding a personal stake in the terrorism debate, and so it was a more immediate concern (and thus more accessible) than Bosnia or the Israel–Lebanon conflict.

The question remains whether, as predicted by Hypothesis 4, the above interaction disappears if the respondents are asked about an issue covered intensely by the traditional news media but not by the soft news media. If the interaction persists, this would suggest that the above relationships may be artifacts of some omitted variable(s), such as, perhaps, greater overall media exposure by soft news consumers. One appropriate political issue for addressing this question is a presidential primary election. Primaries are highly partisan events and, hence, less appealing to a politically cynical populace. They ought therefore to be less amenable than foreign crises to cheap framing and piggybacking.<sup>31</sup> In fact, a content analysis of soft news coverage of the Republican presidential candidates during the 1996 primaries, shown in Table 2, found, with several exceptions, far less coverage of the primaries than of any of the foreign crises included in that table.32

Fortunately, the same survey asked whether respondents had followed news about the Republican presidential candidates during the 1996 primary election campaign. As with the previous models, the dependent variable is a four-category scale, measuring the extent to which respondents followed the Republican primaries. I tested this dependent variable against three distinct models. The first, shown in the fifth column in Table 4, includes an interaction between the soft news index and interest in national politics.<sup>33</sup> The others (not shown) include interactions between the soft news index and political partisanship or political knowledge.

The theoretical distinction between foreign crises and presidential primaries rests upon the differing degrees to which each is amenable to cheap framing and piggybacking.<sup>34</sup> Issues that are not so amenable

<sup>31</sup> Primary elections involving major scandals or celebrities may not follow this general pattern. Examples here include Gary Hart's affair with Donna Rice, which derailed his campaign in 1988, Bill Clinton's various scandals during the 1992 primary (e.g., Gennifer Flowers and marijuana use), and the involvement of Warren Beatty and Donald Trump in the 2000 primaries. Each of these candidates attracted some soft news media coverage, due either to their personal foibles or to their personal notoriety.

plus at least one of the other key words.)

33 Here, I replaced interest in national politics with interest in international affairs in the hard news index.

are unlikely to attract significant soft news coverage. As noted, while I focus on foreign crises as a "most difficult" test, this distinction is general. If it is valid, we should find positive relationships between exposure to soft news and attentiveness to any political issue easily framed in highly accessible terms and therefore covered by the soft news media. In contrast, most typical political issues, which tend not to possess these characteristics, are unlikely to be covered by the soft news media, and hence, we should not find statistically significant relationships. In fact, consistent with Hypothesis 4, soft news proved highly insignificant across all three specifications, and as anticipated, the interactions did not emerge. Hence, the soft news media appear in these relationships to contribute to attentiveness to foreign crises but not to the 1996 presidential primaries.

A second survey (Pew Center, Believability of Media/People poll, May 1998) allows a more general test of this distinction. Respondents were asked the same media exposure questions employed in the 1996 survey (plus questions regarding several newer programs). They were also asked how closely they had followed several high-profile issues, including the Monica Lewinsky scandal, tobacco regulation, and the 1998 election campaigns. (See Appendix A for question wording.)

As a further test of Hypothesis 4, I conducted a series of ordered logit analyses, employing, as dependent variables, respondents' self-reported extent of following each of these issues. I also constructed hard and soft news indexes similar to those presented in Table 2 and included a similar set of control variables. (The coding of all variables is identical to that in the 1996 Pew survey. See Appendix A for a listing of the items included in the hard and soft news indexes.<sup>35</sup>) If Hypothesis 4 is valid, we should find a statistically significant positive relationship between exposure to soft news and attentiveness to the Lewinsky scandal, particularly, per Hypothesis 3, among respondents who do not normally follow politics, but not to either the tobacco debate or the 1998 election campaigns. The former issue represents the classic material of soft news: a sex scandal involving a high-profile public figure. The latter issues, in contrast, are far more complex and (intrinsically) partisan and, thus, less amenable to cheap framing and piggybacking.<sup>36</sup> In fact, as anticipated,

&lt;sup>32</sup> The exceptions were late-night talk shows and MTV. The former programs, which were not included in the Pew survey, have a long tradition of political humor. And in 1996, MTV continued its "Rock the Vote" campaign, intended to bring young voters into the political process. These figures cover the period January through April 1996. Because the Pew Center survey was concluded in early May, this was an appropriate cutoff point. Moreover, by May, the primary season was largely concluded and the nomination wrapped up. Hence, adding May and June to the figures in Table 2 changes the overall tallies only marginally. (Key words employed in this search included Bob Dole, Steve Forbes, Lamar Alexander, Phil Gramm, Pat Buchanan, Alan Keyes, primary, campaign, candidate, election, caucus, and Republican. All "hits" mentioned at least one candidate, plus at least one of the other key words.)

<sup>34</sup> This distinction may not always hold for general presidential elections, which are much higher profile and geared less toward appealing to party loyalists. Having won their party's nomination, candidates typically seek to broaden their appeal to the center of the political spectrum. This makes general election campaigns potentially more amenable to cheap framing and piggybacking. For instance, the 2000 presidential election attracted substantial soft news media coverage, especially among daytime and late-night talk shows. Indeed, talk shows have always offered occasional coverage of presidential politics. During the 1960 presidential campaign, for instance, Richard Nixon sought to "humanize" himself by playing piano on The Tonight Show (Rosenberg 2000). And in 1992, Bill Clinton courted young voters by playing his saxophone on the Arsenio Hall Show and appearing on MTV. Yet, prior to 2000, such instances were relatively rare and arguably of limited political consequence.

 $<sup>^{35}</sup>$  The  $\alpha$  reliability scores for the new soft and hard news indexes are 0.70 and 0.75, respectively.

&lt;sup>36</sup> Though the Lewinsky scandal became intensely partisan, soft news media coverage focused primarily on the more sensationalistic, sexually oriented aspects, rather than on partisan politics in Washington.

additional content analyses indicated that, to an even greater extent than the 1996 Republican primaries, the soft news programs listed in Table 2 appear hardly to have noticed the 1998 elections, while soft news coverage of the tobacco debate approached zero. In sharp contrast, most of the soft news programs listed in Table 2 provided substantial coverage of the Lewinsky scandal.<sup>37</sup>

Not surprisingly, the results, shown in Table 4 indicate that attentiveness to neither the tobacco debate nor to the 1998 election campaigns is significantly related to soft news exposure, while both are strongly related to hard news exposure. In contrast, attentiveness to the Lewinsky scandal, which received substantial soft news coverage, is strongly related to soft news exposure (p < 0.01). This further suggests that the relationships identified in Fig. 1 are not mere artifacts of overall greater media or news exposure among soft news consumers.

Finally, to see if the distinction I have drawn between foreign crises and other foreign policy issues is valid, I also conducted content analyses of soft news coverage of NAFTA and the World Trade Organization (January 1, 1992, to February 29, 2000).<sup>39</sup> With the sole exception of NAFTA-related humor on three late-night talk shows (almost exclusively presidential humor), the soft news programs all but ignored NAFTA and the WTO.<sup>40</sup>

Indeed, a key word search of three soft news programs (Access Hollywood, Entertainment Tonight, and Extra), using Lexis-Nexis (Baum n.d.), revealed that, while covering the scandal—including the House and Senate impeachment hearings and trial—in literally hundreds of broadcasts, the three programs, in sharp contrast to the network news, mentioned the word "Democrat" or "Republican" a combined total of twice in their scandal coverage (both of which were incidental to the stories).

<sup>37</sup> The time frames for these content analyses were as follows: (1) 1998 elections, January 1, 1998–November 3, 1998; (2) tobacco debate, January 1, 1998–December 31, 1998; and (3) Lewinsky scandal, January 21, 1998–April 30, 1998. One news content monitoring report found that in the week following the January 21, 1998, breaking of the Lewinsky story, tabloid TV news magazines accounted for about one-third of all coverage of the scandal (Lowry 1998, F1).

<sup>38</sup> Consistent with Hypothesis 3, all of these patterns persist when an interaction with interest in news about national politics is included (not shown).

<sup>39</sup> Key words for the latter analyses included NA FTA. World Trade

<sup>39</sup> Key words for the latter analyses included NAFTA, World Trade Organization or WTO, and Monica Lewinsky. Key words for the 1998 elections included election or campaign and Congress, or governor or legislature. Key words for the tobacco debate included Congress and tobacco (all hits included both terms). Traditional news programs covered these issues extensively. The identical search terms produced 58 stories related to the 1998 elections on ABC's World News Tonight. The corresponding figures for the CBS Evening News, NBC Nightly News, and Jim Lehrer News Hour were 36, 45, and 56 stories, respectively. The tobacco search terms returned 30 related stories on ABC's World News Tonight. The corresponding figures for the CBS Evening News, NBC Nightly News, and Jim Lehrer News Hour were 22, 29, and 30 stories, respectively.

<sup>40</sup> Due to their relatively greater complexity and the absence of easily identifiable moral "heroes" or "villains," these two foreign affairs issues seem relatively unlikely to appeal to the soft news media. All WTO coverage focused on the protests at a December 1999 WTO meeting in Seattle. Perhaps due to the absence of serious injuries or fatalities, even the protests failed to attract substantial soft news media coverage of the WTO. Not surprisingly,

Taken together, these results offer substantial support for the theory.

Soft News Consumption and Familiarity with Foreign Crises

It remains possible that the relationships identified in the prior analysis are artifacts of either the survey instrument or my operationalization of attentiveness. As noted, attentiveness is difficult to precisely measure. Hence, in this section I replicate the results from the prior investigations, using an additional, distinct yet conceptually related, operational indicator of attentiveness: respondents' familiarity with the Northern Ireland conflict and peace process. For this analysis, I employ a July 1998 poll (Gallup Media/Social Security poll, July 1998) addressing several major public policy issues, including the peace process in Northern Ireland. The United States has been intimately involved for many years in efforts to resolve the civil war in Northern Ireland. Moreover, the Clinton Administration played a central role in drafting the Good Friday peace agreement ending the conflict and in convincing the various parties to sign it. Additionally, the conflict has attracted the attention of high-profile celebrities, such as the Irish rock band U2, whose efforts to promote the peace process were widely reported by the soft news media. Hence, while the Northern Ireland peace process is not the archetypal U.S. foreign crisis, I believe that it is an appropriate issue for further testing Hypotheses 2 and 3.4

As dependent variables, I focus on two questions concerning respondents' sympathies in the conflict and their estimation of the prospects for a peaceful settlement. I transformed the responses into binary variables, coded 0 for responses of "don't know/not familiar (with)" and 1 otherwise. In this instance, I employ respondents' willingness to offer an opinion about an issue as an indicator of attentiveness to the issue (Page and Shapiro 1983). The independent variables are similar to the prior analyses, including hard and soft news indexes constructed from a variety of media coverage of NAFTA and the WTO was far greater in network news. For instance, during the same time periods, the CBS Evening News covered NAFTA and WTO in 67 and 23 separate broadcasts, respectively, and the figures for the other major networks are comparable.

&lt;sup>41</sup> A review of Lexis-Nexis transcripts revealed that many soft news programs covered the issue, often on numerous occasions. A partial list of soft news programs covering Northern Ireland includes A Current Affair, The View, Live with Regis and Kathy Lee, 20/20, 48 Hours, 60 Minutes, David Letterman, and Comedy Central's The Daily Show. Interestingly, exposure to hard news is here unrelated to familiarity with Northern Ireland. This most likely reflects the overwhelming domestic orientation of most traditional news programs in 1998, which were heavily focused on the politics of the Lewinsky scandal. While the soft news media also focused on the scandal, they were more likely to highlight possible relationships between the president's domestic difficulties and his foreign policy initiatives initiatives. <sup>42</sup> Overall, 22 and 15% of respondents, respectively, chose "don't know/not familiar with."

TABLE 5.	Logit Analysis of Attentiveness to Northern Ireland, as Soft News Consumption and Education	Level Vary

		Coeffic	cient (SE)
Independent Variable	Ireland (A1)	Ireland (A2)	Ireland (B1)	Ireland (B2)
Media usage
Soft News Index	0.656 (0.331)*	1.576 (0.804)*	0.850 (0.374)*	2.003 (1.019)*
Hard News Index	-0.270 (0.349)	-0.285 (0.343)	0.179 (0.490)	0.198 (0.482)
SES characteristics	, ,	( - /	(	(51.100)
Age	-0.008 (0.043)	-0.004 (0.043)	0.033 (0.051)	0.038 (0.051)
Age <sup>2</sup>	-0.000(0.000)	-0.000 (0.000)	-0.000 (0.001)	-0.001 (0.001)
Education	0.225 (0.093)*	0.526 (0.281)	0.506 (0.135)	0.917 (0.355)
Family Income	0.099 (0.087)	0.100 (0.088)	0.076 (0.117)	0.074 (0.119)
Female	-0.485 (0.285)	-0.474 (0.286)	-0.434 (0.411)	-0.442 (0.414)
African American	-0.414 (0.452)	-0.458 (0.445)	-2.072 (0.500)	-2.154 (0.501)
Hispanic	0.206 (0.591)	0.209 (0.591)	0.489 (0.781)	0.517 (0.785)
Unemployed	-0.223 (0.401)	-0.324 (0.406)	-1.307 (0.503)	-1.425 (0.501)
Political partisanship	, ,	, ,	, ,	(5.55.)
Liberal-Conservative	-0.131 (0.150)	-0.141 (0.152)	-0.531 (0.208)	-0.550 (0.210)
Party Identification	-0.033 (0.098)	-0.031 (0.098)	0.258 (0.139)	0.262 (0.140)
Approve Clinton	0.446 (0.321)	0.440 (0.325)	0.033 (0.453)	0.029 (0.464)
Interaction term	, ,	, ,	, ,	(,
Soft News Index X Education	_	-0.154 (0.136)	_	-0.217 (0.174)
Constant	-0.205 (1.426)	-2.034 (1.944)	-1.760 (1.522)	-3.983 (2.457)
Pseudo-R <sup>2</sup>	0.06 (N = 496)	$0.06  (\dot{N} = 496)$	$0.20 \ (\hat{N} = 503)$	0.21 (N = 503)

Note: All models employ White's heteroscedasticity-consistent standard errors and probability weighting. *p < 0.05; **p < 0.01; ***p < 0.001.

consumption items.<sup>43</sup> (See Appendix A for variable coding and question wording.<sup>44</sup>)

Results from logit analyses of the two dependent variables are reported in the second and fourth columns in Table 5. Consistent with Hypothesis 2, in both models, exposure to soft news is positively associated with attentiveness to Northern Ireland (p < 0.05). Once again, I translate the coefficient on soft news index into probabilities of offering an opinion as exposure to soft news varies. The results indicate that, as exposure to soft news increases from its minimum to its maximum values, the probability of having an opinion about the Northern Ireland peace process increases by 25 and 13 percentage points, for the first and second dependent variables (Questions A and B), respectively. Among these respondents, soft news programs were indeed a source of information about the Northern Ireland peace process.

To test Hypothesis 3, it is necessary to identify an appropriate indicator for respondents' propensity to follow politics or international affairs. While this survey does not include such direct questions, research has shown education to be closely related to political knowledge and engagement (Krause 1997; Bennett 1995; MacKuen 1984; Converse 1964). Hence, I employ education as an indicator of respondents' political engagement. I therefore interact education and the soft news index to capture the differing effects of exposure to soft news on respondents at differing levels of education.

March 2002

The results, shown in the third and fifth columns in Table 5, once again support my hypothesis. For both dependent variables, exposure to soft news exerts a far stronger effect on attentiveness to Northern Ireland among less educated respondents. Indeed, the effects of exposure to soft news diminish in a stepwise fashion as respondents move up the education ladder. In the two graphics in Figure 2, I again translate the key coefficients into probabilities.

Among respondents who completed only primary school, as exposure to soft news increases from its lowest to its highest values, the probability of having an opinion about Northern Ireland increases by 55 and 54 percentage points, respectively, for the two dependent variables (Questions A and B). In contrast, among respondents possessing a graduate degree, a maximum increase in exposure to soft news is associated with modest increases of 5 and 0.3 percentage points, respectively. Despite differences in survey organization, dates, items available for inclusion in the hard and soft news indexes, control variables, and operationalizations of attentiveness across the two data sets, the curves in Figures 1 and 2 are strikingly similar. Combined, the results from these several analyses represent substantial additional support for the theory.

&lt;sup>43</sup> The hard and soft news index items produced  $\alpha$  reliability scores of 0.60 and 0.59, respectively.

&lt;sup>44</sup> Due to differences in question availability, format, and performance, four controls not included in Table 4 are added (age<sup>2</sup>, African American, Hispanic, unemployed, liberal-conservative) and three that were present in Table 4 are excluded (political knowledge, political partisanship, and white). Once again, variations in model specification produce only marginal changes in the reported results.

CONCLUSION

Beginning in the 1980s, news broadcasters, facing unprecedented competitive pressures, came to recognize that real-life human drama could attract a large audience and could be produced at a far lower cost than fictional drama. According to Danny Schechter, a former producer for CNN and ABC's news magazine 20/20, the Persian Gulf War drove home for news executives the huge ratings potential of military conflicts, which could be realized by transforming war reporting into a made-for-television soap opera:

It started with the Gulf War—the packaging of news, the graphics, the music, the classification of stories.... Everybody benefited by saturation coverage. The more channels, the more a sedated public will respond to this.... If you can get an audience hooked, breathlessly awaiting every fresh disclosure with a recognizable cast of characters they can either love or hate, with a dramatic arc and a certain coming down to a deadline, you have a winner in terms of building audience. (Scott 1998)

Through cheap framing, the soft news media have successfully piggybacked information about foreign crises (and other highly accessible issues, such as the Lewinsky scandal) to entertainment-oriented information. Soft news consumers thereby gain information about such issues as an incidental by-product of seeking entertainment. My statistical investigations demonstrated that individuals do learn about these types of issues—but not other, less accessible or dramatic issues—from the soft news media, without necessarily tuning in with the intention of doing so.

Substantial scholarly research has shown that public opinion can, at least sometimes, influence policy outcomes, including in foreign policy (Kernell 1997; Powlick 1995; Bartels 1991; Ostrom and Job 1986; Page and Shapiro 1983). And even minimal attention to politics through the mass media disproportionately increases partisan stability in voting (Zukin 1977). This suggests that soft news media coverage of foreign policy may have significant practical consequences for American politics. Indeed, while viewers of many of these programs are not among the most politically engaged Americans (Davis and Owen 1998), low-attention individuals do vote in significant numbers. According to the Pew Center surveys employed in this study (1996 and 1998), over 60% of respondents who consumed more than one standard deviation above the mean quantity of soft news and were eligible to vote in 1992 and 1996, respectively, indicated that they had done so. While self-declared voting rates in surveys are typically inflated [by about 10%, according to Kelly and Mirer (1974)], the difference between these respondents and the self-declared voting rates for frequent hard news viewers is less than 18 percentage points in both surveys. And, in the same surveys, individuals who did not attend college were 22 and 26 percentage points less likely to have voted in 1992 and 1996, respectively, than their college-educated counterparts; substantial differences to be sure, but hardly overwhelming. Clearly, many soft news viewers and politically inattentive individuals vote. While determining the precise policy effects of this phenomenon is beyond the scope of this project, in a democratic political system, in which leaders are directly accountable to the public, it seems unlikely that heightened awareness of policy decision making by a previously disengaged segment of the population would be entirely without consequence.

Indeed, I have presented some evidence suggesting that the soft news media may not necessarily cover political issues in the same way that traditional news programs do. And research has shown that the nature of the political information people consume can influence the substance of the opinions they express (Iyengar and Kinder 1987; Key 1961). This, in turn, raises the possibility that, at least in some instances, and regarding some issues, the opinions of individuals whose primary source of political information is the soft news media might differ materially from those of their more politically attentive counterparts. Along these lines, elsewhere (Baum n.d.) I report evidence that, among individuals who are not highly educated or politically aware, increased soft news consumption—net of demographic and political characteristics and hard news consumption patterns—is associated with substantially reduced support for America's overseas commitments as well as an increase in the propensity to view those issues and themes most prevalent in the soft news media (e.g., crime, morality, scandal, or foreign crisis issues), relative to other policy areas, as the nation's most urgent problems.45

My findings further suggest that some of the barriers to information and political participation confronting democratic citizens may be falling. Where America's foreign policy was once the domain of a fairly small "foreign policy elite," the soft news media appear to have, to some extent, "democratized" foreign policy. This represents both a challenge and an opportunity for America's political leaders. It is a challenge because leaders can no longer count on communicating effectively with the American people solely through traditional news outlets (Baum and Kernell 1999; Hess 1998). To reach those segments of the public who eagerly reach for their remotes any time traditional political news appears on the screen, leaders must reformulate their messages in terms that appeal to programs preferred by these politically uninterested individuals.

The rise of the soft news media also offers an opportunity, because, to the extent that they are able to adapt their messages accordingly, soft news outlets allow leaders to communicate with segments of the population that have traditionally tuned out politics and foreign affairs entirely. This may allow future leaders to expand their support coalitions beyond the traditionally attentive segments of the population. Broader support coalitions, in turn, may translate into more effective leadership, particularly in difficult times.

Finally, from the citizens' perspective, one might be tempted to take heart from the apparent leveling-off of attentiveness to foreign policy across differing groups of Americans. After all, a more broadly attentive public might yield more broad-based participation in the political process. Many democratic theorists would likely consider this a desirable outcome. Yet it is unclear whether more information necessarily makes better citizens, particularly if the quality or diversity of that information is suspect. Indeed, one might also be tempted to wonder about the implications of a citizenry learning about the world through the relatively narrow lens of the entertainment-oriented soft news media.

APPENDIX A: SURVEY QUESTION WORDING AND CODING

Pew Center May 1996 and May 1998 Media Consumption Poll Variables (Telephone Surveys; N = 1751 and N = 3002, Respectively)

All Pew survey data can be downloaded at http://www.people-press.org.

Dependent Variables. "Now I will read a list of some stories covered by news organizations this past month. As I read each item, tell me if you happened to follow this news story very closely, fairly closely, not too closely, or not at all closely": (1) "the military conflict between Israel and the pro-Iranian Muslims in Lebanon" (1996), (2) "the passage in Congress of a new law dealing with domestic terrorism" (1996), (3) "the situation in Bosnia" (1996), (4) "allegations of sexual misconduct against Bill Clinton" (1998), (5) "the debate in Washington over legislation to regulate the tobacco industry" (1998), and (6) "candidates and election campaigns in your state" (1998). Coding: 1 = "not at all closely," 2 = "not very closely," 3 = "fairly closely," and 4 = "very closely."

Political Interest and Knowledge. Voted in 1992 (or 1996): Dummy variable, coded 1 if respondent voted in 1992 (or 1996, in 1998 survey) and 0 otherwise.

Political Knowledge (1996 only): Respondents' levels of political knowledge were estimated through construction of a scale, derived from three knowledge-based questions. Respondents were asked if they knew (a) "who the Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives is," (b) "which political party has a majority in the U.S. House of Representatives," and (c) "what the federal minimum wage is today." (For the minimum wage question, answers within one category of the correct answer, on a seven-category scale, were coded as correct responses.) Respondents were given 1 point for each correct response, resulting in a 3-point scale, with a score of 3 representing those most politically knowledgeable. Responses of "Don't know/refused" were coded as incorrect.

Partisanship: Three-point scale estimating the extent of the respondent's partisanship (from party ID question). Coding: 1 = no preference; 2 = Independent or other; 3 = Democrat or Republican.

Party Identification: Five-point scale. Coding: 1 = Democrat; 2 = Independent, leaning Democratic; 3 = Independent, no preference, or other; 4 = Independent, leaning Republican; 5 = Republican.

1996 Media Consumption (Questions Employed in Soft and Hard News Indexes). Note: All media indexes are ordinal scales, based on the sum of all individual items.

(A) "Now I'd like to know how often you watch or listen to certain TV and radio programs. For each that I read, tell me if you watch or listen to it regularly, sometimes, hardly ever, or never. Network Newscasts; Local Newscasts; CNN; CSPAN; NPR; TV News Magazines; PBS News Hour with Jim Lehrer;

&lt;sup>45</sup> For instance, in one March 1998 Gallup Poll, among respondents with less than a 12th-grade education, greater soft news consumption was associated with significantly reduced support for NATO. And in the 2000 National Election Study (NES), increased exposure to day-time talk shows was associated with significantly reduced approval of President Clinton's handling of foreign policy (VAR 000515) and reduced support for U.S. overseas commitments (VAR 000513a). Finally, in a May 1998 Pew Center poll asking respondents to name the nation's most important problems, greater exposure to soft news, but not hard news consumption, was associated with an increased propensity to mention issues pertaining to foreign crises (including terrorism), crime, morality, or scandal and a reduced propensity to mention other, less dramatic policy issues, such as the state of the economy and education. In each instance, these effects weaken as respondents move up the political awareness or education ladders.

MTV; Tabloid TV Shows; Daytime TV Talk Shows." Coding: 1 = never; 2 = hardly ever; 3 = sometimes; 4 = regularly.

(B) "I'm going to read you a list of different types of news. Please tell me how closely you follow this type of news either in the newspaper, on television, or on radio...very closely, somewhat closely, not very closely, or not at all closely. International Affairs; Political News; Business News; News About Crime; News About Famous People; News About Entertainment." Coding: 1 = not at all closely; 2 = not very closely; 3 = somewhat closely; 4 = very closely.

(C) "Now I'd like to know how often you read certain types of publications. As I read each, tell me if you read them regularly, sometimes, hardly ever, or never. [First,] how about: Tabloid Newspapers (i.e., The National Enquirer, The Sun or The Star); News Magazines; Business Magazines." Coding: 1 = never: 2 = hardly ever; 3 = sometimes; 4 = regularly.

(D) Daily Newspaper: Dummy variable coded 1 if the respondent reads a newspaper regularly and 0 otherwise.

(E) News on Internet: "Do you ever go on-line to get information on current events, public issues and politics? If yes, how often do you go on-line for this type of information ... every day, 3 to 5 days per week, 1 or 2 days per week, once every few weeks, or never?" Coding: 1 = never; 2 = less than once every few weeks; 3 = every few weeks or 1-2 days per week; 4 = 3-5 days per week or every day.

Cable Subscriber: Dummy variable coded 1 if the respondent currently subscribes to cable and 0 otherwise. (This question is included as a separate control.)

1998 Soft and Hard News Index Components. Soft News Index: Ten-item scale constructed from the identical general question format as in the 1996 Survey, and including the following items: MTV, Tabloid TV News Magazines, Daytime Talk Shows, Court TV, Morning News/Variety Shows, News Magazine Shows, Entertainment Tonight, The National Enquirer, Howard Stern, and People Magazine.

Hard News Index: Thirteen-item scale constructed from the same question format as the soft news index and including the following items: Nightly Network News Programs, Local Television News Programs, CNN, C-SPAN, National Public Radio, The Newshour with Jim Lehrer, CNBC, MSNBC, Fox News, News Magazines, Business Magazines, Harpers Magazine, and Daily Newspapers. (The Daily Newspapers item is a 6-point scale, with respondents receiving one point each for indicating that they read the following newspapers: New York Times, Wall Street Journal, Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, Herald Tribune, and Boston Globe.)

July 1998 Gallup Media/Social Security Poll Variables (Telephone Survey; N = 619)

Dependent Variables. (A) "In the situation in Northern Ireland, are your sympathies—(1) more with the Irish Catholics, or (2) more with the Irish Protestants, (3) both, (4) neither, (5) don't know/not familiar." (B) "As you may know, the leaders of the two opposing sides in Northern Ireland have reached a new compromise agreement concerning the governance of Northern Ireland. Are you generally optimistic or pessimistic that this agreement will lead to lasting peace in Northern Ireland?—(1) optimistic, (2) pessimistic, (3) don't know/not familiar with." Coding: 0="don't know/not familiar with"; 1= all other responses.

Media Consumption (Questions Employed in Soft and Hard News Indexes). (A) "Now, I would like to ask you some questions about the media. As you know, people get their news and information from many different sources, and I would like to ask you where you get YOUR news and information. I will read a list of sources, and for each one, please tell me how often you get your news from that source: every day, several times a week, occasionally, or never. First, how often do you get your news from _____? Newspapers, National Newspapers, Nightly Network News Programs, Morning News and Interview Programs, CNN News or CNN Headline News, Cable News other than CNN, C-SPAN, Public Television News, Local Television News, National Public Radio, National Network News on Radio (cther than NPR), Radio Talk Shows, Television Talk Shows, Half-Hour TV Entertainment News Programs." Coding: 1 = never; 2 = occasionally; 3 = several times a week; 4 = every day. ("Don't know/refused" responses were coded as missing.)

(B) "And how often do you get your news from each of the following WEEKLY sources of news: every week, several times a month, occasionally, or never? First, how often do you get your news from ____? Weekly News Magazines, Television News Programs on Sunday Mornings, TV News Magazine Shows during the Evenings." Coding: 1 = never; 2 = occasionally; 3 = several times a month; 4 = every week. ("Don't know/refused" responses were coded as missing.)

Political Partisanship. Liberal-Conservative: "How would you describe your political views?" Coding: 1 = very conservative; 2 = conservative; 3 = moderate; 4 = liberal; 5 = very liberal. ("Don't know/refused" responses were coded as missing.)

Party Identification: Coding: 1 = Republican; 2=Independent, leaning Republican; 3 = Independent; 4 = Independent, leaning Democratic; 5 = Democrat. ("Don't know/refused" responses were coded as missing.)

Soft and Hard News Index Components. Soft News Index: TV Entertainment News Shows, Television Talk Shows, Radio Talk Shows, TV News Magazine Shows, Morning News and Interview Shows (e.g., Good Morning America).

Hard News Index: Nightly Network News Programs, Local Television News Programs, CNN, C-SPAN, Public Television News, Cable News other than CNN, Sunday Morning Television News Shows, National Public Radio, National Network News on Radio, Weekly News Magazines, Newspapers or National Newspapers.

APPENDIX B: SUMMARY OF RELIABILITY AND VALIDITY TESTS

Substantial evidence indicates that responding "don't know" reflects primarily inattentiveness or unfamiliarity, rather than ambivalence about how to respond. For instance, the 1996 and 1998 NES surveys each included 19 "feeling thermometer" questions regarding politically prominent individuals and groups. Respondents who answered "don't know" were asked a follow-up question regarding whether they were unfamiliar with the individual/group or ambivalent about the appropriate response. Overall, 76 and 75%, in 1996 and 1998, respectively, indicated that their "don't know" response meant that they were unfamiliar with the individual or group.

I also conducted a series of additional validity and reliability tests. Across a wide range of data sets, including every NES survey conducted during the Vietnam and the Persian Gulf wars (1966, 1968, 1970, 1972, and 1990/1991), "don't know" responses to questions about the wars were inversely and significantly related to political knowledge, education, interest in politics, and political partisanship, as well as to the number of mentions of foreign policy issues in open-ended "most important problems facing the nation" questions. These findings are consistent with Zaller (1991), who found a strong positive relationship between "don't know" responses and political awareness. Similarly, Page and Shapiro (1983) argue that public attentiveness to an issue can be most directly, though not perfectly, measured by the proportion of respondents answering "don't know" to survey questions pertaining to the issue.

Additionally, a principal-component factor analysis indicated that, in two surveys (Gallup; August 12, 1997, and CBS, September 18, 1978), respondents' self-declared attention to the Israel-Palestine conflict and the Camp David Accords between Israel and Egypt load fairly strongly (at 0.61 and 0.51, respectively) on the same underlying factor as the propensity to respond "don't know" to a second question asking respondents their opinions of the two issues. [For additional arguments and evidence substantiating the use of "don't know" responses as indicating low attentiveness, see Powlick and Katz (1998), Zaller (1992), Zaller and Feldman (1992), Edwards (1990), Shapiro and Mahajan (1986), and Krugman and Hartley (1970). For additional reliability and validity testing, see Baum (n.d., 2000).]

REFERENCES

- Almond, Gabriel A. 1950. The American People and Foreign Policy. New York: Harcourt, Brace.
- Bark, Ed. 1998. "For TV, 18 to 49 Is Best Advertising Age." San Diego Union-Tribune, 6 October: Sect. E.
- Bartels, Larry M. 1991. "Constituency Opinion and Congressional Policy Making: The Reagan Defense Buildup." American Political Science Review 85 (June): 457-74.
- Baum, Matthew A. n.d. "Infotainment Wars: Public Opinion and Foreign Policy in the New Media Age." Typescript.
- Baum, Matthew A., 2000. Tabloid Wars: The Mass Media, Public Opinion and the Use of Force Abroad, Ph.D. dissertation. San Diego: University of California.
- Baum, Matthew A., and Sam Kernell. 1999. "Has Cable Ended the Golden Age of Presidential Television?" American Political Science Review 93 (March): 99-114.
- Bennett, Stephen E. 1986. Apathy in America, 1960-1984: Causes and Consequences of Citizen Political Indifference. Dobbs Ferry & New York: Transnational.
- Bennett, Stephen E. 1995. "Comparing Americans' Political Information in 1988 and 1992." Journal of Politics 57(May): 521-
- Blumler, Jay G., and Denis McQuail. 1969. Television in Politics: Its Uses and Influence. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Bosso, Christopher J. 1989. "Setting the Agenda: Mass Media and the Discovery of Famine in Ethiopia." In Manipulating Public Opinion: Essays on Public Opinion as a Dependent Variable, eds. Michael Margolis and Gary A. Mauser. Pacific Grove, CA: Brooks/Cole. Pp. 153-74.
- Chaffee, Steven H., and Stacey F. Kanihan. 1997. "Learning About Politics from the Mass Media." Political Communication 14 (October-December): 421-30.
- Cohen, Bernard C. 1973. The Public's Impact on Foreign Policy. Boston: Little, Brown.
- Converse, Philip E. 1964. "The Nature of Belief Systems in Mass Publics." In Ideology and Discontent, eds. David E. Apter. New York: Free Press. Pp. 206-61.
- Committee of Concerned Journalists (CCJ). 1998. "Changing Definitions of News." Report. Available at http://www.journalism.
- Davis, Richard, and Diana Owen. 1998. New Media and American Politics. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Delli Carpini, Michael X, and Scott Keeter. 1996. What Americans Know About Politics and Why It Matters. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press
- Dionne, E. J. 1991. Why Americans Hate Politics. New York: Simon
- Druckman, James N. 2002. "The Implications of Framing Effects for Citizen Competence." Political Behavior (in press).
- Edwards, George C., III. 1990. Presidential Approval: A Source Book. Baltimore and London: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Eveland, William P., and Sietram A. Scheufele. 2000. "Connecting News Media Use with Gaps in Knowledge and Participation. Political Communication 17 (July-September): 215-37.

Fitzsimmons, Stephen J., and Hobart G. Osburn. 1968. "The Impact of Social Issues and Public Affairs Television Documentaries." Public Opinion Quarterly 32 (Autumn): 379-97.

- Gamson, William A., and Andre Modigliani. 1987. "The Changing Culture of Affirmative Action." In Research in Political Sociology, Volume 3, ed. Richard D. Braungart. Greenwich, CT: JAI. Pp. 137-77.
- Graber, Doris A. 1984. Processing the News: How People Tame the Information Tide. New York: Longman.
- Graebner, Normal A. 1983. "Public Opinion and Foreign Policy: A Pragmatic View." In Interaction: Foreign Policy and Public Policy, eds. E. D. Piper and R. J. Turchik. Washington, DC: American Enterprise Institute. Pp. 11–34.
- Grossman, Lawrence K. 2000. "It's Time to Treat Broadcasting Like Any Other Business." Columbia Journalism Review 39
- (November/December): 64. Hallin, Daniel. 1991. "Whose Campaign Is It, Anyway?" Columbia Journalism Review 39 (January-February) 43-6.
  Hess, Stephen. 1998. "The Once to Future Worlds of Presidents
- Communicating." Presidential Studies Quarterly 28 (Fall): 748. Holsti, Ole R. 1996. Public Opinion and American Foreign Policy. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Iyengar, Shanto. 1990. "Shortcuts to Political Knowledge: The Role of Selective Attention and Accessibility." In Information and Democratic Processes, eds. John A. Ferejohn and James H. Kuklinski. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. Pp. 160-85.
- Iyengar, Shanto, and Donald R. Kinder. 1987. News that Matters.
- Chicago: University of Chicago Press. Kalb, Marvin. 1998a. "Get Ready for the Really Bad News." Los Angeles Times 10 July: Sect. B.
- Kalb, Marvin. 1998b. "The Rise of the 'New News': A Case Study of Two Root Causes of the Modern Scandal Coverage." Discussion Paper D-34 (October). Cambridge, MA: Joan Shorenstein Center on the Press, Politics and Public Policy, Harvard University.
- Katz, Elihu, and David Foulkes. 1962. "On the Use of the Mass Media as 'Escape': Clarification of a Concept." Public Opinion Quarterly 26 (Autumn): 377-88.
- Katz, Elihu, Jay G. Blumler, and Michael Gurevitch. 1973-1974. "Uses and Gratifications Research." Public Opinion Quarterly 37 (Winter): 509–23.
- Katzman, Natan. 1972. "Television Soap Operas: What's Been Going on Anyway?" Public Opinion Quarterly 36 (Summer): 200-12.
- Kelly, Stanley, Jr., and Thad W. Mirer. 1974. "The Simple Act of Voting." American Political Science Review 68 (January): 572-91.
- Kernell, Samuel. 1997. Going Public: New Strategies of Presidential Leadership, 3rd ed. Washington, DC: CQ Press.
- Krause, George A. 1997. "Voters, Information Heterogeneity, and the Dynamics of Aggregate Economic Expectations." American Journal of Political Science 41 (October): 1170-200. Krugman, Herbert. 1965. "The Impact of Television Advertising:
- Learning Without Involvement." Public Opinion Quarterly 29 (Autumn): 349-56.
- Krugman, Herbert E., and Eugene L. Hartley. 1970. "Passive Learning from Television." Public Opinion Quarterly 34 (Summer): 184-
- Lichty, Lawrence W., and Douglas Gomery. 1992. "More Is Less." In The Future of News: Television, Newspapers, Wire Services, Newsmagazines, eds. Philip S. Cook, Douglas Gomery, and Lawrence W. Lichty. Washington, DC: Woodrow Wilson Center Press. Pp.
- Lowry, Brian. 1998. "With Clinton Under Fire, Viewers Vote for the News," Los Angeles Times 30 January: Sect. F.
- MacKuen, Michael. 1984. "Exposure to Information, Belief Integration, and Individual Responsiveness to Agenda Change." American Political Science Review 78 (June): 372-91.
- McGuire, William J. 1968. "The Nature of Attitudes and Attitude Change." In The Handbook of Social Psychology, 2nd ed., Volume 3, eds. Lindzey Gardner and Elliott Aronson. Reading, MA: Addison-Wesley. Pp. 136-314.

  Media Monitor. 1997a. "Defining Journalism Down: Visual and Ver-
- bal Images in Tabloid TV News Shows." Center for Media and Public Affairs [CMPA] 11(November/December): 5.

- Media Monitor. 1997b. "What Do the People Want from the Press?" Center for Media and Public Affairs [CMPA] 11 (May/June): 2.
- Miller, Arthur H. 1974. "Political Issues and Trust in Government." American Political Science Review 68 (September): 951-72.
- Moisy, Claude. 1997. "Myths of the Global Information Village." Foreign Policy 107 (Summer): 78–87.
- Niemi, Richard G., John Mueller, and Tom W. Smith. 1989. Trends in Public Opinion: A Compendium of Survey Data. New York: Greenwood Press.
- Neuman, W. Russell, Marion R. Just, and Ann R. Crigler. 1992. Common Knowledge: News and the Construction of Political Meaning. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Noah, Timothy. 1997. Beating Swords into TV Shares. U.S. News and World Report Online edition (December 1): http://www.usnews.com/usnews/home.htm.
- Nye, Joseph S., Philip D. Zelikow, and David C. King, eds. 1997. Why People Don't Trust Government. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Ostrom, Charles W., Jr., and Brian L. Job. 1986. "The President and the Political Use of Force." American Political Science Review 80 (June): 541–66.
- Page, Benjamin I., and Robert Y. Shapiro. 1983. "Effects of Public Opinion on Policy." American Political Science Review 77 (March): 175–90.
- Patterson, Thomas E. 1980. The Mass Media Election: How Americans Choose Their President. New York: Praeger.
- Patterson, Thomas E. 2000. "Doing Well and Doing Good." Faculty Research Working Paper Series, RWP01-001 (December). Cambridge, MA: John F. Kennedy School of Government, Harvard University.
- Popkin, Samuel. 1994. The Reasoning Voter, 2nd ed. New York: University of Chicago Press.
- Powlick, Philip J. 1995. "The Sources of Public Opinion for American Foreign Policy Officials." International Studies Quarterly 39 (December): 427–52.
- Powlick, Philip J., and Andrew Z. Katz. 1998. "Testing a Model of Public Opinion-Foreign Policy Linkage: Public Opinion in Two Carter Foreign Policy Decisions." Presented at the 1998 Meeting of the Midwest Political Science Association, Chicago.
- of the Midwest Political Science Association, Chicago.
  Robinson, Michael. 1974. "The Impact of the Televised Watergate Hearings." Journal of Communication 24 (Spring): 17–30.
- Rosenberg, Howard. 2000. "Candidates on Talk-Show Circuit: If You Don't Schmooze, You Lose." Los Angeles Times, September 15: Sect. F.

- Rosenstiel, Tom, Carl Gottlieb, and Lee Ann Brady. 2000. "Time of Peril for TV News: Quality Sells, but Commitment and Viewership Continue to Erode." Report by The Project for Excellence in Journalism, Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism, November/December. Pp. 84–99.
- Salomon, Gavriel. 1984. "Television Is 'Easy' and Print Is 'Tough': The Differential Investment of Mental Effort in Learning as a Function of Perceptions and Attributions." Journal of Educational Psychology 76 (December): 647–58.
- Scott, David K., and Robert H. Gobetz. 1992. "Hard News/Soft News Content of the National Television Networks, 1972–1987." Journalism Quarterly 69 (Summer): 406–12.
- Scott, Janny. 1998. "The President Under Fire: The Media; A Media Race Enters Waters Still Uncharted." The New York Times 1 February, Late Edition—Final, Sect. 1: 1.
- Shapiro, Robert Y., and Harpreet Mahajan. 1986. "Gender Differences in Policy Preferences: A Summary of Trends from the 1960s to the 1980s." Public Opinion Quarterly 50 (Spring): 42–61.
- Smith, M. Brewster, Jerome S. Bruner, and Robert W. White. 1956. Opinions & Personality. New York: John Wiley and Sons.
- Wamsley, Gary, and Richard A. Pride. 1972. "Television Network News: Rethinking the Iceberg Problem." Western Political Quarterly 25 (Summer): 434–50.
- Webster, James G., and Lawrence W. Lichty. 1991. Ratings Analysis: Theory and Practice. Hillsdale, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates.
- Wechtel, Paul L. 1967. "Conceptions of Broad and Narrow Attention." Psychological Bulletin 68 (November-December): 417-29.
- Weinstein, Steve. 1998. "CNN Adds Newsmagazines to the Mix." Los Angeles Times 6 January: Sect. F.
- Zaller, John, R. 1991. "Information, Values, and Opinion." American Political Science Review 85 (December): 1215–37.
- Zaller, John, R. 1992. The Nature and Origins of Mass Opinion.
  New York: Cambridge University Press.
  Zaller, John, R. 1999. "A Theory of Media Politics." Typescript.
- Zaller, John, R. 1999. "A Theory of Media Politics." Typescript.Available at http://www.sscnet.ucla.edu/polisci/faculty/zaller.Zaller, John, R., and Stanley Feldman. 1992. "A Simple Theory of Sur-
- Zaller, John, R., and Stanley Feldman. 1992. "A Simple Theory of Survey Response." American Journal of Political Science 36 (August): 579–616.
- Zukin, Cliff. 1977. "A Reconsideration of the Effects of Information on Partisan Stability." Public Opinion Quarterly 41 (Summer): 244–54.
- Zukin, Cliff, and Robin Snyder. 1984. "Passive Learning: When the Media Environment Is the Message." Public Opinion Quarterly 48 (Autumn): 629–38.

Cross-cutting Social Networks: Testing Democratic Theory in Practice

DIANA C. MUTZ Ohio State University

Exposure to conflicting political viewpoints is widely assumed to benefit the citizens of a democratic polity. Nonetheless, the benefits of exposure to heterogeneous political viewpoints have yet to be demonstrated empirically. Drawing on national survey data that tap characteristics of people's political discussion networks, I examine the impact of heterogeneous networks of political discussion on individuals' awareness of legitimate rationales for oppositional viewpoints, on their awareness of rationales for their own viewpoints, and on levels of political tolerance. Finally, utilizing a laboratory experiment manipulating exposure to dissonant and consonant political views, I further substantiate the causal role of cross-cutting exposure in fostering political tolerance.

ecent social and political theory has elevated political conversation among democratic citizens to new heights. Political talk is central to most current conceptions of how democracy functions (Schudson 1997). According to many prominent social theorists, democracy has a future only if "citizens come back out of their bunkers and start talking" (Gray 1995, 1; see also Elshtain 1995; Lasch 1995). The quantity and quality of political conversation have become "a standard for the accomplishment of democracy" (Sanders 1997, 347). Theorists extol the virtues of political talk, foundations spend millions of dollars to encourage it, and civic journalists and others plan special meetings to foster more of it. Yet what do we really know about beneficial outcomes of political talk as it occurs in day to day life?

For the most part, arguments for the centrality of political discussion among ordinary Americans have been highly theoretical in nature. In other words, the contributions to democratic ends that political conversations are supposed to make depend critically on whether such talk reaches the standards necessary to be deemed "deliberation," "discourse," or, in Habermas' (1989) terms, an "ideal speech situation." It is one thing to claim that political conversation has the potential to produce beneficial outcomes if it meets a whole variety of as yet unrealized criteria, and yet another to argue that political conversations, as they actually occur, produce meaningful benefits for citizens (Conover and Searing 1998). Because the list of requirements for deliberation tends to be quite lengthy, it is difficult, if not impossible, to test theories of this kind empirically.

Diana C. Mutz is Professor of Political Science and Journalism and Communication at Ohio State University, 2140 Derby Hall, 154 North Oval Mall, Columbus, OH 43210-1373 (MUTZ.1@OSU.EDU).

I am grateful to the Spencer Foundation for funding the survey data collection for this project, to the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences for time to work on it, and to Paul Martin and Justin Taylor for their research assistance.

<sup>1</sup> For example, to qualify, political discussion must take place among citizens of equal status who offer reasonable, carefully constructed, and morally justifiable arguments to one another in a context of mutual respect (Gutmann and Thompson 1996). Such interactions must exclude no one or, at least, provide "free and equal access to all" (Knight and Johnson 1994). In addition, the opinions of participants in deliberative encounters must all weigh equally (e.g., Fishkin 1991), and all participants must be free of the kinds of material deprivations that hinder participation, such as a lack of income or education.

If one limits the political communication phenomena worthy of study to those conversations that meet the necessary and sufficient conditions invoked by democratic theorists, then one is left with a near-empty set of social interactions to study. Instead, the goal of this research is to examine a very minimalist conception of political discussion, but one that may, nonetheless, have significant consequences for the citizens who engage in it. For these purposes I relax many of the requirements invoked in discussions of deliberation and focus strictly on the extent to which political conversations expose people to dissimilar political views. My results suggest that although cross-cutting exposure is disappointingly infrequent in the contemporary United States, it may—even in its highly imperfect manifestationshold some beneficial consequences for democratic citizens.

THEORETICAL ASSUMPTIONS ABOUT THE CONSEQUENCES OF CROSS-CUTTING EXPOSURE

Perhaps the most often cited proponent of communication across lines of difference is John Stuart Mill (1859, 21), who pointed out how a lack of contact with oppositional viewpoints diminishes the prospects for a public sphere: "If the opinion is right, they are deprived of the opportunity of exchanging error for truth; if wrong, they lose what is almost as great a benefit, the clearer perception and livelier impression of truth produced by its collision with error." Likewise, Habermas (1989) assumes that exposure to dissimilar views will benefit the inhabitants of a public sphere by encouraging greater interpersonal deliberation and intrapersonal reflection.

Exposure to conflicting political views is also said to play an integral role in encouraging "enlarged mentality," that is, the capacity to form an opinion "by considering a given issue from different viewpoints, by making present to my mind the standpoints of those who are absent.... The more people's standpoints I have present in my mind while I am pondering a given issue, and the better I can imagine how I would feel and think if I were in their place, the stronger will be my capacity for representative thinking and the more valid my final conclusions, my opinion" (Arendt 1968, 241). Interactions with others of differing views is assumed to be "essential for us to comprehend and to come to appreciate the perspective of others" (Benhabib 1992, 140).

Cross-cutting exposure also is assumed to promote greater awareness of oppositional views because no individual person thinking in isolation can foresee the variety of perspectives through which political issues may be perceived (Manin 1987). Thus political deliberation "teaches citizens to see things they had previously overlooked, including the views of others ... " (p. 351). Awareness of rationales for oppositional views is a particularly important type of political knowledge because of its close ties to legitimacy. One purpose served by conveying rationales for oppositional views is to help render the ultimate decision or policy legitimate in the eyes of others (Manin 1987). If rationales are not made public, the losers in a given controversy will not know what reasons or arguments the winners judged to be stronger in deciding the merits of the case: "Hence discussion rather than private deliberation would be necessary to 'put on the table' the various reasons and arguments that different individuals had in mind, and thus to ensure that no one could see the end result as arbitrary rather than reasonable and justifiable, even if not what he or she happened to see as most justifiable" (Fearon 1998, 62).

Exposure to diverse political views is obviously tied to a wide range of outcomes that are valued in democratic systems. But it would be quite naive to suggest that only good can flow from cross-cutting interactions; conversations among those of differing views also have the capacity to result in bitter arguments, violence, and/or a hostile and uneasy silence (Scorza 1998). Thus Kingwell (1995) has stressed the importance of civility or politeness in maintaining conversations across lines of political difference. To sustain relationships that make cross-cutting discourse possible, discussants must at times refrain from saying all they could say in the interests of smooth social interaction. This type of civility via "not-saying" ... "contributes to smooth social interaction, makes for tolerance of diversity and conditions a regard for the claims and interests of others" (Kingwell 1995, 219). In this view, exposure to differing views holds the potential for tremendous benefits, but only if it occurs in a context in which the collective project of getting along with one another in society is primary and the elucidation of differences secondary.

THE ROLE OF CROSS-CUTTING EXPOSURE IN EMPIRICAL RESEARCH

In addition to the assumptions of political theory, many empirical relationships have been credited to exposure to dissonant views. For example, in his classic study of tolerance, Stouffer (1955, 127) suggested that exposure to conflicting views was the main reason that education and tolerance were so closely connected:

... Schooling puts a person in touch with people whose ideas and values are different from one's own. And this tends to carry on, after formal schooling is finished, through reading and personal contacts. . . . To be tolerant, one has to learn further not only that people with different ideas are not necessarily bad people but also that it is vital to America to preserve this free market place. . . . The first step in learning this may be merely to encounter the strange and the different. (original italics)

Although other explanations for the education—tolerance relationship have been proposed in subsequent research, most later studies also reference the idea that education "increase(s) awareness of the varieties of human experience that legitimize wide variation in ... values" (Nunn, Crockett, and Williams 1978, 61). The extent to which people are exposed to differing views also has been invoked in explanations for why women tend to be less tolerant than men and why those in urban environments may be more tolerant than those in rural areas (Stouffer 1955; Sullivan, Piereson, and Marcus 1982; Nunn, Crockett, and Williams 1978).

Interpretations of tolerance levels have stressed the diversity of people's contacts, but this concept has seldom been directly measured. Nonetheless, closely related concepts support the likelihood of such an impact. For example, a personality dimension known as "openness to experience" is strongly positively related to tolerance (Marcus et al. 1995), and authoritarians have been found to live relatively sheltered lives with little exposure to alternative lifestyles and beliefs (Altemeyer 1997). In a recent study of Russian social networks, Gibson (1999) also found that support for democratic institutions was correlated with the number of "weak ties" (i.e., nonrelatives) in a person's social network.

Finally, the popularity of specially organized deliberative forums also rests on the assumption that crosscutting exposure is particularly beneficial. Although such events may successfully educate people on public policy issues (for a review, see Gastil and Dillard 1999; Cook et al. 1999), it is unclear from research to date whether learning is influenced by the cross-cutting interactions themselves or some other aspect of the forums such as the educational materials given to participants by organizers. Americans report that they are very unlikely to talk about politics at public meetings (Conover and Searing 1998) so the generalizability of findings from specially orchestrated forums to everyday political life is also an open question.<sup>2</sup>

The most important point to be gleaned from analyzing the role that the political diversity of social networks has played in political science research to date is that outside of work on persuasion, cross-cutting exposure typically has been an unmeasured concept, one offered in post hoc explanations for other relationships rather than as the central focus of research. Despite the important role that cross-cutting exposure plays in political theory, little empirical research has examined its consequences.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Experimental studies using small groups in contexts outside of political decision-making have suggested that an emphasis on controversy over concurrence-seeking promotes greater mastery and retention of information (Lowry and Johnson 1981; Smith et al. 1981) and greater epistemic curiosity, that is, interest in and commitment to the immediate search for more information about a problem (Smith et al. 1992; Lowry and Johnson 1981; Smith et al. 1981).

THE SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGICAL PLAUSIBILITY OF BENEFICIAL CONSEQUENCES

Embedded in these assertions are hypotheses about at least three potential beneficial effects of cross-cutting networks. Communication environments that expose people to non-like-minded political views have been assumed to promote (1) greater awareness of rationales for one's own viewpoints, (2) greater awareness of rationales for oppositional viewpoints, and (3) greater tolerance. How plausible are such benefits from the perspective of what is known about the social psychology of human interaction?

The first hypothesis rests on the assumption that confronting differences prompts people to reflect on the reasons for their own beliefs. This process is assumed to occur either in preparation for defending one's own positions or as a result of an internal need to rationalize or explain why one's own views differ from others'. Studies of cognitive response generally support the plausibility of such a reaction; exposure to counter-attitudinal advocacy enhances the production of counter-arguments, particularly for highly involving topics (e.g., Petty and Cacioppo 1977, 1979).<sup>3</sup>

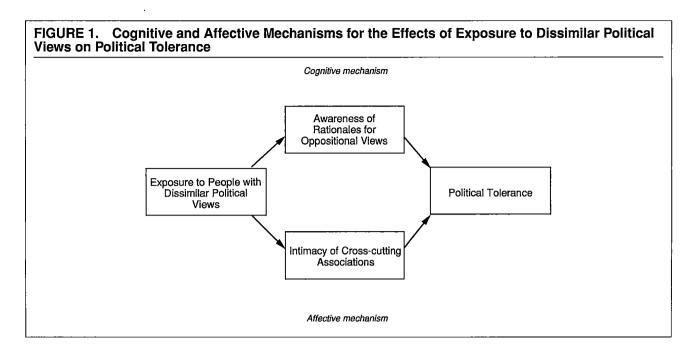

The second hypothesis, that cross-cutting exposure promotes greater awareness of oppositional viewpoints, simply assumes that exposure to dissimilar views imparts new information. Psychologically this hypothesis demands nothing more than a straightforward learning process whereby rationales are transmitted from one person to another. The greatest limitation on its plausibility is the infrequency with which political conversations are likely to reach the level of depth in which rationales are articulated. But a good deal of this process may occur at the intrapersonal rather than the interpersonal level. In other words, when exposed interpersonally to political views noticeably different from their own, people may be prompted to think intrapersonally about the reasons that may have led those others to hold such views (Mutz 1998). This mental rehearsal of thoughts and search for rationales may occur even when the discussants do not explicitly articulate such reasons themselves (Burnstein and Sentis 1981; Burnstein, Vinokur, and Trope 1973).

The third hypothesis embedded in arguments about the importance of cross-cutting exposure is that it should lead to greater political tolerance. On initial consideration, this assertion sounds very similar to Allport's (1954) classic intergroup contact hypothesis. which suggests that face-to-face interaction among members of different groups can, under certain conditions, reduce prejudice. Although the contact hypothesis has been known for producing mixed evidence at best (see, e.g., Amir 1969, 1976), more recent assessments suggest that intergroup contact usually does have positive effects, even when the situation does not meet all of the conditions enumerated by Allport and subsequent researchers (see Pettigrew 1998, Pettigrew and Tropp 2000). Moreover, among the various types of "groups" that one might consider, contact among those of differing political views is ideally situated to produce beneficial effects from cross-cutting exposure. The best sequence of events for purposes of promoting beneficial effects is one in which people first get to know one another as individuals, then only later recognize each other as representatives of disliked groups (Pettigrew 1997). People's political views are seldom obvious upon first meeting, and conversations about politics do not occur with sufficient regularity so that people always know when they are in the company of people holding cross-cutting views. Thus a person may easily develop a liking for another person long before discovering their differences of political opinion.

On the other hand, the kind of people or groups one is asked to tolerate on civil libertarian grounds are seldom exactly the same as the people of opposing views that one encounters at work or in the neighborhood. Nonetheless, within the large literature on intergroup contact, a smaller group of studies of "generalized intergroup contact" confirms that contact across group lines can generalize to reduce prejudice even toward outgroups that are not part of the intergroup contact (e.g., Reich and Purbhoo 1975; Cook 1984; Pettigrew 1997; Weigert 1976). In other words, these findings support the possibility that exposure to everyday differences of political opinion may translate to an appreciation of the need to tolerate differences of political opinion among disparate groups within the larger society. People who have had to learn how to "agree to disagree" in their daily lives better understand the need to do so as a matter of public policy. For example, in support of the generalizability of contact effects, the extent of interpersonal contact across lines of religion, race, social class, culture, and nationality predicted nonprejudicial attitudes toward groups not involved in the contact, even when taking into account potential reciprocal influences (Pettigrew 1997). Moreover, the extent of contact across lines of difference also generalized to immigration policy preferences, a more policy-oriented outcome similar to tolerance measures. Although studies of intergroup contact have tended to use prejudicial attitudes as their dependent variables, their findings also appear to generalize to perspective-taking ability (see Reich and Purbhoo 1975); that is, cross-cutting contact improves people's abilities to see issues from the perspectives of others, even when they personally do not agree.<sup>5</sup>

&lt;sup>3</sup> Consistent with this argument, Green, Visser, and Tetlock (1999) found that people became more aware of and able to balance valid arguments on both sides of an issue when they were exposed to strong arguments on both sides of an issue and anticipated having to justify their views to opinionated representatives of the conflicting sides, an experimental condition that simulates a cross-cutting personal network.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Moreover, many of the additional necessary conditions tacked on in subsequent research turn out to be facilitating but not essential conditions (Pettigrew 1998; Pettigrew and Tropp 2000).

As illustrated in Fig. 1, there are at least two mechanisms by which exposure to oppositional political viewpoints might lead to political tolerance.<sup>6</sup> First, as suggested by the second hypothesis, cross-cutting interactions may convey information. Through what psychologists call the process of "deprovincialization," people learn that their norms, customs, and lifestyles are not the only ways to deal with the social world (Pettigrew 1997, 174). To the extent that cross-cutting exposure leads to greater awareness of legitimate rationales for oppositional views, such awareness should give people good reasons for upholding the civil liberties of those with whom they personally disagree; one sees that there are at least legitimate reasons for such views, even if one personally finds them uncompelling. The top half of Fig. 1 illustrates this proposed chain of events whereby exposure to people of differing political views increases awareness of rationales for differing viewpoints and thus increases political tolerance. This link is further supported by theorists such as Mead (1934) and Piaget (1932), who stressed the importance of perspective-taking ability to attitudes and behaviors that subordinate the self's perspective to the larger society—as does political tolerance.

In addition to this cognitive mechanism for translating cross-cutting exposure to political tolerance, a second potential mechanism emphasizes affect over cognition. To paraphrase Stouffer (1955), one could learn from personal experience that those different from one's self are not necessarily bad people. According to this mechanism, the content and extent of people's political discussions are less important than the quality of the personal relationships that develop. It is not important that they learn about the rationales for one another's political views, but it is important that they develop close relationships with those they know to hold quite different political viewpoints. Once formed, these cross-cutting relationships make it less likely that people will support restrictions of the civil liberties of those of differing views. The bottom half of Fig. 1 illustrates how exposure to people of differing political views may lead to more intimate cross-cutting associations, and thus greater tolerance.

To summarize, interactions involving exposure to conflicting views have been assumed to benefit people largely (1) by encouraging a deeper understanding of one's own viewpoint, (2) by producing greater awareness of rationales for opposing views, and (3) by contributing to greater tolerance. With respect to the third hypothesis, if exposure to cross-cutting political views increases tolerance via its effects on awareness of rationales for oppositional points of view, then this would lend credibility to the cognitive interpretation of the benefits of cross-cutting contact. If close personal relationships across lines of political difference influence tolerance levels, then this provides support for the affective mechanism.

SURVEY DESIGN

To examine these hypotheses, I utilized data from a representative national telephone survey sponsored by the Spencer Foundation and executed by the University of Wisconsin Survey Center in the fall of 1996, immediately preceding the presidential election in November.<sup>7</sup> This survey included a battery of items tapping the frequency with which respondents talked about politics with up to three political discussants and the frequency with which respondents agreed or disagreed with the views of the political discussants that were named. In addition, all respondents were asked about whether they perceived their views to be generally the same as or different from their discussants' and whether the discussant generally shared or opposed their political views. The survey also included questions tapping whether each of the respondent's discussants favored Republicans or Democrats, and which presidential candidate they preferred. By combining the latter two questions with information on the respondent's own partisanship and candidate preference, it was possible to create additional measures of the extent to which the discussants held political views similar to or different from the respondent's views. Since the extent of discussion with politically dissonant and consonant discussion partners is not a zero-sum situation whereby more discussion with agreeable partners must lead to less discussion with partners who disagree, I used these five items to create separate measures of the frequency of discussion with politically consonant and dissonant partners (see Appendix A for details on the wording of survey items and construction of measures).8

&lt;sup>5</sup> Changing prejudice is clearly not the same thing as altering levels of tolerance, because the former involves altering negative attitudes toward groups and the latter involves support for civil liberties in spite of ongoing negative attitudes toward groups. Nonetheless, there is sufficient conceptual overlap for these literatures to be relevant to one another.

&lt;sup>6</sup> Kuklinski and colleagues (1991) and Theiss-Morse and colleagues (1993) identify a similar distinction between "cognitive and affective bases of political tolerance judgments," but in their experiments the cognitive basis means that people are induced to think about tolerance judgments, as opposed to thinking specifically about rationales for the opposite view as suggested by the cognitive mechanism in this study.

Although the impact of discussions with like-minded others is not the central focus of this study, I include this variable in the analyses to sort out effects that may be attributed to political discussion in general, as opposed to discussions that cross lines of political difference in particular. Moreover, since political discussion of all types is likely to characterize those more politically interested, knowledgeable, and involved, controls are included for these predispositions. To the extent that the effects of exposure to dissonant views are unique and not attributable to contact that involves political agreement or to political interest and involvement more generally, then the benefits suggested by so many theorists gain support. In addition to the frequency of consonant and dissonant contact, the survey also included items that made it possible to tap the level of intimacy within dyads (see Appendix A). For each respondent, separate measures were created to represent levels of intimacy with consonant, dissonant and politically neutral discussion partners.9

To tap the dependent variables for the first and second hypotheses, awareness of legitimate rationales for own and for opposing views, open-ended questions were used to solicit issue-specific rationales for three separate controversies including preferences among the 1996 presidential candidates, opinions about affirmative action for women and minorities, and opinions about state versus federal control of the welfare system.<sup>10</sup> Randomizing the order in which own and opposing view questions appeared,11 respondents were asked what reasons they could think of for the various viewpoints. The open-ended responses were coded into individual rationales by two independent coders. To produce an indicator of awareness of rationales for opposing viewpoints, respondents were asked, "Regardless of your own views, what reasons can you think of for. ..."12 In other words, they were asked to view the issues through the eyes of the opposition.

As expected, the number of rationales that people could give for their own positions were, on average, significantly higher than those they could give for why someone might hold an opposing view (p < 0.001 in all three cases). As shown in Table 1, the measures of <sup>9</sup> Consistent with previous research on social and political networks (e.g., Huckfeldt and Sprague 1995), the political discussants in this sample may be characterized as fairly homogeneous. For example, respondents reported that only 14% of their discussants were of a different political party, and only 13% favored a different presidential candidate than the main respondent. Only 11% of discussants held views "very different" from the respondent's own, compared to 61% whose views were described as "much the same." Finally, 60% of discussants were said to share most of the main respondents' views, while only 10% were opposed to their views. The relationships among the independent variables also were as expected based on past research: close relationships and frequent interactions tended to be among those who agreed, while crosscutting exposure characterized weak ties and less frequent political discussion.

&lt;sup>10</sup> Based on a pretest, these issues were chosen because they were current at the time the survey was done, and formed a likely basis for tapping awareness that could result from recent political discussions. They are also issues for which substantial controversy exists, so respondents with differing views on both sides of the issues were available.

Analyses showed no significant difference between the two orderings in the number of rationales offered for either own or opposing positions, and thus the order variables were dropped from further analyses.

12 Volunteered rationales for own and opposing views were taken at face value and not evaluated by any external standards of sophistication. But coders did eliminate from their counts rationales that served to delegitimize the other viewpoint. For example, if a respondent explained why others supported Clinton with reference to negative personal traits of the opinion holder ("Other people might vote for him because they are stupid") or negative traits of Clinton ("He's so slippery and slick and a good puppet"), then these were not counted as acknowledgments of a legitimate basis for the oppositional viewpoint. To test the reliability of coding, two independent coders both coded a subsample of 105 of respondents' answers to the openended awareness of rationales for own and opposing views questions. The correlation between the measures produced by the two coders ranged from 0.74 to 0.89 across the six open-ended questions, with an average of 0.80. For respondents who held no opinion on a given issue, their rationales for the two questions were divided equally between awareness of own and oppositional views.

&lt;sup>7</sup> Each number was screened to verify that it was associated with a household. The person selected for the interview was randomly chosen from among household members at least 18 years old, with no substitutions allowed. The response rate was 47% when calculated as the proportion of completed interviews divided by the total sample (which includes those who never answered and all other nonresponses and refusals) minus the nonsample numbers. This is virtually identical to the rate obtained in similar telephone surveys (see, e.g., Huckfeldt et al. 1995). Interviews averaged 25 minutes. A maximum of 30 calls was made to each unresolved telephone number.

<sup>8</sup> For each of the three political discussants named, these items scaled relatively well, with Cronbach's a's for Exposure to dissonant views of 0.77, 0.80, and 0.81, for the first, second, and third named discussants, respectively, and for Exposure to consonant views,  $\alpha$ 's of 0.73, 0.83, and 0.85, respectively.

TABLE 1. Awareness of Rationales for Own and Opposing Political Views

Issue	Mean	Range	Correlation	t Value
State versus federal
Own view	0.89	0-4	0.21	15.31
Opposing view	0.41	0–3
Affirmative action
Own view	0.65	0–5	0.32	9.90
Opposing view	0.38	0–3
Presidential candida	ate
Own view	1.36	0–9	0.26	13.06
Opposing view	0.67	0–7
Combined measure
Own view	2.90	0-14	0.48	19.77
Opposing view	1.46	0-11

Note: t values are based on paired t tests comparing the number of rationales given for own and oppositional views. *** p < 0.001.

rationales for the two sides of a given issue were, also not surprisingly, significantly correlated with one another, thus indicating general knowledge of or interest in politics or in these specific issues. Three issues were used to get a broader sense of a given person's knowledge of dissimilar viewpoints than one issue alone would make possible and were then combined into two additive indices representing a person's overall awareness of rationales for oppositional views and overall awareness of rationales for their own viewpoints.

Political tolerance was measured using Sullivan Piereson and Marcus's (1982) content-controlled method whereby respondents first volunteer their "least-liked" group and are then asked a series of six questions about extending civil liberties to these particular groups, including the extent to which they should be banned or outlawed, be allowed to hold rallies in their city, be allowed to teach in public schools, and be subject to government phone tapping. 13

EFFECTS ON AWARENESS OF RATIONALES FOR OWN AND OPPOSITIONAL VIEWS

The first hope of advocates of greater network diversity is that exposure to conflicting views will benefit citizens either by familiarizing them with legitimate reasons for holding opposing viewpoints or by deepening their understanding of their own views by having to defend them to others and/or to themselves. The first 2 columns of data in Table 2 show regression equations examining these two questions, <sup>14</sup> one predicting awareness of rationales for one's own side of the issues and the second predicting awareness of rationales for the opposing viewpoints. In addition to the variables included

For purposes of evaluating the first two hypotheses, what is important in Table 2 is the coefficient corresponding to exposure to dissonant political views. As shown in column 1, counter to the first hypothesis, exposure to dissonant views does not appear to have a significant impact on awareness of rationales for people's own political views. Even when examined among the most likely subgroups within the population (such as those with strongly held views or high levels of education), there is no evidence that those with crosscutting political networks have more rationales in mind in support of their viewpoints.

However, consistent with the second hypothesis, column 2 shows that exposure to oppositional viewpoints increases awareness of legitimate rationales for opposing views. The highly significant positive coefficient supports the hypothesis that exposure to oppositional viewpoints is particularly important for purposes of familiarizing people with legitimate reasons for viewpoints that differ from their own. Nonetheless, to make a solid case for this hypothesis, it is essential to determine that it is exposure to dissonant views, and not just political discussion in general, that is driving awareness of rationales for oppositional views. Comparing the coefficients for exposure to consonant and dissonant views lends additional support to this hypothesis because the consonant coefficient is negative and significantly different from the coefficient for exposure to dissonant views.

With cross-sectional data how confident can one be that exposure to conflicting political views actually brings about greater awareness of rationales for opposing views? Because a person knows a lot about politics, he/she may be more confident of defending his/her own views, and thus be more willing to engage in cross-cutting interactions (see Conover and Searing to control for general levels of political interest, knowledge, and extremity of opinions, in each equation I have included the variable representing awareness of rationales on the other side of these same issues. Those with high interest in these three particular issues are obviously likely to score high on both measures. Thus in analyses predicting awareness of rationales for oppositional views, awareness of rationales for one's own views also was included, and vice versa for the analysis predicting rationales for own views.<sup>15</sup> As evidenced by the large size of these coefficients, each served as a powerful control for the equation in which the other was the dependent variable. Also as expected, political knowledge was a significant positive predictor of political awareness of either variety, and extremity of political views had predictable effects, increasing awareness of rationales for one's own views, while reducing the number of rationales that could be offered for others'

&lt;sup>13</sup> The index produced a Cronbach's  $\alpha$  of 0.83.

&lt;sup>14</sup> To prevent loss of cases due to listwise deletion in the multivariate analyses (i.e., Tables 2 and 3), Amelia was used to impute missing values for several variables. In no analysis did this procedure change the substantive findings of the study. For details on this procedure, see King et al. (2001) and Honaker et al. (1999).

&lt;sup>15</sup> For these variables, one need not assume a specific causal direction between awareness of rationales for own and others' views. The purpose is to conduct a stringent test of the key hypothesis but to avoid confounding results with characteristics that may be specific to the three issues used to create measures of awareness of rationales for own and others' views.

TABLE 2. The Influence of Exposure to Consonant and Dissonant Political Views on Awareness of Rationales for Own and Opposing Political Views

		Awareness of Rationales	s for
	Own Views	Opposing Views	Opposing Views with Interaction
Network characteristics
Exposure to dissonant views	0.125 (1.198)	0.242 (3.384)	0.155* (2.048)
Exposure to consonant views	0.182 (1.727)	_0.045´ (0.624)	_`0.032 ´ (0.441)
Intimacy within dissonant dyads	0.096 (0.344)	-0.302 (1.571)	-0.328* (1.715)
Intimacy within consonant dyads	0.032 (0.262)	0.081 (0.979)	0.087 (1.049)
Density of network	0.006 (0.094)	-0.042 (0.883)	-0.037 (0.789)
Number of discussants	0.037 (0.341)	-0.026 (0.350)	-0.026 (0.351)
Issue-specific awareness	(0.01.)	(0.000)	(5.55.)
Awareness of rationales for own views	_	0.342 (15.696)	0.339 (15.607)
Awareness of rationales for opposing views	0.721 (15.705)		,
Political involvement	, ,
Political knowledge	0.192 (3.464)	0.099* (2.581)	0.091* (2.401)
Political interest	0.118 (1.521)	0.093 (1.734)	0.082 (1.526)
Extremity of issue opinions	0.840 (5.679)	-0.333 (3.215)	-0.345 (3.358)
Education	-0.072 (1.032)	0.240 (5.192)	0.245 (5.358)
Partisanship	(1.002)	(3.132)	(3.000)
Republican	-0.361	-0.067	-0.078
Topabiloan	(4.321)	(1.153)	(1.353)
Democrat	0.028	-0.018	-0.018
Domodia	(0.339)	(0.327)	(0.323)
Conservative	0.011	-0.023	-0.023
o one or valino	(0.164)	(0.497)	(0.496)
Liberal	0.069	0.008	0.012
A	(0.861)	(0.152)	(0.221)
Orientation to conflict	(0.00.)	(51152)	(/
Orientation to conflict			0.158
Orientation × Exposure to dissonant views			(1.614) 0.333 (3.444)
Constant	0.484 (1.172)	-0.355 (1.249)	-0.429 (1.512)
Sample size	780	780	780
R <sup>2</sup>	0.497	0.463	0.474

Note: Entries are unstandardized OLS regression coefficients, with t values in parentheses. Gender, race, age, income, marital status, and underage children also were included in the equations estimated above. *** p < 0.001; ** p < 0.01; * p < 0.05.

1998). I have attempted to rule out the most obvious spurious influences by including controls for general political knowledge, interest, and awareness specific to these issues, but reverse causation remains a possibility. The problem with this rival interpretation is that, if true, it ought to apply equally well, if not more so, to knowledge of rationales for one's own views; the more deeply committed one is to his/her position, and the more rationales in one's arsenal, the less threatened one should be by oppositional viewpoints. Table 2 shows that awareness of rationales for one's own views is not related to exposure to conflicting views in one's personal network. Although this represents a null finding with respect to the first hypothesis, ultimately this pattern strengthens the case for the idea that exposure to conflicting views contributes to greater awareness of legitimate rationales for opposing views.

How large is the effect of exposure to dissimilar views on awareness of legitimate rationales for oppositional views? To provide a general idea, I calculated the predicted values of awareness of legitimate rationales for oppositional views for those with the highest and lowest levels of exposure to dissonant political views. On average, those with high levels of exposure to dissonant views should be expected to be familiar with just over two additional rationales compared to a similar person with a homogeneous network. Given that the mean number of oppositional rationales that people in this sample could generate was 1.46, the increase due to cross-cutting networks could have quite significant consequences for the perceived legitimacy of political outcomes.

Finally, in the third column in Table 2, I test Kingwell's suggestion about the importance of civility in generating beneficial outcomes from cross-cutting political dialogue. Drawing on a scale widely used to classify patterns of communication within families, I operationalized the "civil" orientation to conflict as one that combines acknowledgment of the importance of expressing dissenting views with an emphasis on social harmony. In other words, a civil orientation is one that does not duck conflict but that simultaneously acknowledges the importance of maintaining harmonious social relationships.

As shown in the third column in Table 2, people with a civil orientation toward conflict are particularly likely to benefit from exposure to dissonant views. Although the inclusion of an interaction between Orientation to conflict and exposure to dissonant views slightly reduces the size of the original coefficient corresponding to exposure to dissonant views, the interaction significantly strengthens the overall model (p < 0.05), thus indicating that those who value both frank opinion expression and social harmony learn the most from their cross-cutting interactions. The size of the effect among members of this group is more than twice the size of the effect on the population as a whole.

To summarize, exposure to cross-cutting views does not appear to play a significant role in deepening people's knowledge of their own issue positions, but it does have an important impact by familiarizing them with legitimate rationales for opposing viewpoints. This impact is particularly pronounced among people who value the expression of dissenting opinions, but simultaneously care about social harmony; in other words, those who would engage in cross-cutting conversations but who would remain silent rather than risk conflict that might end a cross-cutting association altogether.

TABLE 3. The Cognitive and Affective Influence of Discussant Networks on Political Tolerance

	Orietanal
	Original Data	2SLS Model
Exposure to dissonant views	0.019	Wiodoi
Exposure to dissortant views	(0.534)	_
Exposure to consonant views	0.024	_
	(0.648)
Intimacy within dissonant dyads	`0.150 	0.116
•	(2.208)	(2.352)
Intimacy within consonant dyads		0.029
	(1.632)	(1.050)
Density of network	-0.043	0.038
Number of discussants	(1.303)	(1.1250)
Number of discussants	-0.062 (1.529)	-0.016 (0.482)
Awareness of rationales	0.061	0.061
for opposing views	(3.194)	(3.236)
Awareness of rationales	-0.012	-0.011
for own views	(0.957)	(0.900)
Political knowledge	0.122
	(5.105)	(4.754)
Political interest	0.058*	0.058*
Extramity of ignue opinions	(2.015) 0.109*	(2.050) 0.096
Extremity of issue opinions	(1.998)	_0.096 (1.758)
Education	0.068*	0.065*
	(2.305)	(2.215)
Parents' education	`0.022	`0.024
	(0.853)	(0.963)
Mean education in county	0.098*	0.099*
Liberal	(2.466) 0.040	(2.507) 0.039
Liberal	(1.485)	(1.452)
Conservative	-0.004	-0.005
3033343	(0.174)	(0.208)
Republican	_`0.051 ´	_`0.048´
_	(1.709)	(1.772)
Democrat	-0.046	-0.037
	(1.629)	(1.413)
Constant	1.259	1.233
Constant	(6.144)	(6.691)
	(3.1.7)	(0.001)
Sample size	780	780
$R^2$	0.298	0.293

Note: Entries are unstandardized regression coefficients, with t values in parentheses. Tolerance ranges from 1 to 4 based on an average of responses to all tolerance items. The equations in both columns also included gender, race, marital status, age, and the presence of underage children. The second column uses two-stage least squares and treats awareness of rationales for oppositional views and Intimacy within dissonant dyads as endogenous. First-stage  $R^2$  values were 0.46 and 0.49 for awareness of rationales for oppositional views and Intimacy within dissonant dyads, respectively. See Table 2, column 3, and Appendix B for details on first-stage regression. *** p< 0.001; *p< 0.01; *p< 0.05.

CONSEQUENCES OF POLITICAL TOLERANCE

The first column in Table 3 takes a first pass at evaluating Fig. 1's proposed mechanisms for translating exposure to dissonant views into political tolerance. If the affective ties between people are what is important for purposes of translating cross-cutting ties into political tolerance, then one would expect closeness within dissonant relationships to be particularly important to political tolerance. If the cognitive benefits are primary, then people's awareness of rationales for those views should be most predictive of political tolerance.

&lt;sup>16</sup> In this study as in many previous studies using these items (see McLeod and Chaffee 1972; McLeod et al. 1982), the two dimensions of communication patterns within the family (known as the social harmony and concept orientations) were independent (r = 0.03, p = 0.46), thus it was possible to identify a quarter of the sample in which differences of opinion were valued along with the need for social harmony; in other words, those with a civil orientation toward conflict (see the Appendix A for wording).

Consistent with the expectations in Fig. 1, exposure to dissonant views has no direct effects on political tolerance, but awareness of rationales for oppositional views and intimacy within dissonant dyads are both significantly related to tolerance. Closer relationships across lines of difference and greater knowledge of rationales for these differences both predict tolerance, even after controlling for political knowledge, political interest, extremity of issue opinions, and so forth. Notice, in contrast, that awareness of rationales for own views does not contribute significantly to political tolerance. Despite the fact that the two measures are highly correlated (see Table 1), awareness of rationales for own and opposing views represent distinctly different types of knowledge with very different consequences.

The problem with a causal interpretation of these relationships is that tolerance may have reciprocal effects on these variables. More tolerant people may be more likely to form close relationships with those of differing political views and/or may be more likely, as a result of their tolerance, to be open to learning about reasons for others' views. Although I do not carry out an analysis of the full simultaneous system, 2SLS provides a useful means of obtaining less biased estimates of the strength of the key causal relationships examined here. Fortunately, there are variables available that predict awareness of rationales for oppositional views and that predict Intimacy within dissonant dyads but that do not predict tolerance, thus making them ideal as instrumental variables in a 2SLS analysis. For example, as shown in Table 2, awareness of rationales for oppositional views is predicted by exposure to dissonant views and by awareness of rationales for own views, but they are unrelated to tolerance. Likewise, intimacy within dissonant dyads is predicted by exposure to dissonant views, exposure to consonant views, and Number of discussants in the network, but none of these variables is significantly related to tolerance judgments (see Appendix B).<sup>17</sup> These two equations produced first-stage  $R^2$  values for awareness of rationales for opposing views and intimacy within dissonant dyads of 0.46 and 0.49, respectively.18

In the second column in Table 3, the endogenous variables produced by the first-stage estimations are used in a 2SLS model treating both intimacy within dissonant dyads and awareness of rationales for opposing views as endogenous. As shown in the second column, the coefficients are virtually identical when taking potential reciprocal causation into account, thus lending additional support to the proposed pathways in Fig. 1. Most interestingly, they confirm that both cognitive and affective mechanisms are at work simultaneously in translating exposure to dissonant views to greater political tolerance. If one generally perceives those opposed to one's own views to have some legitimate, if not compelling, reasons for doing so, then one also will be more likely to extend to disliked groups the rights of speech, assembly, and so forth. Likewise, close ties with those who hold differing political views can increase tolerance. It should also be noted that this effect is not a mere function of attitude extremity or general or issue-specific forms of political knowledge, as variables of this kind are already included in the model.

Given that these findings only indirectly relate exposure to dissonant political views to political tolerance, what is the size of the net impact of cross-cutting exposure in the network on political tolerance? Using the coefficients in Tables 2 and 3 as a basis for estimating the size of the impact of the cognitive mechanism suggests that, if all else remained constant, a person at the high end of the exposure to dissonant views index would score just over 4% higher on the tolerance scale than someone with the lowest levels of exposure to dissonant views.<sup>19</sup> Thus the magnitude of the cognitive mechanism is small by most standards. Using the size of the coefficients in Table 3 and Appendix B, we can estimate the corresponding size of the affective mechanism as just over an 11% increase in tolerance from those least to most exposed to people with cross-cutting political views.

From a technical standpoint, there are two ways one might view the strength of these findings. On the one hand, two of the three hypotheses have sustained extensive controls for plausible rival interpretations, the implementation of instrumental variables to take into account simultaneity bias, and a relatively small sample size. On the other hand, the effects that emerge are modest, though they are clearly statistically significant and thus lend some credibility to the many claims of democratic theorists about the benefits of cross-cutting exposure.

The relationships may be viewed in a more impressive light if one takes into consideration the crudeness of some of the operational measures relative to the concepts they represent. For example, ideally one would like a measure of awareness of legitimate rationales for oppositional views that takes into account all potential controversies. Instead this larger concept is represented <sup>17</sup> Exposure to dissonant views turned out to be a stubbornly exogenous independent variable, predicted by virtually nothing within the data set except two structural characteristics that alter a person's supply of available discussion partners—whether they work outside the home and if their parents were of differing political parties.

&lt;sup>18</sup> The first-stage equations are shown in Table A1 (Appendix B) for Intimacy within dissonant dyads and are almost identical to the third column in Table 2 for awareness of rationales for opposing views. The analysis used for the first-stage 2SLS is different only in that it omits the intimacy variables to avoid potential endogeneity problems.

&lt;sup>19</sup> The range for the index of exposure to dissonant views was from -1.97 to 6.73.

in this study by only three political controversies. Likewise, the measure of the extent to which people's networks involve cross-cutting exposure has been limited by constraining respondents to only three discussants, when a more extensive network battery might generate a more valid measure including a greater number of weak ties, people with whom politics is discussed very seldom but who are politically dissimilar to the main respondent. The type of contact I examine in this study is by its very nature infrequent and often fleeting and, thus, difficult to measure. In addition, if better first-stage predictors of the endogenous variables were available, then a stronger pattern of relationships might be visible.

From a theoretical perspective, it is also worth noting that I do not make stringent assumptions about the kind of exposure to cross-cutting views that is tapped by these items. When exposed to conflicting views, I do not assume that people are truly "deliberating" according to any particular theoretical definition, nor is it assumed that when people are exposed to conflicting views the context is one in which people have equal status, reciprocity, and so forth. In this study exposure to dissonant political views requires only that people talk politics with someone who has political views that are, to some recognizable degree, different from their own (and vice versa for exposure to consonant views). Even though this is a far cry from what theorists and others envision as ultimately the most beneficial, exposure to conflicting views—even at the level defined here—appears to have the capacity to produce some beneficial effects. In short, there is undoubtedly a great deal of noise in these measures, and this needs to be taken into account in evaluating the more general theories these relationships represent. Although replication of these analyses on other data sets would be a natural next step to increase confidence in these findings, unfortunately there are few, if any, additional national surveys addressing the constitution of Americans' political networks that also measure political tolerance.20

AN EXPERIMENTAL CONFIRMATION

Recognizing that statistical techniques can only go so far in strengthening causal inferences in survey data, I subjected part of this model to an experimental test. Ideally, one could test all of the relationships shown in Fig. 1 in a controlled laboratory environment, manipulating exposure to cross-cutting political views and observing the consequences. However, for the bottom half of Fig. 1, that is, the affective mechanism translating cross-cutting exposure into political tolerance, an experimental design is not feasible. At least within the context of a short-term laboratory experiment, one cannot forge cross-cutting friendships and evaluate the effects of their intimacy.

Nonetheless, the cognitive mechanism shown in the top half of Fig. 1 is amenable to experimentation. Although it is not possible to simulate the effects of ongoing, accumulated exposure to cross-cutting political viewpoints in a lab, even a large, one-time exposure to the rationales behind multiple views different from one's own could be adequate. If one learns from such an experience that those with views different from one's own have their reasons, despite the fact that one may disagree with them, such exposure should promote support for the general principle of tolerance.

Using a simple, three-group design in which 82 student subjects<sup>21</sup> were randomly assigned to a control group or to political views that were either consonant with or contrary to their preexisting views, I evaluated the impact of cross-cutting exposure on political tolerance. All subjects filled out a pretest questionnaire that asked basic demographic and political information as well as opinions on eight controversial issues.<sup>22</sup> In addition, scales were included to tap personality characteristics including perspective-taking ability (see Davis 1983) and dogmatism (see Altemeyer 1997). Dogmatism is a stable personality trait known to predict political tolerance. Although perspective-taking ability has not been studied in relation to political tolerance, it makes sense to measure in this theoretical context because it represents the capacity to entertain others' points of view, as proposed by the purely cognitive mechanism in the upper half of Fig. 1.23 This capacity should condition people's ability to appreciate the legitimacy of conflicting political perspectives. Exposure to cross-cutting political perspectives combined with perspective-taking ability should give subjects a particularly good reason for upholding others' rights to speech, assembly, and so forth.

After the pretest, each subject was exposed to rationales for dissonant or consonant views or to nothing at all. Because the cognitive mechanism in Fig. 1 hypothesizes a purely informational effect from cross-cutting exposure on tolerance, the manipulation was limited to simply conveying information about arguments behind oppositional positions, without any face to face contact with another human being. Further, because this hypothesis is about the effects of generalized exposure to

&lt;sup>20</sup> The General Social Surveys have at times included both tolerance measures and network measures, but there is no information available about political agreement or disagreement among discussion partners. Several data sets make it possible to examine political agreement within networks (e.g., Huckfeldt and Sprague 1995; Dalton, Beck, and Huckfeldt 1998), but they do not make it possible to conect these network characteristics to tolerance judgments. Although data on U.S. networks and tolerance are lacking, see Gibson (1999) for similar data on Russia.

&lt;sup>21</sup> Students were undergraduates attending classes in the political science department at Ohio State University.

<sup>22</sup> These included the death populty same say marriage, the use of schools, stricter environmental policies, and hate crime laws.

&lt;sup>22</sup> These included the death penalty, same sex marriage, the use of mammals in medical research, affirmative action for women and minorities, the emphasis in sex education programs on abstinence versus birth control/STD prevention, vouchers for private and parochial schools, stricter environmental policies, and hate crime laws.

23 The perspective-taking scale represents a cognitive, nonemotional form of empathy and is not related to empathy's emotional components (Davis 1983).

contradictory views on tolerance, and not about effects from exposure to any one topic or area of controversy, each subject was exposed either to multiple rationales for multiple political viewpoints that matched their own, rationales for views they were known to oppose, or no new information. To strengthen the manipulation, exposure to consonant or dissonant views was carried out by exposing respondents to consistently agreeable or disagreeable arguments for three separate issues. A randomized schedule dictated for which of eight pretest issue controversies each subject received stimuli and in which order.<sup>24</sup>

In the dissonant and consonant exposure conditions, three brief "assignments" provided a context for exposing people to rationales in support of, or in opposition to, their own views. For each assignment, subjects were given a stack of five cards, each bearing a rationale in support of an issue position. The first assignment asked subjects to order the cards by strength of argument from strongest to weakest and then copy them onto a separate sheet of paper; the second asked the subject to imagine him or herself as a speechwriter for a political candidate endorsing that issue position, and to embed the arguments into a speech they write for him; the third assignment simply replicated the first one but with a third issue. So in total each experimental subject not in the control condition was exposed to

<sup>24</sup> If a subject chose the midpoint on the scale, another issue was substituted according to a random schedule.
<sup>25</sup> A sample of what the stacks of cards were like is as follows for two

15 arguments concerning three issue positions, all of which were either systematically consistent with or inconsistent with some of the many political views the subject had expressed in the pretest. The goal of the assignments was to encourage subjects to fully process all of the rationales on the cards. After completing the assignments, a posttest was administered that included a "content-controlled" measure of political tolerance virtually identical to the one administered by telephone in the survey.<sup>27</sup>

The raw mean comparisons resulting from this experiment were in the expected direction with lower tolerance in the control condition ( $\bar{x} = 2.73$ ) relative to the dissonant views condition ( $\bar{x} = 2.81$ ), but these differences were not statistically significant among any of the three groups. However, when the efficiency of the model was improved by including covariates and taking into account subjects' perspective-taking ability and dogmatism, significant effects on tolerance were evident among those respondents with high perspectivetaking ability. As predicted, perspective-taking ability was directly related to political tolerance, but it also served as an important contingent condition for the effects of cross-cutting exposure. In contrast, analyses revealed no significant differences or interactions in analyses comparing the control condition to subjects exposed to rationales for consonant views.<sup>28</sup>

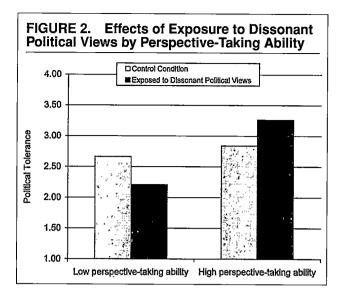

As Fig. 2 demonstrates, among those high in perspective-taking ability, mean levels of tolerance were higher when subjects were exposed to rationales for dissonant views. However, among those low in perspective-taking ability, tolerance levels were lower when subjects were exposed to dissonant views, although the higher variance among this group makes this a suggestive, though not significant difference.<sup>29</sup>

To assess the size of this effect while taking other variables into account, Table 4 presents these results as regression equations. Column 1 in Table 4 shows that among those with high perspective-taking ability, those receiving exposure to rationales for dissonant views on three issues scored about 14% higher on the tolerance scale. Although the small, relatively homogeneous student sample used in this experiment is by no means a different sides of just one of the 8 issues. Death Penalty, Pro: 1) The death penalty is a fair and appropriate form of justice for the most severe crimes against human lives. 2) The death penalty sometimes provides grieving families with the closure they need after the death of a loved one. 3) Most violent criminals can't be rehabilitated and the costs of life imprisonment are higher per year than the costs of many colleges. 4) It is unfair to expect the American public to pay higher taxes out of their own pockets in order to pay the costs of building more prisons and feeding, clothing, and providing medical care for criminals who make no useful contribution to society. 5) Most Americans support the use of the death penalty in some situations, so it should continue to be legal. Death Penalty, Con: 1) It is immoral to take a human life, no matter what the circumstances. 2) Sometimes innocent people are convicted, and there is no way mistakes can ever be corrected when innocent people are put to death. 3) Most studies show that the death penalty does not reduce crime rates. 4) Because death sentences are usually appealed many times in court, it ends up being more expensive than life imprisonment. 5) Government should not condone violence against human life under any circumstances. It makes us as bad as the criminals we want to stop.

&lt;sup>26</sup> The assignments read as follows. Assignment 1/3: "Please take the stack of cards supporting a particular issue position and read them carefully. Next sort them by how strong an argument for the issue position you think each reason is. After you have sorted them into a pile from strongest argument to weakest argument, start with the strongest reason, and copy it onto line 1 below. Continue ranking the arguments from 1 to 5 with the strongest argument at the top, the weakest at the bottom of the page." Assignment 2: "You work for a member of congress and have been asked to write part of his speech for a talk he will give to a large group of people, some of whom support his issue positions and many who do not. Use the stack of arguments for the issue position that you have been given in order to write a few paragraphs of the speech justifying his position on this one controversial issue. All the facts have already been checked by your staff for accuracy. We realize this may or may not be your personal position. Nonetheless, please make the speech as convincing as possible!"

&lt;sup>27</sup> Cronbach's  $\alpha$  for the six-item index of political tolerance was 0.80. <sup>28</sup> The significant differences between subjects in the dissonant condition and the control condition were confirmed using an analysis of variance with two between-subject factors (experimental condition and high or low perspective-taking ability), plus covariates for strength of Republican/Democratic party identification, income, parental education levels, ideology, and dogmatism. Dogmatism was a significant predictor of tolerance levels (F = 2.99, p < 0.05), as was perspective-taking ability (F = 5.39, p < 0.05). Those accustomed to thinking about controversies from more than one perspective also tended to be more tolerant. But the interaction between experimental condition (control versus exposure to dissonant views) and perspective-taking ability (low versus high) also confirmed that those with high perspective-taking ability benefited significantly from exposure to rationales for cross-cutting views (F = 2.96, p < 0.05). <sup>29</sup> This may result from the fact that exposing people to counterattitudinal arguments when they are not able to see things through another's eves causes them to counter-argue and strengthen their resolve, believing perhaps even more ardently that those who disagree with them are unworthy opponents.

representative one, it is impressive that an effect of this size was generated by one single disembodied exposure to cross-cutting political views. As the second column in Table 4 shows, exposure to viewpoints consonant with the subject's own views produced no such effects, thus confirming that it is exposure to dissonant views that is encouraging tolerance rather than simply exposure to political viewpoints more generally.

DISCUSSION

Exposure to dissimilar views has been deemed a central element—if not the sine qua non—of the kind of political dialogue that is needed to maintain a democratic citizenry: "Democratic public discourse does not depend on preexisting harmony or similarity among citizens . . . but rather on the ability to create meaningful discourses across lines of difference" (Calhoun 1988, 220). The extent to which people are exposed to crosscutting political viewpoints has become of increasing concern to observers of American politics as a result of trends toward increasing residential balkanization (e.g., Harrison and Bennett 1995; Frey 1995). If people self select into lifestyle enclaves with similar-minded others, their exposure to dissimilar political views should suffer.

To the extent that residential balkanization and other trends translate to a decline in communication across lines of political difference, one of its adverse effects may include fewer opportunities for people to learn about legitimate rationales for oppositional viewpoints. Particularly when policies or candidates other than one's own top preferences carry the day, the findings of this study suggest that the perceived legitimacy of the winning people and policies may be hindered by a lack of awareness of legitimate reasons for opposing views. If people are surrounded by people who think much like they do, they will be less aware of the legitimate arguments on the other side of contemporary political controversies.

Beyond legitimacy, the extent of exposure to dissonant political views may also be important for its

TABLE 4. Experimental Effects of Exposure to Rationales for Consonant and Dissonant Political Views on Political Tolerance

TOTALICAL VICAS OIL FOILLICAL	Tolerance
	Dissonant	Consonant
	Views	Views
	Versus	Versus
	Control	Control
Experimental treatment	-0.44	0.13
	(1.11)	(0.34)
Perspective-taking ability	0.13	0.03
	(0.38)	(0.09)
Experimental treatment	1.01*	-0.30
by perspective-taking ability	(1.99)	(0.53)
Dogmatism-	-0.32	-0.27
	(1.68)	(1.36)
Ideology (conservative)	-0.19	-0.12
	(1.42)	(0.85)
Republican (strength of)	0.34	-0.00
	(1.32)	(0.02)
Democrat (strength of)	-0.10	- 0.15
	(0.46)	(0.69)
Income	-0.06	_0.08 °
	(1.13)	(1.36)
Parents' educational	-0.07	_0.02 ^
attainment	(0.86)	(0.26)
Constant	4.24	4.12
	(5.79)	(5.53)
$R^2$	0.27	0.18
Sample size	57	50

Note: Entries are ordinary least-squares coefficients, with t values in parentheses. The change in  $R^2$  due to the addition of the interaction in column 2 is significant (F change = 4.31, p < 0.05). *** p < 0.001; ** p < 0.01; ** p < 0.05 (one-tailed test).

indirect contributions to political tolerance. The capacity to see that there is more than one side to an issue, that a political conflict is, in fact, a legitimate controversy with rationales on both sides, translates to greater willingness to extend civil liberties to even those groups whose political views one dislikes a great deal.

This cognitive mechanism is augmented by influence that flows through the affective ties that people maintain across lines of political difference. Close personal ties with those of differing political views contribute to greater political tolerance. It is interesting to note that, from this perspective, the fact that Americans so seldom discuss politics in any depth is probably a feature, not a liability. Because politics is such a small part of people's day-to-day lives, when they come into contact with people of opposing views, it is relatively easy for them to ignore this dimension of difference or to discover it late enough that a friendship of some kind has already been initiated or established. Political views need not be at the forefront of daily life or daily conversation to produce beneficial consequences.

Moreover, the positive role played by affective ties to politically dissimilar others suggests a need to reconsider the role of emotion in democratic judgment. Particularly in research on political tolerance, there is a tendency to think of emotion as something that promotes intolerance and prejudicial reactions to others (cf. Kuklinski et al. 1991; Theiss-Morse, Marcus and Sullivan 1993). Although evidence on this point remains unresolved, the emotional versus deliberative citizen dichotomy often fails to acknowledge that through social interaction people form relationships with affective components as well as judgments based on the information that is conveyed.

Although in this study I have attempted to separate network characteristics such as intimacy, frequency, and agreement for analytic purposes, it should be acknowledged that in the real world they are inextricably intertwined. People generally feel closer to those who share their values, political and otherwise, and they talk more frequently with those to whom they are close. Thus it is important to note that efforts to increase exposure to disagreement may necessitate trade-offs in other network characteristics that are also generally valued. For example, to increase levels of exposure to oppositional views in the population, people will need to have a greater number of weak ties and probably less intimacy on average within their networks. And although trust is not directly examined in this study, it also goes hand in hand with homogeneity of views (e.g., Gibson 1999; Baldassare 1985); thus dense networks of tight-knit social relationships and their characteristic high levels of trust may come only at the expense of exposure to cross-cutting views. Close relationships obviously have their virtues, but large pluralistic societies such as the United States undoubtedly need citizens with a good number of weak ties in their social networks to sustain support for democratic freedoms in the midst of great heterogeneity (e.g., Simmel 1955; Karatnycky 1999).

Ultimately, political tolerance is about formalized ways in which people agree to disagree. It is primarily about restraint and not doing, rather than political action. Thus people's capacity to carry on conversations across lines of political difference, conversations in which one must agree to disagree at a micro level, may teach important lessons about the necessity of political tolerance, the public policy rendition of agreeing to disagree at the macro level.

These findings also have implications for the burgeoning empirical literature on deliberative democracy. A spate of recent studies, primarily experimental or quasi-experimental in nature, has attempted to manipulate deliberation by bringing people together to talk in small groups (see, e.g., Morrell 2000; Muhlberger and Butts 1998; Price and Cappella 2001; Simon and Sulkin 2000; Weber 1998). While such studies have provided many new insights on what happens when people are compelled to talk to one another about controversial issues, the broad and variable nature of their interactions also makes it difficult to determine which aspects of the experience are producing the observed effects. Moreover, because every small group exchange is somewhat different from the next, causal arguments have been more difficult to make than in most experimental studies. For example, it is difficult to know if effects are due to information gains through social interaction, the camaraderie of social interaction, group dynamics, and so forth. In reality, deliberation is a conglomeration of many variables, and it is often impossible to disentangle their effects when they are all varied simultaneously. From a social—psychological perspective, the advantage of this study is that it isolates one particular aspect of the deliberative encounter, the extent of cross-cutting exposure, and examines its consequences using both survey and experimental evidence. While advantageous for methodological reasons, and for purposes of understanding underlying processes of influence, this narrowness also limits the scope of the conclusions that should be drawn from it.

Does the composition of people's social networks have meaningful consequences for political tolerance and democratic legitimacy? My tentative answer to this question is yes, though they are relatively modest ones based on this survey and experimental evidence. Although these findings do not support the argument that more deliberation per se is what contemporary American politics need most, they do lend supporting evidence to arguments about the benefits of cross-cutting networks of political communication.

APPENDIX A: WORDING OF SURVEY ITEMS

Discussant Generator. "From time to time, people discuss government, elections and politics with other people. We'd like to know the first names or just the initials of people you talk with about these matters. These people might be from your family, from work, from the neighborhood, from some other organization you belong to, or they might be from somewhere else. Who is the person you've talked with most about politics? [Discussant 1] Aside from this person, who is the person you've talked with most about politics? [Discussant 2] Aside from anyone you've already mentioned, is there anyone else you've talked with about politics? [Discussant 3]." If at any point the respondent could not give a name: "Well then, can you give the first name of the person with whom you were most likely to have informal conversations during the course of the past few months?"

Frequency of Political Discussion. When you talk with [discussant], do you discuss politics a lot, some, a little, or very rarely? (Coded 0 if no discussant was named or R reports no political discussion with the discussant, 1 if very rarely, 2 if a little, 3 if some, and 4 if a lot.)

Exposure to Dissonant Political Views. The following five items were coded as indicated below, standardized, and then combined into an additive index representing the extent to which each discussion partner held differing views. To produce an indicator of the respondent's overall extent of exposure to dissonant political views, these three measures were weighted by the frequency of the respondent's interactions with that particular discussant, and then combined across each of the three discussants for a summary measure. To facilitate interpretation of coefficients, the summary measure across discussants also was standardized.

 "Compared with [discussant], would you say that your political views are much the same, somewhat different,

- or very different?" (Coded 2 if very different, 1 if somewhat different, 0 if else.)
- (2) "Do you think [discussant] normally favors Republicans or Democrats, or both, or neither?" (Coded 2 if discussant and respondent clearly favor opposing parties, 1 if the respondent leans toward an opposing party, and 0 if else.)
- (3) "Which presidential candidate, if any, does [discussant] favor? Clinton, Dole, Perot, or some other candidate?" (Coded 1 if discussant and respondent disagree on choice of candidate, 0 if else.)
- (4) "Overall, do you feel [discussant] shares most of your views on political issues, opposes them, or doesn't [person's name] do either one?" (Coded 1 if opposes views, 0 if else.)
- (5) "When you discuss politics with [discussant], do you disagree often, sometimes, rarely, or never?" (Coded 0 if never disagrees (or never talks), 1 if rarely, 2 if sometimes, and 3 if often.)

Exposure to Consonant Political Views. The same procedure as for Exposure to Dissonant Views was followed, but items were coded so as to award higher scores for greater agreement between respondents and their discussants. (1) Coded 1 if much the same, 0 if else. (2) Coded 2 if discussant and respondent clearly favor the same party, 1 if the respondent leans toward the same party, and 0 if else. (3) Coded 1 if discussant and respondent are in agreement on choice of candidate, 0 if else. (4) Coded 1 if shares views, 0 if else.

Intimacy Within Dissonant and Consonant Dyads. Question 4 above was used to sort discussants into categories of consonant, dissonant, and politically neutral relationships. For discussants within each of these categories, an indicator of the level of intimacy in the relationship was based on answers to the question, "Is [discussant] a close friend, just a friend, or just someone that you regularly come into contact with?" (Coded 0 if no discussant, 1 if acquaintance only, 2 if a friend, 3 if a close friend, 4 if a spouse/family member.) The mean level of closeness was calculated across the 0 to 3 dyads that were consonant, dissonant, or neutral, thus producing three separate measures of Intimacy.

Political Interest. "Some people seem to follow what's going on in government and public affairs most of the time, whether there's an election going on or not. Others aren't that interested. Would you say you follow what's going on in government and public affairs most of the time, some of the time, only now and then, or hardly at all?" (Coded 1 if hardly at all, 2 if only now and then, 3 if some of the time, 4 if most of the time.)

Issue Opinions. (1) Until recently, welfare programs like food stamps and aid to families with dependent children were funded and run by the federal government. Do you favor transferring most of the responsibility for welfare programs to the individual state governments or keeping most of the responsibility for welfare programs with the federal government? (2) Do you favor or oppose affirmative action programs for women and minorities? (3) I'd like to get your feelings toward the major candidates for president by asking you to rate each one on a scale that runs from 0 to 10. Zero means you feel most unfavorable toward the candidate, 10 means you feel most favorable, and 5 means you feel neutral toward the candidate. Using any number from 0 to 10, overall how do you feel toward BOB DOLE/BILL CLINTON? Coded by taking the difference (DOLE-CLINTON) and trichotomizing the sum into pro-Dole, pro-Clinton, and neutral scores.

Awareness of Rationales for Own and Opposing Views. "We are interested in hearing about the reasons people have for [supporting different presidential candidates/ favoring different sides of this issue] Regardless of your own views, what reasons can you think of for [supporting Bill Clinton/Bob Dole for President] [keeping responsibility with the federal government/transferring responsibility to the individual state governments] [favoring/opposing affirmative action programs]?"

Tolerance. Average of responses to six questions asked with respect to the group named by the respondent. "I'm going to read you a list of groups in politics. As I read it please follow along and think about which of these groups you like the least. If there is some other group you like even less than the groups I read, please tell me the name of that group. Communists, white supremacists, homosexuals, militia groups, abortion rights activists, pro-life activists, neo-Nazis, religious fundamentalists, atheists, the Ku Klux Klan, and feminists. Which of these groups do you like the least, or is there some other group you like even less?" All items were answered on a 4-point agree–disagree scale: [Named group] should be banned from being president of the United States/should be outlawed/should be allowed to make a speech in your town/city./should be allowed to hold public rallies in your town/city./should be allowed to teach in the public schools./should have their phones tapped by our government.

Political Knowledge. Additive index of the number of correct responses to the five items recommended by Delli Carpini and Keeter (1996, 305-6).

Extremity of Political Opinions. This is the average of how strongly respondents favored or opposed the three opinion questions. "Do you strongly or only somewhat favor (opinion given)?" For presidential candidates, those for whom the absolute value of the thermometer difference score (Dole–Clinton) was greater than 5 were coded as high extremity (2), those for whom it was less than 5 were coded 1, and those who rated the candidates equally were coded 0.

Liberal/Conservative. For each variable (liberal/conservative), respondents were coded 0 if the respondent reported no partisanship, 1 if the respondent only leaned in a partisan direction, 2 if a not very strong partisan, and 3 if the respondent reported strong partisanship.

Republican/Democrat. Coded 1 if Republican/Democrat and 0 otherwise.

Civil Orientation Toward Conflict. Scored 1 for respondents over the median on both social harmony and conflict scales, otherwise 0: Social harmony orientation: (a) "When you were growing up, about how often did your parents take the position that certain topics are better left undiscussed?" (b) "How often did they encourage you to give in on arguments rather than risk antagonizing people?" Concept orientation: (a) "When you were growing up, how often did your parents emphasize that getting your point across is important even if others don't like it?" (b) How often did they have spirited discussions of controversial matters like politics or religion"

APPENDIX B

TABLE A1.	First-Stage	Predictors	of Intimacy
Within Disso	onant Dyads

Within Dissonant Dyads
Network characteristics
Exposure to dissonant views	0.32
	(19.49)
Exposure to consonant views	0.04
	(1.96)
Intimacy within consonant dyads	-0.07
	(4.15)
Density of network	-0.01
	(0.81)
Number of discussants	0.08
	(4.74)
Political involvement	0.00
Political knowledge	-0.00 (0.00)
D-listlinterest	(0.26)
Political interest	-0.01 (0.04)
Cutromity of issue eniniana	(0.34) 0.08
Extremity of issue opinions	(2.65)
Education	(2.03) 0.01
Education	(0.82)
   Partisanship	(0.02)
Republican	-0.02
riopublicari	(0.97)
Democrat	-0.02
Bomodiat	(0.97)
Conservative	0.02
	(1.52)
Liberal	0.02
	(1.25)
	` ,
Constant	0.06
	(0.68)
Sample size	780
R <sup>2</sup>	0.49

Note: Entries are unstandardized ordinary least-squares regression coefficients with t values in parentheses below. Gender, race, age, income, marital status, and the presence of underage children also were included in the equation estimated above.

REFERENCES

- Allport, Gordon W. 1954. The Nature of Prejudice. Reading, MA: Addison–Wesley.
- Altemeyer, Bob. 1996. The Authoritarian Specter. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Amir, Yehuda. 1969. "Contact Hypothesis in Ethnic Relations." Psychological Bulletin 71 (May): 319-42.
- Amir, Yehuda. 1976. "The Role of Intergroup Contact in Change of Prejudice and Ethnic Relations." in Towards the Elimination of Racism, ed. Phyllis A. Katz. New York: Pergamon Press.
- Arendt, Hannah. 1968. "Truth and Politics." In Between Past and Future: Eight Exercises in Political Thought, ed. Hannah Arendt. New York: Viking Press.
- Baldassare. Mark. 1985. "Trust in Local Government." Social Science Quarterly 66 (September): 704–12.
- Benhabib, Seyla. 1992. Situating the Self. New York: Routledge. Burnstein, Eugene, and Keith Sentis. 1981. "Attitude Polarization in Groups." In Cognitive Responses in Persuasion, eds. Richard E. Petty, Thomas M. Ostrom, and Timothy C. Brock. Mahwah, NJ: Erlbaum.

- Burnstein, Eugene, Amiram Vinokur, and Yacov Trope. 1973. "Interpersonal Comparison Versus Persuasive Argumentation; A More Direct Test of Alternative Explanations for Group-Induced Shifts in Individual Choice." Journal of Experimental Social Psychology 9 (May): 236–45.
- Calhoun, Craig. 1988. "Populist Politics, Communication Media and Large Scale Societal Integration." Sociological Theory 6 (Fall): 219-41
- Conover, Pamela J., and Donald D. Searing. 1998. Political Discussion and the Politics of Identity. Presented at the annual meeting of the Midwest Political Science Association, Chicago, IL.
- Cook, Fay Lomax, Lawrence R. Jacobs, and Jason Barabas. 1999. "Deliberative Democracy in Action: An Analysis of the Effects of the Americans Discuss Social Security Deliberative Forums." Presented at the annual meeting of the American Political Science Association. Atlanta. GA.
- Association, Atlanta, GA.
  Cook, Stuart W. 1984. "Cooperative Interaction in Multi-ethnic Contexts." In Groups in Contact: The Psychology of Desegregation, eds. Norman Miller and Marilynn B. Brewer. Orlando, FL: Academic Press.
- Dalton, Russell, Paul A. Beck, and Robert Huckfeldt. 1998. "Partisan Cues and the Media: Information Flows in the 1992 Presidential Election." American Political Science Review 92 (March): 111–26
- Davis, Mark H. 1983. "Measuring Individual Differences in Empathy: Evidence for a Multidimensional Approach." Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 44 (January): 113–26.
- Delli Carpini, Michael X., and Scott Keeter. 1996. What Americans Know About Politics and Why It Matters. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Elshtain, Jean Bethke. 1995. Democracy on Trial. New York: Basic
- Fearon, James. 1998. "Deliberation as Discussion." In Deliberative Democracy, ed. Jon Elster. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Fishkin, James S. 1991. Democracy and Deliberation. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Frey, William H. 1995. "The New Geography of Population Shifts: Trends Toward Balkanization." In State of the Union: America in the 1990s Vol. 2. ed. Reynolds Farley, New York: Russell Sage.
- the 1990s, Vol. 2, ed. Reynolds Farley. New York: Russell Sage. Gastil, John, and James P. Dillard. 1999. "Increasing Political Sophistication Through Public Deliberation." Political Communication 16 (January to March): 3–23.
- Gibson, James L. 1999. "Social Networks, Civil Society, and the Prospects for Consolidating Russia's Democratic Transition," Typescript. St. Louis, MO: Department of Political Science, Washington University.
- Gray, John. 1995. "Does Democracy Have a Future?" New York Times Book Review January 22.
- Green, Melanie C., Penny S. Visser and Philip E. Tetlock. 1999. "Coping with Accountability Cross-Pressures: Low-effort Evasive Tactics and High Effort Quests for Complex Compromises." Typescript. Columbus: Department of Psychology, Ohio State University.
- Gutmann, Amy, and Dennis Thompson. 1996. Democracy and Disagreement. Cambridge, MA: Harvard, Belknap Press.
- Habermas, Jurgen. 1989. The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press.
- Harrison, Roderick J., and Claudette E. Bennett. 1995. "Racial and Ethnic Diversity." In State of the Union: America in the 1990s, Vol. 2, ed. Reynolds Farley. New York: Russell Sage.
- Honaker, James, Anne Joseph, Gary King, Kenneth Scheve, and Naunihal. Singh. 1999. Amelia: A Program for Missing Data (Windows version). Cambridge, MA: Harvard University. http://GKing. Harvard.edu/.
- Huckfeldt, Robert, and John Sprague. 1995. Citizens, Politics, and Social Communication: Information and Influence in an Election Campaign. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Karatnycky, Adrian. 1999. "The Decline of Illiberal Democracy." Journal of Democracy 10 (January): 112–25.
- King, Gary, James Honaker, Anne Joseph, and Kenneth Scheve. 2001. "Analyzing Incomplete Political Science Data: An Alternative Algorithm for Multiple Imputation." American Political Science Review 95 (1): 49–69.

- Kingwell, Mark. 1995. A Civil Tongue: Justice, Dialogue, and the Politics of Pluralism. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.
- Knight, Jack, and James Johnson. 1994. "Aggregation and Deliberation: On the Possibility of Democratic Legitimacy." Political Theory 22 (May): 277–96.
- Kuklinski, James H., Ellen Riggle, Victor Ottati, Norbert Schwarz, and Robert S. Wyer, Jr. 1991. "The Cognitive and Affective Bases of Political Tolerance Judgments." American Journal of Political Science 35 (February): 1–27.
- Lasch, Christopher. 1995. The Revolt of the Elites and the Betrayal of Democracy. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Lowry, Nancy, and David W. Johnson. 1981. "Effects of Controversy on Epistemic Curiosity, Achievement and Attitudes." Journal of Social Psychology 115 (October): 31–43.
- Manin, Bernard. 1987. "On Legitimacy and Political Deliberation." Political Theory 15 (3): 338-68.
- Marcus, George, John L. Sullivan, Elizabeth Theiss-Morse, and Sandra Wood. 1995. With Malice Toward Some: How People Make Civil Liberties Judgments. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- McLeod, Jack M., and Steven H. Chaffee. 1972. "The Construction of Social Reality." In The Social Influence Processes. ed. James T. Tedeschi. Chicago: Aldine Atherton.
- McLeod, Jack M., Maryanne Fitzpatrick, Carroll Glynn, and Susan F. Fallis. "Television and Social Relations: Family Influences and Consequences for Interpersonal Behavior." In Television and Behavior: Ten Years of Scientific Progress and Implications for the Eighties. Rockville, MD: U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, National Institute of Mental Health.
- Mead, George Herbert. 1934. Mind, Self and Society. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Mill, John Stuart. [1859] 1956. On Liberty. ed. C. V. Shields. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.
- Morrell, Michael E. 2000. "Participatory Democracy, Deliberative Structures, and Empathy." Presented at the annual meeting of the Midwest Political Science Association, Chicago, IL.
- Muhlberger, Peter, and Carter Butts. 1998. "An Experiment in Deliberative Democracy: Politics Shaping Citizens." Presented at the annual meeting of the Midwest Political Science Association, Chicago, IL.
- Mutz. Diana C. 1998. Impersonal Influence. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Nunn, Clyde Z., Harry J. Crockett, and J. Allen Williams. 1978. Tolerance for Nonconformity. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass.
- Pettigrew, Thomas F. 1997. "Generalized Intergroup Contact Effects on Prejudice." Personality and Social Psychology Bulletin 23 (February): 173–85.
- Pettigrew, Thomas F. 1998. "Intergroup Contact Theory." Annual Review of Psychology 49: 65–85.
- Pettigrew, Thomas F., and Linda R. Tropp. 2000. "Does Intergroup Contact Reduce Prejudice? Recent Meta-Analytic Findings." In Reducing Prejudice and Discrimination, ed. Stuart Oskamp. Mahwah, NJ: Earlbaum.

- Petty, Richard E., and Cacioppo, John T. 1977. "Forewarning, Cognitive Responding and Resistance to Persuasion." Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 35 (September): 645–55.
- Petty, Richard E., and Cacioppo, John T. 1979. "Issue Involvement Can Increase or Decrease Persuasion by Enhancing Message-Relevant Cognitive Responses." Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 37 (October): 1915–26.
- Piaget, Jean. 1932. The Moral Judgment of the Child, trans. M. Gabain. New York: Harcourt, Brace.
- Price, Vincent, and Joseph N. Cappella. 2001. "Online Deliberation and Its Influence: The Electronic Dialogue Project in Campaign 2000." Presented at the annual meeting of the American Association for Public Opinion Research, Montreal.
- Reich, Carol, and Mary Purbhoo. 1975. "The Effects of Cross-Cultural Contact." Canadian Journal of Behavioural Science 7 (October): 313–27.
- Sanders, Lynn M. 1997. "Against Deliberation." Political Theory 25 (June): 347-76.
- Schudson, Michael. 1997. "Why Conversation Is Not the Soul of Democracy." Critical Studies in Mass Communication 14 (October): 297–309.
- Scorza, Jason A. 1998. "Uncivil Friendship: Emersonian Lessons for Democratic Disagreement." Presented at the annual meetings of the American Political Science Association, Boston, MA.
- Simmel, Georg. 1955. Conflict and the Web of Group Affiliations, trans. K. H. Wolff. New York: Free Press.
- Simon, Adam F., and Tracy Sulkin. 2000. "Assessing Deliberation in Small Groups." Presented at the annual meeting of the Midwest Political Science Association, Chicago, IL.
- Smith, Karl A., David W. Johnson, and Roger T. Johnson. 1981. "Can Conflict be Constructive? Controversy Versus Concurrence Seeking in Learning Groups." Journal of Educational Psychology 73 (October): 651–63.
- Smith, Karl A., Renne P. Petersen, David W. Johnson, and Roger T. Johnson. 1992. "The Effects of Controversy and Concurrence Seeking on Effective Decision Making." Journal of Social Psychology 126 (2): 237–48.
- Stouffer, Samuel. 1955. Communism, Conformity, and Civil Liberties. New York: Doubleday.
- Sullivan, John L., James Piereson, and George E. Marcus. 1982. Political Tolerance and American Democracy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Theiss-Morse, Elizabeth, George E. Marcus, and John L. Sullivan. 1993. "Passion and Reason in Political Life: The Organization of Affect and Cognition and Political Tolerance." In Reconsidering the Democratic Public, ed. George E. Marcus and Russell L. Hanson. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press. Pp. 249–72.
- Weber, Lori M. 1998. "The Effect of Democratic Deliberation on Political Tolerance." Presented at the annual meeting of the Midwest Political Science Association, Chicago, IL.
- Weigert, Kathleen Mass. 1976. "Intergroup Contact and Attitudes About a Third Group: A Survey of Black soldiers' Perceptions." International Journal of Group Tension 6: 110-24.

Out of Step, Out of Office: Electoral Accountability and House Members' Voting

BRANDICE CANES-WRONE Massachusetts Institute of Technology and California Institute of Technology

DAVID W. BRADY AND JOHN F. COGAN Stanford University and The Hoover Institution

oes a typical House member need to worry about the electoral ramifications of his roll-call decisions? We investigate the relationship between incumbents' electoral performance and roll-call support for their party—controlling for district ideology, challenger quality, and campaign spending, among other factors—through a series of tests of the 1956–1996 elections. The tests produce three key findings indicating that members are indeed accountable for their legislative voting. First, in each election, an incumbent receives a lower vote share the more he supports his party. Second, this effect is comparable in size to that of other widely recognized electoral determinants. Third, a member's probability of retaining office decreases as he offers increased support for his party, and this relationship holds for not only marginal, but also safe members.

You can only go so far in Texas...there's nothing more useless [to the Democrats] than a dead liberal.

Spoken by Representative (and future President) Lyndon B. Johnson to Jim Rowe, a White House assistant under Franklin D. Roosevelt, when Rowe asked Johnson to vote for an administration proposal on civil rights (Dallek 1991, 168–9) fundamental issue of American politics, as well as democratic theory, is whether the public holds elected officials accountable for their policy decisions. The founders of the United States clearly desired such accountability, and for no institution more so than the House of Representatives. As Madison ([1788] 1987, 323–4) argued in Federalist 52, "As it is essential to liberty that the government in general should have a common interest with the people, so it is particularly essential that the branch of it under consideration [the House of Representatives] should have an immediate dependence on, and intimate sympathy with, the people." He continued by surmising, "Frequent elections are unquestionably the only policy by which this dependence sympathy can be effectively secured."

Brandice Canes-Wrone is Assistant Professor of Political Science, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and Visiting Assistant Professor of Political Science, California Institute of Technology, Division of Humanities and Social Sciences 228-77, Pasadena, CA 91125 (bcw@hss.caltech.edu). David W. Brady is Professor of Political Science, Standford University and Fellow, The Hoover Institution, 241 Littlefield, Graduate School of Business, Stanford University, Stanford, CA 94305-5015 (dbrady@leland.stanford.edu). John F. Cogan is Senior Fellow, The Hoover Institution and Professor of Public Policy, Standford University, HHMB Room 347, Stanford, CA 94305-6010 (cogan@hoover.stanford.edu).

We thank Steve Ansolabehere, Michael Bailey, Gregory Bovitz, Chappell Lawson, John Lott, Jas Sekhon, and Jim Snyder for helpful comments and Steve Ansolabehere, Gary Jacobson, and Jim Snyder for making available the data on challenger quality and candidates' spending. Any errors, however, are clearly our own.

Of course, frequent House elections achieve Madison's desired common interest only to the extent that electoral outcomes depend upon officials' policy decisions, and research in political science calls into question whether in fact voters hold members accountable for their policy choices. Perhaps most indicative of a lack of accountability is the plethora of studies that suggest that individual voters are fairly ignorant about members' policy actions (e.g., Campbell et al. 1960; Converse 1964; Delli Carpini and Keeter 1991; Miller and Stokes 1962; Smith 1989). Moreover, as Downs (1957) argued nearly half a century ago, such ignorance is rational for the typical citizen, who has little incentive to expend effort to gather political information given the extremely low probability that he is pivotal in an election. Thus the typical representative might be able to vote on legislative matters as she pleases without fearing that she could lose reelection.

In contrast to this body of work, research on congressional behavior suggests that House members believe that roll-call voting affects their probability of reelection, causing them to consider constituent ideology in deciding upon roll-call positions. This concern with the electoral effect of legislative voting is a standard component of theories of Congress<sup>1</sup> and a consistent finding of surveys of members.<sup>2</sup> Even research that emphasizes other influences on roll-call decisions, such as Matthews and Stimson (1975), still acknowledges members' attention to the potential electoral ramifications of the decisions. For example, Matthews and Stimson (1975, 30) highlight the following observation of a member:

I've found out this much. When you are voting right, you build up points on a cumulative basis. You lose them on a geometric basis; you can lose all your points on one vote.

 $<sup>^{1}</sup>$  For example, see Arnold (1990), Fiorina (1974), and Mayhew (1974a).

&lt;sup>2</sup> See Clausen (1973), Kingdon (1981), and Sullivan et al. (1993) among others. Collie (1985) provides an excellent review of this literature.

Studies that focus explicitly on electoral results do not resolve whether a typical member should be concerned with the potential electoral ramifications of legislative voting. Several studies find no evidence of an electoral impact (e.g., Gaines and Nokken 1999), while those uncovering one have generally focused on members' vote shares for specific elections (e.g., Jacobson 1996) or samples of legislators (e.g., Ansolabehere, Stewart and Snyder 2001). Notably, even the positive evidence does not establish that a member who has won with at least 60% of the two-party vote, a criterion applying to the majority of incumbents between 1956 and 1996, need fear that roll-call voting could affect his probability of defeat. Results on vote shares and seat loss are not in general equivalent, and moreover, the existing evidence suggests that a large shift in a member's voting, such as from a perfectly moderate record to one at his party extreme, decreases his two-party vote share by less than 10 percentage points.

In the following, we conduct three tests on the elections of 1956-1996 to analyze whether in fact House members should be concerned with the electoral impact of legislative voting. In each of the tests, we estimate the effect of an incumbent's increased support for the extreme of his party. The first test employs a standard model from previous work to assess whether such legislative voting had a significant effect on members' vote shares in each election. The second test then pools across the elections, estimating how the average impact of legislative voting compares to that of other factors, such as challenger quality and campaign spending. The third test proceeds to examine directly the relationship between members' voting and their probability of reelection. To incorporate that this probability may differ between "safe" members who have previously won with at least 60% of the vote and the remaining "marginal" members, the test distinguishes between them. In addition, it accounts for the fact that a member's safety may depend upon his prior voting record.

EXISTING EVIDENCE ON THE ELECTORAL EFFECT OF HOUSE MEMBERS' VOTING

Almost every existing study that finds an electoral effect of legislative voting focuses on a small set of elections. These include the studies by Schoenberger (1969) for 1964, Erikson (1971) for Republicans in the 1950s–1960s, Bernstein (1989) for 1978 and 1980, Johannes and McAdams (1981) for 1978, Erikson and Wright (1993) for 1990, and Brady et al. (1996) and Jacobson (1996) for 1994.<sup>3</sup> While details vary across the works, they generally establish that, holding district ideology constant, Republican incumbents' vote shares were lower the more conservative their roll-call voting and Democratic incumbents' vote shares lower the more liberal their roll-call voting.<sup>4</sup> In other words, members lost electoral support from increasing the extent to which they voted with the extreme of their party.

This research provides a critical basis for considering the importance of legislative voting in affecting electoral outcomes but, as a whole, does not establish that members' actual probability of seat loss is affected by their roll-call decisions, particularly for so-called safe members. In general, results on electoral margins are not equivalent to results on seat loss because, among other reasons, members behave differently if they are minimizing their probability of defeat rather than seeking the largest number of votes.<sup>5</sup> Even ignoring this nonequivalence, however, the existing results do not imply a conclusive impact. For example, Erikson and Wright (1993) find that a Democrat who shifted from perfectly moderate to perfectly liberal voting decreased his two-party vote share by only 5 percentage points in 1990, and Bernstein (1989) estimates that among Democratic incumbents who lost in 1980, only those receiving at least 46% of the vote could have conceivably altered the outcome by moderating their roll-call voting. Given such findings, one might conclude that a typical incumbent need not fear that roll-call voting could ever cost him reelection, and Bernstein explicitly makes this claim. After reviewing the existing evidence, he surmises that "members can generally afford to vote for what they think is right without expecting that their votes will cost them a seat in Congress... (Bernstein 1989, 100). The other cited studies on electoral margins do not offer such a bold claim, but neither do they establish a systematic relationship between members' voting and their probability of retaining office.

Even the contention that legislative voting systematically affects electoral margins is put into question by work that analyzes elections across several decades. For example, political economics research on members' ideological "shirking" from 1960 through 1990 has produced inconsistent findings. In studies that estimate shirking as the absolute difference between interest-group voting scores and the predicted values from these scores regressed on constituency characteristics, some evidence has suggested that shirking is correlated with electoral defeat (e.g., Wright 1993), while other evidence has suggested that the factors are uncorrelated (e.g., Goff and Grier 1993). One possible reason for the discrepancy is that these studies equate shirking with noise that could result from omitted variables; to the extent that the constituency characteristics included in a particular analysis do not fully capture district preferences, shirking is overestimated and the effects of it underestimated.<sup>6</sup> To avoid this problem, Lott and Bronars (1993) equate shirking with change in a member's voting pattern. They find some evidence of a positive correlation between such change and electoral defeat, but this result is not robust across the various econometric specifications employed.

&lt;sup>3</sup> In related work, Wright (1978) and Erikson and Wright (1989, 1997) show that members' publicly stated campaign positions affected their electoral margins in 1966, 1982, and 1994, respectively.

&lt;sup>4</sup> The two exceptions are Johannes and McAdams (1981) and Brady et al. (1996). In the former, the authors construct a measure of ideological discrepancy that allows any member, regardless of partisan affiliation, to be out of step with district ideology in either a conservative or a liberal direction. In the latter, the authors analyze the relationship between incumbents' presidential support and their probability of reelection.

&lt;sup>5</sup> See Aranson, Hinich and Ordeshook (1974).

Other research that examines elections over time, but that does not characterize itself as studying shirking, also produces inconclusive results as to whether legislative voting systematically affects elections. Gaines and Nokken (1999) analyze all midterm elections between 1958 and 1994 and find that in almost every year, an incumbent's roll-call support for the president did not significantly affect his probability of reelection. Brady, Canes-Wrone and Cogan (2000) find more evidence of an impact, showing that for the 1954–1994 elections, winning incumbents tended to have more moderate voting records than losing incumbents. This difference, however, is significant for only about one-third of the elections.

The most compelling evidence of an electoral effect over time comes from Ansolabehere, Snyder and Stewart (2001) and Erikson and Wright (2000). Ansolabehere, Snyder and Stewart pool the elections of 1952-1974 and 1976-1996 to compare candidates' voting records in races in which a sitting incumbent was defeated and find that a candidate's vote share was lower the more she supported the extreme of her party. The key limitation of the analysis is that it does not examine the roll-call voting of members who are never unseated, and therefore, as the authors acknowledge, it remains possible that most House races are not affected by legislative voting. Erikson and Wright do examine all incumbents for the elections of 1976-1996 and similarly find that voting with the ideological extreme of one's party decreases one's vote share. Their analysis does not, however, control for standard electoral determinants such as challenger quality and campaign spending, and thus it remains possible that the effect of legislative voting would disappear once such controls were added to the analysis. In addition, as with other analyses of electoral margins, the results do not establish a significant probability of seat loss, particularly for safe members.

In sum, the literature is far from conclusive that legislative voting systematically affects House electoral outcomes. It offers some evidence that roll-call voting, particularly voting with the extreme of one's party, affects electoral margins, but this relationship has not been established across time and members. Moreover, even the existing support does not show that legislative voting affects the probability of reelection, particularly for safe members. What is needed, therefore, is a study that examines the relationship between vote shares and roll-call decisions across elections for all districts and that explicitly analyzes the effect of the decisions on the probability of winning for safe as well as marginal members.

LEGISLATIVE VOTING AND ELECTORAL MARGINS

Building on previous research, we estimate the electoral impact of legislative voting by analyzing the effect of voting with the extreme of one's party, a phenomenon we refer to as roll-call ideological extremity. We hypothesize that controlling for district ideology, Democrats lose electoral support by voting more liberally and Republicans by voting more conservatively. Thus for two Democratic (Republican) incumbents from districts with identical voter preferences, the Democrat (Republican) with the more liberal (conservative) voting record should have a lower electoral vote share, holding all else equal. We refer to this prediction as the Roll-Call Ideological Extremity Hypothesis.

While much of the previously discussed work on electoral margins details the theoretical framework underlying the Roll-Call Ideological Extremity Hypothesis (in particular, see Erikson 1971), we briefly review the logic here. Arguably the most critical assumption is that the Republican and Democratic candidates of each district diverge ideologically, with the Democrat being more liberal than the Republican. Evidence of such divergence is provided by Ansolabehere, Snyder and Stewart (2001), and other studies justify this phenomenon by describing the long-run career benefits a member may obtain from voting with his or her party (e.g., Aldrich 1995; Cox and McCubbins 1993; Rohde 1991; Snyder and Groseclose 2000). Thus even on rollcalls for which a member's electoral incentive is to vote against her party, she can have long-term career incentives to vote with it.

Applying Downsian (1957) logic to this stylized fact of ideological divergence between the Republican and the Democratic candidates in a district, ideological moderation should increase an incumbent's vote share. Given Downs' assumptions that voters can order the candidates on an ideological spectrum, that voters have positions on the spectrum, and that electoral choices depend upon candidates' positions, either candidate can increase her vote share by moderating towards the other. Thus if voters' assessment of the incumbent's ideology is not independent of her legislative voting, her electoral margin is higher the less she votes with the ideological extreme of her party.<sup>8</sup>

Notably, while this framework assumes that voters select candidates on the basis of ideology, the Roll-Call

&lt;sup>6</sup> For other problems with the two-stage residual approach, see Bender and Lott (1996).

<sup>7</sup> Notably most of the other side.

&lt;sup>7</sup> Notably, most of the other cited analyses also do not control for these electoral determinants.

&lt;sup>8</sup> The directional theory of issue voting (Rabinowitz and MacDonald 1989) suggests that a candidate may increase his vote share by moving toward his party extreme. While we base our theoretical prediction on Downsian logic, our empirical analysis allows for this alternative hypothesis (and in fact tests for it). Moreover, we are careful to use two-tailed significance tests in evaluating the Roll-Call Ideological Extremity Hypothesis given the alternative prediction of the directional theory.

Ideological Extremity Hypothesis does not require voters to be fully informed about all details of an incumbent's legislative record. The literature identifies several mechanisms by which roll-call voting should affect constituents' assessments of an incumbent's ideology absent their complete knowledge of his or her record. As Erikson (1971) discusses, one such mechanism is a diffusion model in which elites pay attention to the legislative voting of members, and voters take cues from elites that share their policy positions.<sup>10</sup> A second mechanism, suggested by the analysis of Bailey (2001), is that challengers are likely to inform constituents about the policy positions of a member when he votes out of step with district preferences. In fact, Miller and Stokes (1963), while finding that constituents are not fully informed about representatives' positions, actually provide some support for Bailey's analysis; specifically, Miller and Stokes show that when an incumbent had voted out of step with his district on the issue of race, all interviewed voters could identify his and his challenger's positions on the issue.<sup>11</sup> We do not take a stance on whether one of these informational mechanisms predominates but merely emphasize that any observed relationship between electoral outcomes and roll-call decisions does not depend upon the assumption that voters are fully informed about the details of representatives' voting records.12

Model, Data, and Measurement for Analysis of Electoral Margins

To test the Roll-Call Ideological Extremity Hypothesis, we employ an econometric model that is similar to those adopted in previous studies of the relationship between legislative voting and electoral margins. In particular, we regress each incumbent's vote share on a measure of roll-call ideological extremity, controlling for a range of factors.<sup>13</sup> Formally, we estimate the following model for each incumbent i who faces a major party challenger in election t:

Incumbent's Vote Share;

- $= \beta_0 + \beta_1$  Roll-Call Ideological Extremity<sub>it</sub>
- $+\beta_2$  Presidential Vote<sub>it</sub>  $+\beta_3$  Challenger Quality<sub>it</sub>
- $+\beta_4$  (In (Challenger Spending)
- In (Incumbent Spending));
- $+\beta_5$  Freshman<sub>it</sub>  $+\beta_6$  In Party<sub>it</sub>
- $+ [\beta_7 \Delta Personal Income_{it} (coded by In Party)]$
- $+\beta_8$  Presidential Popularity; (coded by In Party)
- +  $\beta_9$  Midterm Loss<sub>it</sub> (coded by In Party)] +  $\varepsilon_{it}$  (1) where the variables in brackets are naturally included only in tests that pool across elections. Because the Roll-Call Ideological Extremity Hypothesis does not imply asymmetric effects across parties, we analyze Democratic and Republican incumbents jointly, with the parties in a given year separated by the factor In Party. The substantive results still hold, however, if the effect of roll-call ideological extremity or the entire model is estimated separately for each party.<sup>14</sup> We analyze contested races only because otherwise, unnecessary error may be introduced by assigning an uncontested member a vote share of 100%. The substantive results hold, however, if such races are included. 15

The measurement of each variable in the model is as follows.

Incumbent's Vote Share. As is common in studies of electoral margins (e.g., Jacobson 1996), the dependent variable equals the incumbent's percentage of the two-party vote. 16

Roll-Call Ideological Extremity. We base our measure of legislative voting on Americans for Democratic Action (ADA) scores, which reflect the proportion of liberal positions taken by a member in a given year on votes selected by the Americans for Democratic Action. These votes generally encompass the key policy issues of a session. For example, the scores include the major tax and budget votes of the 1980s and 1990s,

&lt;sup>9</sup> Even Downs (1957, 80) explicitly states that his framework assumes that voters "may be completely unaware of certain actions being carried out by the government, or of alternatives the government could have undertaken, or of both."

10 Among others, see Kuklinski, Metlay and Kay (1982) and Lupia

<sup>(1994)</sup> for evidence of citizen cue-taking from elites.

11 Jacobson and Kernell (1983) identify a related mechanism, arguing that a high-quality challenger is more likely to enter the electoral race if an incumbent has voted out of step with district preferences. This mechanism still presumes that there exists some relationship between an incumbent's voting record and voters' assessment of the incumbent; otherwise, potential challengers' decisions on whether to enter the race would not be based on the incumbent's record.

<sup>12</sup> Complementing these mechanisms is the "running tally" or "online" cognitive model of voters' evaluations of candidates. In this cognitive model, voters update their judgment of a candidate with each new piece of information received and, when they produce an overall evaluation, retrieve the tally without reviewing the contents upon which it has been formed. See, for example, Lodge, McGraw and Stroh (1989)

Snyder (1996b) formally derives the conditions under which a linear factor structure can be employed to analyze aggregated voting data, and Snyder (1996a) employs such a model.

&lt;sup>14</sup> When we estimate the effect of roll-call ideological extremity separately by party, but the remainder of the model jointly, the null that the coefficients for the two parties are equivalent cannot be rejected. Specifically, for the time series as a whole, the coefficient on Roll-Call Ideological Extremity for Democrats is 0.067 (with a standard error of 0.006) and the analogous coefficient for Republicans is 0.055 (with a standard error of 0.008). The difference between these two coefficients, 0.012, is not significant at conventional levels (F=1.13, p>0.2). Estimating only the elections for which we have data on candidates' spending, we again cannot reject the null that the two coefficients are identical (F = 2.41, p > 0.1).

<sup>15</sup> The main difference when uncontested elections are included is that if separate coefficients are estimated for Democratic and Republican incumbents, the magnitude of the difference between Democrats and Republicans becomes relatively large, with roll-call ideological extremity having approximately three times the impact on the former than the latter. (Each coefficient remains significant, however.) Consistent with this result, Democrats held 82% of uncontested seats during the time period of our analysis.

The independents Dale Alford (AR), John Moakley (MA), Thomas Foglietta (PA), and Bernie Sanders (VT) have been coded as Democrats since each caucused with this party.

the abortion and school prayer votes of the 1970s and 1980s, and the Civil Rights votes of the 1960s. The ADA ratings are widely known among members and often publicized in their districts. Therefore, to the extent that legislative voting affects members' electoral fate, the scores should have this effect. The specific measure that we adopt provides a consistent ranking of ideological extremity across the parties and is based on a member's ADA score in the year prior to the election if the member is Democratic and 100 minus this score if the member is Republican. Thus for a Democrat, a higher value indicates a more liberal member, while for a Republican, it reflects a more conservative one.<sup>17</sup> So that the factor is on the same scale as the dependent variable, we divide the raw score by 100 for purposes of presentation.

Although we focus on the ADA ratings, we have also analyzed the model with Roll-Call Ideological Extremity based on Keith Poole and Howard Rosenthal's DW-NOMINATE scores. These scores, which are a similar, more recent version of Poole and Rosenthal's (1991) D-NOMINATE scores, utilize a wider selection of members' votes than the interest group ratings. The results, which are available upon request, are substantively similar to those presented.

Presidential Vote. Following Erikson and Wright (1989, 1993, 1997) and Brady et al. (1996), among others, we use the presidential vote to control for district ideology. Specifically, Presidential Vote equals the average proportion of the two-party vote received by the presidential candidate of the incumbent's party in the two most recent elections in his or her district, with each combination of presidential elections normalized around its mean. Thus for Democratic incumbents, the variable is based on the vote for the Democratic presidential candidate, and for Republican incumbents, on the vote for the Republican presidential candidate. We average across the two most recent elections and normalize each of these averages, to mitigate the impact of factors that may be specific to individual presidential races.

Challenger Quality. Research suggests that an incumbent's vote share is lower when she faces a challenger who has previously won an elected position (e.g. Jacobson and Kernell 1983). We therefore control for challenger quality with a variable that equals 1 if the challenger has held elective office and 0 otherwise.

 $ln(Challenger\ Spending) - ln(Incumbent\ Spending).$  A great deal of work has examined the electoral effects of candidates' spending, and while the findings vary, the literature as a whole suggests that a candidate's spending increases his vote share. As in some previous research (e.g., Erikson and Wright 1993), we control for this effect with a variable reflecting the difference between challenger and incumbent spending, taking the natural log of each. Our data are from Federal Elections Commission (FEC) Reports. Because these reports were not edited by the FEC until 1980, we include the control for spending only in the 1980 through 1996 elections. <sup>19</sup> To account for the fact that candidates are not required to report expenditures below $5000, we adopt Jacobson's (1990) practice of assuming that each spent at least this amount.

Freshman. This dummy variable equals 1 if the House term was the incumbent's first and 0 otherwise. Research suggests that there exists an incumbency advantage due to, among other factors, members' capacity to bring home pork and perform constituency service (Mayhew 1974a). Because freshmen generally have less political clout than more senior members, for example, less influential committee assignments (Munger 1988), freshmen should have a lower incumbency advantage and thus a lower average vote share.

ΔPersonal Income (coded by In Party), Presidential Popularity (coded by In Party), Midterm Loss (coded by In Party), and In Party. We include several factors that vary over time<sup>20</sup> and that research suggests have a differential effect according to whether a member is in the president's party. The first factor is based on Tufte's (1975) standard control for the economy and reflects his argument that a good economy will help the in party at the expense of the out party. Specifically, the variable equals the change in real income per capita in the year prior to the election for members of the president's party and -1 times this value for other members. The second factor accounts for his contention that a president's public approval should be positively correlated with his fellow partisans' electoral fortunes. Like Tufte, we measure presidential popularity with the percentage of positive responses to the long-standing Gallup Poll asking "Do you approve or disapprove of the way [the current president] is handling his job as president?" using the poll taken most recently prior to the election. As with income, this value is multiplied by -1 for members of the out party. The third factor, which we call midterm loss, controls for the so-called midterm loss tendency of the president's party to lose seats in off-year elections. Previous work provides a variety of explanations for the

&lt;sup>17</sup> We are aware of the limitations of pooling interest group scores over time (Groseclose, Levitt and Snyder 1999), but the available corrections constrain the way in which members' scores can change over time, and we do not want to eliminate the possibility that a member could vote moderately for a number of sessions and then more extremely in a particular session. Still, we have analyzed our model with the Groseclose, Levitt and Snyder adjusted scores, and our substantive results hold.

&lt;sup>18</sup> In conducting this analysis, we used the average of each member's first- and second-dimension DW-NOMINATE scores.

&lt;sup>19</sup> As Souraf (1992, 248, note 10) writes, "Since the Federal Election Commission did not begin to operate at full power until the 1978 elections, complete data on congressional campaign finance are not available before that election. Even then, the FEC never had the resources to edit and reconcile the data for the receipts and spending of congressional candidates in 1978; one must use a final preliminary report and its data. Worse than that, FEC data for 1976 are sketchy and for 1974 one has to rely on the much smaller volume of data that Common Cause assembled."

We have also conducted the analysis with a set of election indicators. However, because the controls for presidential popularity, midterm loss, and the macroeconomy already account for a good deal of inter temporal variation, multicollinearity prevents including a full set of election effects. For example, in the 1980–1996 test, only five election effects can be included without creating perfect multicollinearity among some of the controls. The results are substantively similar with the effects.

	Roll-Call Ideological Extremity with Controls of Presidential Vote, In Party, Challenger Quality, Candidates' Spending, Freshman		Roll-Call Ideological Extremity with Controls of Presidential Vote, In Party, Challenger Quality, Freshman
1996 ( n =362)	-0.082 (0.023)	1978 (n=311)	-0.114 (0.022)
1994 ( n =330)	-0.074 (0.019)	1976 (n=329)	-0.109 (0.021)
1992 ( n =311)	_0.107 (0.021)	1974 (n=311)	-0.087 (0.024)
1990 (n=315)	-0.113 (0.021)	1972 (n=313)	-0.110 (0.018)
1988 (n=327)	-0.101 (0.022)	1970 (n=325)	-0.090 (0.019)
1986 (n=319)	-0.095 (0.020)	1968 (n=347)	-0.130 (0.024)
1984 (n=340)	-0.067 (0.021)	1966 (n=342)	(0.024) 0.046* (0.020)
1982 (n=309)	-0.032* (0.016)	1964 (n=346)	-0.119 (0.017)
1980 (n=337)	-0.033* (0.016)	1962	(0.017) —
	(2.2.2)	1960 (n=321)	-0.108 (0.019)
		1958 (n=292)	-0.058* (0.016)
		1956 (n=336)	-0.092 (0.021)

Note: Robust standard errors given in parentheses below OLS coefficients. *p<0.05; **p<0.01; ***p<0.001. All significance levels in the tables are two-tailed.

trend, ranging from voters' dissatisfaction with presidential performance (Kramer 1971) to voters' desire for a greater balance of power between the executive and legislative branches (Erikson 1988).<sup>21</sup> As with the previous two factors, we code midterm loss on the basis of whether a member is in the president's party.

We include each of these factors as a single term that is coded by affiliation with the in party rather than without this coding but with interaction terms according to affiliation with the in party because the latter approach would create a high degree of multicollinearity.<sup>22</sup> For example, the correlation is 0.93 between a main effect for whether a member is in the president's party and an interaction of this term with the president's popularity entered without differentiating across members. In our analysis, we still include the main effect In Party, which equals 1 if a member is in the president's party and 0 otherwise, given that our coding is based on this differentiation.<sup>23</sup>

Results on Electoral Margins

We first analyze Eq. (1) for each election of 1956 through 1996.<sup>24</sup> Given that previous work has focused on more limited subsets of elections and/or members, the individual-election analysis allows us to discern whether legislative voting affects electoral margins only in certain years or more consistently across time. The only year that we do not analyze is 1962, which is excluded because the extensive reapportionment following the Supreme Court decision in Baker v. Carr hinders mapping the 1960 presidential vote onto the 1962 districts.<sup>25</sup> Also because of this reapportionment, for the 1964 and 1966 elections, *Presiden*tial Vote is based only on the most recent presidential election.

Table 1 presents the central results. In particular, the table describes the parameter estimates on &lt;sup>21</sup> Other rationales include the macroeconomy and presidential popularity, which are controlled for directly.

22 Our approach is akin to that of Jacobson (2000).

&lt;sup>23</sup> An additional control variable with which we have conducted the analysis is the incumbent's prior vote, and the results from this analysis are substantively similar to those presented. Disagreement exists in the literature over whether to include lagged vote share as an explanatory variable of current vote share. For example, in the previous studies of roll-call voting cited, some do not control for lagged vote (e.g., Ansolabehere, Snyder and Stewart 2001; Eriskon and Wright <sup>2000)</sup> while others do (e.g., Jacobson 1996). Our main rationale for not including the variable derives from Ansolabehere, Snyder and Stewart's (2000), which shows that it does a poor job of measuring the normal vote, which is the traditional reason for including lagged vote. We therefore do not include the variable in our analysis. <sup>24</sup> We conducted all analyses regarding electoral margins with the key variable Roll-Call Ideological Extremity, reporting White's robust standard errors because the Cook and Weisberg (1983) test rejects the null of homoskedasticity in almost every election. We have chosen to make the parameter estimates on the control variables and the regression diagnostics available upon request to conserve space, particularly because these findings largely replicate those presented subsequently (and more succinctly) for the pooled-election analyses.

STATA version 6.0.

&lt;sup>25</sup> We have also analyzed an alternative specification that excludes any observation for which redistricting occurred in the previous 2 years or since the most recent presidential election and that bases Presidential Vote only on this most recent presidential election. The results are substantively similar to those presented.

As Table 1 shows, the results of the individualelection analysis strongly support the Roll-Call Ideological Extremity Hypothesis. In all of the elections, an incumbent receives a significantly lower electoral margin the more he votes with the extreme of his party holding constant the range of control variables listed in the table. Thus comparing two Republican members who have identical district ideologies, who are running against the same quality of challenger, who are not freshmen, and who face the same distribution of spending between themselves and their challengers, the member with the more conservative voting record obtains a lower vote share. Similarly, the results suggest that between two otherwise equivalent Democratic incumbents, the one with the more liberal voting record will receive the lower vote share. In each year, this effect is statistically significant at the conventional level of p = 0.05 (two-tailed).<sup>26</sup>

To interpret the size of this effect, we consider a 25-point shift in a member's ADA score toward the extreme of his party, a shift that approximates one standard deviation of the data, or 3 to 4 highprofile votes.<sup>27</sup> The coefficients indicate that such a shift decreases a member's vote share by 1 to 3 percentage points. Thus, in every election between 1956 and 1996, the typical variation that occurs in roll-call behavior had a noticeable effect on incumbents' vote shares. Moreover, these estimates are arguably conservative since we have controlled for challenger quality and campaign spending; to the extent that roll-call voting works through these factors, controlling for them as we do will provide a conservative estimate of the impact of roll-call ideological extremity.<sup>28</sup>

Given the consistent significance of the relationship between roll-call decisions and vote margins, we proceed to estimate the average impact of this relationship. Pooling the data, we control not only for factors that

The standard deviation in members. ADA scores equals 24.43 points.
 Analyzing our model without controlling for challenger quality

TABLE 2. House Incumbents' Legislative Voting and Electoral Vote Share: Pooled Analysis, 1956–1996

Allalyolo, 1000 1000
	1980–1996	1956–1996
Roll-Call Ideological	-0.085	-0.070
Extremity	(0.007)	(0.005)
Presidential Vote	0.466	0.454
	(0.015)	(0.011)
Challenger Quality	-0.025	-0.053
	(0.003)	(0.002)
In (Challenger Spending)	-0.030	_
<ul><li>In(Incumbent Spending)</li></ul>	(0.001)
Freshman	0.008	-0.020
	(0.003)	(0.003)
∆Personal Income	0.013	0.042
(coded by In Party)	(0.004)	(0.003)
Presidential Popularity	-0.089	-0.044
(coded by In Party)	(0.019)	(0.010)
Midterm Loss	-0.033	-0.015
(coded by In Party)	(0.004)	(0.003)
In Party	0.045	-0.040
	(0.017)	(0.011)
Constant	0.656	0.739
	(0.010)	(0.007)
Number of observations	2950	6521
R <sup>2</sup>	0.594	0.365
Root MSE	0.063	0.079
	0.000	0.079

Note: Robust standard errors given in parentheses below OLS coefficients. ** p < 0.01; *** p < 0.001.

vary only within an election but also ones that vary across time, as specified in Eq. (1). Because the control for candidate spending exists only for 1980–1996, we conduct two tests. The first examines these later years with the control, and the second all years without it.

Table 2 presents the results. As with the individualelection analysis, the Cook and Weisberg (1983) test suggests evidence of heteroskedasticity, and White's robust standard errors are therefore reported.<sup>29</sup> Table 2 provides further support for the Roll-Call Ideological Extremity Hypothesis. Holding constant a variety of factors that are commonly presumed to determine elections, the effect of roll-call ideology is positive and statistically significant for each sample of the data.

Moreover, this effect has a magnitude comparable to that of other commonly recognized electoral determinants. To interpret the average impact of ideologically extreme voting, we again focus on a 25-point shift in a member's ADA score toward the extreme of his party, which, as mentioned previously, approximates a standard deviation. The coefficients for each

&lt;sup>26</sup> These results, in supporting the Roll-Call Ideological Extremity Hypothesis, also support the Downsian logic of elections over the directional theory of issue voting, which allows that candidates may increase their electoral margins by voting more extremely.

<sup>27</sup> The standard deviation in results of the standard deviation in results of the standard deviation in results of the standard deviation.

&lt;sup>28</sup> Analyzing our model without controlling for challenger quality or campaign spending, a 25-point shift in roll-call extremity is estimated to decrease a member's vote share by 1.5 to 4 percentage points. Another reason that our estimate is arguably conservative is that we have excluded uncontested elections, which many previous studies include (e.g., Brady, Canes-Wrone and Cogan 2000; Erikson and Wright 2000). Analyzing our model with contested elections, a standard deviation increase in roll-call extremity is estimated to decrease a member's vote share by 2 to 7 percentage points.

 $<sup>^{29}</sup>$  Specifically,  $\chi^2(9)=36.77$  (p<0.05) for the 1980–1996 sample and  $\chi^2(8)=168.03$  (p<0.05) for the 1956–1996 sample. We have also tested for autocorrelation and found that it is not significant. The lack of significant autocorrelation is not terribly surprising since open seats are excluded; in fact, less than 10% of the observations are in a district that has an uninterrupted time series. The DW statistic (calculated as if each observation may be correlated with the most recent previous election in which an incumbent ran in that district) equals 1.89 for the 1980–1996 sample and 1.90 for the 1956–1996 sample.

sample indicate that such a shift would decrease a member's vote share by approximately 2 percentage points. In comparison, the 1980-1996 results suggest that an incumbent's vote share is lower by 2.5 percentage points when she faces a high-quality challenger, by 1 percentage point if the ratio between the challenger's and the incumbent's spending increases by 25 percentage points, and by 1 percentage point if she is a freshman. Even the coefficient on the midterm loss phenomenon has a comparable impact; off-year elections are estimated to lower the vote share of members of the president's party by 3 percentage points. The 1956–1996 coefficients are similar, with a high-quality challenger lowering a member's vote share by approximately 5 percentage points, a freshman receiving a lower vote share of 2 percentage points, and off-year elections lowering the vote shares of members of the president's party by 2 percentage points.

As these results suggest, the effects of the control variables are generally consistent with our expectations. The coefficients on challenger quality, presidential vote, candidates' spending, freshmen, personal income, and the midterm loss phenomenon all have the predicted signs with statistical significance (p < 0.05, two-tailed). The only control variable that has an unexpected effect is presidential popularity, and even though the factor was included merely to prevent overestimating any impact of legislative voting, we still investigated why the variable did not have the same effect as in the study by Tufte (1975). Employing Tufte's specification, which regresses seat change across the parties (rather than individual members' vote shares) on presidential popularity and personal income, we found presidential popularity to have the predicted impact, suggesting our finding derives from differences across the specifications. Specifically, the Tufte effect does not hold once the control for spending is added or if the dependent variable represents vote share rather than seat loss; our subsequent analysis on the probability of reelection demonstrates this variation in the impact.

Before moving on to this analysis, however, we first summarize the key findings in Tables 1 and 2. The results are important because previous work had left open the possibility that legislative voting affects members' electoral margins only for particular elections. By establishing a consistent effect in every year, we have foreclosed this possibility. Moreover, we have shown that the magnitude of the effect is not insubstantial but rather comparable to that of other widely recognized electoral determinants such as campaign spending, challenger quality, and the midterm loss phenomenon.

LEGISLATIVE VOTING AND THE PROBABILITY OF REELECTION BY DISTRICT SAFETY

The previous section still leaves open whether most members should be concerned that legislative voting might affect their probability of defeat. On the one hand, a majority of incumbents win by the so-called safe margin of at least 60% of the two-party vote, and the findings indicate that a shift from perfectly moderate to perfectly extreme voting alters a member's vote share by only 4 percentage points. On the other hand, the findings indicate that safety itself is likely to be dependent upon members' prior legislative records, and this relationship would suggest that even safe members might need to fear the electoral ramifications of legislative voting. For example, the results on electoral margins would lead us to expect that between two otherwise similar incumbents, the one with the more moderate record should be likelier to win by a safe margin, yet if that member were subsequently to shift toward her party's extreme, then her probability of winning reelection could significantly decrease. In fact, to the extent that a member is safe due to the moderation of her prior voting, a change toward more ideologically extreme voting could have as large of an effect as for a marginal member, whose lack of safety may derive from having voted ideologically extremely.

To assess whether members should indeed fear that roll-call voting might affect their prospects for reelection, we conduct a final test that estimates the relationship between legislative voting and the probability of reelection directly. In the test, we account for the possibility that safe members may not need to be concerned with the electoral ramifications of legislative voting even if marginal members do. Moreover, we incorporate that safety itself may depend upon members' prior voting records.

Model and Data for Analysis of the Probability of Reelection

The model that we employ is an endogenous switching regime regression, which has been utilized previously in political science (e.g., Kiewiet and McCubbins 1988; McCarty and Poole 1995). The model has similarities to the instrumental variables approach that has long been used to analyze congressional elections (e.g., Ferejohn and Calvert 1984) and consists of two equations. In the first-stage equation the binary indicator Safety, which equals 1 if the incumbent won at least 60% of the twoparty vote in the previous election and equals 0 otherwise, is regressed via probit analysis on determinants of the previous election.<sup>30</sup> The second-stage equation, regresses Incumbent Won, which equals 1 if the incumbent won reelection as 0 otherwise, on determinants of the current election. In this equation, the independent variables are separated into regimes based on the probability the member is safe as estimated by the first-stage equation.

The regime-switching specification of the secondstage equation is important because if we estimated a single coefficient for roll-call voting, the effect could be significant (in magnitude and standard error) even if the impact for safe members were negligible. Our specification allows that the effect may be negligible for these members. The first-stage equation is also important; it is necessary from an econometric standpoint because if the factors influencing safety are correlated with those determining the probability of reelection, then modeling safety as exogenous could bias the results in favor of finding a significant effect of roll-call voting (see Maddala 1983, 283–4). By modeling safety as endogenous, we avoid this problem.<sup>31</sup>

&lt;sup>30</sup> We use the cutpoint of 60% rather than the other, often employed cutpoint of 55% (e.g., Mayhew 1974b) to bias against a finding that safe members face a higher probability of electoral defeat from ideologically extreme voting. We have conducted the analysis with this alternative cutpoint and found substantively similar results.

Equations (2) and (3) formally state the model.

Pr[Incumbent Won<sub>it</sub> = 1] =
$$\Phi$$ (Pr[Safety<sub>it</sub> = 1]\*\*
$$\times (\kappa_0 + \kappa_1 \text{ Roll-Call Ideological Extremity}_{it}$$ $$+ \kappa_{2-8} \text{ Control Variables}_{it})$$

$$+ (1 - \text{Pr}[\text{Safety}_{it} = 1]^{})$$

$$\times (\delta_0 + \delta_1 \text{ Roll-Call Ideological Extremity}_{it}$$ $$+ \delta_{2-8} \text{ Control Variables}_{it})$$

(2)

where  $Pr[Safety_{it} = 1]^{}$  equals the predicted values from $$\begin{aligned} &\Pr[\text{Safety}_{it} = 1] \\ &= \Phi(\gamma_0 + \gamma_1 \text{ Roll-Call Ideological Extremity}_{it-1} \\ &+ \gamma_{2-8} \text{ Control Variables}_{it-1} + \gamma_9 \text{ Freshman}_{it-1}) \end{aligned}$$ and where the Control Variables include Presidential Vote, Challenger Quality, In(Challenger Spending)-In(Incumbent Spending),  $\Delta Personal Income$  (coded by In Party), Presidential Popularity (coded by In Party), Midterm Loss (coded by In Party), and In Party.

Because we are interested in capturing the degree to which prior legislative voting affects safety, we include only members who in election t have a voting record in the Congress preceding election t-1, a sample that includes only nonfreshmen. Notably, this exclusion biases against finding that legislative voting significantly affects the probability of reelection; because freshmen tend to have a lower ability to bring home pork, perform constituency service, and otherwise serve their district in nonvoting capacities (Munger 1988), any effect of roll-call voting should be greater for these members. The control variable Freshman is thus not included in Eq. (2), but the lag is still included in Eq. (3) because sophomore members running in election t ran as freshmen in election t-1.

The model is identified by this necessary exclusion of Freshman from Eq. (2) and, more generally, the fact that all other variables in Eq. (3) are lags of the regressors in Eq. (2). Thus for a given observation, Incumbent Won is predicted by right-hand-side components distinct from those predicting Safety. For example, if an incumbent faces a high-quality challenger in election t but did not face one in election t-1, the value of Challenger Quality<sub>t</sub> equals 1, while Challenger Quality<sub>t-1</sub> equals 0.32

Our predictions for Eqs. (2) and (3) are similar to those we made regarding electoral margins. In terms of the incumbent's estimated safety, we predict that, holding district ideology constant, a member's likelihood of holding a safe seat will decrease as she shifts her voting toward the extreme of her party. In terms of the probability of reelection, we predict a negative effect of Roll-Call Ideological Extremity, expecting this effect to be significant for not only marginal but also safe members. We do not predict whether the impact should be greater for safe or marginal members because, as explained above, a significant relationship between safety and roll call voting would indicate that the impact could be similar for each type of member.

Results on the Probability of Reelection

We estimate the two-equation system by maximum likelihood and, following our previous tests, employ robust standard errors.<sup>33</sup> Although the equations are estimated jointly, we describe the results separately for presentation purposes, beginning with the first-stage equation that estimates the safety of the incumbent. Table 3 states these results. It is immediately apparent from the table that safety is a function of the factors we previously found to determine incremental changes in vote shares. In other words, when a member is described as safe, this descriptor refers not to an exogenously imposed invulnerability but, instead, to an outcome based on political conditions, some of which are in the member's control.

Most importantly for our purposes, the results indicate that a member is significantly more likely to be designated safe the more moderate is his legislative voting holding other factors equal. Interpreting the probit coefficients at the means of the independent variables, we focus as before on a 25-point shift in an incumbent's ADA score toward the extreme of his party, a shift that approximates a standard deviation.<sup>34</sup> Specifically, such a change decreases a member's probability of holding a safe seat by 6% for each sample of the data. So-called safety is therefore not independent of legislative voting, suggesting that safe members may well need to fear the electoral ramifications of roll-call decisions.

&lt;sup>31</sup> We have, however, estimated a one-equation probit model of the probability of winning regressed on roll-call ideological extremity, the control variables, and a control for the incumbent's vote share last year and found a significant effect of roll-call ideological extremity. These results are presented in Table A1 (Appendix).

 $<sup>^{32}</sup>$  We do not include in Eq. (3) the determinants of election t because of the intertemporal inconsistency that would result from doing so.  $^{33}$  We used the package TSP 4.5 to maximize the likelihood function, which Kimhi (1999) defines.

 $<sup>^{34}</sup>$  The standard deviation in members' ADA scores is 24.96 points. This standard deviation is close but not identical to that of the data in Table 2 since the current analysis excludes freshmen running in election t.

	1980–1996	1956–1996
Roll-Call Ideological Extremity $in t - 1$	-1.320	0.806
·	(0.181)	(0.090)
Presidential Vote $in t - 1$	5.799	4.668
	(0.488)	(0.242)
Challenger Quality $in t-1$	-0.446	-0.729
	(0.082)	(0.046)
$\ln(\text{Challenger Spending}) - \ln(\text{Incumbent Spending}) \ in \ t-1$	0.556	· — ·
	(0.039)
Freshman $in t-1$	-0.131	-0.253
	(0.083)	(0.051)
$\Delta$ Personal Income (coded by In Party) in $t-1$	0.635	0.505
	(0.133)	(0.064)
Presidential Popularity (coded by In Party) $in t - 1$	- 2.797	-0.701
	(0.622)	(0.103)
Midterm Loss (coded by In Party) $in t - 1$	-0.038	-0.165
	(0.110)	(0.057)
In Party in t – 1	1.595	0.311
	(0.518)	(0.102)
Constant	0.373	1.697
	(0.310)	(0.090)
Number of observations	2446	5460
$\chi^2$ test of joint significance of coefficients	669.865	1727.650

The control variables generally have the same effect on safety as they did on marginal changes in vote share. The most notable difference is in the 1980–1996 sample: the coefficients on Midterm Loss and Freshman are no longer significant at p = 0.05 (two-tailed) in this sample. These effects are still in the expected direction, however, and that on freshman remains marginally significant (p = 0.06, one-tailed).

Turning to the main results, those on the probability of reelection, Table 4 presents them by the estimated regime of seat safety. In particular, the table describes the parameter estimates of each electoral determinant for a safe member versus a marginal one. The findings show that even safe members face a significantly lower probability of reelection when they increase the extent to which they vote with the extreme of their party. For both safe and marginal members and in each sample of the data, an incumbent's likelihood of retaining her seat decreases the more ideologically extreme is her voting.

These results support the long-standing findings that members view legislative voting as an important component of the electoral connection and consider constituency cues in roll-call decisions. Perhaps most notably, the results show why such legislative behavior is consistent with the fact that most incumbents win reelection by safe margins. Even safe legislators' roll-call voting affects their risk of electoral defeat. Thus members are correct in assuming that legislative votes have an impact on the probability of reelection.

Comparing the coefficients on Roll-Call Ideological Extremity across regimes, the one for marginal members is higher than that for safe members in the test with the control for campaign spending, while the reverse occurs in the other test. Neither difference, however, is statistically significant (p > 0.4 in each case). This result is consistent with the first-stage findings that safety is a function of members' prior voting records. As we argued at the outset, to the extent that safety depends upon roll-call decisions, they may have a similar impact on the probability of winning for safe and marginal members.

In terms of the magnitude of the coefficients, interpretation is less straightforward than for even a typical probit analysis because the means of the variables differ across the regimes of safety. To describe the magnitudes similarly by regime, we interpret the probit coefficients at specified parameter values, beginning with the following ones, which were chosen for their moderate values: 0.75 for roll-call ideological extremity (an ADA of 75 for a Democrat, 25 for a Republican); a difference of 0 between the district vote for the presidential candidate of the incumbent's party and the average vote for that candidate across the districts; 1 for challenger quality, midterm loss, and in party; 50% for presidential popularity; and 0 for the other variables. At these values, a member who shifts his ADA score 25 points toward the extreme of his party decreases his probability of reelection by 11% in the marginal regime of the 1980-1996 test, 9% in the safe regime of that test, and 4% in each regime of the 1956-1996 test. Altering the values such that the incumbent does not face a high-quality challenger, the magnitudes stay relatively constant, with such a shift in an incumbent's roll-call voting decreasing his probability of reelection by 9% in the marginal regime of the 1980–1996 test,

	1980-	1980–1996		1996
	Marginal	Safe	Marginal	Safe
Roll-Call Ideological Extremity	-1.306	-0.868*	-0.422*	-0.602
,	(0.461)	(0.379)	(0.212)	(0.215)
Presidential Vote	`4.940	5.237	1.295	4.266
	(1.302)	(1.035)	(0.666)	(0.605)
Challenger Quality	_`0.241 ´	_`0.417 	_0.466 * 	-0.556
- Tamongor Lacamy	(0.164)	(0.157)	(0.094)	(0.102)
In(Challenger Spending) - In(Incumbent Spending)	_`0.696 <sup></sup> 	_`0.794 <sup></sup> 	` ′	` — '
(ontainenger openians)(internation openials)	(0.127)	(0.089)
ΔPersonal Income (coded by In Party)	_`0.042 ´	`0.563	0.690	0.872
Zi. Bibbilai moomo (Bodod Zi) mir aniji	(0.340)	(0.307)	(0.186)	(0.178)
Presidential Popularity (coded by In Party)	0.451	_`2.326 ´	`1.919 * 	`0.686
Trobladinian repetating (content by the carry)	(1.330)	(1.508)	(0.530)	(0.620)
Midterm Loss (coded by In Party)	-0.584*	`0.043	_0.729 * 	_`0.103 ´
	(0.227)	(0.221)	(0.125)	(0.131)
In Party	_`0.910 ´	`1.042	_`2.501	_`0.515 °
	(1.157)	(1.252)	(0.548)	(0.625)
Constant	`3.097	`1.192 ´	`3.276 <sup></sup> 	`2.951 <sup></sup> **
	(0.663)	(0.672)	(0.367)	(0.368)
Number of observations	24	46	540	60
$\chi^2$ test of joint significance of coefficients	483.867		766.939
log likelihood of system of equations	-1091.703		-3498.372

Note: Robust standard errors given in parentheses below probit coefficients. *p < 0.05; **p < 0.01; *** p < 0.001. The regime of whether a member is classified as safe or marginal is derived endogenously from Eq. (3) in the text, the results of which are given in Table 3.

8% in the safe regime of this test, 3% in the marginal regime of the 1956–1996 test, and 2% in the remaining regime. Likewise, reducing the initial value of roll-call ideological extremity does not substantially alter the results. For example, at 0.50 (an ADA of 50 for each member) a 25-point shift in a member's ADA toward his party's extreme decreases his likelihood of reelection by 8% in each regime of the 1980–1996 test and by 3 to 4% in each regime of the 1956–1996 test.

As with the results on vote shares, the impact of roll-call voting is comparable to that for other electoral determinants. For example, at the initial parameter values of the previous paragraph, the 1980–1996 test suggests that an incumbent's probability of winning would decline by 5 to 7% if the ratio of challenger to incumbent spending increased by 25%. Similarly, each test indicates that a high-quality challenger decreases an incumbent's probability of reelection by 6 to 15%. The impact of legislative voting on the probability of reelection is thus not only statistically significant for safe as well as marginal members, but also similar to the effect of factors that are commonly recognized to be important determinants of electoral outcomes.

In general, the results on the control variables comport with our expectations. The effects of campaign spending and district ideology are consistently in the expected direction and statistically significant. Those on challenger quality also have the correct sign in each regime and sample and are significant with the exception of the marginal regime of the 1980–1996 test. In addition, the coefficients for the remaining variables that are not included as a main effect typically have the predicted sign, and they are significant only with the expected sign. Specifically, the effect of the economy is significant in each regime of the 1956–1996 test, the effect of the midterm loss is significant in the marginal regime of each test, and the effect of presidential popularity is significant in the marginal regime of the 1956–1996 test.

Overall, the results in Tables 3 and 4 are important because they show that a typical member should rationally be concerned with the electoral impact of legislative voting. Controlling for a wide range of other electoral determinants, roll-call voting has a significant effect on the probability of reelection. Notably, this effect holds for not only marginal but also safe members. These results are consistent with our finding that safety itself is a function of members' voting. That is, safe members are "safe" partially as a consequence of their roll-call decisions. Consequently, when such members change their voting pattern toward their party's extreme, they face a significantly higher probability of defeat, just as other members do.

CONCLUSION

While surveys of members have consistently found that they are concerned with the potential electoral ramifications of legislative voting, previous work had not established that this concern is necessarily rational. Surveys of the mass public have suggested that the typical voter is fairly ignorant of her representative's policy decisions, and studies of elections themselves have provided mixed results as to whether legislative voting affects electoral margins. Moreover, even the positive evidence has left open the possibility that roll-call decisions may not affect the likelihood of defeat for the majority of incumbents. The literature has thus failed to provide evidence that a typical member should believe that he is accountable to voters with regard to his roll-call decisions.

Our study presents three types of evidence to this end. First, we show that, holding district ideology constant, in every election between 1956 and 1996 an incumbent's vote share decreased the more he voted with the extreme of his party. Second, pooling across the years, we establish that the average impact of this effect is comparable to that of commonly recognized electoral determinants such as challenger quality. Third, by directly examining the probability of reelection, we demonstrate that the probability decreases significantly as an incumbent's voting support for his party increases, with this effect holding not only for marginal but also safe incumbents. The vulnerability of the safe members occurs in part because moderate voting increases the probability of holding a safe seat or, in other words, because safety itself derives from a member's roll-call positions.

Notably, while we find evidence of House members' electoral accountability for their policy actions, we certainly do not conclude that voters are highly knowledgeable about all such actions. Earlier we noted several rationales for the seemingly distinct states of the world. For example, "uninformed" voters may take cues from informed elites or, alternatively, may become informed by challengers when an incumbent votes out of step with her district. Accordingly, future work might examine how elites' and challengers' behaviors influence the degree to which legislative voting affects electoral outcomes.

Our analysis also provokes a number of other issues for future research. One question is the extent to which the effect of legislative voting varies according to the salience of the policy issue. Research on legislative behavior finds that members are more likely to enact legislation reflecting public opinion when the policy issue is salient (Canes-Wrone 2001; Hutchings 1998; Kollman 1998). In combination with our findings, this research suggests that members' legislative votes regarding relatively salient issues may have larger electoral effects than votes on less salient matters.

A second extension would be to examine whether changes in the number of marginal seats derive in part from variation in party discipline. Standard explanations for the "vanishing marginals" of the 1960s–1980s emphasize member activities other than legislative voting, such as constituency service (Fiorina 1989). Meanwhile, research has found substantial variation in the influence of parties over members' voting throughout these decades (e.g., Snyder and Groseclose 2000). The evidence presented in this paper suggests that these phenomena of party discipline and the vanishing marginals could be related.

APPENDIX

	Alternative S		ı of Analysis of Probability of Reelection
		1980-1996	1956

	1980–1996	1956–1996
Roll-Call Ideological	-0.678*	-0.363
Extremity	(0.263)	(0.126)
Incumbent's Previous	`1.105 °	3.671
Vote Share	(0.707)	(0.622)
Presidential Vote	`4.354	3.299
	(0.760)	(0.439)
Challenger Quality	_`0.367 <sup></sup> 	_0.491 <sup></sup> **
-	(0.099)	(0.059)
In(ChallengerSpending) -	-0.769	· — ·
In(Incumbent Spending)	(0.078)
Freshman	0.058	0.080
	(0.118)	(0.072)
△Personal Income	0.300	0.521
(coded by In Party)	(0.197)	(0.098)
Presidential Popularity	-1.020	1.181
(coded by In Party)	(0.955)	(0.366)
Midterm Loss	-0.565	-0.610
(coded by In Party)	(0.141)	(0.085)
In Party	0.325	-1.851
	(0.831)	(0.376)
Constant	1.043	1.016*
	(0.651)	(0.420)
Number of observations	2912	6462
$\chi^2$ test of joint significance	205.830	421.352
log likelihood	-1191.507	-406.619

Note: Robust standard errors given in parentheses below probit coefficients. * p < 0.05; *** p < 0.01; **** p < 0.001.

REFERENCES

Aldrich, John H. 1995. Why Parties? The Origin and Transformation of Party Politics in America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. Ansolabehere, Stephen, James M. Snyder, Jr., and Charles Stewart, III. 2000. "Old Voters, New Voters, and the Personal Vote: Using Redistricting to Measure the Incumbency Advantage." American Journal of Political Science 44 (January): 17–34.

Ansolabehere, Stephen, James M. Snyder, Jr., and Charles Stewart, III. 2001. "Candidate Positioning in U.S. House Elections." American Journal of Political Science 45 (January): 136–59.

Aranson, Peter H., Melvin J. Hinich, and Peter C. Ordeshook. 1974. "Election Goals and Strategies: Equivalent and Nonequivalent Candidate Objectives." American Political Science Review 68 (March): 135–52.

Arnold, R. Douglas. 1990. The Logic of Congressional Action. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Bailey, Michael. 2001. "Quiet Influence: The Representation of Diffuse Interests on Postwar Trade Policy." Legislative Studies Quarterly 26 (February): 45–80.

Bender, Bruce, and John R. Lott. 1996. "Legislator Voting and Shirking: A Critical Review of the Literature." Public Choice 87 (April): 67–100.

Bernstein, Robert A. 1989. Elections, Representation and Congressional Voting Behavior: The Myth of Constituency Control. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall.

Brady, David W., Brandice Canes-Wrone, and John F. Cogan. 2000. "Differences between Winning and Losing Incumbents." In Change and Continuity in House Elections, eds. David W. Brady, John F. Cogan, and Morris P. Fiorina. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press. Pp. 178–92.

Brady, David W., John F. Cogan, Brian Gaines, and R. Douglas Rivers. 1996. "The Perils of Presidential Support: How the

- Republicans Captured the House." Political Behavior 18 (December): 345-68.
- Campbell, Angus, Philip E. Converse, Warren E. Miller, and Donald E. Stokes. 1960. The American Voter. New York: Wiley.
- Canes-Wrone, Brandice. 2001. "The President's Legislative Influence from Public Appeals." American Journal of Political Science 45 (April): 313-29.
- Clausen, Aage. 1973. How Congressmen Decide: A Policy Focus. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Collie, Melissa P. 1985. "Voting Behavior in Legislatures." In Handbook of Legislative Research, eds. Gerhard Loewenberg, Samuel Patterson, and Malcolm Jewell. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press. Pp. 471-518.
- Converse, Philip E. "The Nature of Belief Systems in Mass Publics." In Ideology and Discontent, ed. David E. Apter. New York: Free Press. Pp. 206-61.
- Cook, R. Dennis, and Sanford Weisberg. 1983. "Diagnostics for Heteroscedasticity in Regression." Biometrika 70 (April): 1–10.
- Cox, Gary W., and Mathew D. McCubbins. 1993. Legislative Leviathan: Party Government in the House. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Dallek, Robert. 1991. Lone Star Rising: Lyndon Johnson and His Times, 1908-1960. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Delli Carpini, Michael X., and Scott Keeter. 1991. "Stability and Change in the U.S. Public's Knowledge of Politics." Public Opinion Quarterly (Winter): 583-612.
- Downs, Anthony. 1957. An Economic Theory of Democracy. New York: Harper.
- Erikson, Robert S. 1971. "The Electoral Impact of Congressional Roll Call Voting." American Political Science Review 65 (December): 1018 - 32
- Erikson, Robert S. 1988. "The Puzzle of Midterm Loss." Journal of Politics 50 (November): 1011-29.
- Erikson, Robert S., and Gerald C. Wright. 1989. "Voters, Candidates and Issues in Congressional Elections." In Congress Reconsidered, 4th ed., eds. Lawrence C. Dodd and Bruce I. Oppenheimer. Wash-
- ington, DC: Congressional Quarterly Press. Pp. 91-116. Erikson, Robert S., and Gerald C. Wright. 1993. "Voters, Candidates and Issues in Congressional Elections." In Congress Reconsidered, 5th ed., eds. Lawrence C. Dodd and Bruce I. Oppenheimer. Wash-
- ington, DC: Congressional Quarterly Press. Pp. 91–114. Erikson, Robert S., and Gerald C. Wright. 1997. "Voters, Candidates and Issues in Congressional Elections." In Congress Reconsidered, 6th ed., eds. Lawrence C. Dodd and Bruce I. Oppenheimer. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly Press. Pp. 132-61.
- Erikson, Robert S., and Gerald C. Wright. 2000. "Representation of Constituency Ideology in Congress." In Change and Continuity in House Elections, eds. David W. Brady, John F. Cogan, and John F. Ferejohn. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press. Pp. 149-77.
- Ferejohn, John A., and Randall L. Calvert. 1984. "Presidential Coattails in Historical Perspective." American Journal of Political Science 28 (February): 127-46.
- Fiorina, Morris P. 1974. Representatives, Roll Calls, and Constituencies. Lexington, MA: Lexington Books.
- Fiorina, Morris P. 1989. Congress: Keystone of the Washington Establishment, 2nd ed. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Gaines, Brian J., and Timothy P. Nokken. 1999. "The Presidential Shadow on Midterm House Elections: Presidential Support, Presidential Agendas, and Seat Loss," Typescript. University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign.
- Goff, Brian L., and Kevin B. Grier. 1993. "On the (Mis)measurement of Legislator Ideology and Shirking." Public Choice 76 (June): 5-
- Groseclose, Tim, Steven D. Levitt, and James M. Snyder, Jr. 1999. "Comparing Interest Group Scores across Time and Chambers: Adjusted ADA Scores for the U.S. Congress." American Political
- Science Review 93 (March): 33-50. Hutchings, Vincent L. 1998. "Issue Salience and Support for Civil Rights Legislation Among Southern Democrats." Legislative Stud- ies Quarterly 23 (November): 521-44. Jacobson, Gary C. 1990. "The Effects of Campaign Spending in House Elections: New Evidence for Old Arguments." American Journal of Political Science 34 (May): 334-62. Jacobson, Gary C. 1996. "The 1994 House Elections in Perspective."
- Political Science Quarterly 111 (Summer): 203-23.

- Jacobson, Gary C. 2000. "Reversal of Fortune: The Transformation of U.S. House Elections in the 1990s." In Change and Continuity in House Elections, eds. David W. Brady, John F. Cogan, and Morris P. Fiorina. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press Pp. 10-38.
- Jacobson, Gary C., and Samuel Kernell. 1983. Strategy and Choice in Congressional Elections, 2nd ed. New Haven, CT: Yale University
- Johannes, John R., and John C. McAdams. 1981. "The Congressional Incumbency Effect: Is It Casework, Policy Compatibility, or Something Else? An Examination of the 1978 Election." American Journal of Political Science 25 (August): 512-42.
- Kiewiet, D. Roderick, and Mathew D. McCubbins. 1988. "Presidential Influence on Congressional Appropriations Decisions." American Journal of Political Science 32 (August): 713-36.
- Kimhi, Ayal. 1999. "Estimation of an Endogenous Switching Regression Model with Discrete Dependent Variables: Monte-Carlo Analysis and Empirical Application of Three Estimators." Empirical Economics 24 (2): 225-41.
- Kingdon, John W. 1981. Congressmen's Voting Decisions. New York: Harper & Row.
- Kollman, Ken. 1998. Outside Lobbying: Public Opinion and Interest Group Strategies. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Kramer, Gerald H. 1971. "Short-Term Fluctuations in U.S. Voting Behavior, 1896-1964." American Political Science Review 65 (March): 131-43.
- Kuklinski, James H. Daniel S. Metlay, and W. D. Kay. 1982. "Citizen Knowledge and Choices on the Complex Issue of Nuclear Energy." American Journal of Political Science 26 (November):
- Lodge, Milton, Kathleen M. McGraw, and Patrick Stroh. 1989. "An Impression-Driven Model of Candidate Evaluation." American Political Science Review 83 (June): 399-419.
- Lott, John R., and Stephen G. Bronars. 1993. "Time-Series Evidence on Shirking in the United States House of Representatives." Public Choice 76 (June): 125-49.
- Lupia, Arthur. 1994. "Shortcuts Versus Encyclopedias: Information and Voting Behavior in California Insurance Reform Elections." American Political Science Review 88 (March): 63-76.
- Madalla, G. S. 1983. Limited Dependent and Qualitative Variables in Econometrics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Madison, James, Alexander Hamilton, and John Jay. [1788] 1987. The Federalist Papers, ed. Isaac Kramnick. New York: Penguin
- Matthews, Donald R., and James A. Stimson. 1975. Yeas and Nays: Normal Decision-Making in the U.S. House of Representatives. New York: Wiley.
- Mayhew, David R. 1974a. Congress: The Electoral Connection. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Mayhew, David R. 1974b. "Congressional Elections: The Case of the Vanishing Marginals." Polity 6 (Spring): 295–317.
- McCarty, Nolan M., and Keith T. Poole. 1995. "Veto Power and Legislation: An Empirical Analysis of Executive and Legislative Bargaining from 1961–1986." Journal of Law, Economics and Organization 11 (October): 282-312.
- Miller, Warren E., and Donald E. Stokes. 1963. "Constituency Influence in Congress." American Political Science Review 57 (March): 45-56.
- Munger, Michael C. 1988. "Allocation of Desirable Committee Assignments: Extended Queues Versus Committee Expansion." American Journal of Political Science 32 (May): 317-44.
- Poole, Keith T., and Howard Rosenthal. 1991. "Patterns of Congressional Voting." American Journal of Political Science 35 (February):
- Rabinowitz, George, and Stuart Elaine MacDonald. 1989. "A Directional Theory of Issue Voting." American Political Science Review 83 (March): 93-121.
- Rohde, David W. 1991. Parties and Leaders in the Postreform House. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Schoenberger, Robert A. 1969. "Campaign Strategy and Party Loyalty: The Electoral Relevance of Candidate Decision-Making in the 1964 Congressional Elections." American Political Science Review 63 (June): 515-20.
- Smith, Eric R. A. N. 1989. The Unchanging American Voter. Berkeley: University of California Press.

- Snyder, James M., Jr. 1996a. "Constituency Preferences: California Ballot Propositions, 1974–90." Legislative Studies Quarterly 21 (November): 463–88.
- Snyder, James M., Jr. 1996b. "Estimating Voter Preferences Using Partially Aggregated Voting Data," Typescript. Cambridge, MA. Snyder, James M., Jr., and Tim Groseclose. 2000. "Estimating Party
- Snyder, James M., Jr., and Tim Groseclose. 2000. "Estimating Party Influence in Congressional Roll Call Voting." American Journal of Political Science 44 (April): 193–211.
- Souraf, Frank J. 1992. Inside Campaign Finance. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Sullivan, John L., L. Earl Shaw, Gregory E. McAvoy, and David G.
- Barnum. 1993. "The Dimensions of Cue-Taking in the House of Representatives: Variation by Issue Area." Journal of Politics 55 (November): 975–97.
- Tufte, Edward R. 1975. "Determinants of the Outcomes of Midterm Congressional Elections." American Political Science Review 69 (September): 812–26.
- Wright, Gerald C. 1978. "Candidates' Policy Positions and Voting in U.S. Congressional Elections." Legislative Studies Quarterly 3 (August): 445-64.
- Wright, Matthew B. 1993. "Shirking, Political Support and Agency Costs in Political Markets." Public Choice 76 (June): 103–24.

Coordination and Policy Moderation at Midterm

WALTER R. MEBANE, JR. Cornell University JASJEET S. SEKHON Harvard University

Eligible voters have been coordinating their turnout and vote decisions for the House of Representatives in midterm elections. Coordination is a noncooperative rational expectations equilibrium. Stochastic choice models estimated using individual-level data from U.S. National Election Studies surveys of the years 1978–1998 support the coordinating model and reject a nonstrategic model. The coordinating model shows that many voters have incentives to change their votes between the presidential year and midterm after learning the outcome of the presidential election. But this mechanism alone does not explain the size of midterm cycles. The largest source of loss of support for the president's party at midterm is a regular pattern in which the median differences between the voters' ideal points and the parties' policy positions have become less favorable for the president's party than they were at the time of the presidential election (nonvoters show the same pattern). The interelection changes are not consistent with the theory of surge and decline.

o Americans coordinate their electoral choices in midterm congressional elections? We use coordination to describe a situation in which two conditions hold for everyone who is eligible to vote (i.e., every elector). Each elector combines information that each elector has privately with information that everyone has in common to make the best possible prediction of the election outcome, and each elector makes the choice—consistent with the elector's prediction—that is most likely to produce the best possible result for the elector. Each elector's prediction takes into account what all electors' best strategies would be given the information they have in common, a condition described by saying that each elector has rational expectations. The choice each elector makes is part of the elector's private information. When every elector makes choices according to a strategy that is consistent with the elector's rational expectations, and no elector can produce a personally better outcome by using a different strategy, then there is a noncooperative equilibrium. Coordination is defined as the existence of a noncooperative equilibrium that is based on everyone having rational expectations.

Beyond implications for the regularity with which the president's party loses vote share in midterm elections, which we discuss below, the existence of coordination is important because coordination implies that electors take one another into account in a constitutionally Walter R. Mebane, Jr., is Associate Professor, Department of Government, Cornell University, Ithaca, NY 14853-4601 (wrm1@cornell.edu). Jasjeet S. Sekhon is Assistant Professor, Government Department, Harvard University, 34 Kirkland Street, Cambridge, MA 02138 (jsekhon@fas.harvard.edu).

Earlier versions of this paper were presented at the 2000 Annual Meeting of the Midwest Political Science Association, April 27–30, Palmer House, Chicago, at the 1999 Annual Meeting of the American Political Science Association, September 2–5, Atlanta, and at seminars at Harvard University. Data were made available in part by the Cornell Institute for Social and Economic Research and the Interuniversity Consortium for Political and Social Research. We thank Jonathan Wand for helpful comments, Jonathan Cowden for letting tron help macht and lapo with the computing, and Gary Jacobson for giving us his candidate quality data for the 1978–1998 midterm elections. All errors are solely the responsibility of the authors.

significant way. In American elections, coordination is based on the separation of powers between the president and the Congress. Coordination occurs when electors anticipate how election outcomes will affect bargaining about policy within the legislature and between the legislature and the executive. By instituting the constitutional separation of powers, Madison believed that elected officials' pursuit of their selfish interests and ambitions would lead them to act with regard to one another in ways that would prevent governmental tyranny (Carey 1978, 159-60). Even electors who did not coordinate might hope, with Madison, that the separation of powers would affect officials in that way. But if coordination exists, electors are not mere observers of consequences the constitutional provisions may produce but instead are agents who are led to counteract one another by the constitutional incentives. Coordinating electors are as wary of one another as they are of officials.

Coordination produces policy moderation. An elector is acting to moderate policy when the elector chooses what to do based on the idea that, via the institutional structure, the policy outcome will be intermediate between the parties' positions. With coordination it is not that electors individually prefer to have government produce moderate policy. Indeed, no elector prefers moderation or divided government per se. Rather, the separation of powers and the institutions that create public information together channel each elector's selfish efforts in such a way that collectively there is a moderated result.

In the strategic theory of policy moderation introduced by Alesina and Rosenthal (1989, 1995, 1996), which motivates our analysis, each voter's rational expectation about the midterm outcome is part of a noncooperative equilibrium that encompasses the presidential and midterm elections. Based on empirical tests of a rational expectations noncooperative equilibrium model of voters' choices among candidates for president and for the House of Representatives, Mebane (2000) argues that there is coordination among voters in presidential elections. We use an extension of Mebane's (2000) fixed-point methods to develop an equilibrium model for turnout and vote choice decisions by midterm electors. We test the model using National Election Studies (NES) survey data from the six midterm elections of years 1978 through 1998. We also compare the coordinating model explicitly to an institutional balancing model that asserts that electors do not act strategically. Finally, we examine how well the coordinating model explains midterm loss (Erikson 1988), taking into account the alternative theory of surge and decline (Born 1990; Angus Campbell 1966; James E. Campbell 1987, 1991).

Our analysis is a counterexample to Green and Shapiro's (1994, 195) claim that "rational choice theory fares best in environments that are evidence poor." Indeed, we sharply test the strategic theory using exactly the kind of survey data with which Green and Shapiro (1994, 195) assert that "rational choice theories have been refuted or domesticated." Our analysis is not subject to the pathologies that Green and Shapiro show have generally afflicted rational choice theory. The statistical model we use to confront the survey data is isomorphic to the formal equilibrium theory. We test the parameters of the estimated model for internal coherence and the model as a whole against a relevant alternative, namely the nonstrategic model.

It may be surprising to many, including some formal theorists, that voters are able to behave in the strategic fashion our model posits. No one disputes the longestablished fact that most voters are politically ignorant (e.g., Adams [1805] 1973; Bryce [1888] 1995; Converse 1964; Delli Carpini and Keeter 1996). What widespread voter ignorance implies is controversial, however. Even though individuals are poorly informed, political and electoral institutions may allow voters to make decisions that are much the same as they would make if they had better information. For instance, McKelvey and Ordeshook (1985a,b) suggest that polls and interest group endorsements may perform such cuing functions. Mebane (2000) regards such institutions as implicitly providing foundations for coordination, and so do we. It is clear, however, that neither such cues nor the aggregate cancellation of individual voter errors is sufficient to produce election results that fully match what would happen if all electors were better informed (Bartels 1996).

That electors interact strategically does not imply that they live up to the democratic ideal of being active participants in a rational-critical discourse on public issues (Ĥabermas [1964] 1989, [1981] 1984, [1981] 1987). The noncooperative framework takes preferences as given, and when assessing the efficacy and desirability of possible actions, strategic electors know that they are interacting with others who are similarly rational. In discourse, individuals may modify their preferences in response to arguments, and if engaged in communicative action, they are "coordinated not through egocentric calculations of success but through acts of reaching understanding" (Habermas [1981] 1984, 285-6). Communicative reasoning is about individuals together reflecting on background assumptions about the world and bringing shared basic norms to the fore to be questioned and negotiated. Even if strategic electors might be thought to be Madisonian because the constitutional separation of powers causes them collectively to moderate policy, instrumental rationality has individuals taking background assumptions and norms for granted, as common knowledge, and focusing on pursuit of gains.

OVERVIEW

We assume that each elector has the same basic institutional understanding that is attributed to voters in the theories of Alesina and Rosenthal (1995, 1996) and Mebane (2000). Each elector knows that postelection policy outcomes are compromises between the positions taken by the president and the Congress, and each elector believes that the two political parties push for distinct policy alternatives. In our theory different electors have different beliefs about what the parties' policy positions are, and not all electors care about the policy outcomes. An elector may vote for one of the parties or not vote.

The equilibrium concept in our model is similar to Mebane's (2000): each elector is able to make an equilibrium strategic choice that is based on accurate expectations regarding the aggregate results of other electors' intended choices. Different electors have beliefs about the upcoming election results that are similar because of common knowledge all electors have but differ because of private information each elector has. Our equilibrium includes the level of turnout along with the two-party split of votes for House candidates. The fixed-point values determined in the empirical analysis estimate the aggregate values that are common knowledge in equilibrium in the theoretical model.

We compare the coordinating model to an empirical model derived from the nonstrategic theory that Fiorina (1988, 1992, 73–81) introduced to describe institutional balancing by voters in elections during presidential years. Mebane (2000) finds the nonstrategic model to be significantly inferior to his coordinating model in NES data from presidential election years 1976–1996. Our findings for the midterms data are similar.

One of the most important implications of Alesina and Rosenthal's theory is an explanation of midterm loss. According to their theory, some who voted for a congressional candidate of the president's party when the presidential outcome was uncertain would have voted for the other party had they known which presidential candidate would win. At midterm such voters change their votes, so the president's party loses congressional vote share. Alesina and Rosenthal (1989, 1995; Alesina et al. 1993) show patterns in aggregate data that in several respects match the kind of midterm cycle their theory implies, but, as they observe, the midterm cycle occurs too frequently to be fully consistent with their theoretical model (Alesina and Rosenthal 1995, 207).<sup>2</sup> We use the data and parameter estimates from our model and from Mebane (2000) to confirm that the disappearing uncertainty of Alesina and Rosenthal's theory accounts for only a small part of the midterm cycles that occurred between 1976 and 1998. The predominant part of the explanation for the frequency and magnitude of the midterm cycles is a regular pattern of interelection changes in the relationship between voters' policy ideal points and the policy positions they attribute to the parties. Usually the changes work against candidates of the president's party, but in 1998 the changes helped Democrats achieve a midterm gain.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Mebane's (2000) analysis of presidential and House candidate choices in presidential election years considers only voters.

An alternative explanation for midterm loss is the theory of surge and decline. The details of the theory vary somewhat in different accounts (Born 1990; Angus Campbell 1966; James E. Campbell 1987, 1991; Kernell 1977), but there are two central ideas. First, there are people who turn out in the presidential election and vote for House candidates of the party that wins the presidency but who do not vote at midterm. Second, presidential coattails cause many voters to choose House candidates of the president's party, but at midterm, absent presidential coattails, the president's party suffers a predictable and regular midterm loss proportional to the party's prior presidential vote margin (Campbell 1991).

One formulation of the surge and decline argument highlights the claim that Independents are more likely to vote in the presidential election than at midterm, so that the midterm electorate consists of a higher proportion of party identifiers whose vote choices are relatively unmoved by short-run concerns (Campbell 1966). Using NES data, Born (1990) finds little support for that or related claims about turnout variations. We find that policy evaluations change systematically between the presidential election and midterm in ways that do not match the theory. Consistent with surge and decline, Born (1990) finds that short-run concerns matter more during the presidential election than at midterm. We explain that this asymmetry arises because retrospective economic evaluations significantly affect House votes in presidential years, but these evaluations do not significantly affect House votes at midterm.

A negative voting variant of the surge and decline theory argues that voters weigh negative aspects of a president's performance more heavily than positive aspects (Bloom and Price 1975; Kernell 1977). Several studies find mixed support for various interpretations of the negative voting idea (Abramowitz 1985; Cover 1986), but Fiorina and Shepsle (1989) show that evidence of negative voting reflects nothing more than a technical artifact. Born (1990) rejects the idea based on NES data from several elections. Because of the lack of evidence for asymmetric negative voting, we do not directly engage this variant of surge and decline.

The negative voting variant claims to explain an interesting regularity that surge and decline otherwise does not. A party consistently receives a higher vote proportion in midterm House elections when the other party controls the White House than when they themselves control it. Surge and decline compares midterm election returns to the previous presidential election but usually ignores the distribution of returns across midterms. Our moderation theory explains that distribution and, unlike negative voting, has strong individual-level support.

A MODEL OF COORDINATION IN TURNOUT AND VOTE CHOICES AT MIDTERM

In a manner similar to that of Mebane (2000), the model of coordination we develop is based on a fixed-point theorem that defines the common knowledge belief that all electors have about the upcoming election results. The values of two aggregate statistics summarize the election results: (i) the proportion of the two-party vote to be cast nationally for Republican candidates for the House and (ii) the proportion of electors who will vote. Our theory differs from Mebane's by including electors whose election-time preferences and hence strategies do not depend on expected postelection policies. Each elector who does care about the policies responds to the belief each has about the aggregate values, because the values affect the loss each expects.

The election is a game among everyone who is eligible to vote, that is, among all the electors, assumed to be a large number. Electors act noncooperatively and simultaneously, each choosing whether to vote for a Democratic or a Republican candidate for a House seat or not to vote. In some House districts a candidate may be unopposed. Every elector's expectations about the election outcome depend on the strategies other electors are expected to use. Equilibrium occurs when every elector uses all available information to form such expectations and, given everything each elector knows, no elector expects to gain by using a different strategy. In the following discussion we sketch the main features of the model. Further details, including the extension to include unopposed candidates in some districts, are given in the Appendix.

Elector i expects that after the election Democrats will try to implement policy position  $\theta_{Di}$  and Republicans position  $\theta_{Ri}$ . Given expectations that a proportion  $\bar{V}_i$  of the N electors will vote and a proportion  $\bar{H}_i$  of the vote will go to Republicans, i expects postelection policy to be

$$\tilde{\theta}_i = \begin{cases} \alpha\theta_{Di} + (1-\alpha)[\bar{H}_i\theta_{Ri} + (1-\bar{H}_i)\theta_{Di}], \\ \text{if Democrat is president,} \\ \alpha\theta_{Ri} + (1-\alpha)[\bar{H}_i\theta_{Ri} + (1-\bar{H}_i)\theta_{Di}], \\ \text{if Republican is president,} \end{cases}$$ where  $\alpha$ ,  $0 \le \alpha \le 1$ , represents the president's strength in comparison to the House, and  $\bar{H}_i\theta_{Ri} + (1 - \bar{H}_i)\theta_{Di}$  is the position i expects the House to take. If elector i's preferences depend on policy, then i's expected loss from  $\tilde{\theta}_i$ , denoted  $\lambda_i$ , depends on i's ideal point  $\theta_i$ , according to  $\lambda_i = |\theta_i - \tilde{\theta}_i|^q$ , where  $0 < q < +\infty$ , and we set an indicator variable  $\gamma_i = 1$ . If i does not care about policy, then  $\lambda_i = 0$  and we set  $\gamma_i = 0$ .

&lt;sup>2</sup> Scheve and Tomz (1999) use NES panel data to study the relationship between surprise about the presidential election outcome and midterm loss. As a test of Alesina and Rosenthal's theory their analysis is limited because they do not distinguish policy preferences from party identification and do not impose equilibrium conditions on voters' beliefs or strategies.

Every elector's choice—whether to vote for the Republican, to vote for the Democrat, or not to vote—affects  $\bar{H}_i$  and hence affects  $\bar{\theta}_i$ . We write  $\bar{H}_i = \bar{H}_{i,R}$  if i votes Republican and  $\bar{H}_i = \bar{H}_{i,D}$  if i votes Democrat, with  $\bar{H}_{i,R} > \bar{H}_{i,D}$ . The effect an increase in  $\bar{H}_i$  has on  $\lambda_i$  is

$$w_{Ci} = \begin{cases} q(\theta_{Di} - \theta_{Ri})(1 - \alpha)|\theta_i - \tilde{\theta}_i|^{q-1} \operatorname{sgn}(\theta_i - \tilde{\theta}_i), & \text{if } \gamma_i = 1, \\ 0, & \text{if } \gamma_i = 0, \end{cases}$$ where sgn(x) = -1 if x < 0, sgn(x) = 0 if x = 0, and sgn(x) = 1 if x > 0. Each choice also involves additional gains and losses, such that the total loss for i is

$$\tilde{\lambda}_i = \begin{cases} \lambda_{i,D} + z_{i,D} + \epsilon_{i,D}, & \text{if } i \text{ votes for the Democrat,} \\ \lambda_{i,R} + z_{i,R} + \epsilon_{i,R}, & \text{if } i \text{ votes for the Republican,} \\ \lambda_{i,A} + z_{i,A} + \epsilon_{i,A}, & \text{if } i \text{ does not vote.} \end{cases}$$

To minimize  $\tilde{\lambda}_i$ , i chooses the value from the set  $K = \{D, R, A\}$  that minimizes  $x_{i,h} + \epsilon_{i,h}$ ,  $h \in K$ , where D denotes voting for the Democrat, R voting for the Republican, and A not voting, and, using  $\bar{V}_{i,A}$  to denote the value of  $\bar{V}_i$  if i does not vote,

$$x_{i,D} = -(N\bar{V}_{i,A})^{-1}\bar{H}_{i,D}w_{Ci} + z_{i,D},$$
 (1a)

$$x_{i,R} = (N\bar{V}_{i,A})^{-1}(1 - \bar{H}_{i,R})w_{Ci} + z_{i,R},$$
 (1b)

$$x_{i,A} = z_{i,A}. (1c)$$

Variable  $Y_i$  denotes i's choice from K. Because  $Y_i$  depends on  $\bar{V}_i$  and  $\bar{H}_i$ , the best choice for each elector who has  $\gamma_i = 1$  depends on what i expects others to do.  $Y_i$  is an equilibrium only if it minimizes  $\tilde{\lambda}_i$  when each i assumes that everyone else is using the same rule and only if it is supported by every i believing "mutually consistent" (Mebane 2000, 41) values for  $\bar{H}_i$  and  $\bar{V}_i$ . The definition of  $Y_i$  and assumptions we make about the probability distribution of  $w_{Ci}$ ,  $z_{i,h}$ , and  $\epsilon_{i,h}$  imply choice probabilities  $\mu_{i,D}$ ,  $\mu_{i,R}$ , and  $\mu_{i,A}$ .

We use Mebane's (2000) method to characterize each mutually consistent pair  $(\bar{H}_i, \bar{V}_i)$  as a deviation from common knowledge expections  $(\bar{H}, \bar{V})$  that all electors have when each elector i knows only the distribution of  $w_{Ci}$ ,  $z_{i,h}$ , and  $\epsilon_{i,h}$ . In that case, the proportions of electors expected to vote Republican and Democratic are, respectively,  $\bar{R}$  and  $\bar{D}$  such that  $\bar{V} = \bar{R} + \bar{D}$ ,  $\bar{H} = \bar{R}/\bar{V}$  and, in (1a) and (1b),  $\bar{V}_{i,A} = \bar{V}$  and  $\bar{H}_{i,D} = \bar{H}_{i,R} = \bar{H}$ , and i's choice probabilities are  $\bar{\mu}_{k_i,h} = \bar{\mu}_{k,h}$  (same for all i in a set indexed by k). The difference between  $(\bar{H}_i, \bar{V}_i)$  and  $(\bar{H}, \bar{V})$  reflects i's private information, which is the actual values of  $w_{Ci}$ ,  $z_{i,h}$ , and  $\epsilon_{i,h}$ . Let  $y_{i,h}$  indicate the value of  $Y_i$  when i knows  $w_{Ci}$ ,  $z_{i,h}$ , and  $\epsilon_{i,h}$ ,  $h \in K$ , but for other electors has only the common knowledge:  $y_{i,h} = 1$  if  $Y_i = h$ ,  $y_{i,h} = 0$  if  $Y_i \neq h$ ,  $h \in K$ . Define  $\bar{R}_{iy_{i,R}} = \bar{R} + (y_{i,R} - \bar{\mu}_{k_i,R})/N$ ,  $\bar{D}_{iy_{i,D}} = \bar{D} + (y_{i,D} - \bar{\mu}_{k_i,D})/N$ ,  $\bar{V}_{iy_{i,R}y_{i,D}} = \bar{R}_{iy_{i,R}} + \bar{D}_{iy_{i,D}}$ , and  $\bar{H}_{iy_{i,R}y_{i,D}} = \bar{R}_{iy_{i,R}}/\bar{V}_{iy_{i,R}y_{i,D}}$ . A set of equilibrium choices  $Y_i$  and expectations  $(\bar{H}_i, \bar{V}_i)$ ,  $i = 1, \ldots, N$ , is given by the following theorem.

Theorem 1. There is a coordinating elector equilibrium if, with all electors using the same fixed point  $(\bar{H}, \bar{V})$  computed from common knowledge, each elector i has  $(\bar{H}_i, \bar{V}_i) = (\bar{H}_{iy_i,R}y_{i,D}, \bar{V}_{iy_i,R}y_{i,D})$  and  $Y_i = h$ ,  $h \in K$ , for whichever of the three possible pairs of values  $(\bar{H}_{iy_i,R}y_{i,D}, \bar{V}_{iy_i,R}y_{i,D})$  corresponds to the smallest value of  $\tilde{\lambda}_i$ : either  $\bar{H}_i = \bar{H}_{i01}$ ,  $\bar{V}_i = \bar{V}_{i01}$ , and  $Y_i = D$ ;  $\bar{H}_i = \bar{H}_{i10}$ ,  $\bar{V}_i = \bar{V}_{i10}$ , and  $Y_i = R$ ; or  $\bar{H}_i = \bar{H}_{i00}$ ,  $\bar{V}_i = \bar{V}_{i00}$ , and  $Y_i = A$ .

A COORDINATING MODEL FOR SURVEY DATA

With survey data we observe choices  $Y_i \in K$  reported by each elector i in a sample S of size  $n, i = 1, \ldots, n$ , and a set of variables  $Z_i$  that affect electoral choices. Given  $Z_i$  and a set of parameter values, we adapt Mebane's (2000) method to compute values  $(\hat{H}, \hat{V})$ . In (1a)–(1c) we set  $\bar{H}_i = \hat{H}$  and  $\bar{V}_i = \hat{V}$  and substitute  $b_C \hat{V}^{-1}$  for  $(N\bar{V})^{-1}$ , where  $b_C > 0$  is a constant parameter:

$$x_{i,D} = -b_C \hat{V}^{-1} \hat{H} w_{Ci} + z_{i,D},$$
 (2a)

$$x_{i,R} = b_C \hat{V}^{-1} (1 - \hat{H}) w_{Ci} + z_{i,R},$$
 (2b)

$$x_{i,A} = z_{i,A}. (2c)$$

Further details, including the definition of the loglikelihood, are given in the Appendix.

We test whether the parameters satisfy conditions necessary for coordination to exist. If  $\alpha=1$ , then  $w_{Ci}=0$  so that electors' strategies depend on neither  $\hat{H}$  nor  $\hat{V}$  and there is no coordination. We use confidence intervals and likelihood-ratio (LR) tests to check whether  $\alpha=1$  can be rejected for each year of our data. We use Davies's (1987, 36, Eq. 3.4) method to adjust the LR test significance probabilities for a nonregularity that arises because the model does not depend on  $\rho$  when  $\alpha=1$ . Also necessary for the model to describe coordination are that q>0 and that  $b_C>0$ : q=0 implies that  $w_{Ci}=0$ , and  $b_C=0$  implies that  $w_{Ci}$ ,  $\hat{H}$  and  $\hat{V}$  do not affect i's choice.

&lt;sup>3</sup> In Mebane's (2000) coordinating model, the weight each voter places on the expected policy-related loss from each party depends on the voter's retrospective evaluation of the national economy (see Mebane's Eqs. 3 and 16). In alternative specifications, not reported here, estimation of the stochastic choice model [see Eqs. (2a)–(2c) and (A7) and (A8) in the Appendix] showed no evidence of such dependence in the expected policy-related losses of midterm electors. Hence we have simplified the definition of the midterm theoretical model.

A NONSTRATEGIC MODERATING MODEL

To test further whether electors coordinate, we define an empirical model that applies to midterm elections the core idea in Fiorina's (1988, 1992, 73–81) non-strategic theory of institutional balancing by voters in presidential-year elections. The theory considers a situation in which each voter has a choice between two candidates for president and two candidates for the legislature, one from each of two parties. Each voter chooses the mix of party control of the presidency and the legislature, either unified or divided government, that would produce a policy outcome nearest the elector's ideal point. The voter ignores the expected election outcome. The theory is nonstrategic because no voter's choice depends on the likely choice of any other voter.

We apply the nonstrategic theory by assuming that at midterm each elector i treats the party of the president as fixed in forming a preference between unified or divided government but ignores the expected election outcome. The postelection policies that i expects if there is a Democratic majority in the House are<sup>4</sup>

$$\tilde{\theta}_{Di} = \begin{cases} \theta_{Di}, & \text{if Democrat is president} \\ \alpha \theta_{Ri} + (1 - \alpha)\theta_{Di}, & \text{if Republican is president} \end{cases}$$
(3)

and the postelection policies that i expects if there is a Republican majority are $$\tilde{\theta}_{Ri} = \begin{cases} \alpha \theta_{Di} + (1 - \alpha)\theta_{Ri}, \\ & \text{if Democrat is president} \\ \theta_{Ri}, & \text{if Republican is president} \end{cases}$$

 (4)

with  $0 \le \alpha \le 1$ . The nonstrategic theory says that, other things equal, i votes for the Democrat instead of the Republican if i's ideal point is closer to the policy expected with a Democratic majority than to the policy expected with a Republican majority, i.e., if  $|\theta_i - \tilde{\theta}_{Di}| < |\theta_i - \tilde{\theta}_{Ri}|$ . If  $|\theta_i - \tilde{\theta}_{Di}| > |\theta_i - \tilde{\theta}_{Ri}|$ , then i votes for the Republican instead of the Democrat.

In the nonstrategic model there is policy moderation only if  $0 < \alpha < 1$ . If  $\alpha = 1$ , then the president's party's position is the expected policy, hence  $\tilde{\theta}_{Di} = \tilde{\theta}_{Ri}$ , and policy comparisons do not affect midterm vote choices. If  $\alpha = 0$ , then  $\tilde{\theta}_{Di} = \theta_{Di}$  and  $\tilde{\theta}_{Ri} = \theta_{Ri}$  regardless of who is president. There is no moderation but rather a simple choice between the parties' alternative policies.

To include the possibility of not voting, we use the same log-likelihood function as with the coordinating model, except based on modified definitions of  $x_{i,h}$ ,  $h \in K$ . Defining with  $0 < q < +\infty$ , we define

$$w_{NSi} = \begin{cases} |\theta_i - \tilde{\theta}_{Ri}|^q - |\theta_i - \tilde{\theta}_{Di}|^q, & \text{if} & \gamma_i = 1\\ 0, & \text{if} & \gamma_i = 0 \end{cases}$$

$$x_{i,D} = -b_{NS}w_{NSi} + z_{i,D} \tag{5a}$$

$$x_{i,R} = b_{NS} w_{NSi} + z_{i,R}$$
 (5b)

$$x_{i,A} = z_{i,A} \tag{5c}$$

with  $b_{NS} \ge 0$ . If  $b_{NS} > 0$ , then  $\partial \mu_{i,D} / \partial w_{NSi} > 0$  and  $\partial \mu_{i,R} / \partial w_{NSi} < 0$ .

The coordinating and nonstrategic models differ only in that the former uses  $\hat{V}^{-1}\hat{H}w_{Ci}$  and  $\hat{V}^{-1}(1-\hat{H})w_{Ci}$  to define  $x_{i,D}$  and  $x_{i,R}$ , while the latter uses  $w_{NSi}$ . We use Vuong's (1989, 320) test to compare them, first testing separately whether  $b_C > 0$  and  $b_{NS} > 0$ . The models may fit the data about equally well because  $w_{Ci}$  and  $w_{NSi}$  have the same sign if  $\tilde{\theta}_i = (\tilde{\theta}_{Di} + \tilde{\theta}_{Ri})/2$ .

DEFINITIONS OF EMPIRICAL CHOICE ATTRIBUTES

To estimate the models we pool NES Survey data from the years 1978, 1982, 1986, 1990, 1994 and 1998 (Miller and National Election Studies 1979, 1983, 1987; Miller et al. 1992; Rosenstone et al. 1995; Sapiro, Rosenstone, and National Election Studies 1999). Some parameters vary by year.

We use NES 7-point scales and the method described by Mebane (2000, 55) to determine the values of  $\theta_i$ ,  $\vartheta_{Di}$ ,  $\vartheta_{Ri}$ , and  $\vartheta_{PDi}$  or  $\vartheta_{PRi}$  for each i. If an elector i does not provide values for the policy position variables ( $\theta_i$ ,  $\vartheta_{Di}$ ,  $\vartheta_{Ri}$ , and  $\vartheta_{PDi}$  or  $\vartheta_{PRi}$ ), we assume that i does not experience policy-related losses, so that such losses do not affect the choices i makes. We set  $\gamma_i = 0$  if there is not at least one complete set of policy position variable values for i and  $\gamma_i = 1$  if at least one complete set exists. We include  $\gamma_i$  in  $z_{i,A}$ . To allow for the possibility of ideologically based mobilization, we also include each elector's ideal point in  $z_{i,A}$ , using the form  $\gamma_i \theta_i$  to switch the effect off when i lacks a complete set of policy position values.

Evidence that retrospective economic evaluations matter in presidential elections is strong, but systematic direct effects seem not to exist for candidate choices in House elections at midterm (Alesina and Rosenthal 1989; Born 1991; Erikson 1990; Jacobson 1989). Effects on turnout decisions also have been found to be weak

<sup>6</sup> There is a "complete set" if i placed all four of the referents for any single scale topic, e.g., placing self, the parties, and the president on the scale for Rights of the Accused (variables 365–368) in 1978. Among the cases used to compute the estimates reported in Table 1, the percentage with  $\gamma_i = 0$  is, by year, 14.2, 10.9, 10.9, 12.2, 4.8, and 5.0

&lt;sup>4</sup>  $\theta_{D_i}$  and  $\theta_{R_i}$  are as defined in the Appendix, Eqs. (A1) and (A2).

&lt;sup>5</sup> The NES variables for each set of scales for each year are given here. "Reversed" indicates an item for which we reversed the original 1–7 ordering. In years 1982–1998 respondents who initially declined to place themselves on the Liberal/Conservative scale, or who initially described themselves as "moderate" on the scale, were asked a follow-up question; we used those responses to categorize them as either "slightly liberal," "moderate," or "slightly conservative." 1978: 357–360; 365–368; 373–376; 381–384; 389–392; 399–402. 1982: 393, 394, 404–406; 407–410; 415–418; 425–428; 435–438; reversed 443–446. 1986: 385–387, 393, 394; 405, 406, 412, 413; 428, 429, 435, 436; reversed 448, 449, 455, 456. 1990: 406–408, 413, 414; 439, 440, 443, 444; 447–450; reversed 452, 453, 456, 457. 1994: 839–841, 847, 848; 930, 931, 934, 935; 936–939; reversed 940, 941, 944, 945; 950, 951, 954, 955. 1998 (omitting the prefix "980"): 399, 401, 403, 411, 412; 448, 449, 453, 454; 457, 458, 460, 461; reversed 463, 464, 468, 469.

(Arcelus and Meltzer 1975; Fiorina 1978). To measure retrospective evaluations we use responses to a question asking whether the national economy has gotten worse or better over the past year. In  $z_{i,D}$ ,  $z_{i,R}$ , and  $z_{i,A}$  we include the variable,  $EC_i$ , multiplied by  $PP_i = 1$  if the president is Republican;  $PP_i = -1$  if Democrat.

Party identification has long been known to affect vote choices (e.g., Campbell and Miller 1957) and to be associated both with varying rates of voter turnout (Campbell 1966; Converse 1966; Miller 1979) and with policy preferences and perceptions (Brady and Sniderman 1985). We measure party identification with six dummy variables that correspond to the levels of the NES 7-point scale, using "Strong Democrat" as the reference category:  $PID_{Di}$ ,  $PID_{IDi}$ ,  $PID_{II}$ ,  $PID_{IRi}$ ,  $PID_{Ri}$ , and  $PID_{SRi}$ . We include the variables in  $z_{i,D}$ ,  $z_{i,R}$ , and  $z_{i,A}$ .

To take incumbent-related effects into account, we use a pair of dummy variables that indicate whether a Democratic or Republican incumbent is running for reelection in elector i's congressional district.  $DEM_i = 1$  if a Democratic incumbent is running, otherwise  $DEM_i = 0$ , and likewise for  $REP_i$  and a Republican incumbent. In the choice between candidates we expect to see an incumbency advantage. Decause the presence of an incumbent usually means the absence of a vigorous campaign, the probability of not voting should be higher when an incumbent is running than when there is an open seat.

We include in  $z_{i,A}$  a measure of subjective political efficacy (EFF<sub>i</sub>), defined as the average of responses to two survey items (Abramson and Aldrich 1982; Balch 1974), <sup>12</sup> and four demographic variables that are frequently observed to have strong effects on voter turnout (Born 1990): education, age, marital status, and time at current residence. Three dummy variables measure education: high school diploma, 12+ years of school, no higher degree (ED1<sub>i</sub>); AA- or BA-level degrees or 17+ years of school and no higher degree (ED2<sub>i</sub>); and advanced degree, including LLB (ED3<sub>i</sub>). The reference category for the dummy variables is 11 grades or less, no diploma, or equivalency. Age we measure as time in year minus  $40 \, (AGE_i)$ . Marital status is a dummy variable (MAR<sub>i</sub>) coded 1 for "married and living with spouse (or spouse in service)" and 0 otherwise. Time at current residence (RES<sub>i</sub>) is measured in whole years for durations of between 3 and 9 years; otherwise it is coded using the same values used by Born (1990): less than 6 months, 0.25; 6–12 months, or 1 year, 0.75; 13–24 months, or 2 years, 1.5; and 10 years or more, 10.13

The definitions of the attributes of the choices are

$$z_{i,D} = c_0 - c_{DEM} DEM_i + c_{EC} PP_i EC_i + c_D PID_{Di}$$

$$+ c_{ID} PID_{IDi} + c_I PID_{Ii} + c_{IR} PID_{IRi}$$

$$+ c_R PID_{Ri} + c_{SR} PID_{SRi}, \qquad (6a)$$

$$z_{i,R} = -c_0 - c_{REP} REP_i - c_{EC} PP_i EC_i - c_D PID_{Di}$$

$$- c_{ID} PID_{IDi} - c_I PID_{Ii} - c_{IR} PID_{IRi}$$

$$- c_R PID_{Ri} - c_{SR} PID_{SRi}, \qquad (6b)$$

$$z_{i,A} = d_0 + d_{EFF} EFF_i + d_{ED1} ED1_i + d_{ED2} ED2_i$$

$$+ d_{ED3} ED3_i + d_{AGE} AGE_i + d_{MAR} MAR_i$$

$$+ d_{RES} RES_i + d_{\gamma} (1 - \gamma_i) + d_{\theta} \gamma_i \theta_i$$

$$+ d_{REP} REP_i + d_{DEM} DEM_i + d_{EC} PP_i EC_i$$

$$+ d_D PID_{Di} + d_{ID} PID_{IDi} + d_I PID_{Ii}$$

$$+ d_{IR} PID_{IRi} + d_R PID_{Ri} + d_{SR} PID_{SRi}, \qquad (6c)$$

where the parameters  $c_0$ ,  $c_{EC}$ ,  $d_0$ ,  $d_{EC}$ , and  $d_\theta$  are constant in each year, and the remaining parameters are constant over all years. A variable that increases the probability of choosing  $h \in K$  will have a negative coefficient. The effects measured by the c parameters primarily contrast the candidate alternatives to one another, while the d parameters measure effects that contrast the choice not to vote to the choice to vote. For the attributes of the candidates, the parameter signs should be  $c_0 < 0$  and  $c_{EC}$ ,  $c_{DEM}$ ,  $c_{REP}$ ,  $c_D$ ,  $c_{ID}$ ,  $c_I$ ,  $c_{IR}$ ,  $c_R$ ,  $c_{SR} > 0$ . For the attributes of not voting, the parameter signs should be  $d_\gamma$ ,  $d_{REP}$ ,  $d_{DEM}$ ,  $d_D$ ,  $d_{ID}$ ,  $d_I$ ,  $d_{IR}$ ,  $d_R < 0$  and  $d_{EFF}$ ,  $d_{ED1}$ ,  $d_{ED2}$ ,  $d_{ED3}$ ,  $d_{AGE}$ ,  $d_{MAR}$ ,  $d_{RES} > 0$ . The signs of  $d_0$ ,  $d_0$ , and  $d_{EC}$  are indeterminate.

To measure choices  $y_{i,h}$  we use individuals' self reports. <sup>15</sup> The sample size of electors used, pooled over the six NES surveys, is 9639 (by year, 1978–1998, the sizes are 1814, 1226, 1972, 1833, 1648, and 1146, respectively.). Only those who did not vote or who voted for either a Democrat or a Republican are included. Of

 $<sup>^{7}</sup>$  By year, the NES variables are 338, 328, 373, 423, 909, and 980419. Codes are as given by Mebane (2000, 55).

By year, the NES variables are 433, 291, 300, 320, 655, and 980339.
 By year, the NES variables are 4, 6, 43, 58, 17, and 980065.

&lt;sup>10</sup> Eubank and Gow (1983) and Gow and Eubank (1984) document proincumbent biases in 1978 and 1982 NES data. Estimated incumbency effects may be exaggerated (cf. Eubank 1985).

&lt;sup>11</sup> Including dummy variables based on Jacobson's (1989) candidate quality measure improves the fit to the data but does not change any of the results of primary interest in the analysis.

<sup>12</sup> The items are "have say" and "don't care much." By year, the NES variables are as follows: 351, 354; 531, 532; 549 ("don't care"); 509, 508; 1038, 1037; and 980525, 980524. In 1978, 1982, and 1986, the response codes are —1 for "agree" and 1 for "disagree." In 1990, 1994, and 1998, five responses range from "agree strongly" to "disagree strongly," coded —1, —0.5, 0, 0.5 and 1. In 1986 only the "don't care" item is available, and only for half the sample. We use a proxy variable to replace missing values for variable 549, constructed by summing the values of four variables: 62, 64, and 66, each being coded 1 if yes and 0 otherwise; and 59, coded 1 if "very interested" or "somewhat interested" and 0 otherwise. Respondents with INDEX = 4 are assigned the value 1; those with INDEX < 4 are assigned —1. Support for the proxy comes from a logistic regression model for the binary responses to variable 549 in the half-sample that was asked that question, with INDEX as the regressor: the MLEs give Pr(variable 549 = disagree) >0.5 only if INDEX = 4.

&lt;sup>13</sup> By year, the NES variables for education, age, marital status, and residency are as follows: 513, 504, 505, 628; 542, 535, 536, 760; 602, 595, 598, 753; 557, 552, 553, 684; 1209, 1203, 1204, 1426; and 980577, 980572, 980573, 980662.

&lt;sup>14</sup> In the Appendix, Eq. (A4):  $\partial v_{i,h}/\partial z_{i,h} < 0$ .

&lt;sup>15</sup> By year, the NES variables are as follows: 470, 473, 474; 501, 505, 506; 261, 265, 267; 279, 287, 289; 601, 612, 614; and 980303, 980311, 980313.

TABLE 1.	Coordi		Nonstr		dinating and Nonstrategic Models  Coordinating Nonstrategic				ategic
	-		•
Parameter	MLE	SE	MLE	SE	Parameter	MLE	SE	MLE	SE
$\overline{q}$	1.557	0.137	1.433	0.208	τ	0.769	0.068	0.732	0.068
$b_C$	1.491	0.217	_		$d_{0.78}$	-1.184	0.185	-1.249	0.187
$b_{NS}$			1.390	0.387	$d_{0,82}$	-1.256	0.215	-1.318	0.218
$\alpha_{78}$	0.463	0.167	, 0.359	0.176	$d_{0,86}$	-1.518	0.187	-1.594	0.190
$\alpha_{82}$	0.143	0.141	0*	0.192	$d_{0,90}$	-1.630	0.200	-1.706	0.203
$\alpha_{86}$	0.570	0.111	0.408	0.125	$d_{0,94}$	-1.790	0.212	-1.827	0.211
$\alpha_{90}$	0*	0.118	0*	0.189	$d_{0,98}$	-2.048	0.227	-2.095	0.229
$\alpha_{94}$	0*	0.072	0*	0.154	$d_{EFF}$	0.292	0.033	0.292	0.033
$\alpha_{98}$	0.272	0.140	0*	0.177	$d_{ED1}$	1.099	0.071	1.098	0.071
$ ho_{78}$	0*	0.353	0*	0.373	$d_{ED2}$	1.773	0.087	1.770	0.087
$ ho_{82}$	0.780	0.434	0.086	0.515	$d_{ED3}$	2.029	0.119	2.026	0.119
$ ho_{86}$	1*	0.424	1*	0.393	$d_{AGE}$	0.031	0.002	0.031	0.002
$ ho_{90}$	1*	0.386	1*	0.402	$d_{MAR}$	0.423	0.051	0.425	0.051
$ ho_{94}$	0.752	0.430	0.641	0.423	$d_{RES}$	0.117	0.007	0.117	0.007
$ ho_{98}$	1*	0.467	1*	0.523	$d_{\gamma}$	-0.605	0.115	-0.585	0.115
C <sub>0,78</sub>	-1.018	0.093	-0.990	0.093	$d_{ heta,78}$	-0.057	0.222	-0.024	0.223
C <sub>0,82</sub>	-0.898	0.114	-0.923	0.119	$d_{ heta,82}$	0.245	0.312	0.282	0.313
C <sub>0,86</sub>	-0.772	0.097	0.744	0.097	$d_{ heta,86}$	0.381	0.295	0.427	0.295
C <sub>0,90</sub>	-0.864	0.124	-0.775	0.124	$d_{ heta,90}$	-0.169	0.260	-0.107	0.262
C <sub>0,94</sub>	-0.871	0.091	-0.871	0.092	$d_{ heta,94}$	0.961	0.280	0.934	0.280
C <sub>0,98</sub>	-1.063	0.110	-0.992	0.118	$d_{ heta,98}$	0.881	0.347	0.881	0.349
C <sub>EC,78</sub>	0.078	0.112	0.080	0.111	$d_{EC,78}$	-0.023	0.117	-0.023	0.117
C <sub>EC,82</sub>	0.096	0.109	0.107	0.109	$d_{EC,82}$	0.015	0.132	0.015	0.133
C <sub>EC,86</sub>	0.066	0.094	0.048	0.094	$d_{EC,86}$	-0.146	0.110	-0.146	0.110
CEC,90	0.284	0.143	0.285	0.143	$d_{EC,90}$	-0.156	0.131	-0.149	0.131
CEC,94	0.023	0.101	0.031	0.101	$d_{EC,94}$	-0.404	0.121	− .0.408	0.121
C <sub>EC,98</sub>	-0.061	0.144	0.067	0.141	$d_{EC,98}$	0.152	0.156	0.153	0.156
$c_D$	0.493	0.074	0.485	0.074	$d_D$	-0.833	0.081	-0.816	0.081
CID	0.603	0.083	0.604	0.083	$d_{ID}$	-0.880	0.094	-0.860	0.094
$C_l$	0.946	0.093	0.931	0.093	$d_l$	-1.265	0.104	-1.242	0.105
CIR	1.408	0.087	1.386	0.086	$d_{lR}$	-0.712	0.099	0.691	0.100
CR	1.433	0.082	1.418	0.082	$d_R$	-0.780	0.091	-0.760	0.091
CSR	1.892	0.094	1.862	0.094	$d_{SR}$	-0.114	0.103	-0.103	0.103
C <sub>DEM</sub>	0.683	0.066	0.685	0.066	$d_{DEM}$	-0.260	0.085	-0.269	0.085
CREP	0.636	0.067	0.631	0.067	$d_{REP}$	-0.343	0.087	-0.348	0.087

Note: Maximum-likelihood estimates and standard errors. *A boundary-constrained parameter. Pooled NES Post-Election Survey data, 1978–1998; n= 9639 cases. Log-likelihood values: coordinating model, -6824.7; nonstrategic model, -6825.4.

the 10,954 respondents in all the NES data, 1315 were omitted due to missing or invalid data. 16

MODEL ESTIMATES AND RESULTS OF TESTS OF COORDINATION

The coordinating and nonstrategic models produce similar results. Maximum-likelihood estimates (MLE) and standard errors (SE) for the parameters of the models, using observed attribute specifications (2a)–(2c), (5a)–(5c), and (6a)–(6c) are listed in Table 1.<sup>17</sup>

 $^{16}$  In the NES data,  $\zeta_i$  is the number of eligible adults in each household, multiplied by a time-series weight in 1994. We rescaled each number of adults and time-series weight variable to give each a mean of 1.0 over the whole of each survey sample. By year, the NES variables are as follows: 38; 53; 14; 29; 6, 58; and 980035.

All the parameters that have the same interpretation in both models have statistically indistinguishable estimates. The MLEs for  $c_{EC}$  are near zero for every year except 1990, suggesting that for the most part retrospective economic evaluations do not affect choices between candidates. 18 Except for 1994, the MLEs for  $d_{EC}$ are statistically insignificant, so that retrospective evaluations also have no systematic effect on the choice not to vote. The MLEs for the party identification dummy variables show the familiar effects of party identification on candidate choices and turnout. The MLEs for  $c_{DEM}$  and  $c_{REP}$  point to a substantial incumbent advantage, while the MLEs for  $d_{DEM}$  and  $d_{REP}$  show that the probability of voting is lower when an incumbent is running for reelection. Greater subjective political efficacy, higher education, greater age, being married, and having lived longer at one's current residence all increase the loss from not voting and so increase the probability of voting. An elector who does not report at

&lt;sup>17</sup> Over all years for the coordinating model, the percentage correctly classified by "predicting" for each observation the choice that has the highest probability using the parameter MLEs is 67.3% (by year, 64.2, 66.4, 68.2, 68.7, 66.7, and 70.1%), and the average probability of the choice actually made is 0.57 (by year, 0.54, 0.56, 0.58, 0.59, 0.56, and 0.59).

&lt;sup>18</sup> The 95% confidence interval for  $c_{EC,90}$ , computed as in Table 2, is (-0.001, 0.558).

TABLE 2. Ninety-Five Percent Confidence Intervals for  $\alpha$

	Lower	Upper
Parameter	Bound	Bound
$\alpha_{78}$	0.157	0.787
$\alpha_{82}$	0*	0.423
$\alpha_{86}$	0.348	0.775
$\alpha_{90}$	0*	0.196
$\alpha_{94}$	0*	0.127
α98	0.007	0.541

Note: Estimates are based on tabulation of an asymptotic mixture distribution of the kind derived by Self and Liang (1987), under the hypothesis that  $\alpha_{90} = \alpha_{94} = \rho_{78} = 0$  and  $\rho_{86} = \rho_{90} = \rho_{98} = 1$ . \*A boundary-constrained value.

least one complete set of policy position values ( $\gamma_i = 0$ ) is significantly more likely not to vote than an elector who does report policy positions. For 1994 and 1998, electors who have higher values of  $\theta_i$  are significantly more likely to vote than electors who have lower values of  $\theta_i$ : conservative electors were especially mobilized in those elections.

The coordinating model passes the tests of the conditions necessary for coordinating behavior. The LR test statistics for the constraint  $\alpha=1$ , imposed separately for each year, reject the constraint in every year. <sup>19</sup> The 95% confidence intervals listed in Table 2 support the same conclusions. <sup>20</sup> Regarding the other conditions, 95% confidence intervals computed as in Table 2 show q (1.28, 1.81) and  $b_C$  (1.10, 1.90) to be positive and bounded well away from zero.

The MLEs for the nonstrategic model do not support the theory of nonstrategic institutional balancing. Only two of the six MLEs for  $\alpha$  ( $\hat{\alpha}_{78}$  and  $\hat{\alpha}_{86}$ ) are statistically distinguishable from zero;  $\hat{\alpha}_{82} = \hat{\alpha}_{90} = \hat{\alpha}_{94} = \hat{\alpha}_{98} = 0$ . Rather than moderating, the estimates suggest that in most years electors are making direct choices between the parties' alternative policies.

While the log-likelihood of the coordinating model (-6824.7) is not much greater than that of the non-strategic model (-6825.4), Vuong's (1989) overlapping models test nonetheless rejects the nonstrategic model as an alternative to the coordinating model. The MLEs and SEs in Table 1 clearly reject both  $b_C = 0$  and  $b_{NS} = 0$ . Using the distribution of Vuong (1989, Eq. 6.4), the test statistic is  $n^{-1/2}LR_n/\hat{\omega}_n = 4.3$  (p < .0001).<sup>21</sup>

MODERATION, INSTITUTIONAL BALANCING, AND THE MIDTERM CYCLE

In the coordinating model, every elector anticipates a postelection policy that is intermediate between the parties' positions, unless  $\alpha=1$ . The coordinating model MLEs for  $\alpha$  are less than 0.5 in every year except 1986 (see Table 1), suggesting that electors expected the president to be weaker than the House in determining postmidterm policy. The estimates for  $\hat{H}$  show that the position of the House was expected to be closer to the Democratic position in 1978, 1982, 1986, and 1990 and closer to the Republican position in 1994 and 1998.<sup>22</sup>

The systematic foundation for a midterm cycle in the coordinating model is that the equilibrium Republican House vote share each elector expects at the time of the presidential election is no longer an equilibrium once the identity of the president becomes known. The postelection disequilibrium decreases the probability that each elector votes for a House candidate of the president's party. The aggregation of such changes is the cycle-generating mechanism.

Does the coordinating model's moderating mechanism, which is based on  $\lambda_i$ , generate a midterm cycle? For a baseline measure of the effect policy-related incentives have on choices in the presidential election year preceding each midterm, we use Mebane's (2000, Table 7) estimates of the proportion of presidentialyear voters for whom each combination of presidential and House choices would minimize expected policyrelated losses.<sup>23</sup> Consider the proportion of voters in a presidential election who would minimize their expected policy-related losses by voting for a House candidate of the same party as the new president. There is a policy-related foundation for a midterm cycle if that proportion is greater than the proportion of voters in the subsequent midterm who would minimize their policy-related losses by voting for a candidate of the same party as the president. Table 3 shows that such a pattern occurs for all six midterm elections, although the decline from 1996 to 1998 is considerably smaller than for the other years.<sup>24</sup>

It is doubtful, however, whether most of the change in votes from presidential election to midterm is due purely to the postelection disequilibrium that the disappearance of uncertainty about the identity of the president brings about. Simulation using presidential-year NES data and Mebane's (2000) coordinating voting model suggests that immediately after the presidential election, due solely to the identity of the new president having become known, the equilibrium proportion of

&lt;sup>19</sup> By year, the LR statistics  $-2(L_{\rm constrained}-L)$  and associated significance probabilities are 13.2 (p<0.001), 35.2 (p<0.0001), 12.0 (p<0.01), 28.6 (p<0.0001), 53.3 (p<0.0001), and 26.7 (p<0.0001). The significance probability is the upper-tail probability for the  $\chi_1^2$  distribution under the null hypothesis  $\alpha=1$ , using the method of Davies (1987, Eq. 3.4) to adjust for the nuisance parameter  $\rho$ .

&lt;sup>20</sup> Table 1 shows  $\alpha_{90}$ ,  $\alpha_{94}$ ,  $\rho_{78}$ ,  $\rho_{86}$ ,  $\rho_{90}$ , and  $\rho_{98}$  to have MLEs equal to either 0.0 or 1.0, on boundaries of the parameter space. We bootstrap (20,000 resamples) the score vectors of the MLEs in Table 1 to estimate the quantiles of the asymptotic distribution implied by the hypothesis that  $\alpha_{90} = \alpha_{94} = \rho_{78} = 0$  and  $\rho_{86} = \rho_{90} = \rho_{98} = 1$ , which is a mixture of 64 censored multivariate normal distributions (Self and Liang 1987) and, hence, estimate the confidence intervals in Table 2. <sup>21</sup>  $LR_n = 16.50197$  (Vuong 1989, Eq. 3.1) and  $\hat{\omega}_n^2 = 0.0014981 - 0.0017120^2 = 0.0014952$  (Vuong 1989, Eq. 4.2). We compute both  $LR_n$  and  $\hat{\omega}_n^2$  with adjustments for sampling weights.

&lt;sup>22</sup> By year,  $\hat{H}$  and  $\hat{V}$  computed using the parameter MLEs in Table 1 and 1978–1998 NES data are as follows: 0.393, 0.477; 0.437, 0.550; 0.418, 0.481; 0.373, 0.439; 0.544, 0.558; 0.524, and 0.455.

 $<sup>^{23}</sup>$  From Mebane's (2000) Table 7 coordinating model results we sum the percentages with choices RR and DR to get the percentage for whom choosing a Republican House candidate minimizes the expected policy-related loss, and we sum the percentages with choices DD and RD to get the percentages for whom choosing a Democrat minimizes the loss.

 $<sup>^{24}</sup>$  By midterm year, the decreases shown in Table 3 are 0.167, 0.229, 0.206, 0.124, 0.278, and 0.028.

TABLE 3. House Vote Choices that Minimize Policy-Related Losses, by Year

Midtorm	President's	Presi	Preceding Presidential Year <sup>a</sup>		dterm dinating odel <sup>b</sup>
Year	Party	D	 	U
1978	D	0.500	0.500	0.333	0.667
1982	R	0.337	0.663	0.566	0.434
1986	R	0.593	0.407	0.799	0.201
1990	R	0.337	0.663	0.461	0.539
1994	D	0.635	0.365	0.357	0.643
1998	D	0.544	0.456	0.516	0.484

Note: Entries show the proportion of voters in each year for whom a vote for a House candidate of the indicated party is associated with a smaller policy-related loss than is a vote for the other party. Midterm entries are computed using the parameter MLEs in Table 1 and 1978–1998 NES data. Each observation is weighted by the sampling weight  $1/\zeta_i$ .

<sup>a</sup> Proportion of voters in the preceding presidential election year for whom the indicated House candidate choice minimizes the expected policy-related loss according to the coordinating voting model estimates of Mebane (2000, Table 7).

<sup>b</sup> Of voters with  $\gamma_i = 1$  and  $w_{Ci} \neq 0$ , the proportion under D have  $w_{Ci} > 0$  and the proportion under R have  $w_{Ci} < 0$ .

House votes for the new president's party typically falls by values ranging from about 0.01 to about 0.06.<sup>25</sup> The simulated loss is substantially smaller than the corresponding decrease in policy-related support for the president's party shown in Table 3 for each midterm year except 1998. Other factors that change between the presidential and the midterm elections are modulating the magnitude of the policy-related midterm losses. Such factors include the fact that the president is usually expected to have less influence on policy after midterm than after the preceding presidential election.<sup>26</sup> The form of each elector's evaluation of the policy-related losses also changes: at midterm an elector's evaluation of  $\lambda_i$  does not depend on the elector's retrospective evaluation of the economy, as it does in presidential election years.<sup>27</sup> And between elections parties may change their policy positions, or voters may change their ideal points, and substantively different policies come into play.

SURGE AND DECLINE

The theory of surge and decline suggests a possible reason for the relationship between voters' most preferred policies and the policy positions they attribute to the parties to change in a systematic way between the presidential and the midterm elections. According to the theory, during the heightened mobilization of presidential elections more electors with marginal political involvement turn out to vote than during midterm elections, and this group disproportionately votes for the party of the winning presidential candidate (Campbell 1966). Campbell's (1987) revised theory treats midterm as a return to a normal partisan vote, less influenced by short-run concerns than the presidential election. He writes, "Surge of interest and information in presidential elections will affect the turnout of peripheral partisans and the vote choice of independents" (p. 968). Born (1990, 642, note 30) raises serious doubts about those revisions.

 $^{25}$  The simulation consists of recomputing the choice probabilities of Mebane's (2000) empirical coordinating model with  $\bar{P}$  set equal to 0 or 1 depending on which party actually won the presidency in each election. By presidential year, 1976–1996, the losses for the new president's party are 0.011, 0.060, 0.015, 0.035, 0.043, and 0.058.

<sup>27</sup> Recall footnote 3.

Perhaps the surge of marginal electors who, according to the theory, vote for House candidates of the same party as the presidential winner do so because they like that party's policy position better than the other party's policy position. The posited midterm decline in their turnout should have two major effects. On average, midterm voters should tend to have policy ideal points that are farther from the president's party than presidential-year voters do, and midterm nonvoters should tend to have policy ideal points that are closer to the president's party than presidential-year nonvoters do. We show that NES data from the elections of 1976 through 1998 do not support the existence of such a surge and decline mechanism.

For most electors, turnout at midterm is only weakly related to expected policy-related losses. In the empirical coordinating model, the policy-related loss expected by elector i affects the probability that i does not vote  $(\mu_{i,A})$  via  $w_{Ci}$ . We assess the effect that policy-related losses have on midterm turnout by computing the effect on  $\mu_{i,A}$  of setting  $w_{Ci} = 0$  for each i in the midterm NES data. By midterm year, 1978–1998, the median differences between  $\mu_{i,A}$  using the original  $w_{Ci}$  value and  $\mu_{i,A}$  with  $w_{Ci} = 0$  are -0.0000017, -0.0017, -0.00047, -0.0014, -0.0018, and -0.0011. The median differences always have a smaller magnitude for Independents than for other electors. Such small effects will usually be dominated by other factors, such as partisanship per se, that much more strongly affect the probability of not voting.

Nonetheless it may be that midterm voters see themselves as farther from the president's party on policy than presidential-year voters do, while midterm nonvoters see themselves as closer to the policy of the presidential winner's party than do presidential-year nonvoters. To compare the policy proximities, we use the coordinating model parameter estimates of Mebane (2000) to compute ideal points ( $\theta_i$ ) and party policy positions ( $\theta_{Di}$  and  $\theta_{Ri}$ ) for both voters and nonvoters in the NES data for each presidential election year from 1976 through 1996. We define a voter to be anyone who reports having voted for either the

&lt;sup>26</sup> The upper bounds of the 95% confidence intervals for  $\alpha$ , in Table 2, are smaller than the lower bounds of the 95% confidence intervals that Mebane (2000, Table 4) reports for  $\alpha_D$  or  $\alpha_R$  for the winning presidential candidate for all years except 1984. The interval for  $\alpha_{R,84}$ , (0.34, 0.79), is virtually the same as the interval for  $\alpha_{86}$  in Table 2, suggesting that voters believed that Reagan's influence on policy remained about the same throughout his second term.

&lt;sup>28</sup> The medians include only observations that have  $\gamma_i = 1$ .

&lt;sup>29</sup> For Independent Independents the medians are 0, -0.00003, 0, 0, -0.00002, and -0.00041.

Democrat or the Republican in the House race and a nonvoter to be anyone who does not report such a vote. We include only those who report at least one complete set of policy position values. For each elector i we compute the absolute difference between i's ideal point and the position of the party that won the presidential election. The absolute difference is  $|\theta_i - \theta_{Di}|$  if the Democrat won the election and  $|\theta_i - \theta_{Ri}|$  if the Republican won.

Each panel in Fig. 1 displays for each year the median of the absolute differences for a different set of electors. Figure 1a shows the medians for all voters and nonvoters, and the remaining panels show the medians for each of the seven NES types of party identifiers. Among all voters (Fig. 1a) the median absolute difference between each voter's ideal point and the position the voter attributes to the presidential winner's party is always greater at midterm than it is during the preceding presidential election year. But in every case except 1992–1994, the median absolute difference is also greater at midterm among all nonvoters. The pattern among nonvoters does not match what surge and decline theory predicts.

The closest match to the pattern predicted by the surge and decline theory occurs among Independent Independents (Fig. 1b), but even there the support for surge and decline is weak at best. In 1978, 1990, and 1994 there are decreases at midterm in the median absolute difference among nonvoters. But in the remaining three midterms the median absolute difference increases from the preceding presidential year among nonvoters. Moreover, in 1990 the median absolute difference decreases among voters. There is hardly any support for surge and decline in the data for Independent Democrats and Independent Republicans (Figs. 1e and 1f). Among nonvoters there are nine instances where the median absolute difference increases at midterm and only three instances where it decreases at midterm. Moreover, among Independent Democrats there are two instances (1990 and 1998) where the median absolute difference for voters decreases at midterm and among Independent Republicans there is one instance (1998).

Instead of the pattern that the surge and decline theory predicts, what we see is that typically both voters and nonvoters are farther from the policy of the president's party at midterm than they were at the time that the party won the presidency in the preceding election. Nonvoters are somewhat more likely than voters are to be closer to the president's party at midterm, but the difference is not regular enough for surge and decline to be a compelling explanation.

Surge and decline theory also asserts that some regular voters deviate from their partisan affiliation during the presidential elections and vote for House candidates of the presidential winner's party, but return to their normal partisan vote at midterm (Born 1990, 635). The insignificant effects ( $c_{EC}$ ) we estimate retrospective economic evaluations have on choices between candidates may partly account for that. In Mebane (2000), the corresponding parameters  $(c_{H1})$  are significant in four of the six presidential years. Presidential-year deviations prompted by economic evaluations tend to disappear at midterm.

MODERATION BY CHANGES IN POLICY POSITIONS

Figure 1 shows that the absolute difference between electors' ideal points and the policy positions of the party that won the presidential election usually increases at midterm. Figure 1 is a bit one-sided, however, because it summarizes the relationship between electors' ideal points and only one party's policy positions, but the expected policy-related losses that affect vote choices depend on both parties' policies.

To assess the components of change it is important to consider not merely the magnitudes but also the directions in which the aggregate of voters moves with respect to the parties. Consider a situation in which all voters think the Democratic party policy position is left of the Republican party position, i.e.,  $\theta_{Di} < \theta_{Ri}$ for all voters i. We may characterize the aggregate movement across elections in terms of two median statistics: the median difference between ideal points and Democratic positions, denoted  $med_i(\theta_i - \theta_{Di})$ , and Republican positions, denoted  $med_i(\theta_i - \theta_{Ri})$ . Let  $\Delta_D = \operatorname{med}_i^M(\theta_i - \theta_{Di}) - \operatorname{med}_i^P(\theta_i - \theta_{Di})$  denote the difference between the median policy difference with respect to the Democratic party at midterm and the median difference in the preceding presidential year. If  $\Delta_D < 0$ , then at midterm voters have ideal points more to the left of the positions they attribute to the Democratic party than in the preceding presidential year and, other things equal, a greater proportion vote for Democratic candidates at midterm than in the preceding presidential year. If  $\Delta_D > 0$ , then midterm voters have ideal points more to the right of Democratic party positions, and a smaller proportion vote for Democratic candidates at midterm. Analogously let  $\Delta_R = \operatorname{med}_i^M(\theta_i - \theta_{Ri}) - \operatorname{med}_i^P(\theta_i - \theta_{Ri})$  denote the difference between midterm and the preceding presidential year of the policy differences with respect to the Republican party. If  $\Delta_R > 0$ , then midterm voters have ideal points more to the right of Republican party positions, and Republican candidates receive a greater proportion of votes at midterm than in the preceding presidential year. If  $\Delta_R < 0$ , then Republican candidates receive a smaller proportion of votes at midterm. Because  $\theta_i$ ,  $\theta_{D_i}$ , and  $\theta_{Ri}$  vary independently, all combinations of positive and negative values for  $\Delta_D$  and  $\Delta_R$ are possible.

Of particular interest are circumstances in which  $\Delta_D$  and  $\Delta_R$  are either both positive or both negative. If  $\Delta_D > 0$  and  $\Delta_R > 0$ , then between elections the distribution of voters' ideal points has moved to the right relative to both parties' positions. Other things equal, Republican House vote share  $\bar{H}$  increases. If a Democrat is president, the result is a kind of policy moderation: policy outcomes are expected to be closer to the midterm Republican position.<sup>31</sup> If  $\Delta_D < 0$  and  $\Delta_R < 0$ , then between elections the distribution of voters' ideal points has moved to the left relative to both parties' positions, the Republican House vote share decreases, and if a Republican is president, there is moderation of expected policy toward the midterm Democratic position.

&lt;sup>30</sup> Voters and nonvoters by year are as follows: 982, 887; 802, 551; 1,099, 617; 940, 725; 1,244, 841; and 996, 600.

Moderation via such a pattern of changes occurs in five of the six midterm elections from 1978 through 1998, according to NES data. Using NES data to compute the median differences between ideal points and the parties' positions, it is necessary to adjust for the fact that some voters place the Democratic party policy position to the right of the Republican party position: for some voters,  $\theta_{Di} > \theta_{Ri}$ . Because moderation refers to movement from one party toward the other and does not depend on the orientation with which each voter interprets its ideal point and the parties' positions, we use the sign of the difference between  $\theta_{Ri}$  and  $\theta_{Di}$  to orient all voters the same way. We compute  $\operatorname{med}_{i}^{M}[(\theta_{i}-\theta_{Di})\operatorname{sgn}(\theta_{Ri}-\theta_{Di})]$  and  $\operatorname{med}_{i}^{M}[(\theta_{i}-\theta_{Ri})\operatorname{sgn}(\theta_{Ri}-\theta_{Di})]$  for each midterm year and analogous quantities for each presidential year. In Fig. 2 we plot the values for all voters who report at least one complete set of policy position values (as in Fig. 1) and, in separate panels, for party identifier subsets. The interelection differences are now:

$$\Delta_D = \operatorname{med}_i^M[(\theta_i - \theta_{Di})\operatorname{sgn}(\theta_{Ri} - \theta_{Di})] - \operatorname{med}_i^P[(\theta_i - \theta_{Di})\operatorname{sgn}(\theta_{Ri} - \theta_{Di})],$$

$$\Delta_R = \operatorname{med}_i^M[(\theta_i - \theta_{Ri})\operatorname{sgn}(\theta_{Ri} - \theta_{Di})] - \operatorname{med}_i^P[(\theta_i - \theta_{Ri})\operatorname{sgn}(\theta_{Ri} - \theta_{Di})].$$

The sign of each  $\Delta_D$  and  $\Delta_R$  value is indicated by the slope of the line that joins each presidential-year median to the succeeding midterm median.

Figure 2a shows that among all voters, in every midterm except 1998 there is moderation based on interelection changes in the location of voters' ideal points relative to the parties' positions.<sup>32</sup> In 1978 and 1994, with Democratic presidents, we have  $\Delta_D > 0$  and  $\Delta_R > 0$ , and in 1982, 1986, and 1990, with Republican presidents, we have  $\Delta_D < 0$  and  $\Delta_R < 0$ . In 1998 there is a Democratic president but nonetheless  $\Delta_D < 0$  and  $\Delta_R < 0$ : Democrats' House vote share was pushed up, because between 1996 and 1998 the distribution of voters' ideal points shifted to the left relative to both parties' positions. The pattern of interelection changes is similar across all of the partisan subsets and within each subset is by and large similar to the pattern among all voters, except for 1988-1990. Between 1988 and 1990 we have  $\Delta_R < 0$  among all voters but within each partisan subset  $\Delta_R > 0$ . The reason for the difference is that a higher proportion of voters identified as Democrats and a lower proportion as Republicans in 1990 than in 1988,<sup>33</sup> and  $(\theta_i - \theta_{Ri}) \operatorname{sgn}(\theta_{Ri} - \theta_{Di})$  is more negative among Democratic voters than among Republican voters.

The moderating pattern associated with having either a Democratic president,  $\Delta_D > 0$  and  $\Delta_R > 0$ , or a Republican president,  $\Delta_D < 0$  and  $\Delta_R < 0$ , differs from the mechanism of disappearing uncertainty, but the fluctuations in policy positions may relate to the idea that parties may commit to policies different from their ideal policies. Alesina and Rosenthal (1995, 127–36) report that in such an extension of their model parties often announce policies that are more polarized than their ideal policies are. Polarization increases as the president's power  $(\alpha)$  falls. As we mentioned previously, voters usually believe that the president will be more powerful before midterm than afterward. Alesina and Rosenthal (1995) do not examine models in which α changes at midterm, but we may speculate that with the parties possibly changing their positions at midterm—there would be a tendency for polarization to increase at midterm.

The NES data from 1976 through 1998 support the idea that polarization is greater at midterm. Among voters, the median absolute difference between the parties' positions is smaller in the presidential election than at midterm in five of the six pairs of elections (the exception is 1988–1990).<sup>34</sup> The interelection changes in the median absolute differences are, however, small compared to the observed magnitudes of  $\Delta_D$  and  $\Delta_R$ . These results are only suggestive because by construction our measures of party positions are within the unit interval [0, 1] in every year.

The changes  $\Delta_D$  and  $\Delta_R$  may also arise because voters learn something after the presidential election. They may learn more about what a party's true policy position is, about a policy position's consequences. or about elected officials' competence to implement the policy. Any of these may be a reason for a voter to update the relationship between the voter's ideal point and the positions the voter attributes to the parties. A party's actions either in the presidency or in Congress may be informative. Perhaps, for instance, the Democrat-favoring changes shown in Fig. 2 for 1996 to 1998 stem from judgments that Republicans in the House were especially incompetent or extreme.<sup>35</sup> The unanswered question is, Why are movements away from the president's party more typical. Why do electors not learn more often that the president's party is more competent or less extreme than they previously thought?

 $<sup>^{31}</sup>$  This assumes that  $\alpha$  does not increase after midterm (recall footnote 26).

<sup>32</sup> The pattern of changes is similar among nonvoters.

&lt;sup>33</sup> In 1988 the proportions identifying as Strong Democrats, Democrats, Republicans, and Strong Republicans were 0.20, 0.16, 0.14, and 0.20. In 1990 the proportions were 0.28, 0.18, 0.14, and 0.14.

&lt;sup>34</sup> By pairs of elections, the  $\text{med}_i | \theta_{Ri} - \theta_{Di} |$  values are as follows: 1976–1978, 0.20 and 0.21; 1980–1982, 0.33 and 0.39; 1984–1986, 0.36 and 0.45; 1988–1990, 0.33 and 0.29; 1992–1994, 0.37 and 0.41; and 1996–1998, 0.34 and 0.36.

&lt;sup>35</sup> The July 1997 plot to remove Newt Gingrich as Speaker revealed disarray among the Republican House leadership. Gingrich resigned shortly after the 1998 election. Polls during 1998 showed that most voters disliked the Republican effort to impeach the president (e.g., Pew Research Center 1998).

One of the difficulties of explaining why moderation by policy position changes occurs is that our policy position measures are based on the gaps between electors' ideal points and the perceived positions of the two major parties. Across elections, we cannot distinguish between movement in electors' ideal points and movement in the positions of the political parties. For example, notwithstanding the polarization argument, it is possible that a party in office follows policies more extreme than it proposed at election time. Electors may learn this and consequently the gap between the president's party and the electors increases at midterm because electors' perceptions of the parties change. With our data we cannot distinguish such a pattern from one in which electors change their ideal points because they learn more about policies' consequences.

Moderation by policy position changes may explain the pattern that was the original focus of the negative voting variant of surge and decline. Beyond turnout and coattails effects, there is an additional midterm loss apparently due to "public disappointments with the incumbent presidential party's performance" (Campbell 1991, 483). Tufte (1975) measures this phenomenon by a decline in presidential approval that usually occurs in the first two years of an administration. Born (1990, Table 4) measures the same phenomenon by changes in feeling thermometer scores. The usual pattern of interelection changes in policy positions would cause such changes in approval and in feeling thermometers.

CONCLUSION

The NES data strongly confirm the strategic theory of policy moderation. The estimated parameters of the coordinating model satisfy all of the conditions necessary to describe coordinating behavior. The nonstrategic model fails to describe policy-moderating behavior and fits the data significantly worse than does the coordinating model. Coordination also affects decisions whether to vote, but the effects on turnout probabilities are typically small.

Midterm loss is in part caused by policy moderation that occurs because uncertainty about which party will control the presidency disappears after the presidential election. But the mechanism of disappearing uncertainty does not itself explain why midterm losses are as large as they are nor why midterm losses occur as frequently as they do.

The largest source of loss of support for the president's party at midterm is a regularly repeated pattern in which by midterm the median differences between voters' ideal points and the parties' policy positions have become less favorable for the president's party than they were at the time of the presidential election (the same pattern occurs among nonvoters). Such a pattern occurs in all five of the interelection periods during 1976–1998 after which the president's party suffered a midterm loss. Between 1996 and 1998 the pattern reverses: The distribution of voters' ideal points and party positions becomes more favorable to the Democratic party notwithstanding the fact that Democrat Bill Clinton is president, to such an extent that on the whole the Democrats enjoyed a small midterm gain in 1998

The policies involved in the interelection changes are not limited to macroeconomic policy. Indeed, only in 1980 do the NES survey items we use to measure ideal points and party positions include scales that refer to macroeconomic policy. The interelection changes we document involve a wide range of policies, and the composition of the set of policies changes over time. Nonetheless, changes go in the same direction—away from the president's party—during five of the six interelection periods our data cover. Why the changes typically cut against the president's party is not clear. The dynamic is not explained by variations in turnout.

Our finding that strategic coordination exists shows that the reach of the incentives the constitutional separation of powers creates extends beyond officials to electors. The separation of powers causes electors to attend to one another and make choices that help produce moderate policy outcomes. It is important to keep clear that in moderation via noncooperative coordinating equilibrium, no one has a taste for moderation per se. It is not that coordinating electors are committed to divided government because of a sincere commitment to "cognitive Madisonianism" (Ladd 1990, 67; Sigelman et al. 1997). Each elector always most prefers his or her own ideal point. Moderation occurs only as a collective outcome due to electors' mutual strategic adjustments.

APPENDIX

Coordinating Model Details

Let  $\vartheta_{Di}$ ,  $\vartheta_{Ri}$ ,  $\vartheta_{PDi}$ , and  $\vartheta_{PRi}$  denote values in the interval [0,1] that elector  $i,i=1,\ldots,N$ , believes are the positions of the Democratic party  $(\vartheta_{Di})$ , Republican party  $(\vartheta_{Ri})$ , and, as relevant, Democratic president  $(\vartheta_{PDi})$  or Republican president  $(\vartheta_{PRi})$ , where 0 represents the extreme liberal position and 1 represents the extreme conservative. Likewise i's ideal point  $\theta_i \in [0,1]$ . We define $$\theta_{Di} = \begin{cases} \rho \vartheta_{PDi} + (1 - \rho) \vartheta_{Di}, \\ & \text{if Democrat is president,} \\ \vartheta_{Di}, & \text{if Republican is president,} \end{cases}$$

(A1)

$$\theta_{Ri} = \begin{cases} \vartheta_{Ri}, & \text{if Democrat is president,} \\ \rho \vartheta_{PRi} + (1 - \rho) \vartheta_{Ri}, & \text{if Republican is president,} \end{cases}$$ with  $0 \le \rho \le 1$ . Using  $\bar{R}_i$  to denote the proportion of electors i expects to vote nationally for Republicans and  $\bar{D}_i$  the proportion for Democrats, we have  $\bar{V}_i = \bar{R}_i + \bar{D}_i$  and  $\bar{H}_i = \bar{R}_i / \bar{V}_i$ . If  $\gamma_i = 1$ , then  $\bar{R}_i$ ,  $\bar{H}_i$ , and  $\lambda_i$  each has one of three
(A2)

If  $\gamma_i=1$ , then  $R_i$ ,  $H_i$ , and  $\lambda_i$  each has one of three values, depending on whether i chooses the Republican  $(\bar{R}_{i,R}, \bar{H}_{i,R}, \lambda_{i,R})$ , chooses the Democrat  $(\bar{R}_{i,D}, \bar{H}_{i,D}, \lambda_{i,D})$ , or does not vote  $(\bar{R}_{i,A}, \bar{H}_{i,A}, \lambda_{i,A})$ . In particular,  $\bar{R}_{i,R}=\bar{R}_{i,D}+1/N=\bar{R}_{i,A}+1/N$  and, using  $\bar{V}_{i,V}=\bar{V}_{i,A}+1/N$  to denote the proportion of electors i expects to vote, including i,  $\bar{H}_{i,R}=\bar{R}_{i,R}/\bar{V}_{i,V}$ ,  $\bar{H}_{i,D}=\bar{R}_{i,D}/\bar{V}_{i,V}$ , and  $\bar{H}_{i,A}=\bar{R}_{i,A}/\bar{V}_{i,A}$ , so  $\bar{H}_{i,D}<\bar{H}_{i,A}<\bar{H}_{i,R}$ . If  $\gamma_i=0$ , then  $\lambda_{i,R}=\lambda_{i,D}=\lambda_{i,A}=0$ .

Based on  $\lambda_i$ , elector i prefers the Democrat to the Republican if  $\lambda_{i,R} - \lambda_{i,D} > 0$  and prefers not to vote if  $\lambda_{i,R} - \lambda_{i,A} > 0$  and  $\lambda_{i,D} - \lambda_{i,A} > 0$ . For N large and  $\bar{V}_{i,V}$  not near zero, we have the approximations  $\lambda_{i,R} - \lambda_{i,D} \approx (N\bar{V}_{i,V})^{-1} d\lambda_i/d\bar{H}_i$ ,  $\lambda_{i,R} - \lambda_{i,A} \approx (N\bar{V}_{i,A})^{-1} (1 - \bar{H}_{i,R}) d\lambda_i/d\bar{H}_i$ , and  $\lambda_{i,D} - \lambda_{i,A} \approx -(N\bar{V}_{i,A})^{-1} \bar{H}_{i,D} d\lambda_i/d\bar{H}_i$ , with  $d\lambda_i/d\bar{H}_i = w_{Ci}$ . The statement of i's strategy as

$$Y_i = \arg\min_{h \in K} (x_{i,h} + \epsilon_{i,h})$$
 (A3)

uses
$$(N\bar{V}_{i,A})^{-1}$$
  $(1 - \bar{H}_{i,R} + \bar{H}_{i,D}) = (N\bar{V}_{i,A})^{-1}$   $[1 - (N\bar{V}_{i,V})^{-1}] = (N\bar{V}_{i,V})^{-1}$ .

We make common knowledge assumptions similar to those of Mebane (2000). The parameters and the joint probability distribution of the variables in  $\tilde{\lambda}_i$ ,  $i=1,\ldots,N$ , are common knowledge. It is common knowledge that the distribution is all each i knows about the variables for every other elector  $j \neq i$  and that every i acts to minimize  $\tilde{\lambda}_i$  knowing the values of i's own variables. Consequently it is common knowledge that (A3) is every elector's choice rule.

For every elector i there is an ordered set  $Z_i$  that includes  $\gamma_i, \theta_i, \vartheta_{Di}, \vartheta_{Ri}, \vartheta_{PDi}$  or  $\vartheta_{PRi}, z_{i,D}, z_{i,R}$ , and  $z_{i,A}$ .  $Z_i$  takes values in a set  $\bar{Z}$ . The vector  $\epsilon_i = (\epsilon_{i,D}, \epsilon_{i,R}, \epsilon_{i,A})'$  is independent of  $Z_i$  and identically and independently distributed across electors with a generalized extreme value (GEV) distribution denoted  $F_H$ . Each elector is in one of  $M \ll N$  sets  $E_k, k=1,\ldots,M$ ; set  $E_k$  has  $M_k$  electors and  $\sum_{k=1}^M M_k = N$ .  $Z_i$  is distributed independently across i, and for every  $i \in E_k, Z_i$  has probability measure  $f_k$  with  $\int_Z df_k(Z_i) = 1$  and  $\int_Z Z_i df_k(Z_i)$  finite.  $\bar{Z}$ ,  $F_H$ , M, and all  $M_k$  and  $f_k$  are common knowledge.

Because many of the costs (or benefits) of voting are the same regardless of which candidate an elector prefers, we assume that  $\epsilon_{i,R}$  and  $\epsilon_{i,D}$  covary but are independent of  $\epsilon_{i,A}$ . Using where  $v_{i,h} = \exp\{-x_{i,h}\}$ , we define  $F_H(x_{i,D}, x_{i,R}, x_{i,A}) = \exp\{-G_i\}$ . If  $\epsilon_{i,R}$  and  $\epsilon_{i,D}$  are independent, then  $\tau = 0$ . If  $\bar{H}_{i,D}$ ,  $\bar{H}_{i,R}$ ,  $\bar{V}_{i,A}$ , and  $Z_i$  are known but  $\epsilon_i$  is known only to have distribution  $\exp\{-G_i\}$ , then (A3) implies choice probabilities

$$G_i = \left(v_{i,D}^{1/1-\tau} + v_{i,R}^{1/1-\tau}\right)^{1-\tau} + v_{i,A}, \qquad 0 \le \tau < 1,$$
 (A4)

$$\mu_{i,h} \equiv \Pr(Y_i = h \mid \bar{H}_{i,D}, \bar{H}_{i,R}, \bar{V}_{i,A}, Z_i) = \frac{v_{i,h}}{G_i} \frac{\partial G_i}{\partial v_{i,h}},$$

$$h \in K, \qquad (A5)$$

(McFadden 1978; Resnick and Roy 1990). The common knowledge probabilities for  $i \in E_k$  are

$$\bar{\mu}_{k,h} \equiv \Pr(Y_i = h \mid i \in E_k, \bar{H}_{i,D} = \bar{H}_{i,R} = \bar{H}, \bar{V}_{i,A} = \bar{V})$$

$$= \int_{\mathcal{Z}} \mu_{i,h} df_k(Z_i), \qquad h \in K. \tag{A6}$$

Using  $\bar{\mu}_{k,h}$ , the proportions of electors expected to vote for Republican and Democratic candidates given only the common knowledge are  $\bar{R} = N^{-1} \sum_{k=1}^{M} M_k \bar{\mu}_{k,R}$  and  $\bar{D} = N^{-1} \sum_{k=1}^{M} M_k \bar{\mu}_{k,D}$ . An argument similar to Mebane's (2000) Theorem 2 proves the existence of a fixed point  $(\bar{H}, \bar{V})$ .  $\bar{\mu}_{k,h}$  denotes  $\bar{\mu}_{k,h}$  for k such that  $i \in E_k$ . Theorem 1 holds when N and each  $M_k$  are large. Proof is similar to that of Theorem 1 of Mebane (2000).

When a candidate runs unopposed, we assume that each elector in the affected district uses the strategy defined by (A3), except conditioning on the pair of choices that are available. Elector i conditions on the choice set  $\{D, A\}$  if a Democrat is running unopposed and on  $\{R, A\}$  if a Republican is running unopposed. The respective choice probabilities are

$$\mu_{i,h|\{D,A\}} \equiv \Pr(Y_i = h \mid \bar{H}_{i,D}, \bar{V}_{i,A}, Z_i, K = \{D, A\})$$

$$= \begin{cases} \frac{\mu_{i,A}}{\mu_{i,A} + \mu_{i,D}}, & h = A, \\ \frac{\mu_{i,D}}{\mu_{i,A} + \mu_{i,D}}, & h = D, \\ 0, & h = R, \end{cases}$$

$$\mu_{i,h|\{R,A\}} \equiv \Pr(Y_i = h \mid \bar{H}_{i,R}, \bar{V}_{i,A}, Z_i, K = \{R, A\})$$

$$= \begin{cases} \frac{\mu_{i,A}}{\mu_{i,A} + \mu_{i,R}}, & h = A, \\ \frac{\mu_{i,R}}{\mu_{i,A} + \mu_{i,R}}, & h = R, \\ 0, & h = D \end{cases}$$ where  $\mu_{i,h}$  is defined by (A5). Integrating over unknown data as in (A6), it is straightforward to redefine  $\bar{R}$  and  $\bar{D}$  and characterize equilibrium as in Theorem 1, with only minor changes.

Survey Data Model Details

Given  $Z_i$  and parameter values, we use (A5) to compute choice probabilities  $\hat{\mu}_{i,\hat{n}}$ . Let  $S_{\{D,R,A\}}$  denote the subsample in districts with a fully contested race,  $S_{\{D,A\}}$  the subsample with an unopposed Democrat, and  $S_{\{R,A\}}$  the subsample with an unopposed Republican. Given sampling weights  $1/\zeta_i$  and values  $\hat{\mu}_{i,h}$ , we compute

$$\hat{R} = \left(\sum_{i \in \mathcal{S}_{[D,R,A]}} \frac{\hat{\mu}_{i,R}}{\zeta_i} + \sum_{i \in \mathcal{S}_{[R,A]}} \frac{\hat{\mu}_{i,R[\{R,A]}}{\zeta_i}\right) / \left(\sum_{i=1}^n 1/\zeta_i\right),$$

$$\hat{D} = \left(\sum_{i \in \mathcal{S}_{[D,R,A]}} \frac{\hat{\mu}_{i,D}}{\zeta_i} + \sum_{i \in \mathcal{S}_{[D,A]}} \frac{\hat{\mu}_{i,D[\{D,A]}}{\zeta_i}\right) / \left(\sum_{i=1}^n 1/\zeta_i\right)$$

$$\hat{V} = \hat{R} + \hat{D}, \quad \text{and} \quad \hat{H} = \hat{R}/\hat{V}.$$

In (2a)–(2c),  $b_C$  equals  $N^{-1}$  divided by the standard deviation of the elements of the unstandardized GEV disturbance.<sup>37</sup> We reparameterize (A4) to decrease the correlation between the estimate  $\hat{\tau}$  and the estimates of the parameters of  $x_{i,D}$  and  $x_{i,R}$ :<sup>38</sup>

$$G_i = (v_{i,D} + v_{i,R})^{1-\tau} + v_{i,A}, \qquad 0 \le \tau < 1.$$
 (A7)

Given  $T \ge 1$  samples  $S_t$  with subsets  $S_{\{D,R,A\}t}$ ,  $S_{\{D,A\}t}$ , and  $S_{\{R,A\}t}$ , the log-likelihood function is Because  $\vec{H}_{i,R}$ ,  $-\vec{H}_{i,D} = (N\vec{V}_{i,V})^{-1} > 0$  and  $N\vec{V}_{i,V}$  is large,  $\lambda_{i,R} - \lambda_{i,D} = (\vec{H}_{i,R} - \vec{H}_{i,D})(\lambda_{i,R} - \lambda_{i,D})/(\vec{H}_{i,R} - \vec{H}_{i,D}) \approx (N\vec{V}_{i,V})^{-1}d\lambda_i/d\vec{H}_i$ . The other two approximations follow from  $\vec{H}_{i,R} - \vec{H}_{i,A} = (1 - \vec{H}_{i,R})/(N\vec{V}_{i,A})$  and  $\vec{H}_{i,D} - \vec{H}_{i,A} = -\vec{H}_{i,D}/(N\vec{V}_{i,A})$ .

&lt;sup>37</sup> NES survey respondents may overreport the frequency with which they vote. Slight inflation in  $\hat{V}$  should induce slight inflation in  $\hat{b}_C$ , via the ratio  $\hat{b}_C/\hat{V}$ .

 $b_C$ , via the ratio  $b_C/\hat{V}$ .

38 Using (A4), correlations between  $\hat{\tau}$  and parameter estimates in  $z_{i,D}$  and  $z_{i,R}$  approach -1 as  $\tau \to 1$  for parameters that have positive values and 1 for parameters that are negative.

$$L = \sum_{t=1}^{T} \left( \sum_{t \in S_{[D,R,A]t}} \sum_{h \in K} y_{i,h} \log \mu_{i,h} + \sum_{i \in S_{[D,A]t}} \sum_{h \in [D,A]} y_{i,h} \log \mu_{i,h|\{D,A\}} + \sum_{t \in S_{[R,A]t}} \sum_{h \in [R,A]} y_{i,h} \log \mu_{i,h|\{R,A\}} \right),$$ where  $y_{i,h} = 1$  if  $Y_i = h$  and  $y_{i,h} = 0$  if  $Y_i \neq h$ ,  $h \in K$ . The estimation algorithm is similar to that of Mebane (2000), with each year's  $(\hat{H}, \hat{V})$  values recomputed at each iteration. If the model is correct and a stability condition (Mebane 2000, 43–4) is satisfied, the algorithm converges to parameter estimates and  $(\hat{H}, \hat{V})$  values that characterize the choices electors make in equilibrium.

$$(A8)$$

REFERENCES

- Abramowitz, Alan I. 1985. "Economic Conditions, Presidential Popularity, and Voting Behavior in Midterm Congressional Elections." Journal of Politics 47 (February): 31–43.
- Abramson, Paul R., and John H. Aldrich. 1982. "The Decline of Electoral Participation in America." American Political Science Review 76 (September): 502–21.
- Adams, John. [1805] 1973. Discourses on Davila: A Series of Papers on Political History. New York: Da Capo Press.
- Alesina, Alberto, and Howard Rosenthal. 1989. "Partisan Cycles in Congressional Elections and the Macroeconomy." American Political Science Review 83 (June): 373–98.
- Alesina, Alberto, and Howard Rosenthal. 1995. Partisan Politics, Divided Government, and the Economy. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Alesina, Alberto, and Howard Rosenthal. 1996. "A Theory of Divided Government." Econometrica 64 (November): 1311–41.
- Alesina, Alberto, John Londregan, and Howard Rosenthal. 1993. "A Model of the Political Economy of the United States." American Political Science Review 87 (March): 12–33.
- Arcelus, Francisco, and Allan H. Meltzer. 1975. "The Effect of Aggregate Economic Variables on Congressional Elections." American Political Science Review 69 (December): 1232–9.
- Balch, George I. 1974. "Multiple Indicators in Survey Research: The Concept 'Sense of Political Efficacy." Political Methodology 1 (2): 1–43.
- Bartels, Larry M. 1996. "Uninformed Votes: Information Effects in Presidential Elections. American Journal of Political Science 40 (February): 194–230.
- Bloom, Howard S., and H. Douglas Price. 1975. "Voter Response to Short-Run Economic Conditions: The Asymmetric Effect of Prosperity and Recession." American Political Science Review 69 (December): 1240–54.
- Born, Richard. 1990. "Surge and Decline, Negative Voting, and the Midterm Loss Phenomenon: A Simultaneous Choice Analysis." American Journal of Political Science 34 (August): 615– 45.
- Born, Richard. 1991. "Assessing the Impact of Institutional and Election Forces on Evaluations of Congressional Incumbents." Journal of Politics 53 (August): 764–99.
- Brady, Henry, and Paul M. Sniderman. 1985. "Attitude Attribution: A Group Basis for Political Reasoning." American Political Science Review 79 (December): 1061–78.
- Bryce, James. [1888] 1995. The American Commonwealth. Indianapolis: Liberty Fund.
- Campbell, Angus. 1966. "Surge and Decline: A Study of Electoral Change." In Elections and the Political Order, eds. Angus Campbell, Philip E. Converse, Warren E. Miller and Donald E. Stokes. New York: Wiley. Pp. 40–62.
- Campbell, Angus, and Warren E. Miller. 1957. "The Motivational Basis of Straight and Split Ticket Voting." American Political Science Review 51 (June): 293–312.

- Campbell, Angus, Philip E. Converse, Warren E. Miller, and Donald E. Stokes. 1960. The American Voter. New York: John Wiley & Sons.
- Campbell, James E. 1987. "The Revised Theory of Surge and Decline." American Journal of Political Science 31 (November): 965– 79.
- Campbell, James E. 1991. "The Presidential Surge and Its Midterm Decline in Congressional Elections, 1868–1988." Journal of Politics 53 (May): 477–87.
- Carey, George W. 1978. "Separation of Powers and the Madisonian Model: A Reply to the Critics." American Political Science Review 72 (March): 151-64.
- Converse, Philip E. 1964. "The Nature of Belief Systems in Mass Publics." In Ideology and Discontent, ed. David E. Apter. New York: Free Press. Pp. 206-61.
- Converse, Philip E. 1966. "The Concept of a Normal Vote." In Elections and the Political Order, eds. Angus Campbell, Philip E. Converse, Warren E. Miller and Donald E. Stokes. New York: Wiley. Pp. 9–39.
- Cover, Albert D. 1986. "Presidential Evaluations and Voting for Congress." American Journal of Political Science 30 (November): 786-801.
- Davies, Robert B. 1987. "Hypothesis Testing When a Nuisance Parameter Is Present Only Under the Alternative." Biometrika 74 (March): 33-43.
- Delli Carpini, Michael K., and Scott Keeter. 1996. What Americans Know About Politics and Why It Matters. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Erikson, Robert S. 1988. "The Puzzle of Midterm Loss." Journal of Politics 50 (November): 1012–29.
- Erikson, Robert S. 1990. "Economic Conditions and the Congressional Vote: A Review of the Macrolevel Evidence." American Journal of Political Science 34 (May): 373-99.
- Eubank, Robert B. 1985. "Incumbent Effects on Individual-Level Voting Behavior in Congressional Elections: A Decade of Exaggeration." Journal of Politics 47 (August): 958–67.
- Eubank, Robert B., and David John Gow. 1983. "The Pro-Incumbent Bias in the 1978 and 1980 National Election Studies." American Journal of Political Science 27 (February): 122–39.
- Fiorina, Morris P. 1978. "Economic Retrospective Voting in American National Elections: A Micro-Analysis." American Journal of Political Science 22 (May): 426-43.
- Fiorina, Morris P. 1988. "The Reagan Years: Turning to the Right or Groping Toward the Middle." In The Resurgence of Conservatism in Anglo-American Democracies, eds. Barry Cooper, Allan Kornberg, and William Mishler. Durham, NC: Duke University Press. Pp. 430–59.
- Fiorina, Morris P. 1992. Divided Government. New York: Macmillan. Fiorina, Morris P., and Kenneth A. Shepsle. 1989. "Is Negative Voting an Artifact?" American Journal of Political Science 33 (May): 423–30
- Gow, David John, and Robert B. Eubank. 1984. "The Pro-Incumbent Bias in the 1982 National Election Study." American Journal of Political Science 28 (February): 224–30.
- Green, Donald P., and Ian Shapiro. 1994. Pathologies of Rational Choice Theory: A Critique of Applications in Political Science. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Habermas, Jürgen. [1981] 1984. The Theory of Communicative Action, Vol. 1, trans. Thomas McCarthy. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Habermas, Jürgen. [1981] 1987. The Theory of Communicative Action, Vol. 2, trans. Thomas McCarthy. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Habermas, Jürgen. [1964] 1989. The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere: An Inquiry into a Category of Bourgeois Society, trans. Thomas Burger. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press.
- Jacobson, Gary C. 1989. "Strategic Politicians and the Dynamics of U.S. House Elections, 1946–86." American Political Science Review 83 (September): 773–93.
- Kernell, Samuel. 1977. "Presidential Popularity and Negative Voting: An Alternative Explanation of the Midterm Congressional Decline of the President's Party." American Political Science Review 71 (March): 44-66.
- Ladd, Carl E. 1990. "Public Opinion and the 'Congress Problem.'" Public Interest 100 (Summer): 57-67.
- McFadden, Daniel. 1978. "Modelling the Choice of Residential Location." In Spatial Interaction Theory and Planning Models, eds.

- Anders Karlqvist, Lars Lundqvist, Folke Snickars and Jörgen W. Weibull. New York: North-Holland. Pp. 75–96.
- McKelvey, Richard D., and Peter C. Ordeshook. 1985a. "Elections with Limited Information: A Fulfilled Expectations Model Using Contemporaneous Poll and Endorsement Data as Information Sources." Journal of Economic Theory 36 (June): 55–85.
- McKelvey, Richard D., and Peter C. Ordeshook. 1985b. "Sequential Elections with Limited Information." American Journal of Political Science 29 (August): 480–512.
- Mebane, Walter R., Jr. 2000. "Coordination, Moderation and Institutional Balancing in American Presidential and House Elections." American Political Science Review 94 (March): 37-57.
- Miller, Arthur H. 1979. "Normal Vote Analysis: Sensitivity to Change Over Time." American Journal of Political Science 23 (May): 406–25.
- Miller, Warren E., and National Election Studies. 1979. American National Election Study, 1978 [computer file]. Ann Arbor: Center for Political Studies, University of Michigan. (Original producer. 1st ICPSR ed. Ann Arbor, MI: Inter-university Consortium for Political and Social Research [producer and distributor].)
- Miller, Warren E., and National Election Studies. 1983. American National Election Study, 1982: Post-Election Survey File [computer file]. Ann Arbor: Center for Political Studies, University of Michigan. (Original producer. 1st ICPSR ed. Ann Arbor, MI: Inter-university Consortium for Political and Social Research [producer and distributor].)
- Miller, Warren E., and National Election Studies. 1987. American National Election Study, 1986 [computer file]. Ann Arbor: Center for Political Studies, University of Michigan. (Original producer. 2nd ICPSR ed. Ann Arbor, MI: Inter-university Consortium for Political and Social Research [producer and distributor].)
- Miller, Warren E., Donald R. Kinder, Steven J. Rosenstone, and National Election Studies. 1992. American National Election Study, 1990: Post-Election Survey [computer file]. Ann Arbor, MI: Center for Political Studies, University of Michigan. (Original producer. 2nd ICPSR ed. Ann Arbor, MI: Inter-university Consortium for Political and Social Research.)

- Pew Research Center for the People and the Press. 1998. "Most Foresee Embarrassment, Not Impeachment: Americans Unmoved by Prospect of Clinton, Lewinsky Testimony," August 4. http://www.people-press.org/aug1rpt.htm (accessed May 17, 2001).
- Resnick, Sidney, and Rishin Roy. 1990. "Multivariate Extremal Processes, Leader Processes and Dynamic Choice Models." Advances in Applied Probability 22 (2): 309–31.
- Rosenstone, Steven J., Warren E. Miller, Donald R. Kinder, and National Election Studies. 1995. American National Election Study, 1994: Post-Election Survey [Enhanced with 1992 and 1993 Data] [computer file]. Ann Arbor: Center for Political Studies, University of Michigan. (Original producer. 2nd ICPSR ed. Ann Arbor, MI: Inter-university Consortium for Political and Social Research [producer and distributor].)
- Sapiro, Virginia, Steven J. Rosenstone, and National Election Studies. 1999. American National Election Study, 1998: Post-Election Survey, ICPSR version [computer file]. Ann Arbor, MI: Center for Political Studies, University of Michigan [producer]; Inter-university Consortium for Political and Social Research [distributor].
- Scheve, Kenneth, and Michael Tomz. 1999. "Electoral Surprise and the Midterm Loss in U.S. Congressional Elections." British Journal of Political Science 29 (July): 507–21.
- Self, Steven G., and Kung-Yee Liang. 1987. "Asymptotic Properties of Maximum Likelihood Estimators and Likelihood Ratio Tests Under Nonstandard Conditions." Journal of the American Statistical Association 82 (June): 605–10.
- Sigelman, Lee, Paul J. Wahlbeck, and Emmett H. Buell, Jr. 1997.
  "Vote Choice and the Preference for Divided Government: Lessons of 1992." American Journal of Political Science 41 (July):
  879-94
- Tufte, Edward R. 1975. "Determinants of the Outcomes of Midterm Congressional Elections." American Political Science Review 69 (September): 812–26.
- Vuong, Quang H. 1989. "Likelihood Ratio Tests for Model Selection and Non-Nested Hypotheses." Econometrica 57 (March): 307–33

Political Regimes and International Trade: The Democratic Difference Revisited

XINYUAN DAI University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

And the aggregate trade barriers agreed upon by a democratic pair lower than those by a pair composed of a democracy and an autocracy? I revisit these important questions by highlighting some problematic aspect of the analysis by Mansfield, Milner, and Rosendorff (2000). Contrary to their central conclusion, I find that whether the aggregate trade barriers are lower for a democratic pair than those for a mixed pair depends on the preferences of the decision makers involved. Thus, although domestic political institutions are important, they alone are insufficient to predict a higher level of cooperation among democracies.

trade policy? In particular, are groups of democracies better able to liberalize trade than groups of autocracies or groups composed of both democracies and autocracies? To address these questions, Mansfield, Milner, and Rosendorff (2000) analyze a take-it-or-leave-it (TILI) bargaining game, in which they compare the aggregate trade barriers agreed upon by democratic pairs with those by autocratic pairs and by mixed pairs.

To distinguish democracies from autocracies, Mansfield, Milner, and Rosendorff (2000) (hereafter MMR) argue that the chief executive in a democracy needs the approval of a legislative majority to enact a trade policy, while an autocrat does not. MMR accordingly solve the TILI games played by democratic pairs, by autocratic pairs, and by mixed pairs. Their central proposition is that, due to the institutional difference between democracies and autocracies, democratic pairs tend to agree upon lower trade barriers than mixed pairs regardless of the preferences of the decision makers.

I highlight some problematic aspect of MMR's analysis. When considering a TILI offer to a democracy (by either a democracy or an autocracy), MMR's solution is not optimal for the executive making the offer. I revise MMR's solutions for the TILI offers made to democracies and, accordingly, recalculate the aggregate trade barriers within democratic pairs, within autocratic pairs, and between a democracy and an autocracy. I find that the aggregate trade barriers within democratic pairs are always higher than what MMR predict. Accordingly, whether the aggregate trade barriers are lower for democratic pairs than those for mixed pairs depends on the preferences of the decision makers involved. This result contrasts with MMR's central proposition that, regardless of the preferences of the decision makers, democracies agree upon lower trade barriers than mixed pairs.

Xinyuan Dai is Assistant Professor of Political Science, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, Urbana, IL 61801-3696 (xdai@uiuc.edu). An earlier version of this paper was presented at Merriam Laboratory for Analytic Political Research, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. For helpful comments, I thank William Bernhard, Brian Gaines, Bernard Grofman, Hao Li, Robert Pahre, Michel Regenwetter, Duncan Snidal, and Pieter van Houten, as well as the Editor of the Review and the anonymous reviewers.

I begin by summarizing the setup of the MMR model. I then explain how MMR's solutions for TILI offers to democracies are not best replies and I provide alternative solutions. Based on these solutions, I recalculate the aggregate trade barriers and conclude that no clearcut comparison can be drawn without considering the preferences of the decision makers involved.

ASSUMPTIONS IN THE MMR MODEL

MMR consider the setting of trade barriers between two countries, "home" and "foreign." Either country can be an autocracy, with only an executive A, or a democracy, with both an executive P and a legislature C. The notation * refers to the foreign country. The ideal level of trade barriers at home and abroad for each actor i is denoted  $(t_i, t_i^)$ . All actors in one country prefer the elimination of trade barriers in the other country; that is,  $t_i^ = 0$  for i = P, C, A, and  $t_i = 0$  for  $i = P^$ ,  $C^$ ,  $A^$ . Each actor's utility function is assumed to be a simple loss function, and thus the actors aim to minimize the distance between the TILI solution  $(t, t^)$  and their own ideal point  $(t_i, t_i^*)$ .

$$U_i(t, t^*) = -(t - t_i)^2 - t^{2},$$ for  $i = P, A, C$  in the home country; (1) $U_i(t, t^) = -t^2 - (t^* - t_i^)^2,$ for  $i = P^, C^, A^$  in the foreign country.

When there is no trade agreement, each country is free to set the trade barriers in its own country. In an autocracy, the executive sets the level of domestic trade barriers. In a democracy, the legislature is assumed to have the final say on the level of domestic trade barriers. Each actor simply maximizes his or her utility function as in Eqs. (1) and (1*). The no-agreement equilibria are  $N_{AA^} = (t_A, t_{A^}^)$ ,  $N_{DA^} = (t_C, t_{A^}^)$ ,  $N_{A^D} = (t_{A^}^, t_C)$ , and  $N_{DD^} = (t_C, t_{C^}^)$ , respectively.

These no-agreement equilibria are not welfare maximizing. MMR thus consider a perfect information bargaining game in which countries coordinate their trade policies. MMR analyze two bargaining structures. In one, the home country makes a TILI offer to the foreign country; in the other, the foreign country makes a TILI offer to the home country.

In the TILI game—suppose that the home country is the first mover—the sequence of moves is assumed to be as follows. First, the home executive makes an offer that specifies reduced levels of home and foreign trade barriers. Second, all relevant decision makers either accept the offer or reject it. If all relevant decision makers accept the offer, it becomes policy. If any relevant decision maker rejects the offer, policy remains at the no-agreement point.

Who are the relevant decision makers, after a TILI offer is made? Again, suppose that the home executive makes the TILI offer. If both countries are autocracies. the foreign executive alone decides whether to take the offer or not. If the home country is a democracy and the foreign country an autocracy, then both the home legislature and the foreign executive must decide whether or not to accept the offer. If the home country is an autocracy and the foreign country a democracy, then both the executive and the legislature in the foreign country must decide either to take the offer or to leave it. If both the home and the foreign countries are democracies, then the offer must be acceptable to the foreign executive as well as the two legislatures to avoid a trade war. All decision makers are assumed never to take any dominated strategy.

MMR further assume that the structure of preferences in countries with similar political regimes is symmetric. That is,  $t_A = t_{A^}^$ ,  $t_P = t_{P^}^$ , and  $t_C = t_{C^}^$ . Furthermore, in a democracy, the legislature is assumed to be more protectionist than the executive, i.e.,  $t_P < t_C$  and  $t_{P^}^ < t_{C^}^$ .

SOLUTIONS FOR TILI OFFERS TO DEMOCRACIES

MMR's solution for a TILI offer to a democracy is not the optimal strategy for the executive making the offer. MMR's Figures 2 and 3, reproduced here as Figures 1 and 2, illustrate their key solutions. In these figures,  $I_C$ ,  $I_C$ ,  $I_A$ , and  $I_{A^}$  are the indifference curves through the no-agreement points for actors C,  $C^$ , A, and  $A^$ , while  $I_P$  and  $I_{P^}$  are the indifference curves through the no-agreement points for actors P and  $P^*$ .

In Figure 1, when the home democratic executive P makes a TILI offer to the foreign autocracy, MMR identify the optimal solutions. However, when the foreign autocrat  $A^$  makes a TILI offer to the home democracy, MMR's solution  $m^$  is not optimal for the foreign autocrat. Rather, a TILI offer at  $M^*$  maximizes the utility of the foreign autocrat. Explanations follow.

Because both the home executive P and the home legislature C can veto an offer, an acceptable offer must lie within the win set formed by the indifference curves

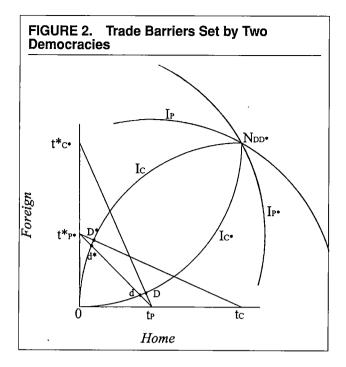

FIGURE 1. Trade Barriers Set by an Autocracy and a Democracy. (A) A protectionist autocracy: I<sub>A*</sub> binds. (B) A moderate autocracy. (C) A liberal autocracy: I<sub>C</sub> binds.

 $I_P$  and  $I_C$  through the no-agreement point  $N_{DA^}$ . The optimal strategy for the foreign autocrat  $A^$  is thus to propose the point in the win set closest to his or her own ideal point  $(0, t_{A^}^)$ . This point is  $M^$ , not  $m^$ . At point  $M^$ , the binding indifference curve  $I_C$  is tangent to the foreign autocrat's indifference curve through  $M^$ . Thus the distance from  $M^$  to the foreign executive's ideal point  $(0, t_{A^}^)$  is smaller than that from any other point in the win set (including point  $m^$ ) to  $(0, t_{A^}^)$ . In other words, a rational foreign autocrat can achieve a higher utility by proposing  $M^$  rather than MMR's solution  $m^$ . Note also that a TILI offer at  $M^*$  is acceptable to both the home executive and the home legislature, for it provides both higher utilities than would no agreement.

&lt;sup>1</sup> To prove their propositions, MMR also require that  $t_C > 2t_P$  and  $t_{C^}^ > 2t_{P^}^$ . I keep all their assumptions except these, because they are more constraining than necessary. Note, just the same, that the fact that my conclusion differs from MMR's cannot be attributed to the relaxation of these assumptions. It is, rather, due to a mistake in MMR that I identify in the next section.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Graphically,  $m^$  is outside of the circle going through  $M^$  with  $(0, t_{A^}^)$  as the center. Thus the distance from  $m^$  to  $(0, t_{A^}^)$  is longer than the radius, which is the distance from  $M^$  to  $(0, t_{A^}^)$ .

Likewise, MMR's solution for the TILI offer from a democracy to a democracy is not optimal for the democratic executive making the offer. In Figure 2, MMR's solutions d and  $d^$  for the TILI offers between democracies are both suboptimal for the executives making the offers, because alternative TILI offers at D and  $D^$  actually maximize the executives' utilities.

In sum, MMR's solutions d and  $d^$  in Figure 2 as well as  $m^$  in Figure 1 are not best replies to the executive's and legislature's strategies of accepting any offer that gives at least as much as the status quo. A rational executive making the TILI offer to a democracy is in fact better off proposing D,  $D^$ , and  $M^$ , respectively. Furthermore, the latter revised solutions will be accepted because all actors fare at least as well with them as with no agreement.

TRADE BARRIER COMPARISONS

How does this revision affect the main result in MMR? The most striking result in MMR is that, although the comparison of the aggregate trade barriers for the autocratic pair and those for either the democratic or the mixed pair depends on the preferences of the decision makers, the comparison of the aggregate trade barriers for the democratic pair and those for the mixed pair does not. In contrast, I find that the comparison of the aggregate trade barriers for the democratic pair and those for the mixed pair also depends on the preferences of the decision makers. That is, when the problematic aspect of MMR's analysis is revised, their central proposition—that aggregate trade barriers are lower within democratic pairs than within mixed pairs—no longer holds.

PROPOSITION. Under TILI, whether the aggregate trade barriers are lower for the democratic pair than those for the mixed pair depends on the preferences of the decision makers involved.

Figure 3 intuitively shows why this is the case. D and  $D^$  mark the TILI solutions for two democracies.  $M_{prot}$ ,  $M_{mod}$ , and  $M_{lib}$  mark the solutions when a home democracy makes a TILI offer to a protectionist, a moderate, and a liberal foreign autocracy.  $M_{prot}^$ ,  $M_{mod}^$ , and  $M_{lib}^$ mark the solutions when a protectionist, a moderate, and a liberal foreign autocracy make a TILI offer to a home democracy. Clearly, the aggregate trade barriers for the democratic pair at  $D^$  are lower than those for the mixed pair at  $\hat{M}_{prot}^$ , because  $t + t^$  at  $D^ < t + t^$  at  $M_{prot}^$ . On the other hand, the aggregate trade barriers for the democratic pair at D are higher than those for the mixed pair at  $M_{mcd}$ , because  $t + t^$  at  $D > t + t^ = t_P$ at  $M_{mod}$ . In short, the aggregate trade barriers for a democratic dyad are sometimes lower but sometimes higher than those for a mixed pair.

The reason that this result differs from MMR's central proposition is as follows. Because the legislature is assumed to be more protectionist than the executive in a democracy, the optimal solution for the TILI offer made to a democracy lies on the contract curve between the executive making the offer and the legislature (not the executive) in the democracy receiving the offer. By stipulating, instead, that the TILI solution be on the contract curve between the two executives, MMR understimate the aggregate trade barriers for the democratic pair invariably to be  $t_P$ . As I show in Lemma 2, the aggregate trade barriers for the democratic pair at either D or  $D^*$  are always higher than  $t_P$ .

I present a proof in the Appendix. Propositions 1 and 2 correspond to Propositions 1 and 2 in MMR's Appendix. These propositions compare the aggregate trade barriers for the democratic pair and those for the mixed pair, with a home offer and a foreign offer, respectively. For both bargaining structures I identify the conditions under which the aggregate trade barriers for the democratic pair are higher than those for the mixed pair, and the conditions vice versa.

In Proposition 1, I compare the aggregate trade barriers reached by a pair of countries in two situations: when a home democracy makes a TILI offer to a foreign democracy (democratic pair) and when a home democracy makes a TILI offer to a foreign autocracy (mixed pair). I find that, only when the autocrat is either extremely protectionist (i.e.,  $t_{A^{\bullet}}^* \geq t_C$ ) or extremely liberal (i.e.,  $t_{A^{\bullet}}^* \leq [(t_C - t_P)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]t_C$ ) are the aggregate trade barriers for the mixed pair as high as or higher than those for the democratic pair. Under all other conditions (i.e.,  $t_C > t_{A^{\bullet}}^* > [(t_C - t_P)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]t_C$ ), including when the autocrat is moderately protectionist, moderate, or moderately liberal, the aggregate trade barriers for the democratic pair are actually higher than those for the mixed pair.

In Proposition 2, I compare the aggregate trade barriers reached by a pair of countries in the following two situations: when a foreign democracy makes a TILI offer to a home democracy (democratic pair) and when a foreign autocracy makes a TILI offer to a home democracy (mixed pair). The results are the following. When the autocrat is more protectionist than the democratic executive, the aggregate trade barriers for the mixed pair are higher than those for the democratic pair. However, when the autocrat is less protectionist than the democratic executive, the aggregate trade barriers for the democratic pair can be higher than those for the mixed pair.

Therefore, it is incorrect that "[a] democracy lowers its trade barriers more when it seeks mutually acceptable concessions with another democracy than when it deals with an autocracy, no matter what the relative preferences of the two leaders" (Mansfield, Milner, and Rosendorff 2000, 310). As in Figure 3, the home democratic executive proposes D to a foreign democracy but  $M_{prot}$  to a protectionist autocracy. In this case, the trade barriers for the home democracy are lower at  $M_{prot}$  with a foreign autocracy than at D with a foreign democracy. As the foreign autocracy gets more protectionist, the home democracy must lower its trade barriers even more in order to achieve a trade agreement. The preferences of the decision makers thus matter. Similarly, it is not true that "a protectionist legislature forces democracies to lower their trade barriers more than otherwise" (Mansfield, Milner, and Rosendorff 2000, 311). Assuming for a moment that two democratic executives bargain as if they were autocrats without protectionist legislatures, then the level of aggregate trade barriers they can agree on is  $t_P$ , which is always lower than the actual trade barriers between two democracies with protectionist legislatures.

Of course, the protectionist legislature matters. For instance, it enables a democracy to resist the pressure to overcompromise and thus enables it to get more favorable deals. This is consistent with the key insight in the two-level games (Putnam 1988) where domestic constraints can be beneficial in international bargaining.

In general, democracies can extract better deals with autocracies than autocracies can with democracies. As in Figure 3, when the home democratic executive makes a TILI offer to the foreign autocrat, the home democracy can drive the foreign trade barriers very low. In fact, except when the foreign autocrat is sufficiently protectionist that his or her indifference curve through the no-agreement point binds, the level of foreign trade barriers is  $t^* = 0$ . Of course, this has to do with the first-move advantage, but there is more to it. When the foreign autocracy has the first-move advantage, it does not fare nearly as well. In fact, the foreign autocrat must compromise sufficiently for not only the home democratic executive but also the home democratic legislature to accept an offer. As the foreign autocrat gets less protectionist, the offer he or she makes is more favorable to the home democracy.

This democratic advantage in the sense of extracting favorable deals can also be understood from another perspective. Compare  $M_{mod}^$  and  $D^$ , as in Figure 3, the TILI offer from the foreign moderate autocracy to the home democracy and the TILI offer from the foreign democracy to the home democracy. The former is much more compromising than the latter, because the existence of a protectionist legislature in the foreign democracy prevents it from over compromising.

The ability of a protectionist legislature to extract favorable deals, however, does not mean that the aggregate trade barriers for a democratic pair are necessarily lower than those for a mixed pair. Simply compare  $M_{mod}$  with D, as in Figure 3, the TILI offer from a home democracy to a foreign moderate autocracy and the TILI offer from a home democracy to a foreign democracy. Given certain preferences, the home democracy can much more effectively drive down the trade barriers of the foreign autocracy than those of the foreign democracy. At times, the home democracy can drive the foreign autocracy's trade barriers so low that their joint trade barriers are lower than what two democracies can agree upon. The comparison of the aggregate trade barriers for democracies and for mixed pairs is thus sensitive to preferences.

Also contingent on perferences are the comparison of the aggregate trade barriers between the autocratic pair and the democratic pair as well as the comparison between the autocratic pair and the mixed pair, as MMR acknowledge. My Proposition 3 differs from the corresponding result of MMR in that the autocrats can be more protectionist than the democratic executives, up to a certain level, before the level of the aggregate trade barriers for the autocrats exceeds that for the democrats. In particular, when the autocrats are as protectionist as the democratic executives, the aggregate trade barriers for the autocrats are lower than those for the democrats. Compared to the corresponding result in MMR, Proposition 4 holds that, for a wider range of preferences, the aggregate trade barriers for the autocratic pair are lower than those for the mixed pair.

MMR also explore whether a more or less divided government affects the level of trade barriers among democracies. Contrary to MMR, I find that the trade barriers within a democratic pair depend on the preferences of the legislatures.

In sum, given the current setup of the model, regime types do exert an important influence on the level of trade barriers negotiated internationally. But regime types alone are insufficient to claim that pairs of democracies should trade more freely than mixed pairs regardles of preferences. Just as the comparison of the aggregate trade barriers for autocratic pairs and those for either democratic or mixed pairs is inconclusive, the comparison of the aggregate trade barriers for democratic pairs and those for mixed pairs, too, depends on the preferences of the decision makers.

CONCLUSION

The central proposition derived by Mansfield, Milner, and Rosendorff (2000) from a TILI bargaining model is striking. Regardless of the preferences of the decision makers, pairs of democracies tend to agree upon lower trade barriers than pairs comprised of a democracy and an autocracy. My analysis shows that the important impact that MMR identify regarding the institutional arrangements also depends on the preferences of the political leaders within these institutions. Specifically, whether the aggregate trade barriers are lower for a democratic pair than for a mixed pair depends on the preferences of the decision makers, just as the comparison of the aggregate trade barriers for the autocratic pair and for either the democratic or the mixed pair.<sup>3</sup>

This reformulation contributes to the fascinating debate on "democratic difference," which is emerging from the sprawling literature on democratic peace. Although the theme of a "democratic difference" is increasingly being extended to a wide range of issue areas beyond international security, it is in some cases being sharply contested; for some interesting studies, see those by Morrow, Siverson, and Tabares (1998), Gowa (1999), Busch (2000), and Reinhardt (2000) on trade, Simmons (2000) on monetary commitments, Raustiala and Victor (1998) on environmental policies, and Slaughter (1995) and Alvarez (2001) on international law. The implication of this study is that domestic political institutions are important, but they alone are insufficient to predict a higher level of cooperation among democracies. To predict the impact of political institutions, it is also important to understand the preferences that go into the institutions.

APPENDIX

Here I list my results that differ from MMR's. Each corresponds to the result in MMR's Appendix with the same label. More detailed proofs can be obtained directly from the author.

LEMMA 2. When the home democracy makes a TILI offer to the foreign democracy, the agreement point is  $(t_C t_P / \sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}, t_C - t_C^2 / \sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2})$ , and the aggregate trade barriers are  $t_C - [(t_C - t_P) / \sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]t_C$ . Furthermore, the level of the aggregate trade barriers for the democratic pair is higher than what MMR predict, i.e.,  $t_C - [(t_C - t_P) / \sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]t_C > t_P$ .

Proof. In Figure 3, the home democratic executive P makes a TILI offer at D to the foreign democracy. To solve for the levels of trade barriers at D, we solve  $U_{C^}(t,t^)=U_{C^}(t_C,t_{C^}^)$ , given  $t^=-t(t_{C^}^/t_P)+t_{C^}^$ , and t,  $t^\geq 0$ . Given  $t_P=t_{P^}^$  and  $t_C=t_{C^}^*$ , we get the solution above. Note that  $t_C-[(t_C-t_P)/\sqrt{t_C^2+t_P^2}]t_C>t_P$ , given  $t_C>t_P$ .  $\square$

PROPOSITION 1. Under TILI (when home makes the offer), the comparison of the aggregate trade barriers for the democratic pair and those for the mixed pair depends on the preferences of the decision makers involved. Except for extreme cases, the aggregate trade barriers for the democratic pair are higher than those for the mixed pair.

&lt;sup>3</sup> MMR also provide an empirical test for their central proposition. The present paper does not directly address their test. Rather, it only demonstrates that the proposition that they support empirically does not hold analytically given their specified model.

Proof. Let  $B^D$  and  $B^M$  denote the aggregate barriers for the democratic pair and the mixed pair, respectively. With a home offer, from Lemma 2,  $B^D = t_C - [(t_C - t_P)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]t_C$ ; and from MMR's Lemma 3,  $B^M = t_A^* - [(t_A^* - t_P)/\sqrt{t_A^{} + t_P^2}]t_C$  if  $t_C^2 - t_P^2 < t_A^{}$ ,  $B^M = t_P$  if  $t_C^2 - t_P^2 \ge t_A^{} \ge (t_C - t_P)^2$ , and  $B^M = t_C - t_A^*$ , if  $t_A^{} < (t_C - t_P)^2$ .

(1) If  $t_C^2 - t_P^2 < t_A^{}$ ,  $B^D - B^M = t_C - [(t_C - t_P)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]t_C - t_A^* + [(t_A^* - t_P)/\sqrt{t_A^{} + t_P^2}]t_C$ . There are two cases. When  $t_A^* \ge t_C$ , and accordingly  $t_A^* > t_P$ , then  $t_A^* \ge t_C$ , and from  $t_C^2 - t_P^2 < t_A^{}$  we have  $t_C < \sqrt{t_A^{} + t_P^2}$ , then  $t_A^* > t_C$ .

(2) If  $t_C^2 - t_P^2 \ge t_{A^*}^{*2} \ge (t_C - t_P)^2$ , then  $B^D - B^M = t_C - [(t_C - t_P)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]t_C - t_P > 0$ .

(3) If  $t_{A^*}^{2} < (t_C - t_P)^2$ ,  $B^D - B^M = t_C - [(t_C - t_P)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]$   $t_C - t_C + t_{A^}^$ . There are again two possibilities. When  $t_{A^}^* > [(t_C - t_P)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]t_C$ , then  $B^D - B^M > 0$ . When  $t_{A^}^ \le [(t_C - t_P)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]t_C$ , then  $B^D - B^M \le 0$ .

PROPOSITION 2. Under TILI (when foreign makes the offer), the comparison of the aggregate trade barriers for the democratic pair and those for the mixed pair again depends on the preferences of the decision makers involved.

Proof. We first calculate  $B^D$  and  $B^M$ , respectively. Then we compare them.

Part 1. When the foreign democracy makes a TILI offer to the home democracy, the agreement point is  $(t_C - t_C^2/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}, t_C t_P/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2})$ , and the aggregate trade barriers are  $B^D = t_C - [(t_C - t_P)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]t_C$ .

As in Figure 3, the solution with the foreign offer is at point  $D^$ . The trade barriers for home and foreign at  $D^$  are reversed from those at D. By Lemma 2, this yields the result as in Part 1.

Part 2. When the foreign autocracy makes a TILI offer to the home democracy, the agreement point is  $(t_C - t_C t_{A^}^ / \sqrt{t_C^2 + t_{A^*}^{2}}, t_{A^}^{2} / \sqrt{t_C^2 + t_{A^}^{2}})$ , and the aggregate trade barriers are  $B^M = t_C - [(t_C - t_{A^}^) / \sqrt{t_C^2 + t_{A^}^{2}}]t_{A^}^*$ .

As in Figures 2A–C, to solve for the levels of trade barriers at  $M^$ , we solve  $U_C(t,t^)=U_C(t_C,t^_{A^})$ , given that  $t^*=-t(t^_{A^}/t_C)+t^_{A^}$ , and  $t,t^*\geq 0$ . This yields the result as in Part 2

Part 3. With  $B^D$  and  $B^M$  both solved,  $B^D - B^M = [(t_C - t_{A^}^)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_{A^*}^{2}}]t_{A^}^* - [(t_C - t_P)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]t_C$ . First, suppose that  $t_{A^}^ \ge t_P$ . Accordingly,  $[(t_C - t_{A^}^)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]t_C$ .

First, suppose that  $t_{A^}^ \ge t_P$ . Accordingly,  $[(t_C - t_{A^}^)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_{A^*}^{2}}]t_{A^}^* \le \sqrt{\frac{1}{2}}(t_C - t_{A^}^)$ . Furthermore,  $t_P < t_C \Longrightarrow [(t_C - t_P)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]t_C < -\sqrt{\frac{1}{2}}(t_C - t_P)$ . Therefore,  $B^D - B^M < 0$ .

Second, suppose that  $t_{A^}^ < t_P$ . The sign of  $B^D - B^M$  is indeterminant. It is possible that  $B^D > B^M$ , when the democratic executive gets sufficiently protectionist and/or the autocrat gets sufficiently liberal. For an example, let  $t_{A^}^ = 5$ ,  $t_P = 10$ , and  $t_C = 13$ ; then  $B^D - B^M = 0.49 > 0$ .

PROPOSITION 3. Under TILI (regardless of foreign or home offer), the comparison of the aggregate trade barriers for the autocratic dyad and those for the democratic dyad depends on the preferences of the decision makers involved. When the autocrats are equally protectionist as the democratic executives, the aggregate trade barriers for the autocrats are lower than those for the democrats.

Proof. Let  $B^D$  and  $B^A$  denote the aggregate barriers for the democratic dyad and the autocratic dyad, respectively. From Lemma 2 and Proposition 2,  $B^D = t_C - [(t_C - t_P)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]t_C$ . Given that  $t_A = t_A^*$ , it is straightforward that  $B^A = t_A$  as in MMR's Figure 1. Formally,  $B^A \leq B^D \iff t_A \leq t_C - [(t_C - t_P)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]t_C$ . Note that  $t_P < t_C - [(t_C - t_P)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]t_C$ . It is thus possible that  $t_A \in (t_P, t_C - [(t_C - t_P)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]t_C)$ . That is,  $B^A < B^D$  for some  $t_A > t_P$ . In particular, when  $t_A = t_P$ ,  $B^A < B^D$ .

COROLLARY. The aggregate trade barriers for the democratic dyad change as the legislatures become more (or less) protectionist.

Proof. By Proposition 2,  $B^D = t_C - [(t_C - t_P)/\sqrt{t_C^2 + t_P^2}]$   $t_C$ .  $B^D$  is a function of  $t_C$  and depends on  $t_C$ .

Proposition 4. Under TILI, the comparison of the aggregate trade barriers for the autocratic pair and those for the mixed pair depends on the preferences of the decision makers involved.

Proof. From Proposition 3,  $B^A=t_{A^}^$ . When a home democracy makes a TILI offer to a foreign autocracy, from MMR's Lemma 3,  $B^M=t_{A^}^-[(t_{A^}^-t_P)/\sqrt{t_{A^*}^{2}+t_P^2}]t_C$ , if  $t_C^2-t_P^2< t_{A^}^{2}$ ,  $B^M=t_P$  if  $t_C^2-t_P^2\geq t_{A^}^{2}\geq (t_C-t_P)^2$ , and  $B^M=t_C-t_{A^}^$  if  $t_{A^}^{2}< (t_C-t_P)^2$ . When the foreign autocracy makes a TILI offer to the home democracy, by Proposition 2,  $B^M=t_C-[(t_C-t_{A^}^)/\sqrt{t_C^2+t_{A^}^{2}}]t_{A^}^*$ .

Part 1. With a home offer,  $B^A \leq B^M \iff t_{A^}^ \leq t_P$ , if either  $t_C^2 - t_P^2 < t_{A^*}^{2}$  or  $t_C^2 - t_P^2 \geq t_{A^}^{2} \geq (t_C - t_P)^2$ , and  $B^A \leq B^M \iff 2t_{A^}^* \leq t_C$  if  $t_{A^*}^{2} < (t_C - t_P)^2$ . This contrasts with MMR's corresponding result that  $B^A - B^M \leq 0 \iff 2t_{A^}^* \leq t_C$ , which is sufficient but not necessary.

Part 2. With a foreign offer,  $B^A \leq B^M \iff t_{A^}^ \leq t_C$ . This differs from MMR's corresponding result that  $B^A \leq B^M \iff t_{A^}^ \leq t_C - t_p$ , which is again sufficient but not necessary.

REFERENCES

Alvarez, Jose E. 2001. "Do Liberal States Behave Better? A Critique of Slaughter's Liberal Theory." European Journal of International Law 12 (2): 183–247.

Busch, Marc L. 2000. "Democracy, Consultation and the Paneling of Disputes under GATT." Journal of Conflict Resolution 44 (August): 425-46.

Gowa, Joanne. 1999. Ballots and Bullets: The Elusive Democratic Peace, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Mansfield, Edward D., Helen V. Milner, and B. Peter Rosendorff. 2000. "Free to Trade: Democracies, Autocracies, and International Trade." American Political Science Review 94 (June): 305–21.

Morrow, James D., Randolph M. Siverson, and Tressa E. Tabares. 1998. "The Political Determinants of International Trade: The Major Powers, 1907–1990." American Political Science Review 92 (September): 649–61.

Putnam, Robert. 1988. "Diplomacy and Domestic Politics: The Logic of Two-Level Games." International Organization 42 (Summer): 427-60

Raustiala, Kal, and David G. Victor. 1998. "Conclusions." In The Implementation and Effectiveness of International Environmental Commitments: Theory and Practice, ed. David G. Victor, Kal Raustiala and Eugene Skolnikoff. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, Reinhardt, Eric. 2000. "Aggressive Multilateralism: The Determinants of GATT/WTO Dispute Initiation, 1948–1998." Emory University. Typescript.

Simmons, Beth. 2000. "International Law and State Behavior: Commitment and Compliance in International Monetary Affairs." American Political Science Review 94 (December): 819–35. Slaughter, Anne-Marie. 1995. "International Law and International Relations Theory: A Dual Agenda." European Journal of International Law 12 (2): 205–39.

Replication, Realism, and Robustness: Analyzing Political Regimes and International Trade

EDWARD D. MANSFIELD University of Pennsylvania HELEN V. MILNER Columbia University B. PETER ROSENDORFF University of Southern California

ur earlier article established that pairs of democracies trade more freely than country-pairs composed of a democracy and an autocracy (Mansfield, Milner, and Rosendorff 2000). Xinyuan Dai (2002) incorrectly asserts that our conclusion depends on the preferences of the decision makers who formulate trade policy. We show that Dai fails to accurately replicate our model, and hence erroneously claims that the new equilibria she deduces are consistent with it. In addition, we demonstrate that in altering one of our assumptions, Dai offers a model that is less realistic as well as inconsistent with the substantive literature on international bargaining. Finally, we question the robustness of her approach. Due to these problems of replication, realism, and robustness, we conclude that Dai's model is of limited utility.

ur article established that pairs of democracies trade more freely than (mixed) country pairs composed of a democracy and an autocracy (Mansfield, Milner, and Rosendorff 2000; hereafter MMR). Xinyuan Dai (2002) asserts that our conclusion depends on the preferences of the decision makers who formulate trade policy. Dai is incorrect. Her results differ from ours solely because she has changed a key assumption of the model. Given the stated assumptions of our model, each player's behavior in equilibrium is optimal and is a best reply.

It is often useful to debate the merits of a model's assumptions, and it is not surprising that altering the assumptions can affect a model's results. Dai, however, ignores one of our explicitly stated assumptions and fails to acknowledge that her results differ from ours as a consequence. Moreover, she never touches upon the relative merits of her assumption. But when choosing a modeling strategy, it is important to be attentive to the assumptions one uses, preferring those that are more realistic and result in more general conclusions. Dai's model suffers from serious problems in this regard, particularly because of its unrealistic assumptions about international economic negotiations. Furthermore, Dai offers no evidence about the robustness of her claims in contrast to our model. Finally, the empirical record lends greater support to our argument than Dai's, since we found strong evidence that democratic pairs have had more open trade relations than mixed pairs, irrespective of policy makers' preferences.

In the following sections, we elaborate on these problems of replication, realism, and robustness. First, we show that Dai fails to replicate our model faithfully and hence erroneously claims that the new equilibria she deduces are consistent with it. Second, we show that altering our assumption as Dai does yields a model that is less realistic and less consistent with the substantive literature on international bargaining. Third, we question the robustness of her approach. We conclude that her model is of limited utility. Not only does our model capture an important element of international economic negotiations missing in Dai's approach, but also it yields results that are robust and have empirical support.

CHANGING A KEY ASSUMPTION

Dai begins by attempting to replicate our model. Her effort, however, is seriously flawed because she fails to adopt one of our stated assumptions. Consequently, she produces a different model with some new equilibria that are inconsistent with our original approach.

Our purpose was to investigate the effects of regime type on international trade negotiations, conceived of as a "two-level game." In such situations, the international negotiators strike an agreement that may, depending on the nature of the regime, require domestic ratification before it can be implemented. As a first cut, we employed a take-it-or-leave-it (TILI) bargaining structure (which was relaxed later in the article) in which either the home or the foreign executive makes an offer that must be accepted or rejected by the other executive. Once accepted, and if necessary, the offer is brought home for domestic ratification by a player we called the legislature. If rejected, the players adopt their noncooperative Nash strategies. The preferences of the players are common knowledge and there is no private information.

The extensive form of our game was explicit. We specifically limited the action spaces of the international negotiators by assumption. Since the actors' indifference curves are circles around their ideal points, the Pareto frontier for the internatinal negotiators (i.e., the executives) is the straight line between their ideal points in tariff space (the straight line  $t_{p*}^*t_P$  in Figure 1 in the case of two democracies). In each game that we studied, the TILI offer must—by assumption—lie on the contract curve between the ideal points of the international negotiators. Dai, in contrast, makes no such assumption and so permits the action space to be the entire quadrant in (home and foreign) tariff space.

It is difficult to understand how there could be any confusion about our assumptions. In describing the TILI game, we explicitly stated that "we require that the international negotiators choose a ratifiable offer that lies on their Pareto frontier when such an agreement exists" (MMR, 308, fn. 9; emphasis added). We reiterated this point in our discussion of negotiations between a democratic executive, P, and a foreign autocrat.  $A^$ : "Recall that P is required to offer to  $A^$  a point on their Pareto frontier" (MMR 310, fn. 11; emphasis added). In the Appendix, the assumption was given high prominence throughout. Indeed, we began the section on "The TILI Game with Home Offers" by reminding the reader that "we require the home executive to offer the foreign executive an agreement that lies on their Pareto frontier" (MMR, 319). The assumption is also referred to elsewhere in the article (e.g., p. 311, fn. 13, and p. 319).

FIGURE 1. The Equilibria and the Pareto Frontier Between the International Negotiators

Given our assumptions, all of our conclusions follow logically. Dai is incorrect in asserting that our "solution is not optimal for the executive making the offer" (e.g., Dai 2002, 159-61) and that they "are not best replies" (Dai 2002, 160-1). Given the stated assumptions in our model, each player's behavior in equilibrium is optimal and is a best reply. Dai's results, however, do not follow from the model we presented. In Figure 1 (which is drawn for a pair of democracies and for a mixed pair composed of a democracy and an autocracy with moderate trade policy preferences), we show this point graphically. The bargaining outcomes in our model must, by assumption, lie on the Pareto frontier between the international negotiators—i.e., either on the line  $t_P^* t_P$  in the case of the democratic pair or on  $t_{A^*}^t_P$  in the case of the mixed pair. The equilibrium strategy of any executive making a proposal must be the element of the action space lying on this Pareto frontier that maximizes that player's expected utility. The TILI offer for each player, as indicated in our article, is optimal for the executive making the offer under the conditions specified and is indicated by  $d, d^$ ,  $m, m^*$ , or  $t_P$  in Figure 1 (depending on the case and the identity of the proposer).

Dai, however, ignores our assumption. Consequently, the outcomes that emerge from her approach—i.e.,  $M^$ , D,  $D^$ —lie off the Pareto frontier of the executives. At  $M^$ , D, or  $D^$ , it is as if the foreign executive has bypassed the international negotiation entirely and bargained solely with the other country's legislature. These are not equilibrium outcomes in our model. Furthermore, as we indicate in the next section, the behavior that would generate such equilibria is at odds with the usual construction of a "two-level game."

In fact, Dai (2002, 161) acknowledges the accuracy of our results when our assumptions are used. She simply chooses to disregard our assumption that the offer must lie on the Pareto frontier between the international negotiators. It is therefore important to consider whether our assumption is reasonable. Dai offers no explicit discussion of this issue, perhaps because our assumption is more defensible than hers.

MODELING A TWO-LEVEL GAME

Our model derives from an attempt to present parsimoniously but realistically the complex bargaining among domestic and foreign actors that is central to the literature on two-level games. These games posit two, sequential negotiating phases; hence their name. The first phase involves bargaining between the home and the foreign executives to arrive at an international agreement. The second phase requires ratification of the agreement by domestic actors if the country is a democracy. Such international bargaining implies that both executives influence the agreement. We could have modeled a full-fledged bargaining game at the international stage, complete with offers and counteroffers. In the interests of simplicity and parsimony, however, we reduced the bargaining structure to this modified TILI game in which one executive makes an offer drawn from the set of Pareto efficient agreements. Hence while the executive making the offer has most of the "bargaining power," the other executive has some influence on the bargain by virtue of the restriction on the agreement space. Pure TILI is an extreme bargaining structure for international politics since there are no international constitutions or conventions that give one state the right to impose such a framework on its interactions with other states.

By changing our assumption, Dai effectively removes one of the executives from the international stage of the game. This agent has no impact on the trade agreement. In every two-level game of which we are aware, however, the actors involved in making the bargain are the countries' chief executives, not their legislatures (or any other domestic actors). Executives bargain first, and then other domestic actors choose whether to ratify the international agreement. As Putnam (1988, 436) wrote in his seminal article on two-level games, "It is convenient analytically to decompose the process into two stages: 1.) bargaining between the [international] negotiators, leading to a tentative agreement... 2.) separate discussions within each group of constituents about whether to ratify the agreement." Such sequential bargaining is similar to that used by other studies of two-level games (e.g., Iida 1993; Mo 1995).

Dai's model is inconsistent with the mainstream literature on two-level games. In most models of this sort, the domestic ratifiers act as a constraint but their preferences do not directly affect the outcome of the international negotiations. Legislatures cannot bargain internationally, and executives, when bargaining with each other, select their most preferred agreement first among all of those that their legislatures would ratify. The two-level nature of the game is eliminated in Dai's model. What remains is effectively a single bargaining game, which at times (i.e., where her results differ from ours) involves only the home legislature and the foreign executive. Dai's approach provides an unrealistic depiction of international economic negotiations, since it is very unusual for foreign leaders to bargain directly with another country's legislature.

THE CONSEQUENCES OF RELAXING THE ASSUMPTION

The benefits of Dai's change to our assumption are not apparent. Not only does this change degrade the model's realism, but also it reduces the model's generality. Dai admits that her central result is not general and must be qualified by the preferences of the agents. No such qualification is required by our model.

Furthermore, the model presented in our article is robust to alternative bargaining structures. The second part of our model investigated the consequences of relaxing the TILI restriction on the bargaining game. We considered a more realistic bargaining structure where the gains from any agreement were evenly split between the international negotiators (which we denoted the SPLIT game). We showed that our results are robust to this shift in bargaining structure; moreover, our results hold for any division of bargaining power among the international negotiators (MMR, 311).

Dai neglects to conduct this robustness check. Moreover, it is far from obvious how to go about doing so given her bargaining structure. Our analysis, on the other hand, yields clear and unqualified predictions independent of the rules governing bargaining between international negotiators.

CONCLUSION

The results of our original model hold regardless of the preferences of countries' chief executives. Contrary to the claims of Dai (2002, 159, 161–3), aggregate trade barriers between democratic pairs are lower than those between mixed pairs. Our assertion that "[a] democracy lowers its trade barriers more when it seeks mutually acceptable concessions with another democracy than when it deals with an autocracy, no matter what the relative preferences of the two leaders" is correct (MMR, 310). Equally correct is our argument that "a protectionist legislature forces democracies to lower their trade barriers more than otherwise" (MMR, 311; Dai 2002, 162). There is no "mistake" in our analysis (Dai, 2002, 160, fn. 1).

Dai has failed to replicate our model and has changed one of its key assumptions. Consequently, it is not surprising that she arrives at different conclusions. Changing this assumption, however, creates serious problems. First, Dai's model is not consistent with either the influential literature on two-level games or the reality of international trade negotiations. In contrast, our model is consistent with this literature and is more faithful to reality than the alternative model that she presents. Second, our model generates results that are robust to variations in the bargaining structure. Dai's model does not. Third, our results are clearly consistent with the data we present. Dai again makes no attempt to show that her model fits the data better than does ours. In sum, then, Dai's model is much less useful than ours for the purpose of explaining how domestic politics influences international trade.

REFERENCES

Dai, Xinyuan. 2002. "Political Regimes and International Trade: The Democratic Difference Revisited." American Political Science Review 96 (1): 159–65.

Iida, Keisuke. 1993. "When and How Do Domestic Constraints Matter? Two-Level Games with Uncertainty." Journal of Conflict Resolution 34 (3): 403–26.

Mansfield, Edward D., Helen V. Milner, and B. Peter Rosendorff. 2000. "Free to Trade: Democracies, Autocracies and International Trade." American Political Science Review 94 (2): 305–22.

Mo, Jongryn. 1995. "Domestic Institutions and International Bargaining: The Role of Agent Veto in Two-Level Games." American Political Science Review 89 (4): 914–24.

Putnam, Robert. 1988. "Diplomacy and Domestic Politics: The Logic of Two-Level Games." International Organization 42 (3): 427–60.

BOOK REVIEWS

Political Theory

The Future of Teledemocracy. By Ted Becker and Christa Daryl Slaton. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2000. 248p. $65.00 cloth, $24.95 paper.

Darin Barney, University of Ottawa

As Ted Becker and Christa Slaton affirm in their introduction to The Future of Teledemocracy, this is not "just another book" of scholarly reflection but, rather, an account of "a way of life" (p. xii) in which they have played a central role. Consequently, instead of a detached, critical investigation of the dynamic encounter among technology, communication, and democratic politics, or even a dispassionate appraisal of the implications of a particular aspect of this encounter, what we receive in this book is an intimate digest of Becker and Slaton's 23-year "odyssey" on behalf of their own vision of teledemocracy—complete with "true blue allies" and powerful enemies "who opposed our ideology and had the means to halt our experiments" (p. xi)—framed by a futurist manifesto that unfortunately diminishes the contribution made by the chronicle of the authors' crusade.

The argument driving the book is relatively straightforward: The dawn of the third millennium has brought with it an array of "uniquely menacing dilemmas" (p. 7)—civil war, poverty, environmental degradation, Third World debt, disaffected youth, etc.—with which representative democracy, dominated by "tiny cliques of economically powerful and well-organized interests who are, by and large, sexist, racist and Social Darwinists at heart" (p. 6), is ill equipped to deal. The solution to these "threats to human viability" is teledemocracy: a "purer, future democracy" (p. 7) that makes liberal use of direct democratic instruments and new information and communication technologies, preferably on the model developed by Becker and Slaton in the course of more than two decades of experimentation. In their view, this "New Democratic Paradigm" is imminent, especially in America, the progressive center of the "one continent on this globe generating a series of impulses that contain the best way for humankind to work together, live together, grow together and govern together" (p. 8). This "wave of the future" (p. 9) is the political analog of the quantum revolution in physics (highlighting randomness, uncertainty, and unpredictability), its progress hindered only by political, economic, and media elites whose interests are wedded to the current representative system and the outmoded "Newtonian paradigm" (emphasizing reason, causality and hierarchy) upon which it is based and legitimated. The realization of teledemocracy requires a leap to "quantum politics" (p. 36), to which Becker and Slaton see their work as making a contribution.

The book is divided into three parts. Part I traces the lineage of teledemocracy in the ideas of a selection of "democratic visionaries of the 20th century" (p. 11), including Buckminster Fuller, Erich Fromm, and Abbie Hoffman. It also presents the case linking the failure of contemporary representative institutions to the Newtonian thinking which informed their founding, and for how a "political-scientific quantum correction" (p. 28) will "reinform our political thinking and processes in order to ameliorate some of the most debilitating and most lethal crises all modern governments face" (p. 21). Part II recounts the history of Becker and Slaton's experiments in "quantum politics": Deliberative polling and televoting; electronic town meetings (ETMs) mediated by television, telephone, and computer technology; and the integration of Internet utilities into these models. This part also includes an interesting discussion of the authors' experience developing "a commercial enterprise devoted to producing ETMs for a profit" (p. 119). Part III imagines the future of teledemocracy in the quantum age. Drawing on Benjamin Barber's idea of strong democracy and the futurism of Alvin and Heidi Toffler, Becker and Slaton forecast the proliferation of a global direct democracy movement, expansive implementation of technologically mediated direct democracy initiatives, the establishment of mediation as the core of "non-hierarchical, quantum-style conflict resolution" (p. 191), and the transformation of political organizations and institutions by the Internet. In other words, the future of teledemocracy will bear a marked resemblance to precisely what Becker and Slaton have been doing over the past 20 years.

There are sections of this book that are informative. The authors' recollection of their journey of social experimentation aimed at transformation holds lessons for those embarking on a similar trajectory, and their expertise undoubtedly will help identify best practices in the execution of teledemocracy exercises. Additionally, the section on the global direct democracy movement (pp. 158-78) provides a useful, if selective and uncritical, catalog of electronically mediated democratic activism around the world. Becker and Slaton do well to point out that political and economic elites who continue to benefit from the current configuration of power and technology have little to gain from real democratization and will use their existing advantage to preserve the status quo. Unfortunately, they assert rather than argue this point, typically at a level of rhetorical excess that undermines its persuasiveness. To their credit, they also seem aware that the combination of direct democratic and technological instruments is open to manipulation by these same elites in ways that undermine efforts at fundamental democratization. However-with the exception of a brief critique of Ross Perot's presidential campaign, apparently inspired by the candidate's rejection of the authors' offer of expertise in designing ETMs (p. 103)—this possibility is not adequately explored.

Chief among the book's shortcomings as a piece of research writing is its parochial stance relative to the broader scholarly discourses in which it might otherwise have been profitably situated. While Becker and Slaton do refer to fellow travelers on the experimental road to teledemocracy, with the exception of brief references to Barber, Amitai Etzioni, and James Fishkin's work on deliberative polling, there is little engagement with the theoretical or social science literatures that examine a number of issues with which Becker and Slaton ought to be concerned. Thus, the book suffers from a lack of sustained conversation with prominent contemporary theories of democracy, participation, deliberation, representation, technology, or citizenship and from minimal reference to the extensive mainstream social science research on direct democracy, the political economy of media, or the emerging political dynamics of digital technology. The result is that complex critical concerns about the potential pathologies of direct democracy and the Internet are glossed over, possibly because these instruments are inextricable from the 'quantum democracy" to which the authors declare themselves committed on a personal level. How else are we to explain, in the age of Microsoft and Time-Warner/AOL, the authors' claim that the "New Internet" is a system of mass telecommunications with "no owners," "no gatekeepers," and under which "all Web sites are equal" (pp. 136-7)? Becker and Slaton refer extensively to their own previous work, and to that of their close circle of colleagues. However, more systematic attention to issues raised by theorists and scholars outside the fraternity of "friends of the ETM process" (p. 106) may have made the authors' case in favor of electronically mediated direct democracy more persuasive, and less exhortative.

Becker and Slaton are correct in their conviction that American democracy bears a name it does not deserve, and there is no reason to doubt their commitment to radical democratization or to dismiss out of hand the contribution teledemocracy might make to its realization. It is entirely plausible that televotes, technologically mediated deliberative polling, and electronic town meetings will become a more prominent element of public life, and it is certain that activists will struggle creatively to ensure that these processes reflect the best, rather than the worst, face of democracy. The counsel of intellectuals such as Becker and Slaton will contribute mightily to this struggle. That being said, this book disappoints as a revolutionary manifesto, primarily because it is utopian in precisely the sense in which Marx and Engels understood that word. There is nothing wrong with imagining and working toward a better, more democratic future. However, to assume that its achievement awaits "a correction of the underlying theory of all our social, economic and political structures" (p. 3) rather than an upheaval in the material conditions which support prevailing configurations of power serves only to misdirect the energies of genuine change. To paraphrase Marx on wage labor, we cannot do away with domination and inequality simply by eliminating the thought of them. To suggest the persistence of "Newtonian thinking" is the chief obstacle to a substantial democratization of liberal capitalism, or that "a quantum correction to the Newtonian political thought" (p. 153) will achieve this, is ultimately disempowering. Equally utopian are the authors' concluding projections that teledemocracy will reverse "the forces of rampant, market-based globalization," yield "a fairer allotment of wealth and social services... reverse the severe degradation to the planet's ecology in the 20th century...[and] work some positive healing of the human psyche and spirit..." (pp. 211-2). It remains to be seen what the broad impact of technologically mediated direct democracy will be. Becker and Slaton succeed neither in establishing that the most important variable determining this outcome will be the prevailing theory of the nature of the cosmos, nor in adequately investigating what some of the other, more significant variables might be.

Sexual Identities, Queer Politics. Edited by Mark Blasius. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2001. 382p. $60.00 cloth, $19.95 paper.

Sexual Strangers: Gays, Lesbians, and the Dilemmas of Citizenship. By Shane Phelan. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 2001. 232p. $59.50 cloth, $18.95 paper.

Anna Marie Smith, Cornell University

Shane Phelan and Mark Blasius have played a leading role in the development of a lesbian, bisexual, gay, and transgender (LBGT) literature within political science, and their most recent texts enrich both this specialized field and the study of politics as a whole. Phelan's investigation of citizenship begins with the claim that LBGT people are "strangers" in American society. According to Zygmunt Bauman (Zygmunt Bauman, Modernity and Ambivalence, 1991), the Jews in European history were strangers. Neither friend nor enemy, they were treated as an ambiguous and shifting figure of otherness that marked the boundary between us and them, but at the same time calling into question the very possibility of such a clear exclusionary division. Critical readings of anti-Semitic discourse can be quite fruitful for the study of homophobia because the demonized subject in both cases is an enemy within who is simultaneously excessively present but invisible; powerful and threatening but harmless and effeminate; physically close but spiritually remote; embodying the highest intellectual and aesthetic values but expressing modern urban decadence and decay, circulating in "mainstream" society and seductively corrupting the innocent, but shunning "mainstream" society and remaining an unassimilated difference within its own separatist cultural enclave. Phelan puts Bauman's stranger trope to good use as she explores the complex positioning of LBGT people in American official discourse and culture.

Drawing from both the liberal republican and feminist traditions, Phelan defines citizenship in terms of legal status, meaningful participation, and recognition. Progressive liberals might be content to argue solely for the extension of basic civil and political rights to LBGT people, but Phelan complicates matters by pointing to the symbolic and discursive dimensions of participation. To have one's voice heard in a public debate, there must be some shared understanding that one deserves respect as a valued member of the community. Working in a similar vein, Nancy Fraser has explored the importance of combining redistribution and pluralistic recognition strategies in her work. Phelan's specific contribution consists in her discussion of the complex ambiguities that homophobia presents for democratic citizenship theory. LBGT people are not singled out for apartheid-style treatment-access to the vote, public office, public accommodation, and residential property ownership is not organized according to sexual classes in a systematic manner. Yet, Bowers v. Hardwick establishes that gays do not have a right to privacy; the "don't ask, don't tell" military policy bans self-affirming lesbians and gays from the military; the criminal justice system usually fails to address antigay violence; and laws protecting LBGT people from discrimination are weak, few, and far between. Phelan contends that although LBGT people do have access to many fundamental rights on a formal basis, the denial of other rights and symbolic recognition tends to diminish the political effectiveness of our citizenship.

Phelan concludes that democratic activists must work to introduce an antihomophobia and/or proqueer ethos of solidarity into American society. From this perspective, she urges conservative homosexual leaders to abandon their assimilatory attempts to depict lesbians and gays as just another middle-class suburban ethnic group. She contends that their tactics have become particularly offensive insofar as they have borrowed a typical ethnic group normalization tactic and have positioned "normal" homosexuals as "mainstream" citizens by attacking the marginal figures in our own community—the transsexual, the gender nonconformist, and the bisexual. This mainstreaming approach will inevitably fall short and backfire. Even if the conservative homosexuals secure small reforms, unless the deeply engrained systems of antigay bigotry and discrimination are addressed, many LBGT people will remain in the closet and will not exercise their rights. Furthermore, heterosexuals will not be pressed to examine their assumptions about sexuality, sex roles, the family, and the community, and the support from opinionsensitive politicians and judges will remain so shallow that many of them will abandon the reforms as soon as they are pressured by the religious Right.

Although Phelan is entirely convincing on these points, she could have engaged more substantially with radical queer theory, which has much to offer to any critique of assimilation. Phelan's analogy between the exclusion of LBGT people and racism and ethnic discrimination is quite interesting, but she also could have given more consideration to the ways in which homophobia remains somewhat unique. The expulsion of LBGT people from their birth families, for example, is a distinct feature of homophobia. Although families in some fundamentalist religious communities systematically expel their children if they reject their faith, this sort of deep-seated intrafamily antagonism is generally quite rare within racial and ethnic groups.

The Blasius anthology deals with the politics of sexuality. The chapters span the entire political science spectrum in terms of research paradigms. Some of the essays were first presented as papers at a 1996 conference, and the high quality of the work is such that even the oldest pieces have stood the test of time. Blasius nicely situates the various chapters so that interesting contrasts emerge. Rayside's overview of LBGT social movement politics in the institutional contexts of the United Kingdom, Canada, and the United States sets up Duyvendak's treatment of gay organizing in the French republican political culture and centralized political system, as well as Diaz-Cotto's analysis of Latin American lesbian-feminist activists' negotiations of the uneven organizing opportunities created by a series of feminist conferences.

The comparative politics chapter by Altman addresses international cultural politics. He demonstrates that in some Southeast Asian gay male communities, Western LBGT ways of thinking about sexuality have been enthusiastically taken up by new generations of bar queens, but Western-style activism has generally not taken root in the difficult economic and political conditions of the developing world. Petchesky, by contrast, emphasizes deliberate coalition-building tactics that have brought feminists together from both the north and the south. Her chapter discusses the progress that feminists have made in institutionalizing sexual rights within official international human rights discourse.

Blasius, Currah, and Bailey call into question popular approaches to LBGT subjectivity. Blasius argues that the effect of an LBGT presence should be theorized in terms of our community-based production of a specific form of emergent subjectivity—the dialogical process of self-constitution or "coming out"—rather than social movement or interest group analyses. Currah argues that lesbian and gay advocates ought to abandon the conservative tactic of constructing sexual orientation discrimination as simply a type of sex discrimination (e.g., Mitchell Y would have been able to marry Juan X if Juan had been a woman) but should instead struggle against any attempt by the state to regulate or punish those who deviate from traditional gender roles, inhabit transsexual bodies, or express unconventional sexualities. Bailey's analysis of lesbian and gay households in urban settings suggests that the LBGT presence should not be depicted as easily defined and homogeneous neighborhoods—the "gay ghettos"-but as highly differentiated, transitional, and shifting urban spaces in which LBGT people from all economic brackets coexist with seniors, female-headed households, and racial/ethnic minorities.

Several authors explore questions related to political strategy. The Cook and Hartnett analysis of television news coverage traces the ambiguous representations of lesbians and gays as worthy individuals and as a dangerous collective movement, thereby revealing the unevenness of strategic media opportunities. Harris deploys a key LBGT studies tactic by championing the work of a neglected gay African-American philosopher, Alain Locke. Yang rejects an elitist approach to mass opinion change, which suggests that "experts" always play a leading role in changing popular attitudes, and demonstrates that the privileging of "experts" depends on the precise issue in question. LBGT activists influenced the American Psychiatric Association's decision to remove homosexuality from its list of pathological disorders but were unable to shape the military's "don't ask, don't tell" policy.

Echoing Foucault, Yang points out that democratic struggles always involve struggles for the authority to determine truth and morality. Salokar urges LBGT activists to maximize the opportunities presented by the federal and multibranch nature of American government by working at all levels and in all areas of politics, while Badgett underlines the importance of LBGT think tanks.

The Blasius collection includes one of the most important pieces published in the entire LBGT literature during the 1990s (given the size, breadth, and quality of this body of texts, that achievement is no small feat), namely, Cohen's critique of radical queer theory. Whereas queer theory has constructed the political as a single struggle—LBGT people versus heterosexuals—Cohen points out that such a construction fails to capture the complex nature of the sexuality-oriented relations of domination that are central to contemporary American politics. Poor women of color have been attacked as sexual deviants and subjected to increasingly punitive welfare programs precisely because of their heterosexual fertility. Cohen affirms that homophobia remains a serious obstacle to progressive social change, but she urges LBGT activists to abandon the single-issue approach to politics. She concludes that the radical promise of apparently transgressive queer activism will only bear fruit to the extent that we grasp the intersections among homophobia, institutional racism, class exploitation, and the patriarchy and situate a radical, antiassimilationist struggle for LBGT rights within a broadly based leftist, feminist, and antiracist coalition.

It can be argued that both books are significant because they transcend the "narrowness" of LBGT politics and address much broader and universal questions of ethnic group politics, democracy, and citizenship. These texts are in fact significant, but we should not have to judge their importance in this manner. It is true that Phelan moves deftly back and forth across LBGT, feminist, multicultural, and democratic theory literatures with ease and to great effect, and the Blasius collection features first-rate works drawn from every corner of the entire political science discipline. These texts should find appreciative audiences not only in LBGT studies but also in the fields of feminist theory, social and political theory, and political science.

But such an assessment would implicitly accept the premise that LBGT politics is an inherently specialized and narrow field of inquiry, and that mainstream scholars should only value LBGT studies when we translate our work into mainstream terms. Literature departments, for the most part, have demonstrated that they welcome the very best humanistic scholarship, and the fact that some of it addresses problems related to gender, sexuality, and race has not interfered with their assessments. If our humanities colleagues have been more open to LBGT studies, our social science colleagues have, for the most part, failed to value this field of inquiry. The latter have often used the "particularism"/"universalism" code to conceal their exclusionary attitudes. Ultimately, the claim that a given knowledge project is particularistic instead of universal can only be defended in political terms; indeed, the charge of particularistic and narrow against LBGT studies is nothing more than the latest version of homophobic pathologization and erasure.

As Phelan and contributors to the Blasius book demonstrate so well, LBGT politics is not a narrow, special interest group, minority concern; it is a field of struggle that brings the very foundational architecture of American citizenship to light. In the words of Salokar:

To study the LGBT movement, scholars will need to move beyond a narrow definition of politics and entertain the notion of "political" as encompassing the social, cultural, ethical, and moral issues of society. What is sought by many LGBT activists is not simply political equality, equal protection of the laws, or the legal recognition of their relationships, but a wholesale examination and retooling of the most basic power relationships among individuals, social institutions (e.g., the family), and the regulatory capabilities of the state in order to shape a more just society. Ultimately, the LGBT movement is seeking-broad-based change that is "political" in all sense of the word (Sexual Identities, p. 260).

At the Heart of Freedom: Feminism, Sex, and Equality. By Drucilla Cornell. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1998. 254p. $14.95 paper.

Gayle Binion, University of California, Santa Barbara

Drucilla Cornell has two goals: Pinpoint equal freedom as the core of sexual equality and make the case for the equal rights of gays and lesbians. Interwoven within these themes is a case for sexual freedom itself, for men and women. With erudite references to a wide multidisciplinary swath of literature, she succeeds in hammering home these concerns and in demanding that the sociolegal order reform its policies affecting sexuality, reproduction, and definitions of family. In these respects, this is a valuable study of how the United States specifically and other societies referentially fall short of what Christine Littleton calls making sex "cost free." Cornell's book, which in the subjects and issues it analyzes covers very familiar territory, is intriguing for a very different reason. It is one of a very few works in radical feminist thought that is fundamentally about employing the tenets of classical liberalism, if not libertarianism, in the service of progressive social change. In contrast with the paradigms of modal feminism, which address social structures and connectedness, and which are concerned predominantly with equality, this work unabashedly focuses on the individual and stresses the freedom of each as a sexual being.

Despite Cornell's creativity, extensive research, and erudite references, the book is not entirely satisfactory. Most immediately, it builds broad general theory from stated but largely unproven premises: (1) One's "sexuate being," defining and representing one's sexual self, is a/the critical foundation of personhood, and (2) the state is largely responsible for our exclusionary views of normalcy in the "imaginary domain." Each premise is repeated throughout and functions as the framework within which Cornell offers legal analyses and suggestions for reform of public policy concerning primarily pregnancy and parenting, but they are not effectively explored as to their centrality, and some readers will remain unpersuaded.

Although it is nearly axiomatic that feminist theory, of which Cornell is self-consciously a major source, serves to challenge sex role orthodoxy, it is rather less clear that the enterprise of feminist jurisprudence is advanced by defining the essence of individuals as inherent in their sexuate natures. By this I mean to separate and applaud the very critical case that must be made, and is made by Cornell, for full freedom and equality whatever one's sexual orientation. It might be noted that a fair application of strict scrutiny analysis to sexual orientation would render unconstitutional all forms of governmental discrimination on the basis of this criterion. Few classifications better fit a test designed to address characteristics that are immutable, historically the basis of arbitrary exclusion, and unrelated to one's ability to contribute to society. But is this case against what is, in my mind, purely and simply bigotry necessarily advanced by an argument that one's sexuate being is the essence of the person from which principles of freedom, generally, do themselves flow? Perhaps this is but a quibble as to how critical sexuality is to freedom in social and political spheres of life, which is arguably a case apart from equal acceptance and integration of people of all sexual orientations into the fabric of society. The former case is not made particularly effectively by Cornell.

I have more problems with the excessive reliance on the proposition that the state is the source of the exclusionary social norms that all but heterosexual men and heterosexual women who are deferential to men are understood to experience. There is a general axiom in law and society research that, "awaiting contrary proof," public policy is more often than not presumed to be a dependent variable, a phenomenon to be explained by other social institutions and forces. Law is seen not as the source of social norms but as a reflection of these values, buttressing and reinforcing them. Cornell's analysis of patriarchy demonstrates the weakness of viewing the state as the problem. "For my purposes, the word patriarchy indicates the manner in which a woman's legal identity remains bound up with her duties to the state as wife and mother within the traditional heterosexual family. Our feminist demand must be for the full release of women from this legal identity that is wholly inconsistent with the recognition of each of us as a free and equal person" (pp. 101-2).

Arguably, patriarchy, which long predates the development of formal institutions of government and law, would continue to exist even if there were no state policies enforcing its strictures. It is, therefore, difficult to understand not only which policy changes will undo patriarchal institutions but also how any changes in contemporary law would necessarily effect positive social change in this arena. The case that is seriously in need of being made is how and under what circumstances the state can effectively intervene and undo the conditions of disempowerment and exclusion that are endemic in the social order. This may be a Herculean task, if not a fool's errand. Carol Smart, in Feminism and the Power of Law (1989), suggests that the law is unreformably patriarchal and that women must look elsewhere to further their interests. The danger, Smart (p. 3) notes, is to buy into the law's "overinflated view of itself.'

Cornell's work would have benefited from more effective copy editing. Some statements, such as that Congress "overturn[ed]" Geduldig v. Aiello (1974) in the Pregnancy Discrimination Act of 1978 (p. 66), are not accurate. (By statutory law, Congress could not undo the constitutional doctrine of the case denying that discrimination on the basis of pregnancy is sex discrimination under the fourteenth Amendment.) Other debatable observations would have been aided by documentation, for example: "There is widespread agreement among psychologists and psychoanalysts that addiction is inseparable from a blocked longing to be a person" (p. 81).

Cultural Studies and Political Theory. Edited by Jodi Dean. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 2000. 362p. $45.00 cloth, $19.95 paper.

Jill Locke, Gustavus Adolphus College

Film, painting, disease, nationalism, mass media, literature, family values, capital punishment, music lyrics, theater, UFOs, the Statue of Liberty, and Appalachian hollers are some of the cultural texts subject to political analysis in this impressive volume of sixteen essays. Neither are these cultural sites presumed to be transparent nor are their investments fully known. They are problematized, pluralized, specified, and contextualized in terms of such political categories as liberalism, communitarianism, privacy, civility, nationhood, citizenship, community, the will, responsibility, the common, revolution, public sphere(s), and the political itself (p. 19). This approach, which Jodi Dean terms an "interface" between cultural studies and political theory, captures how cultural forms such as film and literature cannot be decoupled from their political moorings, just as a political concept like citizenship is always embedded with cultural meanings.

All the essays unpack and rethink the political entanglements, investments, and effects of cultural artifacts, narratives, and sentiments. Some contributors approach this interface expressly; others take its power and validity as givens and proceed by example. In the first mode, Judith Grant and Paul Apostolidis establish criteria for determining whether cultural work has political purchase. Grant examines the turn toward art and culture in the tradition of critical theory as a positive expansion of politics and meaning-making spaces that turns away from economics. But Grant also warns that, without consciousness, cultural work is not emancipating, and its commentary is not political action. Apostolidis argues that criticism on its own is not political without a commitment to democratic leadership, which he defines as "the task of forging alliances between political intellectuals and groups of ordinary people" (p. 144).

The majority of contributors fall in the second mode, sitting more easily with the cultural studies/political theory interface. Mark Reinhardt concludes that even the most generous incarnations of communitarian thought (represented in his essay by Daniel Bell) still fail to conceptualize and therefore obfuscate myriad forms of "cultural struggle" (p. 108). Priscilla Wald reads "carrier narratives" from Typhoid Mary to Robin Cook's Invasion to show how communicative disease renders us "all related" and therefore consolidates and decimates community (p. 201). Linda Zerilli examines the U.S. investment in seeing itself as the "real" democracy vis-àvis national narratives about the Statue of the Liberty as the referent for the Goddess of Democracy held up in Tiananmen Square. She chronicles the history of the statue from its beginnings, as the "gift that nobody wanted," to the miniatures produced for tourist consumption today. Dean's concluding essay celebrates conspiracy theory, typically debunked as paranoid fanaticism, as part of the American tradition of political resistance present in the Declaration of Independence, whose conspiratorial tone unsettled the certainty of who held legitimate power.

Because these essays embrace, without regret, the pluralization of politics, they are meaningful contributions to debates about the expanding or shrinking public and political. Such debates are often played out in terms of a geography of public and private wherein certain concerns are considered essentially public, others indubitably private, artistic, cultural, economic, and so on. Hannah Arendt (On Revolution, 1963; The Human Condition, 1958), Sheldon Wolin ("Political Theory as a Vocation," American Political Science Review 63:4 [December 1969]: 1062-1082 and "What Time is It?" Theory & Event 1 [No. 1, 1997]), Michael Walzer (Spheres of Justice, 1993), Jean Bethke Elshtain (Democracy on Trial, 1995), their commentators, and others have been engaged in debates about this kind of political mapping. Even contemporary feminist scholarship has become uncertain about its stake in making the personal and cultural political.

These essays neither police what counts as political nor make everything so. They detail the workings of power that proliferate beyond the so-called public sphere (and are often constitutive of it) and affect our politics and our culture, and they show us the political failures in working to keep the two distinct. Thomas Dumm discusses the ostensibly mundane act of a group of people in a bar singing the lyrics to "Wild Thing." He examines the political meaning of how the audience (all but Jean Baudrillard, whom Dumm explains was quite baffled by the singing delirium) knew that the opening chords signaled "Wild Thing" and not its chordic sibling, "Louie, Louie." Michael Shapiro juxtaposies the story of his grandfather with the movie Dead Man, an approach well outside the domain of mainstream political theory, as he invokes not only film but also family history and personal experience to show the "radical contingency of the family" (p. 270, emphasis in original). It is not that everything is now political in this interface of political theory and cultural studies, but nothing is essentially not political either. To equate the political with everything would have a paradoxically depoliticizing effect. But to show how political meaning is configured and reconfigured through cultural phenomena is to work in the spirit of the essays collected here.

This book challenges political theorists to be more capacious in their treatment of the political, more attuned to cultural work that untidies their precious categories. It calls on cultural studies scholars to be more deliberate about the political potential of their insights into the subtle cultural feedback that they so convincingly deconstruct. Given that global capitalism lurks as a persona non grata throughout the text, its entailments could be illuminated more directly. Specific attention to the flow of global capital, examination of the economic and cultural imperatives that fashion the global citizen as global consumer, and closer engagement with non-American culture on its own terms would have expanded this volume's already inspiring effort to problematize, pluralize, specify, and contextualize the production, meaning, and circulation of politics. As individual essays and as a collection, however, this book will reach far into the bookshelves and classrooms of critical legal theory, democratic theory, American studies, feminist theory, critical race theory, and other untapped resources for political/cultural imagination.

A Politics of the Ordinary. By Thomas L. Dumm. New York: New York University Press, 1999. 240p. $55.00 cloth, $18.50 paper.

Fred M. Frohock, Syracuse University

Exploring the ordinary is a reasonable and fun way to get through the day. Thomas Dumm takes the exploration along a cart path toward democratic politics, dramatizing the intersections and reciprocal influences of everyday life and political events and the forces of conformity and normalcy that shackle the ordinary. The working technique is juxtaposition, the kind of display that one finds in the store windows of, well, ordinary life in towns and cities. The pantheon of familiar figures and texts includes Emerson, Thoreau, Nixon, Disney, alien depictions, Lowi, Wolin, Cavell, the King's Two Bodies, Baudrillard, and many more, all offered as showcase for the book's main claim that the ordinary is the primary source of the democratic imagination.

There is an early gesture toward methods. Dumm acknowledges a distinction between proof as "an illustration of form" and a "showing to be true" (p. 7). The former is a proof through exemplification; the latter, an effort to fix a definite meaning through placement. It should come as no surprise that Dumm embraces illustration and example and, in doing so, tries to preserve the ordinary with an approach traceable to classical philosophy. The book that follows this method is a presentation of the forms of ordinary life, an inventory of events, anecdotes, narratives, film, and fiction, in general a set of portraits that represents the private, common, personal stuff that we recognize as ordinary life. For Dumm this tentative and spontaneous life world expresses and mediates politics "understood as a capacity and a yearning" (p. 5).

Theory, understood as an explicit attention to the rival forms of understanding, explanation, argument, rules of evidence, and inference used to explain human experience, is no part of this book. Instead we have a collection of insights that draws upon the actual texts at hand and elsewhere to provide smart observations on unexpected connections and meanings. Dumm confesses that he finds theorists such as Habermas and Rawls, and debates about items such as liberalism and communitarianism, of little use as inspiration, in helping us to breathe, preferring instead the leads found in popular culture. The result is a book that reads like a collection of film reviews, biting, funny, enlightening in concrete ways, and leaving us with a wish to have a beer and a conversation with the author.

But so much is missing and missed in a work like this. Saul Bellow once said that he could not bear to read "The Adventures of Augie March" because he saw too many missed opportunities. Here are some opportunities and distinctions that fly away when Dumm puts pen to paper (or fingers on the computer keyboard). First, Dumm often writes as if the ordinary is in some earth chamber under siege, sealed off from flights of speculation and conjecture. But there is no required hostility between ordinary life and the larger forces of hegemony, codification, and controlling power that Dumm sets against the ordinary as both concept and event. The most ordinary event in the world is the slide from event to abstraction, from the quotidian to the generalizable account, from ambiguity to provisional certainty. The child's repetitive Why? question, as ordinary as any item in human experience, leads to infinite regresses and halting games at wonderful levels of pure abstraction, a domain of the ordinary that can easily examine (and dismember) the heavy theories of mass thinking. Remember that the search for timeless, permanent, transcendent truths is the most commonplace occurrence in history. Some of the best political arguments are street discussions of justice and the public good. Or, the counterplots of the ordinary have their own benign origins in the ordinary. Only a very few hints of these curious mergers are found in Dumm's presentations of ordinary life. Explore them and demarcations between the ordinary and its various antitheses may vanish.

Second, much of contemporary social theory is indeed turgid, unreadable and unthinkable, and (I would add) intellectually dishonest. But current failures of thought and expression are not indictments of abstract thought. They are just poor instances of theory. Good theory is usually elegant and beautiful. Read again Watson and Crick on discovering the double helix as the form of DNA. Third, without some work in theory, explorations even of the ordinary have as little use as last year's film reviews. There are rewarding ways to employ theory and avoid the ghastly trappings of bad social theory. Look at Roy Rappaport's magisterial Ritual and Religion in the Making of Humanity (1999), a work that combines rigorous anthropological research into types of ordinary life with analytic philosophy, to the benefit of both.

The oddest thing about Dumm's book is that he follows the lead of most sociologists today in rendering experiences from the outside, never discussing their internal meanings or truths, and Dumm himself seems always in a state of readiness to identify patterns and symbols that actors and authors almost never intend or recognize. For example, he presents the film Independence Day as a "reflection on the crisis of American national politics that is precipitated by the decline in confidence in our system of representation generally..." (p. 146). The 1978 remake of Invasion of the Body Snatchers, Dumm asserts, "was directed at Jimmy Carter" (p. 152). The Exorcist is "a Watergate scandal film" (p. 153). And so on, with one thick imposed connection following another in a book that celebrates the ordinary.

One of my colleagues once asked the director Stephen Frears what he meant by the high shot of the action at a crucial point in the film My Beautiful Launderette. Frears said that on the day of the shot another crew had left a crane on the set so, what the hell, let's use it, and the famous scene was shot. Accidental to the core. Conceded, the author's intentions are not privileged in understanding a text, and if something is there it doesn't matter a lot whether or why the author put it there. The question is whether any bridge theory is privileged in accounts of the ordinary. I finished reading Dumm's book the day after the director in charge of Eastenders, the most popular program on English television, spoke to my London seminar. In response to questions about symbolic space he said what I have heard so often: that kind of stuff is the business of the literary critics. What I do, he said, is just present popular culture: wise, because, as Dumm recognizes, the ordinary is indeterminant at its center, which is one source of its life blood. But then one cannot just do bad and misleading literary theory, imposing patterns from the outside in place of fieldwork into ordinary life and the popular culture in which

In the last chapter ("Wild Things") Dumm raises the question at the center of an intersection between the practical sides of ordinary life and philosophy: Why exist? He is right that contemporary theory is not much help in negotiating this primordial inquiry. But then consider Dumm as guide on the welcome contingency of language: "It requires a particular valorization of ordinary experiences, an attempt to emphasize the powers of experience while avoiding the temptation to make experience into a force for normalizing the ordinary" (p. 168). Thank you, but I prefer the less trendy languages of good anthropology and the insights that sound research can provide on ordinary life.

The Cunning of Unreason: Making Sense of Politics. By John Dunn. New York: Basic Books, 2000. 401p. $20.00.

Nadia Urbinati, Columbia University

If I had to talk about this book to my students, I would begin by describing its cover. The image of the upside down Capitol with the cupola hanging over the key word of the title (Cunning) invites the reader to peruse this fascinating and melancholic book as a species of inverted Hegelianism. This is a book about regret. It regrets what seems out of reach—politics as "something...uniquely courageous, direct, and even potentially effective in its assault on the misery and injustice of the great bulk of collective human life" (pp. ix-x). Its perspective is realistic but contains a glimmer of hope. Dunn's realism is ateleological and open to a moderate voluntarism; it conveys a disillusioned pessimism along with the belief that our politics can be less corrupt and cynical. Hope counterbalances the inexorable fatalism of reason. Its source is acceptance of the limits of human rationality, an endogenous fact unamendable to History's infallibility. Hope is the daughter of judgmental fallibility, the hunch that there is "room for maneuver" (pp. 347-8).

Written for a cultured public as well as for political scientists and theorists, this is a book about what politics were, are, and could be. Dunn makes politics an object of knowledge (the first question he asks is: "What exactly is politics?") (p. ix) because he believes that knowledge can make human agency "potentially effective" and "a locus of value" (p. 111). In order to understand modern politics, we must analyze how the classical political categories have changed. In order to solve the problem of contemporary political science, we must keep the general norm and the specificity of the actual context together. Thus, although he acknowledges, realistically, that interests are powerful factors in human agency and a limit to politics, Dunn wants to preserve the leading role of politics. The goal of modern representative democracy is to keep "a polity in good order" by "the selection as rulers of those with the intelligence, moral commitment and strength of character to rule as they should" (p. 268). To attain this goal, politics needs the "great imaginative force" of the ideal of impartiality to rectify the partial in political judgment stemming from economic interests (p. 357).

The Cunning of Unreason is divided into three parts and combines historical, empirical, and analytical approaches. The first part discusses the transformation of the classical political categories. Paraphrasing Benedetto Croce, Dunn asks: "What is dead and what is alive of Aristotle's vision?" His conclusion leaves no room for doubt: "Whatever we may in the end choose to agree with Aristotle, we can hardly hope to see eye to eye with him" on many ideas (pp. 16-7). Aristotle's conception is no longer viable because it demands that the city be "virtually self-sufficient" and makes women, slaves, and manual workers into pariahs. We live in a globalized economy and have a more comprehensive view of political inclusion. To be sure, Aristotle's world was also global, albeit in a limited way. Greek city-states were engaged in a network of commercial relations with other Mediterranean populations and were familiar with imperialism. Aristotle conceived of "self-sufficiency" as political autonomy, the basic condition for public decisions. Perhaps this general criterion can still be useful, at least to evaluate the character of our democracies, whose scope of action, as Dunn notes, is on many occasions defined by a nonpolitical (thus, free from political control) domain such as the market.

Nonetheless, Dunn is right to trace modern politics back to the less noble and more instrumental view of politics that sprang from Christianity. Starting with the original sin meant to give politics both a coercive and a salvationist role, Christianity promoted both realistic and eschatological perspectives. Predictably, Dunn endorses the former: Hobbes not Marx. Hobbes, Dunn says, was right to treat cruelty and vainglory as "ordinary vices" reason can control (but not eradicate) by transforming them into the cornerstones of a secure social environment. Hobbess' legacy is to have conceptualized the content of the kind of politics we deal with today: interests, instrumental rationality, and the individual potential for good and evil. These are the foundations of the main characteristics of modern politics: the juridification of state authority and the depersonalization of economic relations

The second part of the book is a critical analysis of an empirical case of modern politics: the "structure of domination" of the Thatcher regime, which was a unique mix of "free economy" "protected by and in the last instance enforced by a 'strong state'" and "belligerent chauvinism" (p. 144). What can possibly explain the longevity and popular support of a political program that was clearly not in the interests of that majority? As an Italian compelled to obey Silvio Berlusconi's government, I sympathize instinctively with Dunn's skepticism about the voters' ability to make rational decisions. Yet, citizen "incompetence" is an artifact that begs other questions about how private interests control and manipulate information as well as about the role of ideology, rhetoric, and passion in politics.

In the third part of the book, Dunn outlines the theoretical bases of his reasonable hope. He singles out two possible explanations for the "unimpressive" performance of modern democracy: the Platonist (which "attributes the misdirection essentially to incomprehension" of both ordinary citizens and career politicians) and the sociological (which "attributes the performance of politicians, above all, to the cognitive facilities and distortions which result from, and the more or less perverse incentives which are offered by, the institutional settings and social milieu") (pp. 300–1). Dunn declares his preference for the latter and proposes a vision of democratic politics that is anti-Habermasian, realistic, and contextual in its value. This is a Shumpeterian view of politics, consistent with Dunn's previous choice of Hobbes over Aristotle. Electoral competition is vulnerable to corruption, creates a "gap" between "enfranchised citizens and career politicians," and suffers "the sheer difficulty of forming and implementing rational strategies" (p. 285). Yet, it is all we have if we are to make government democratic and "do the best we now can to modify the consequences of our action and inaction for the better" (p. 341).

Dunn endorses Benjamin Constant's paradigm: The moderns have to cope with the constraints that private liberty imposes on participation. Representative democracy, like capitalism, is our only choice, but dropping the Enlightenment's grand vision does not imply abandoning "the strategy of rectification" modern rationalism has perfected (p. 360). Modern politics is a complex concoction of "fatalism" and "voluntarism," "routine" and "crisis," realism and hope. It demands that reality be accepted, not glorified or demonized.

The Moral of the Story: Literature and Public Ethics. Edited by Henry T. Edmondson III. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books, 2000. 272p. $75.00 cloth, $24.95 paper.

Shakespeare's Political Realism: The English History Plays. By Tim Spiekerman. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2001. 208p. $16.95 paper.

Ethan Fishman, University of South Alabama

As their scholarship indicates, Henry Edmondson and Tim Spiekerman share two basic assumptions: There exist certain enduring issues of politics, such as the nature of social justice and the legitimacy of power, and authors of fiction, drama, and poetry who write with knowledge and sensitivity about the human condition often will have something significant to say about them.

Spiekerman searches the English history plays of Shakespeare, which involve King John, Richard II, Henry IV, and Henry V, for the Bard's treatment of these enduring issues. In doing so, Spiekerman rejects historicist claims by influential contemporary literary critics that his search is implausible because the era in which Shakespeare wrote was so different from our own. Along the way Spiekerman offers some provocative insights. Among them is that Shakespeare does not completely accept or reject Machiavellianism. On the one hand, the author argues, Shakespeare shares Machiavelli's position that the thirst for power is more central to politics than the desire for justice. He points out that none of the historical English kings treated by Shakespeare comes close to being a genuinely moral person. At the same time Spiekerman contends that, unlike Machiavelli, Shakespeare feels there are important moral aspects to politics as well. According to Spiekerman, the subjects of these historical monarchs exhibit a deeply held passion to be governed by morally superior rulers, even if such rulers are rarely

Less illuminating is the analogy chosen by Spiekerman to explain the relationship of subjects to rulers who claim that their power and legitimacy derive from divine right. He favorably compares that relationship to the mystical bond connecting children to their biological father. Spiekerman apparently wants readers to understand that the question of political legitimacy sometimes incorporates extrarational qualities. Yet, one can only wonder why he lends any credence whatsoever to the paternalistic mentality that tyrants habitually exploit to sanction their oppressive regimes.

In his anthology of eighteen generally thoughtful essays. Edmondson describes Shakespeare's Henry V as a virtuous leader, a statesman, and the ideal Christian king. By Edmondson's estimation, it is during his famous soliloquy on the eve of Agincourt that Shakespeare most clearly portrays the depths of Henry's ethical character. In contrast, Spiekerman considers the soliloquy to be unremarkable ethically because it fails to include a moral justification for the invasion of France, which is a patriotic ruse to support his family's controversial right to rule.

Another essay in The Moral of the Story, by Alan Levine, investigates the novels of Chinua Achebe in an attempt to understand the personal and political consequences of moral idealism. In Achebe's Things Fall Apart (1958) and No Longer at Ease (1960), Levine discovers persuasive evidence that expecting persons, cultures, and governments to be too rational and moral can be just as destructive as a more cynical view. Politics has the potential for executing some important public functions, but it certainly is not a panacea for our ills, Levine interprets Achebe as saying. The most profound success we can achieve in combating ignorance, superstition, and injustice must come from education and from within ourselves, if it is to come at all.

Also in the Edmondson volume is an essay by Michael Platt, whose otherwise excellent treatment of prudential leadership in Joseph Conrad's "The Secret Sharer" employs an unfortunate illustration. Platt notes the crucial role of vision in prudence and argues that certain self-proclaimed freedomloving Texas officials acted imprudently when they balked at providing local hospitality for injured Afghan Mujahadeem they had helped transport to Dallas hospitals in the early 1980s. Platt wonders why the officials hesitated to support those then engaged in the active struggle against Soviet totalitarianism. Yet, even if we recoil with Platt from their hypocrisy, is it not acutely shortsighted of the author to advocate unconditional acceptance of a group that twenty years later is guilty of providing financial and military support for international terrorism?

Despite such relatively minor difficulties, these volumes represent noteworthy additions to the growing literature on the relationship between art and politics. By depicting human beings as complex, three-dimensional figures, Spiekerman and Edmondson suggest, great artists can remind political scientists to avoid reductionism in their empirical research. By providing compelling examples of how abstract philosophical concepts influence the daily lives of citizens, the authors contend, great artists can enhance our understanding of political theory. In his contributions to the Edmondson anthology, Gregory R. Johnson thus consults the novels of Jane Austen and Flannery O'Connor in order to gain a deeper appreciation of Aristotle's ideal of magnanimity or greatness of soul.

The Next Religious Establishment: National Identity and Political Theology in Post-Protestant America. By Eldon J. Eisenach. New York: Rowman and Littlefield, 2000. 167 p. $75.00 cloth, $22.95 paper.

Peter Dennis Bathory, Rutgers University

Animated by an "American identity crisis," Eldon Eisenach seeks to comprehend a "deep disjunction in political culture and values between elite national institutions and the aggregate of local cultures and values." National elites, in particular, many in the "American university," offer Americain-crisis "a highly abstract democratic Universalism" which "denies American nationality." At the same time national representatives of "local cultures and values" attempt to "ground national identity and national policy in a 'conservative Restoration' by bringing back to prominence and honor the value-sustaining institutions of civil society" (p. 99). Both "Universalists" and "Restorationists" fail in their respective tasks, and American identity, Eisenach argues, is threatened in the process. While "Universalism," often couched in the "neutral" language of "juridical democracy," is in some ways built upon the New Deal "liberal establishment," it has, he insists, not been able to articulate policies that speak to this "older, ruling coalition" and so poses "above the battle" (pp. 102-3). Restorationists suffer from another malady. Though winning elections, they have proved incapable of establishing "national authority" and so equally incapable of reestablishing an American national identity.

Eisenach joins the fray. Sharing with both Universalists and Restorationists a sense of impending disorder, he develops the case for a new "National Political Theology," another in a series which, he insists, has identified and dominated American political life from its beginnings. A new "Religious Establishment," however, requires something that neither of the alternative formulations he explores can provide. Universalists, seeking to be "free from nationalism, racism, sexism (and every other contingent boundary they happen to reject) that stands in the way of full equality" (p. 101), developed a rhetoric that was increasingly abstract "while the concrete interests and groups they in fact represented appeared increasingly fragmented, particularistic, and demanding." They fail to understand that their "standards of equality are historically articulated" and, in the process, prove incapable of developing the "narrative" of American life necessary to the establishment of a new American identity. Though much of this provided an easy target for conservative Restorationists, they also have failed, Eisenach argues, to take their complete case to the American people. Successful in implementing economic and tax policies, with their emphases on deregulation and cost benefit analysis, efficiency, and social cost measures, Restorationists have had far less success "in the areas of social values, intellectual culture and education" (p. 103). Insightfully, Eisenach reminds us that "economic conservatives, insofar as they adhere to neo-classical or libertarian values, do not share with moral conservatives an inner imperative to reform culture" (p. 104). But, the intramural conflict does not end here, as "some moral conservatives fear that the positive Restorationist projects led by the national government (e.g., national school standards, media censorship or control, the funding of religiously committed academics) require the active assistance of the federal bureaucracy and other national institutions dominated by their opponents" (p. 104).

For Eisenach, however, all is not lost. The moral vacuum left by these multiply-contending forces has produced "Third Way" alternatives, both "Liberal Nationalism" and "Pluralist Communitarian" in substance. From Richard Rorty and E. J. Dionne, Jr., on the Liberal Nationalist front to Charles Taylor and Michael Sandel among the pluralist communitarians, he finds the beginnings of a more satisfactory encounter with our contemporary dilemmas—an unwitting reconstruction of a national political theology. However, in the absence of "a common faith," even these alternatives will founder in contemporary America. Though he finds the bases of that faith, in a "common democratic faith" of Liberal Nationalists and Communitarians, Eisenach seeks to anchor that "faith" in the American political tradition, in Western political thought beyond America, and to recover in the process an American "experiential foundationalism" (p. 130). Looking to the Progressive Era, Eisenach echoes Herbert

Croly's "promise of American life" and its "national cohesion

... dependent ... upon fidelity to democratic principle" (p. 8). While cautious not to elide intervening American history, Eisenach finds much to recommend in this era and its "pragmatism." Indeed, the writings of John Dewey serve not only to define an earlier "religious establishment" (pp. 89–92) but to mark boundaries of the new regime of "civility and citizenship" that Eisenach propounds in his conclusion (p. 148). Likewise, "the shared German or Hegelian or historicist spirit [that], he claims, pervaded the American university well before the Civil War" (p. 86) is revived in Eisenach's call for "a new American narrative" (p. 138). Closing with a plea for toleration, civility, and citizenship embedded in a new American political story, Eisenach's own story ends with a reshaping of "the legacy of American pragmatism into the beginnings of ... a political theology for the next American establishment" (p. 149).

In its critical spirit, Eisenach's argument is reminiscent of Elshtain's Democracy on Trial (1995), but his self-proclaimed "prophecy" places a faith in the American university past and present that is more in the spirit of Dewey. He trumpets "the success of the American university as a powerful and unified set of national institutions independent of both church and state" and explores the possibility that it "might be understood as the authentic national church of voluntary religious establishments" (p. 75). At the same time he understands the dangers of abstraction, distance, and arrogance: The antidemocratic temptations of the academy. Much as Tocqueville did, he attempts to comprehend the essence of politics as theory and its relation to political action. He knows. as Tocqueville taught us, that "the political sciences form a sort of intellectual atmosphere breathed by both governors and governed in society, and [that] both unwittingly derive from it the principles of their actions" (See Alexis de Tocqueville, 1852, "The Art and Science of Politics," Encounter XXXVI, 6 [January 1971]: 27–35).

Still, there is something puzzling about his reliance on American intellectuals and the university. He seems to understand with Tocqueville that the political sciences (Tocqueville's use of the term is closer to our understanding of political theory) are not always clearly understood, that the "intellectual atmosphere" may become polluted, leading to unintended consequences, even to the contradiction of stated goals. Tocqueville's warnings here about the intellectuals in politics may be more apposite than Dewey's principles, for though Tocqueville admired the pragmatic spirit of Americans, he knew first-hand of both the importance and the difficulties of integrating "political art" and political theory. "Authors," he thought, had been responsible for the selfconsuming ideology of the French revolution. Democracy was fragile for Tocqueville, requiring attention to both theory and practice and the endlessly complex relation between them. Eisenach's turn to Dewey, Rorty, Taylor, and others suggests less than a full appreciation of the complexities of the very problem he addresses. It may be that more attention to Tocqueville on both France and America would have helped shape this argument.

Eisenach's reliance on the university, furthermore, confronts dangers beyond those of which Tocqueville could imagine. While our interest in "service learning," for example, seems to harken back to Dewey, our fascination with "distance learning," in particular, as a source of revenue, should give us pause. Within our discipline the spirit of "economism," alive and well despite the contrary signals of the "perestroika" exchanges, suggests yet another problem for Eisenach's "prophetic" message. The reestablishment of a "national political theology" may be responsive to his twin demons, but it is important to recognize that there are aspects of the "atmosphere" he hopes to freshen, quite apart from Universalism and Restorationism, in need of careful attention as well. This said, Eisenach's jeremiad is both provocative and useful for our time and may well stir the fruitful controversy he admittedly seeks.

Making Social Science Matter: Why Social Inquiry Fails and How It Can Succeed Again. By Bent Flyvbjerg. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001. 201p. $54.95 cloth, $19.95 paper.

Stephen K. White, University of Virginia

The 2001 American Political Science Association meeting was alive with the Perestroika controversy. It has been more than a quarter-century since the profession last saw such ferment. If one compares the two episodes, there is strong similarity in the level of organizational activity; but when it comes to methodological issues, the differences are pronounced. The earlier period was characterized by a rich discussion; today there is comparatively little. And this relative silence has been the norm for a good number of years.

What explains this state of affairs? The decline of methodological talk may have reflected a general exhaustion or a dampening of enthusiasm for positivism and the strong behavioralist program of the 1960s. Many political scientists have been content in the last couple of decades to settle down quietly under labels such as postpositivism, postempiricism, and pragmatism, without much sustained analysis as to what such labels actually amount to. And political theorists, with few exceptions, have seemed uninterested in probing these questions.

Perhaps such quiescence is to be expected when there exists widespread consensus about the nature of political inquiry. But with the emergence of Perestroika, no one can pretend that this is the case. Perestroikans charge that certain methodological approaches have established a "hegemonic" position. If that is true, then what becomes most striking about the current state of political science is the stark contrast between the force of this expansionist strategy and the paucity of sustained methodological reflection bearing on its intellectual respectability.

What might we expect from a reinvigoration of methodological talk? One thing we shouldn't expect is any quick fix. Instant therapies were already making their appearance at the 2001 meeting. But such proposals are likely to be perceived either as new power grabs or as too amorphous to have much real purchase on our problems. An example of the former was David Laitin's conference paper that asserted categorically that we already have "impressive intellectual coherence" in our discipline; the real problem is institutional "anarchy" and "indiscipline" that just needs to be cleaned up ("The Political Science Discipline," p. 3). An example of the latter was Elinor Ostrom's well-intended proposal to gather all political inquiry under a big-tent description: the systematic study of "all human activities guided by norms" (Roundtable on "Shaking Things Up? Future Directions in Political Science"). Upon hearing this proposal, a person in the audience behind me mumbled, "I'll study bass fishing."

Given this situation, Bent Flyvbjerg's Making Social Science Matter is a welcome intervention. Flyvbjerg is a Danish social scientist who recently published an excellent case study of the city of Aalborg—essentially what used to be called a "community power" analysis—only this one persuasively incorporated a Foucaultian dimension to its understanding of power. The author's new book projects a general vision of how social science should reimagine itself. A key issue in this regard remains, of course, what one thinks about the unity of science thesis. My guess is that there are relatively few political scientists today who believe that natural and social science are exactly alike; but many still think that some kind of progress on a naturalistic model is possible, and thus the profession should adhere to a clear-cut research program like rational choice. But, despite the many real insights and limited-range generalizations generated by that program, the fact remains that there is no general consensus that political science over the last quarter-century looks like an emerging science on the naturalistic model. Critics of such a research program increasingly find its adherents to be like die-hard Marxists: absolutely convinced the revolution will come and full of an unending supply of reasons why it has failed so far.

Flyvbjerg shares this familiar skepticism about the naturalistic model. A useful way to engage his arguments is to compare and contrast them with ones that were developed in the earlier period of ferment in political science. From this angle, one can see better both what is distinctive and persuasive in Flyvbjerg and what is more problematic. Like earlier critics, he contends that the naturalistic model does not adequately account for the irreducible centrality of "context and judgment" in human action (p. 4). But Flyvbjerg differs from many critics in his construal of the grounds for such centrality. The more familiar approach runs something like this: Because judgment and behavior in political life reflect actors' interpretations of common meanings embedded in particular contexts, and because these meanings and contexts cannot be grasped by abstract, universalistic models of behavior, we cannot expect such models to do very well in predicting political action. This line of argument is perhaps most closely associated today with Charles Taylor. Flyvbjerg finds this kind of hermeneutic account to be inadequate. The problem with this approach is that it amounts only to "a more complex form of determinism"; in effect, if you know the rules governing common meanings, you can determine which actions will occur. But, Flyvbjerg contends, this is surely wrong: "The rules for chess are not chess," and the rules governing common meanings are not a determinate map of expected action (p. 43). Flyvbjerg is, of course, right about this point. The problem is that he never indicates who actually ever believed that rules strictly determine the playing of a game. Wittgenstein certainly didn't; and Taylor doesn't either. Strangely, Flyvbjerg does not include any reference whatsoever to Taylor.

Flyvbjerg contends that we must turn to the work of Hubert Dreyfus as our main resource for showing why action is generally too open-ended to be successfully modeled. Dreyfus's research has shown that the knowledge and skill of a competent actor—whether a paramedic or a politician—is too intuitive, holistic, and context-dependent to be "externalized into rules and explanations" (p. 21). Flyvbjerg's discussion of Dreyfus is generally quite good in drawing out the latter's significance for social scientists. But I do have some reservations. It strikes me as unwarranted to make the case for a nonnaturalistic model depend primarily on Dreyfus's particular theory of human skill and judgment. Given Flyvbjerg's denigration of the hermeneutic account, he forces us to place all our bets on Dreyfus. I would rather reverse the weighting, with the heaviest bets put on a (correctly understood) Taylor-like account that can be combined (easily, I think) with Dreyfus-like insights. Moreover, we would do well to remember that Dreyfus's work actually fits into an existing tradition of reflection on the character of political inquiry. In his much discussed essay of 1969, Sheldon Wolin characterized political insight as involving "tacit political knowledge" ("The Vocation of Political Theory," American Political Science Review 63:4 [December 1969]: 1070-4).

Flyvbjerg's heavy reliance on Dreyfus is related to the Aristotelian orientation he envisions for social science. Aristotle's phronesis, with its focus on the quality of judgment and practical wisdom exhibited by political actors, is the key concept. Flyvbjerg aims to "restore social science to its classical position as a practical, intellectual activity aimed at clarifying the problems, risks and possibilities" that are faced by "the communities in which we live" (pp. 4, 166). To his credit, Flyvbjerg is quite concrete in spelling out methodologically what this vision implies. Thus, for example, he includes a chapter on the importance of case studies (which tend to be denigrated somewhat within the naturalistic model) and a chapter elucidating his own research on Aalborg. Flyvbierg's "phronetic social science" does make one sharp departure from Aristotle, in that it self-consciously attends to how conflict and power are constitutive of political life and inquiry (pp. 3, 129). Although much of what Flyvbjerg says about Foucault on this theme is persuasive, some familiar questions about the latter's perspective on power in general, as well as its relation to domination, remain unanswered. For example, Flyvbjerg unpacks Foucault's notion of power as "a multiplicity of force relations" and "the strategies in which the force relations obtain effects" (pp. 116, 120). But what, then, are "force relations"? Similarly, one thing a contemporary phronetic science is supposed to do is unmask relations of domination; but the normative criteria for picking out instances of domination remain unclear (p. 104). Flyvbjerg, like Foucault, wants to avoid using universalistic normative frames for addressing this issue. He contends that we need only appeal to the normative frames of "the communities in which we live." Without further explanation, however, this would seem to move us toward a position like Richard Rorty's, wherein political inquiries aim at clarifying the implications of authoritative traditions (p. 140). Flyvbjerg seems unaware of the potential tension here: Rorty castigates inquiry that busies itself with just the sort of systematic unmasking operations a phronetic social science undertakes.

Although I have difficulties with some of Flyvbjerg's claims, the book does an excellent job of bringing a whole range of timely methodological issues onto the table and of projecting a thoughtful vision of social science that runs counter to the hegemonic one. Proponents of the latter owe the discipline careful responses to proposals such as Flyvbjerg's. Failure to do so merely feeds the growing suspicion that what is at issue is not a justifiable hegemony but, rather, simply a coercive occupation of intellectual terrain.

The Vocations of Political Theory. Edited by Jason A. Frank and John Tambornino. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2000. 400p. $57.95 cloth, $22.95 paper.

John G. Gunnell, State University of New York at Albany

A generation ago, Sheldon Wolin evoked an image of the vocation of political theory as an alternative to the behavioral program of theory and scientific inquiry that had come to dominate political science. His call also summoned those who believed that, in the midst of the political turmoil of the 1960s, the mainstream of the discipline had become politically quiescent and, at least by its inaction, even implicated in the political crises of the time. Intellectual and ideological choices were, indeed, involved, but Wolin was implicitly also giving voice to a professional identity for a large segment of the academic subfield of political theory that had been evolving for at least three decades. His articulation of the vocation was, however, as mythical as the method of science to which much of political science had subscribed, and these hegemonic legitimating myths ultimately could neither withstand critical scrutiny nor suppress the latent differences within each

The editors of this volume ask what has become of this vocation, and they are sometimes ambivalent about whether they are referring to Wolin's epic image or to the character and condition of political theory as a professional university activity. Whatever their assumptions about the relationship between the two, their principal focus is on the latter. Although the editors state that the concerns "animating" the volume are "the character and status of contemporary political theory, its place in the academy and its role in public life,"(p. x) these matters are not explored very fully, either analytically or empirically, and the essays have difficulty staying on message.

With respect to the issue of the relationship between political theory and political science, the editors characterize their approach as "primarily theoretical and metatheoretical." (p. xxv) They claim that political theory should be relevant. but they point to the value of detachment and "question the assumption that political theory should avoid straying from direct engagement with current events." (p. xv) They stress the existence of "vocations" of political theory as well as the pluralistic and changing character of the field, which they believe warrants yet another assessment of its current state. This pluralism is attributed in part to the nature of the field but particularly to the contemporary diversity and flux within the domain of politics and to the proliferation of the political. Although the editors warily celebrate how eclecticism has enlivened political theory and contributed to its flourishing, they worry about dissolution of identity and about "our ability to speak of a vocation at all" (p. xiii-xiv). As with most credos of pluralism, there is an attempt to indicate some sense of unity and continuity, but they claim little more than an unspecified "family resemblance" among the many modes of theorizing.

The lead essay is by Wolin and focuses on this loss of identity. It also notes that the conference from which this volume derived was devoted to future political theorists and to the future of political theory and was a response to the "perennial uncertainty and controversy about political theory's relationship to political and social science, to philosophy, to history, as well as its relationship, if any, to the 'real' political world." The essay, which Wolin labels an "invocation" or "a response to a certain kind of loss," is not optimistic. (p. 5) He claims there is a danger that the vocation is about either "to lapse into dilettantism" or "to harden into professionalism" (p. 618). He viewed his original essay as partly a response to a political "crisis" and to a condition of undertheoretization and conformism, whereas we now face a situation marked by "overtheoretization."

According to Wolin, in a world in which "both theory and politics are ubiquitous and indeterminate" and "freed of the constraints of an overarching political," we have a "politics of multiplicity" and a concomitant "proliferation of theory" and diverse identities for "disjointed theorists" (pp. 9,11). As a consequence, political theory makes reference to real-world controversies, but "its engagement is with the conditions, or the politics, of the theoretical that it seeks to settle rather than with the political that is being contested.... It is postpolitical" (p. 15). Although the situation seems to be a classic case of overproduction and underconsumption, Wolin attributes these problems, as he has in earlier essays, less to the faults and failings of theorists than to the chaos and speed of modern life, to a "society without a paradigm," to a "utopian" era that paradoxically depends on the "perpetuation of dystopia" for the many. Can an invocation of the vocation of political theory aid us? Wolin suggests, "besides being fatuous, that call may be too late in the day." In the space and time between his two essays, "the academic intellectual has undergone a dizzying series of intellectual permutations." Varieties of political theory have "replicated the pace of technological change" and become a segment of the "brainy classes," who ultimately perpetuate and benefit from the present and undemocratic condition of society (p. 21).

Wolin's image of the vocation was the theme on which the conference pivoted, but the other twelve essays—half by establishment scholars and half by ABDs and recent Ph.Ds—seldom directly engage his account. There is much discussion of theory, but it is often very abstract and reflects the very diversity of issues and perspectives that the editors and Wolin consider problematical.

Wendy Brown discusses Derrida and Benjamin while addressing the relationship between political thinking and forms of historical consciousness. J. Peter Euben, picking up on the more general dimension of Wolin's essay, speaks about the relationship between political theory and the sense of loss. Thomas Dumm explores the significance of loss in a more private or ordinary sense. David Mandell considers the relevance of the study of the history of political theory for thinking about contemporary issues. Linda Zerilli criticizes, from a Wittgensteinian perspective, the craving of feminist thought for generality and its neglect of the ordinary. Mark Brown examines the often contradictory ways in which political theorists have viewed natural science. Lon Troyer urges an ethos of political theory based less on any particular approach than on an attitude of provocation. Shane Gunster argues that political theory must aim at achieving the status of Gramscian "organic intellectuals." Samantha Frost discusses Hobbes as a vehicle for engaging contemporary issues regarding the embodied subject. Jill Locke attempts to bring political theory to bear on the public policy issue of using chain gangs. William Connolly seeks to extract democratic insight from the work of Nietzsche.

These are all lucid and credible essays, but the volume as a whole demonstrates that political theorists live lives of persistent and sometimes desperate cognitive dissonance as they seek to relate to both political science and politics and to come to grips with the disparity between their actual professional position and extravagant images of their vocation.

Public Reason: Mediated Authority in the Liberal State. By Fred M. Frohock. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1999. 234p. $35.00.

Albert W. Dzur, Western Michigan University

The hope of ordering collective purposes through rational speech stretches back to the earliest historical attempts at theorizing political practice. Public reason has been a particularly prominent theme in political theory for the last decade and is central to discussions of deliberative democracy. Recent work on public reason is motivated by the belief that contemporary political procedures lack adequate norms and spaces for public engagement in intelligent, informative civic debate sensitive to deep differences in values. Fred Frohock's thought-provoking book covers much familiar ground, yet it also contributes a number of key ideas and a dose of realism to a research program now in a stage of self-criticism.

John Rawls's Political Liberalism (1993) is in the background throughout this book as the best available theory of the liberal state and as the natural starting point for any critique and reconstruction of contemporary liberalism. Like Rawls, Frohock believes that liberal states must face up to the demands of pluralism and accommodate, in their "governing language," the multiple interpretations of the good that thrive in liberal societies. Unlike Rawls, Frohock rejects procedural solutions to the problem of pluralism. "Merit" forms of public reason that attempt to pare away from deliberation everything but what can be considered the "merit" of the particular political issue under debate fail because political disputes under conditions of pluralism are indeterminant. Some disputes, such as those between prochoice and prolife in the abortion controversy, stem from different ways of legitimately interpreting key terms such as "person," "life," and "harm." Even advocates on both sides who wish to reach an agreement and who share the same moral and political language differ irreconcilably on their interpretations of these terms because of their different life experiences. Deliberative breakdowns are even more dramatic in cases where advocates do not even share the same conceptual language, as in the dispute between health-care professionals committed to biomedical models of thought and Christian Scientists who reject that model in favor of religious healing. Neither debate will be resolved by carefully sifting evidence and weighing the merits of competing arguments.

One of Frohock's targets is Rawls's attempt to distinguish, for the purposes of state action, comprehensive moral arguments from political claims. Like Gutmann and Thompson, whose very closely related work, Democracy and Disagreement (1996), he unfortunately does not engage, Frohock believes that moral disagreement is a legitimate feature of politics. In the abortion and religious healing cases there is no feasible way to distinguish the moral from the political, so suffused are the political issues in the moral experience of the disputants. Frohock is right to remark, "It is hard to see where the moral and political can be demarcated as these matters enter public space. Bracketing moral beliefs in these cases seems to remove the political dimensions also" (pp. 58-9). And he is right to point out the historically close connections between the languages of law, politics, and morality. It is probably necessary to admit, as Frohock encourages, that the state is "clearly a kind of moral undertaking" (p. 57). Harder to reach, at least without more argument, is Frohock's conclusion that when the state steps in to mandate lifesaving medical treatment for a child of Christian Scientist parents, it is rejecting the idea that prayer is a form of healing, and that when it permits the parents to decline such treatment the state is endorsing prayer as healing. Because officials and citizens in liberal states recognize the complicated trade-offs in cases like these, policy settlements simply do not place the state in one moral corner or another.

Under what conditions, then, can we expect legitimate resolution, if only temporary, for the long-term moral disagreements that mark our sharpest political debates? Frohock believes that closer attention to the narratives that shape individual lives is part of the answer. "Narrative conceptions of the self can also provide stories that summon common human experiences, and these stories may mediate the strong pluralism of liberal settings" (p. 100). Stories help unify selves and link people together through overarching themes. Frohock points out that the "great narratives of political experience can forge unity in describing and identifying the roles of persons in a universal political culture," even though they often "relax literal truth in favor of metaphor, symbols of various types, myths even" (p. 105). This emphasis on narratives, and how they integrate the social and the highly personal, is an important addition to the literature on deliberative democracy, which tends to overemphasize the power of rational discourse in forging agreement between persons with divergent interests or values. Frohock leaves open many important questions about how, exactly, narratives challenge our "understandings of evidence, inference and public space" (p. 106). The ideal of public reason seeks the "peculiar merger of self and process" found in a good conversation and hopes to absorb individuals "into the talk that uses and crafts collective arrangements" (p. 113). This formulation is suggestive and warrants closer analysis of the constraints on and the risks of such an ideal under conditions of normal politics, where some narratives have been historically marginalized and others given unchosen and unreflective dominance.

Another solution to the problem of moral disagreement is mediation: "Connections among persons and outcomes in deliberative procedures often require third parties, figures who are to some degree outside of the relationships among persons seeking a collective outcome but are vital to a successful outcome" (p. 203). Mediators can "move the conversation to a deeper inquiry" that may motivate personal changes and help resolve disputes (p. 203). Mediation, therefore, can be "a powerful source of collective experience" (p. 204). The ideal of context-oriented, nonadversarial, minimally hierarchical mediation is the book's strongest positive contribution to research on public deliberation, which has much to learn from the role mediators play in actual contexts of conflict resolution. Frohock exemplifies mediation with the bioethics deliberations of hospital ethics committees, which seek to resolve disputes over treatment plans between patients and health-care workers. This well-chosen example shows how complex mediation is, however, and how vulnerable to the institutional context in which it is embedded. Frohock notes that bioethics mediation is limited by the traditional purposes of medicine—keeping people alive—and by legal constraints, but he pays less attention to the fact that this mediation is also limited by an institutional context that privileges the biomedical model above other "narratives" and grants the physician far more discretionary power than any other participant in mediation. Further, Frohock might have gone farther in discussing the great demands placed on mediators. In the case of medicine the bioethics consultant must be familiar with the language of medicine and the pluralistic languages of patients, must be attentive to the highly personal elements of patient care as well as their social dimensions, and must be aware of legal constraints on patient and physician decision. Such demands are not unique to mediators in medicine. Very similar demands are faced by mediators in the criminal justice domain, such as those who work in victim-offender mediation. Such complexity suggests that mediation may best be seen not as an individual role, as Frohock implies, but rather as something that requires a good deal of structural support.

A methodological merit of this work is its attention to ground-level cases of moral disagreement. Especially attractive is the use of examples drawn from the medical domain, with which Frohock is exceptionally well acquainted. This domain has had a flourishing normative discourse for more than three decades. Political theorists can gain much from paying more attention to the role of ethics consulation and the many political aspects of bioethics discourse in hospitals, clinics, and wider public arenas. Methodological merits and suggestive discussions of narrative and mediation aside, however, the book is difficult to recommend to someone with only a general interest in political theory because Frohock begins in media res with intricate discussions that demand a strong background in contemporary debates over liberalism. The book offers more to those with particular interests in liberalism and in public deliberation, though the latter audience will miss the wide and deep engagement with both critics and advocates of deliberative democracy that is needed at this stage of the research program.

The Enemy with a Thousand Faces: The Tradition of the Other in Western Political Thought and History. By Vilho Harle. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2000. 232p. $59.95.

David Boucher, Cardiff University

This book is part of a much larger collaborative project devoted to "Otherness, Identity, and Politics." It explores an aspect of identity theory, about which the author makes two uncontentious claims: first, that identity is socially and politically constituted and, second, that identity politics predate 1989. By delimiting a theme in Western political thought and history that constructs the "I" and the "thou" in terms of good and evil, the book identifies and delimits a tendency to portray the Other as an enemy, evil incarnate, and dehumanized by a combination of religious and political ideas. The tradition of understanding the Self and the Other as the vehicles of good and evil is reproduced in thought, speech, and action and constitutes a continuous tradition from ancient Iranian Zoroastrianism, through Judaism, Christianity, and Islam.

The book is a work of synthesis, constructed largely from a wide variety of secondary sources, with little evidence of a familiarity with the primary works, with the notable exception of the chapter on Carl Schmitt. The assumption throughout is that we know more about a particular thought or action by pointing out that similar thoughts and actions happen elsewhere. It is a construction based on resemblances at the level of conclusions, without any serious attempt, and deliberately excludes any serious attempt, to explore the reasons for arriving at the conclusions, in order to avoid the "mere description of the unique case" (p. 10). It is interesting, for example, to know that Cicero did not justify war, especially on religious grounds, unlike ancient Hebrew thought and Zoroastrianism. Politics, and not war, was central in his idea of national identity. Why Cicero held these views is left unexplored, and unless you already know, it remains a mystery.

As the author presents it, he has constituted a tradition based upon coincidences, rather than substantive connections. The continuity of the tradition is not demonstrated, but assumed from the soundings taken in different historical periods, considerable distances apart in both space and time. The Middle Ages gets particularly cursory treatment on the eccentric and idiosyncratic grounds that it is an elusive period between the ancient and the contemporary worlds, stretching from the early Christians to Edmund Burke, as the first "modern" representative of the tradition. There is a great body of literature on what constitutes a tradition, and the criteria that have to be met before one can talk in terms of authors belonging to such traditions (see John Gunnell, Political Theory: Tradition and Interpretation, 1979; C. Condren, The Status and Appraisal of Classic Texts, 1985). For Harle, the existence of a tradition is unproblematic. A resemblance between the thought of one period and that of another, or the thought in one geographical location and that in another, is sufficient evidence of the "use" or "application" (p. 53) of the tradition, or of the influence of one set of ideas upon another. Is, for example, self-consciousness, or self-awareness, a criterion of belonging to a tradition? If so, authors have to be shown to be, at least in principle, conscious of their use of the vocabulary and concepts. Even in making such connections, to follow Ricoeur, are we doing no more than constructing a quasi-world of texts, distanced from their authors and the contexts in which they were produced? Indeed, Harle deliberately distances the ideas he reiterates by presenting them at a high level of generality, in order to highlight their similarities. Take just one example as illustrative of what is lost in dealing with generalities abstracted from their contexts. The author suggests that the rhetoric surrounding the conquest of the American Indians "reproduces the tradition" he is discussing (p. 72). What is important for Harle is the dehumanisation of the Indians, the representation of the Other as alien and inferior. What is of significance, however, is how a complete adjustment of the European cosmology had to be changed as a result of the discovery of the Americas, and how it generated modern theories of property, such as those of Grotius and Locke, which justified the appropriation of land in the Americas. First, the discovery of a fourth race of people was contrary to the teachings of the Bible, which taught that Africans, Asians, and Europeans were the descendants of the three sons of Noah. The question of whether the Indians were human was a real theological dilemma. Given that their lands were being conquered, to constitute a legitimate claim to appropriation, and to have that claim respected in international law, or the law of nation, the question of land ownership became paramount. On this question is was claimed that Indians were not human, or that they were children, heathen, or insane, all of which would disqualify them from land ownership. The Spanish theologian Vitoria denied all of these grounds for the appropriation of Indian land but allowed appropriation on the grounds of just war. Practically, this had the same effect as allowing appropriation on the other grounds. To prevent free passage through one's land was a violation of the law of nature and constituted an act of war, which allows combatants to seize lands. It is true, then, that the Indians as Other were constituted as the enemy, but we could hardly claim to have understood why without knowing that it was in order to justify the appropriation of their lands.

Harle's book is not without illuminating insights, and interesting pieces of information that give an indication of different ways of thinking from the West, such as that of Islam. At a time when Jihad has become so thoroughly part of the lingua franca of the age, it is important to be reminded that it does not simply mean holy war. The great Jihad in Islam represents the religious quest for righteousness and goodness in all aspects of life. The small Jihad is the duty to defend Islam with weapons and is related to the idea of just war. War between Islamic countries (harb) is regulated by strict ethical considerations, whereas between an Islamic state and a nonbeliever state (razzia) ethical rules are suspended and any methods for defeating the enemy are permissible.

As an interesting catalog of ideas on the ways in which evil is represented in a variety of cultures, as manifest in the enemy, or Other, the book serves a useful purpose and is a valuable resource. It is, however, methodologically and theoretically naïve.

Natural Law Theories in the Early Enlightenment. By T. J. Hochstrasser. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000. 246p. $54.95.

Michael J. Seidler, Western Kentucky University

This detailed historical study focuses on Protestant natural law theories in the early German Enlightenment (explicitly excluding the French and British sectors) and traces their influence, or fate, through Kant. Despite its title, it is more than a specialist tome devoted to an historically isolable development, and it is not merely a subsidiary, underlaborer's attempt to recount the prehistory of Kant's achievement. Rather, by tracing several important background currents through the period concerned, Hochstrasser illuminates the odd historical fact that German enlighteners at the end of this span knew or thought so little of those at its beginning. The central topics are eclecticism; the so-called "histories of morality" that were part of its self-conscious legitimation method; the rationalism-voluntarism split in early modern natural law; and the associated distinction among moral philosophy (ethics), natural (positive) law, and international law (ius gentium) that developed out of these debates.

Some of these topics have been treated before, but others remain nearly unknown, at least in the Anglo-American realm. There is a growing literature on so-called early modern natural law theory, but eclecticism as a philosophical method has received little attention in English. Moreover, the many histories of morality that appeared (mainly in Latin) during the late Seventeenth and early Eighteenth centuries are even less familiar, both individually and as a pervasive intellectual phenomenon sui generis. Hochstrasser is the first to tackle this body of work and to expound its historical and philosophical significance.

The book contains six chapters whose rich detail might have been better reflected in an expanded table of contents. Chapter 1 establishes the connections among the main themes: natural law, eclecticism, history and theory, and the influence of debates about these topics on university reform and the politics of enlightened absolutism. It ends with an appendix listing the main "histories of morality" consulted. Chapter 2 examines Pufendorf's intellectual method and intentions, particularly his Specimen controversiarum (1678), which was the first and, indeed, paradigmatic instance of moral historiography in the service of philosophical argument. The third chapter compares Leibniz and Pufendorf, not merely their famous disagreement about the nature of obligation but also the underlying moral epistemologies that determined their respective intellectualist and voluntarist approaches.

In chapter 4, Hochstrasser details the metamorphosis of Pufendorfian jurisprudence in Christian Thomasius and his school, including the formal commitment to eclecticism as a self-critical intellectual method most suited for practical reforms. Chapter 5 shows how Wolff and his followers (including Vattel) transmuted voluntarist natural law into rationalist, metaphysical forms directly opposed by its founders. It also describes how the melding of rationalist and voluntarist traditions in Brucker's influential history of philosophy began, already, to obscure the important role of Pufendorf and Thomasius. The final chapter traces eclecticism into the Popularphilosophie of Meiners and Garve, explores Kant's understanding of the history of philosophy, and clarifies the inhospitality of pure reason to natural law as such. Moreover, it iterates the continuing linkage between these abstract discussions and more worldly contestation over academic disciplinary status and, indirectly, social policy. The chapter ends with a look at the Kantianized histories of moral philosophy by Stäudlin, Buhle, and Tennemann, in which natural lawyers and eclectics are barely noted and, ironically, their work is mistaken for the neoscholastic, quasitheological orthodoxies that they opposed.

The sheer range of this book and its ability to fold such a variety of intellectual developments into a coherent account are its chief recommendation. Several features deserve specific mention as notable contributions to the scholarly literature. One is Hochstrasser's careful analysis of the so-called Boineburg correspondence. This important epistolary exchange in the early 1660s—among the German constitutional lawyer Hermann Conring, Baron von Boineburg (Leibniz's patron at Mainz), the Grotian expositor J. H. Böcler, and Pufendorf-resulted in the latter's abandonment of a formal, quasimathematical method for one argumentatively more engaged with historical predecessors. There is nothing as detailed and informative in the English literature, and Hochstrasser's treatment sets a high standard for such background studies, which are so necessary for understanding the evolution of ideas.

Another feature is Hochstrasser's excellent articulation of Pufendorf's sociality principle in terms of his empirical account of language acquisition and the associated development of human rationality through a socialized cultura animi. This, too, is an unusual and powerful focus that shows Pufendorf to be about twenty years ahead of Locke (in his opposition to innatism and his analysis of complex, abstract ideas), and it rightly exhibits the contingency at the heart of Pufendorfian natural law that so irritated his theological, rationalist, and (later) even transcendental opponents (i.e., Kant), who were all absolutists in their own way. By noting the dependence of (even) language and rationality upon a kind of double contract (consistency, veracity) similar to that grounding the state (association, submission), it exhibits well the experience-based conventionalism, or controlled voluntarism, that elaborates the meaning of sociality at different levels of Pufendorf's natural law framework.

Some of Hochstrasser's concepts and distinctions still need sharpening. The notion of "imposition" in Alberti and Pufendorf, and in the divine and human instances (even among humans), is not quite the same. The claimed divergence of ethics from natural law and international law—a result of these debates—also depends on particular interpretive commitments whose potential divergence is not always noted. Even the central notion of voluntarism seems philosophically underdetermined at times, as Hochstrasser moves from the voluntarism "excluded" (p. 104) from Pufendorf's moral epistemology to Kant's "frontal assault" (p. 198) on the voluntarist moral histories in which Pufendorf was central. Ironically, this problem arises because Hochstrasser, unlike the histories he canvasses, may be too historical and insufficiently philosophical. That is, he sometimes takes thinkers or ideas too much on their own or their respective expositors' terms. Yet, without a stronger interpretative or philosophical preference, also reflected in a consistent terminology, the narrative gets redefined too often, and the reader winds up conceptually stranded, without a general vantage point.

The problem is occasional, however, and does not undermine the intelligibility brought by this excellent study to an historical period still lacking in plausible panoptic perspectives. The work rests on a wide and deep scholarship conversant with the primary and secondary literature in many languages. It is well written and carefully produced, and it will become an important tool in the field.

Encountering Tragedy: Rousseau and the Project of Democratic Order. By Steven Johnston. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1999. 189p. $29.95.

Lori Jo Marso, Union College

Rousseau is known as both exalted democrat and father of totalitarianism. Steven Johnston's book demonstrates that the two interpretations cannot be separated. Johnston evaluates Rousseau's texts hoping that the "costs of Rousseau's virtuous republic, many of them hidden or muted, can be reckoned alongside its accomplishments" (p. x.). Not surprisingly, Rousseau's accomplishments are called into question. This elegantly written and forcefully argued book claims that order is the essential ingredient in Rousseau's recipe for democracy. Developing the argument via Nietzsche's tragic perspective, Johnston wonders aloud whether all attempts at democracy will collapse under the weight of their internal contradictions.

Resisting the urge to simply "upbraid Rousseau," Johnston promises to "rethink and radicalize certain aspects of his thought" (p. 3). His focus highlights tragic elements inherent in Rousseau's theorization of the state of nature, the politics of the founding, the role of government, and the existence of enmity. Describing the "phantasmic life" tragedy enjoys in the "interstices" of Rousseau's work, Johnston claims that tragedy manifests itself at "untimely moments" (p. ix). Marginalization ensues from promises of freedom, domination springs from equality, difference rears its ugly head in the quest for identity, arbitrariness haunts legitimacy, cruelty accompanies virtue, and on these dilemmas continue (p. ix). To characterize this sequence as loss, failure, or unfulfilled promise, however, misses Johnston's point. He argues that tragedy is "inescapable, inevitable, inexorable, and—what is more—commonplace, even banal.... Tragedy lies in wait, an inevitable concomitant to human exertions and projects" (p. 9). If the tragic is all too human, as it were, Rousseau could not do otherwise than to manifest tragic elements in his thought. How, then, does Johnston, radicalize Rousseau? Can he, as he claims, "enlist Rousseau as an ally against himself?" (p. 3).

Johnston's chapter "On Government" aptly illustrates his method. Johnston does well to employ Letter to D'Alembert, Political Economy, Considerations on the Government of Poland, and Constitutional Project for Corsica to "think about the political dicta of The Social Contract in terms of the principles and practices of governmentality that permeate these works" (p. 76). Here he moves from Rousseau's specific examples to consider again his general theoretical exposition. Johnston claims that this approach will "tame the seductive rhetorical powers of The Social Contract" (p. 77). Indeed it does. The way Johnston constructs his argument, with help from a 1978 lecture by Foucault titled "Governmentality," one might think that Rousseau's dictates on sovereignty and the art and role of government were written expressly to illustrate the dangers governing oneself poses in this newly exposed Foucaultian universe. As Johnston puts it, "Rousseauian practices of government presuppose and engender relations of reciprocal subjugation more than autonomous determination" (p. 89).

How could this happen? Isn't government, in Rousseau's formulation, intrinsically dangerous, mandated to operate merely at the behest and in the service of sovereignty? Were we to read only The Social Contract, we might conclude that Rousseau recognizes the dangers of government and the constant power struggle between the forces of government and sovereignty. Yet even within these pages Rousseau hints at an "algebra of order" in claiming that the "modern age, with its humongous states, does not lend itself to the pursuit of republicanism" (p. 83). The government must be "relatively stronger in proportion as the people is more numerous" (The Social Contract, p. 80; cited by Johnston, p. 84). Political activity in such large states fails to mold citizen behavior and government steps in to fill the void. Johnston's attention to the 'specific, the contemporary, the local, the empirical" (p. 100), as Rousseau explores in the essays on Poland and Corsica and Letter to D'Alembert, reveals that the citizen is not formed through the political activity of enacting and engaging in sovereignty. Instead, the citizen is produced "through disciplinary processes centering on the regulation of bodies in public space" (p. 98). Military discipline takes the lead in Considerations on the Government of Poland; in the essay on Corsica, citizens are created through service in the corvée; Letter to D'Alembert illustrates the "panoptical architecture" of the marriage festival (p. 103). "Here the subject-citizen is disclosed as the contrivance of power—an artifice to be constructed more than an essence to be realized.... The art of government rather than the exercise of sovereignty is responsible for its manufacture" (p. 87).

Johnston's argument that Rousseau accomplishes what he Johnston's argument that Rousseau accomplishes what he appears to least desire is convincing. In the chapter "On Enmity" we discover that the enemy is always within; the "republic's enemies seem to be proliferating at an alarming rate" (p. 139). Thus while Rousseau rightfully fears the encroaching arm of government, he reproduces its tactics in creating and encouraging the art of government to form his citizens. Though he desires a virtuous republic, the battle each citizen must fight within himself (against individual will), against women (effeminacy), and against all signifiers of difference yields an uncompromising totality where freedom requires total submission.

But must the analysis end here? Johnston hints that a "full-bodied democratic politics" may be "newly capable of finess-ing" the "tragedies of social and political life" (p. 24). Yet the reader is never offered as much as a nod in the direction toward creating this new politics. In fact, we are told the contrary: Any political community is "an arbitrary, contingent artifact;" we are not meant "to live one way rather than another, ruled by this set of values rather than that one" (p. 5). We have learned here that violence, cruelty, and enmity are at the heart of democratic politics. How, then, and why might we be moved to take any political action whatsoever? The intellectual exercise performed by Johnston is a treat to read. Yet this reader wonders where we go from here politically. Rousseau, above all else, insists that we demand attention and commitment to the ways in which a more democratic politics might be theorized and the spaces in which it might be enacted. Despite the valuable insights into Rousseau that Johnston reveals, the limitations of this form of theorizing also lie exposed. A Social Contract completely purged of its seductive power doesn't leave us any space for imagining and enacting new forms of community.

The Loss of Happiness in Market Democracies. By Robert E. Lane. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2000. 466p. $42.00 cloth, $19.00 paper.

Conrad P. Waligorski, University of Arkansas

Happiness, unhappiness, and depression are not the usual foci of political science or economics, but Robert Lane demonstrates their importance. The Loss of Happiness in Market Democracies is a worthy companion to and extension of Lane's earlier work, especially The Market Experience (1991). Lane employs psychology, genetics, evolutionary theory, and medical research to convince economists and democratic theorists that biological and psychological research can enrich their often unrealistic assumptions about well-being and behavior. He argues that in affluent societies there is growing unhappiness, growing depression, and declining marginal utility of income to produce happiness. These are accompanied by mistrust and increasing political negativity, which further undermine happiness. The dominant Western image of individualism ignores that people often do not know what makes them happy, which undermines prevailing market and democratic premises (p. 284).

What has caused this? Lane's discussion of genetics and evolved needs is speculative but plausible, in part because the author is careful to ascribe no more than 40% to 60% of behavior to genetics. He emphasizes instead the mutual influence of endowment and environment. "We have violated evolutionary instructions and we have devalued our children" (p. 37). Affluent, market-democratic humanity has subordinated the need for companionship to acquisition, and the result is insufficient and declining companionship and a "social, occupational, and internally generated" (p. 47) stress response with which we cannot cope. Money and economic growth cannot buy happiness, are not substitutes for intimacy, and do not relieve loneliness. In the process, we have subjected children to increased depression and unhappiness.

Lane effectively argues that neither an ever more compulsive pursuit of market rewards nor, unfortunately, what he calls market (parliamentary) democracy provide an answer. Rather, as presently constituted, they exacerbate our difficulties. Markets make people unhappy (p. 139, pp. 159–92). Democracy is difficult and often painful (pp. 220–45), although some of its pains are true of all political systems, and it does not provide effective self-determination or the close companionship needed to deal with unhappiness and depression. Beyond the [ever shifting?] poverty level, satisfaction with one's family life and interpersonal relations contributes more to subjective well-being than added income, the market, or democracy. Democracy, however, is still relevant to individuals. It can support the behavior that generates companionship, intimacy, and a sense of control over one's life. In itself, this is a great deal.

Lane's "purpose... is to diagnose the problem and not to offer remedies" (p. 335), but his many suggestions lead one to hope that his next book will examine remedies. Lane believes that the "decline in happiness... is likely to be ephemeral" (p. 321). Several times he analyzes "Companionship or Income" and felicity versus income (pp. 77, 125), arguing people must trade some income to create conditions conducive to happiness, but he does not discuss the institutional and ideological changes necessary to support this trade-off. His goal is a "companionable society" (p. 332) in which people realize that there are multiple goods, all of which contribute to democracy and happiness. Democratic government cannot create companionship but can do other things that support such a society, including the creation of "lifeframes" that sustain the "microworlds" of experience, perhaps something like the traditional liberal distinction between state and society.

Although strongly recommend this book, it would have been strengthened if Lane had explored alternatives to current market democracy, had more fully examined the relation between macrophenomena and the "microworlds" of daily experience, and had expanded his analysis of market thinking as ideology and influence.

Perhaps democracies directly contribute little to subjective well-being because the dominant model is limited and often perceived as unresponsive. Although it is not his purpose, beyond a few comments Lane does not address the participatory current in democratic theory—including Aristotle, Jefferson, Mill, Dewey, and Benjamin Barber—that claims democracy can educate and train the citizen. Lane agrees that education is a primary government duty and contribution to happiness, but he slights the participatory heritage and the possibility that small group democracy, even if all will not participate, can expand one's sense of control and companionship.

Lane contends that the microworlds of experience are the locus in which we experience satisfaction. Yet, in numerous places he examines large-scale phenomena that also have an effect. These include unemployment and especially its effect on children, the Great Depression (p. 52), severe economic reversals (p. 62), economic insecurity (pp. 71, 112), "anxiety about the future" (p. 108), and "individualistic doctrine" (pp. 283, 111). Thus, Lane recognizes the larger environment, but he could fully incorporate it into his analysis by examining in detail the interaction between macro and micro levels. This is crucial because, despite popular claims that citizen and consumer are sovereign, everyone is immersed—born, educated, work, and die—in large-scale institutions that individuals are more or less powerless to affect.

Lane is fully cognizant of the often detrimental influence of economic thinking on political analysis, and he criticizes the economistic fallacy that happiness is "proportionate to income" (p. 64), but he does not systematically examine the market ideology that dominates how many people perceive and seek to shape the world. This theory assumes an acquisitive human nature; justifies distribution and differential rewards; encourages self-interest; claims individuals are powerful; defines freedom, equality, and democracy; shapes what we perceive as problems and acceptable solutions to them; and frequently denigrates government and politics. Its popular form teaches joy through consumption: This car or toothpaste bring sexual fulfillment; your children will be happy and love you if you take them to that hamburger place. As Lane repeatedly states, this is not so; more income or goods do not bring happiness or relieve depression. Yet, constant messages that consumption brings happiness may affect satisfaction, depression, and the intimate relations that Lane emphasizes. To paraphrase John Kenneth Galbraith (Affluent Society, 1958, 1998), there is no systematic propaganda for friendship, companionship, or trading income for time to promote closeness.

This is a balanced, nuanced book that blends normative and empirical theory. It leaves much room for active government and interventionist policy, and it reminds us that political and economic ideas are not autonomous. This imaginative, multidisciplinary contribution questions almost everyone's presuppositions about a decent life.

The Multiculturalism of Fear. By Jacob T. Levy. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000. 268p. $29.95.

Jeff Spinner-Halev, University of Nebraska

Jacob Levy argues that the multiculturalism of fear is meant to supplement, not displace, the multiculturalism of rights. Running against many recent celebrations of ethnic identity, Levy is wary of the effects that ethnic (which includes national) identity can have. Too often ethnic politics are cruel and conflictual. Levy is skeptical that a world where everyone's ethnic identity is politically recognized can be peaceful and harmonious. Yet neither can we simply wish ethnic identity away. While cultural identities are socially constructed, they are very much part of our world and so they must be dealt with. "The multiculturalism of fear," Levy writes, "does see ethnic communities as morally important and distinctive, not because of what they provide for individuals, but because of what they risk doing to common social and political life" (p. 33).

Ethnic groups are dangerous, yet they are a part of our world. The result is that we should try to minimize the harm they do. A multiculturalism of fear, directly inspired by the late Judith Shklar's liberalism of fear, focuses our attention on the ways in which groups are victims of cruelty and humiliation because of their ethnicity. For example, Levy argues that when India changed the name of Bombay to Mumbai, it was done to reassert the city's Hindu identity in a way that was meant to taunt the city's many non-Hindu residents. A multiculturalism of rights may have little to say about name changes like this, since this change of names did not violate anyone's rights. The multiculturalism of fear, however, is attentive to the tensions between ethnic groups and can tell us why seemingly innocuous name changes should be resisted. This is an important insight on the usefulness of a multiculturalism of fear.

Related to the multiculturalism of fear (though exactly how is never spelled out) is Levy's negative consequentionalist argument. Levy cites Montesquieu as teaching us that laws are often a bad way to change customs; that rewards and incentives are better ways to do so. Outlawing a long-standing custom may have worse consequences than allowing it unaltered or perhaps in a modified form. For example, some immigrant women from Africa recently asked their doctors in the Seattle area to perform a mild version of female circumcision on their daughters. Levy argues that the doctors were right to agree to do so (though they changed their minds under public pressure), because this incision would not have harmed sexual intercourse, sexual pleasure, or childbirth. In a perfect world the question of such an incision would never arise. But we must, Levy warns us, deal with the cultural and religious realities as they do exist. The alternative to the incision performed in the Seattle hospital was, for many of these families, to return to their country of origin to have the cutting under the control of their traditional grandmothers.

Surely it is better to have the cutting performed by the Seattle doctors.

This is an insightful argument, but it is underdeveloped. Levy is not willing to allow all cultural practices to exist. When the rights of women are violated, then direct intervention is called for. This leaves the reader wanting to hear more. What if stopping these rights violations has terrible consequences? Or if we can successfully stop the violations of women's rights in certain cultures, why not also directly stop patriarchal norms?

Just as the negative consequentionalist argument is not spelled out enough, so too the contours of the multiculturalism of fear are left unfilled. Levy's argument on name changes is one of few examples of how the multiculturalism of fear works. In fact, Levy's fear argument is prominent only in the first two chapters and then a little in the last one; it is rarely mentioned in the five chapters in between. While the theoretical framework tying the book together is uneven, this book has considerable insights into multicultural arguments. Levy is an incisive critic, with an extraordinary command of cases from throughout the world and a firm grasp on the many arguments for nationalism and cultural rights. Levy is a fox, not a hedgehog. The reader will not learn one big thing from this book, but she will learn many smaller (and worthwhile) things. Levy's book travels through arguments against liberal nationalism and liberal arguments for cultural rights, land, indigenous law, and official apologies.

Levy is particularly insightful when he dissects the categories used in a variety of cultural rights arguments. His description of the different kinds of indigenous laws, and their uses and abuses, and his discussion of the several possible approaches to ethnic symbolism are first rate; so too is the powerful chapter on classifying cultural rights. This chapter, already well known in a previously published form, is a grand tour through the different kinds of cultural rights available and can be used a basic starting point in the cultural rights debates. Yet the normative implications of this chapter are too briefly discussed, and its relationship to the multiculturalism of fear is left unclear.

The relationship between theories of rights and theories of fear is also underexplored. In Levy's well-argued chapters against liberal nationalism and cultural rights, he appears to be against the multiculturalism of rights. Levy is willing to allow group rights only when the alternative is worse; he does not think that cultural membership in itself has much moral worth. Yet sometimes it seem like the liberalism of rights trumps the multiculturalism of fear. Levy gently argues that giving territorial self-government rights to indigenous peoples causes a problem with local minorities, raises concerns about the individual rights of tribal members, creates boundaries problems, and restricts the mobility of nonmembers (which Levy counts as a liberal right). While Levy briefly invokes the multiculturalism of fear argument to justify this position, one might think that the fear argument works the other way: That it is cruel and humiliating to take away or withhold territorial self-government from indigenous peoples. And there is, of course, substantial evidence that doing so has negative consequences for indigenous peoples.

Nonetheless, Levy's chapter on indigenous law, like his chapter on land, pushes political theorists in directions in which we normally do not go. Land, in particular, is a difficult subject that few political theorists have tackled, and Levy's argument provides an excellent juxtaposition of liberal and nationalist views on territory. Here and elsewhere, Levy's willingness to take on a broad range of subjects and arguments will provide readers with many occasions to pause and ponder as they read this richly rewarding book.

Community, Solidarity, and Belonging: Levels of Community and Their Normative Significance. By Andrew Mason. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000. 246p. $59.95 cloth, $21.95 paper.

Russell Muirhead, Harvard University

Communitarianism has long suffered from vagueness: what is community? What about it, if anything, is necessary or good? What are the boundaries of morally relevant communities? Often those who attend to the claims of community tender these questions with too little rigor. Not so Andrew Mason. His new book has three main purposes: to map the meaning of community, to assess the claims of political community in relation to communities below the level of the state, and to evaluate the claims of political communities with respect to the global community. In addition to a number of rigorous and thoughtful clarifications and a comprehensive overview of recent debates between liberalism and its critics, the book offers arguments of its own which are often more bold than its judicious manner suggests. It deserves careful attention by all who have attempted to sort through the tensions between liberalism and community.

As those who are familiar with his work know, Mason wields a sharp analytic knife (Explaining Political Disagreement, 1993; Ideals of Equality, 1998). In the first part of Community, Solidarity, and Belonging, he uses this to advantage by clarifying the distinction between ordinary and moralized conceptions of community. Ordinary community refers to a group of individuals who share some values, possess a way of life in common, identify with the group, and recognize each other as members of the group. The moralized concept contains all of these but adds solidarity or mutual concern. In a moral community, individuals "give each other's interests non-instrumental weight" (p. 27). Mason also distinguishes among different levels of community, including those below the level of the state (such as minority cultures), those at the level of the state (political communities), and those at a global level (a community of states). These inform the questions at the center of the book: What community should government encourage at the level of the state? and How should political community accommodate communities below and above it?

Aiming to balance the protection of rights with a sense of belonging among citizens, Mason advocates what he calls the "inclusive political community." This is meant to be a practical model, not an impossible ideal. It squarely faces the practical difficulty that arises when liberal states contain communities within them that endorse illiberal views. Perhaps it would be ideal if citizens converged on one (liberal) concept of justice, if their togetherness came from something like moral reasoning. But a workable model of political community must take people much as they are—divided, not only by interest but also by cultural affiliation, and therefore unlikely to agree about either principles of right or conceptions of the good. These divisions are the real matter of politics.

Amid such disagreement, Mason aims not for principles of justice that all can accept but, rather, for a policy of accommodating communities below the level of the state. He claims that recognizing and including groups, often on their own terms, would cultivate a widespread sense of belonging. The policy Mason has in mind comes into sharp focus in matters of education. In a tempered endorsement of multicultural education, Mason recommends a "pluralist" school system where schools are permitted to endorse particular cultures. He says, "the pluralist model maintains that it is legitimate for teachers to evaluate the ideas of different cultures from some particular perspective, find them wanting and dismiss them" (p. 151). While subject to some constraint (such as a bar on propagating racist or sexist notions in the classroom), Mason would go a long way to accommodate specific cultural groups. "In certain circumstances," Mason writes, "there may be a strong case for stopping schools from teaching that the holocaust never happened because this would undermine a sense of belonging, but it is less clear that there could be similar reasons for preventing schools from teaching that creationism is true" (p. 161; italics added). Yet the standard for education should not be a sense belonging, but truth. Against Mason, one might insist that in no circumstances should schools teach what is obviously false—and that those, for instance, who cannot abide by the fact that the Holocaust never happened do not merit a sense of belonging.

Indeed, the extent of accommodation Mason recommends gives a fragile cast to his liberal commitment to protect rights. He argues, for instance, that the content and meaning of rights should come from citizens, not lawyers and judges (pp. 81-2, 90). Fair enough, politics has its place, one which philosophy and jurisprudence are often too ready to usurp. Yet in practice this can be a slippery distinction. Although Mason has in mind a kind of dialogue (not the tussle of interest groups), real politics rarely resembles the openness or reflection of nice discussions. To render rights the prey of political dialogue may denude rights of their symbolic and institutional force. It's an open question whether the broad "liberal perspective" Mason affirms can survive the degree of accommodation that he calls for and continue to count as a liberal doctrine (p. 9). A more direct argument on behalf of maintaining a sense of belonging is needed if we are to fully grasp why, when rights and the claims of cultural minorities conflict, we should relax a commitment to enforcing rights.

Why should liberals care whether nonliberal minorities "feel at home" in the liberal state? One reason might be strategic: The demands of holding polities together might require some condescension from liberal principles. Yet the hand of necessity is not always so near, and in fact Mason's argument is motivated not only by empirical concerns about political unity, but also by a principled commitment to inclusion. This, in turn, would seem to reflect a particular interpretation of moral equality. Since the consequences of these commitments are profound, their justification needs to be made more visible.

The scope of accommodation, for instance, will depend on the way inclusion is justified. If the argument for accommodation is simply strategic, it might apply only where liberalism has a real fight on its hands and thus needs to accommodate. In other places, where liberalism is dominant, liberals may have the luxury of indulging illiberal groups in their midst. Yet to persuade them to grant such indulgences—or further, to persuade readers that protecting rights can be an act of cultural imperialism (pp. 85, 90)—will take a more principled argument about rights and justice than Mason offers. Indeed, Mason raises vital doubts about "the notion of public justifiability" on which many liberals lean so hard (p. 69). Following these doubts through to the full arguments that underlie them would lend stronger support to the book's provocative recommendations. As it stands, this work subtly nudges liberalism's self-image while reminding readers that the politics of protecting liberal rights while accommodating nonliberal groups remains a vexing mix.

Justice and Punishment: The Rationale of Coercion. By Matt Matravers. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000. 286p. $70.00.

Jean Bethke Elshtain, University of Chicago

Justice and Punishment begins promisingly. Matt Matravers notes that the question—"Why and by what right, do some people punish others?"—is "not a new question. The problem of punishment is one of the most enduring in political theory" (p. 1). But over the years, punishment theory has been separated from moral and political philosophy more generally. The upshot is that both punishment theory and moral and political philosophy have suffered. To put things right, Matravers avers, any adequate theory of punishment "must be rooted in a broader moral theory, and that broader moral theory will be ... constructivist" (p. 1). It is the task of his book to explore why and how this is so.

It is undeniably the case, as Matravers insists, that normative political philosophy has been dominated for three decades or more by theories of justice. But these theories, including John Rawls's signal achievement, have concentrated on distributive justice and questions of retributive justice have been excluded. Why is this the case? Matravers has an answer: The separation occurred because "contemporary theories of justice cannot explain the relationship of justice and morality more broadly conceived" (p. 2). This seems a way to restate the problem rather than to offer an answer. But the problem itself is stated clearly: Absent an overall moral context within which to situate both distributive and retributive accounts, such accounts become less connected to, or intelligible to, one another. Going their own separate ways impoverishes each.

Matravers builds his case by exploring, first, what is at stake in the debate between consequentialism and retributivism—the dominant ways of construing the punishment task as an autonomous enterprise. But must one choose one or the other? Are these approaches mutually exclusively? Matravers argues that, no, they are not and that each captures insights that any comprehensive theory must take into consideration. Indeed, second, any account, to be compelling, must incorporate what he calls a "correct understanding" of what is due to responsible moral agents. Is there something like what Simone Weil would call a right to punishment? (Surprisingly, Matravers does not reference Weil, this despite the fact that punishment features centrally in her major treatise, The Need for Roots.)

Contemporary punishment theory is a failure because, no matter how the question is refracted, the need to integrate and to justify an account of punishment within a larger overall theory is ignored. Matravers' first five chapters are devoted to the critical task of showing the internal weaknesses and flaws in current accounts, whether consequentialist or retributivist; whether justice is construed as impartial or mutually self-interested. Chapters 6 through 9 offer his constructivist theory of moral norms, going on to locate coercion and punishment within the framework of what he calls a comprehensive account of the moral community.

This is a very tall order and Matravers hasn't quite met his goal. His meticulous unpacking of the accounts he finds wanting is carefully done. But his arguments suffer from a fair bit of repetition as he states and restates the central dilemma and his assessment of that dilemma. Moving to what he calls "constructivism" rather than "contractualism," and it is less clear than it ought to be precisely what hangs on his rather idiosyncratic use of the term "constructivism," Matravers builds up a moral context within which punishment theory can be located. The elements of such an account must be complex and multiple. Any such account must not only take seriously questions of reciprocity, fair play, and mutual advantage, but also incorporate matters of "sufficient security" and "justified coercion," else punishment theory will wither on the vine.

Especially important here is Matravers' explicit recognition of "the educative function of punishment" whereby a community "expresses its abhorrence at the offender's action" and reaffirms the choice all persons must make between the requirements of membership and the yearning for some hypothetically independent existence. Despite the importance and complexity of its many parts, Justice and Punishment doesn't add up to the compelling, comprehensive moral theory within which Matravers claims, rightly, any account of punishment must be imbedded. His conclusions restate the problem, this time as a claimed accomplishment. But a few quite essential ingredients are missing-including a clearer articulation of precisely what Matravers means by "the moral community" in light of the fact that the conditions of contemporary pluralistic societies are such that we find ourselves members of a number of overlapping moral communities whose requirements for membership in good standing and standards of what counts as an infraction and what as acceptable punishment may conflict with, rather than reinforce, one another.

One minor note: In his determination to right the wrongs of male pronouns, "she" becomes the new universal in Matravers book. The upshot is that all murderers are "shes." This is a bit unsettling.

Suffering and Moral Responsibility. By Jamie Mayerfeld. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999. 237p. $45.00.

Joan C. Tronto, Hunter College, CUNY

Jamie Mayerfeld has written a wise and morally sensitive book that he hopes will compel readers to take seriously their "prima facie duty to relieve suffering" (p. 9). Insofar as "attention to suffering has been a casualty of a long series of attacks on hedonistic utilitarianism" (p. 3), Mayerfeld offers a thorough account of the nature of suffering and argues for the view that its badness imposes a universal prima facie duty for people to try to avoid suffering. Since the purpose of moral inquiry is "to identify wrong kinds of behavior so that we can avoid them" (p. 7), Mayerfeld, not himself a utilitarian, follows a catholic approach and skillfully draws upon arguments from utilitarians, deontologists, Aristotelians, hedonists, psychologists, and philosophers to support his moral intuitions.

The book begins with a detailed account of the nature of suffering and how to measure it. In the fifth chapter, Mayerfeld provides his justification for the prima facie duty to relieve suffering: "because suffering is bad and ought not to occur.... Its occurrence makes the world that much worse" (p. 111). In the last several chapters he discusses limits to the prima facie duty to end suffering, but he concludes in the end that, "at a modest sacrifice, fortunate individuals can prevent an enormous amount of suffering.... Failure to do this is unjustifiable" (p. 224).

Mayerfeld's treatment leaves a number of interesting features of this topic unexplored. The book is not so much about political theory as it is about identifying a moral duty. The political questions that arise from recognizing the existence of such a duty remain unconsidered.

First, we might inquire about the origins of suffering, a topic that is not much discussed here. Mayerfeld is eager that we not focus too much upon evil doing as the source of suffering lest we will think that if we have not committed the evil, then we are not responsible for the suffering or its prevention. Mayerfeld suggests that our failure to follow the precept to prevent and reduce suffering "results largely from a mixture of inattention and indifference. Partly, it results from ignorance or confusion about the meaning and moral significance of suffering" (p. 224). He does not care to pursue the natural, economic, personal, or political causes of suffering any farther. It does not matter to him why there is suffering; the fact that it exists is enough for us to try to prevent or reduce it. As do so many liberal theorists, Mayerfeld seems to think that ignorance alone is responsible for what is wrong in the world; that there might be evil doers who are responsible for this suffering is not the issue. That people obviously also find reasons for inflicting suffering on others, or for ignoring it, cannot be accounted for. Mayerfeld also does not imagine that human actions, even those designed to eliminate suffering, can have harmful unintended consequences. Postmodernists might see in his approach a return to an Enlightenment optimism about the possibility of the mitigation of suffering.

Second, Mayerfeld is so eager for us to recognize suffering per se that a reticence to make judgments about the topic creeps into his writing. The discussion is fairly abstract, and his examples (ranging from slamming one's finger in a door to torture) are not richly described. Such distance is undoubtedly calculated, as it avoids the harm of using others' suffering for exoticism or titillation. Mayerfeld provides ways to compare different kinds and amounts of suffering, but he refrains from making any broad judgments. He stresses the importance of torture, but he is willing to grant that each of us will decide what form of suffering matters the most to us, that for each of us, relieving suffering "will soon take on the character of a personal project" (p. 208). This overall view seems to be that if enough people (all people?) are willing to accept their duty to relieve suffering, then the burden will not be too onerous for any one person in particular (pp. 206-7). Mayerfeld allows that "we would need some mechanism to insure that the appropriate division of labor was actually observed, but I assume that in a world where every one was committed to the prevention of the worst cumulative suffering, this would not be an insurmountable problem" (p. 206). He makes this claim as if this political process could be taken for granted.

Mayerfeld's argument begins from moral intuitions and ends up being able to do little else except try to convince each, individually, to accept this moral starting point for how we might live our lives. Yet, Mayerfeld also shows that two complications make it unlikely that, short of political action. there is any way to achieve this result. First, it is almost impossible for people to perceive the suffering of others and remain focused on it. Second, the duty to relieve suffering is "not as transparent as, say, the prohibition against killing," so that the duty to relieve suffering requires that "we need to calculate what would actually be required to prevent the worst possible suffering" (p. 120). For both of these tasks, to keep focused on suffering and to make calculations about what is required to prevent it, some forms of political institutions and processes are necessary, but Mayerfeld does not want to consider such questions here.

Mayerfeld has done a great service by drawing our attention to suffering. His arguments are careful and thoughtful, and this book should become the standard work on the topic. If only the problem of human suffering were as susceptible to human reason as Mayerfeld thinks it is.

Bodies of Meaning: Studies on Language, Labor, and Liberation. By David McNally. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000. 277p. $72.50 cloth, $23.95 paper.

Nicholas Xenos, University of Massachusetts at Amherst

David McNally styles this book as beginning in a polemic and ending in a "materialist approach to language" much indebted to the German critic Walter Benjamin. The charge is that "postmodernist theory, whether it calls itself poststructuralism, deconstruction or post-Marxism, is constituted by a radical attempt to banish the real human body—the sensate, biocultural, laboring body—from the sphere of language and social life" (p. 1). By treating language as an abstraction, McNally argues, postmodernism constitutes a form of idealism. More than that, it succumbs to and perpetuates the fetishism of commodities disclosed by Marx insofar as it treats the products of human laboring bodies as entities independently of them. Clearly irritated by the claims to radicalism made by those he labels postmodern, McNally thinks he has found their Achilles' heel: "The extra-discursive body, the body that exceeds language and discourse, is the 'other' of the new idealism, the entity it seeks to efface in order to bestow absolute sovereignty on language. To acknowledge the centrality of the sensate body to language and society is thus to threaten the whole edifice of postmodernist theory" (p. 2).

Famously, and somewhat ambiguously, Marx dedicated Capital to Charles Darwin. Darwin figures prominently for McNally, too, and he starts out with a chapter on Nietzsche's relationship to him. McNally finds it curious that there is little contemporary discussion of that relationship: "For here I detect something of a symptomatic silence, an avoidance that hints at a resistance. Read Michel Foucault, Gilles Deleuze, Jacques Derrida, and their followers when they discuss Nietzsche. The near-total absence of Darwin's name is striking" (p. 15). McNally argues that while Darwin provided the inspiration for Nietzsche's attack on the transcendental philosophy of Kant, he later rebelled against the egalitarian implications of Darwinism and produced an idealist reaction against his own early "materialist impulse." This reaction is entailed in the imperative of self-overcoming, the desire to free oneself of the physical and psychic limitations of the body. It also entails a struggle with language, since for Nietzsche language encapsulates the consciousness of the herd in its universalizing concepts. Thus for true experience to be revealed, it must somehow find expression through the language that conceals it. This antidemocratic, disembodied Nietzsche, he claims, is the inspiration to Heidegger and the darling of postmodernism (p. 38).

McNally's approach runs the risk of forcing his concerns onto the vaguely defined "school" he seeks to undermine rather than engaging with the substance of any particular theorist. For example, McNally notes that Deleuze does mention Darwin in his Nietzsche and Philosophy, but only to point out Nietzsche's preference for Lamarck's more active, transformative notion of evolution. He chides Deleuze for not pursuing the significance of Lamarckianism for Nietzsche and claims that it is to be found in Beyond Good and Evil, where McNally sees an effort to create an "aristocratic biology" (p. 27). However, McNally ignores the main focus of Deleuze's book, which is on Nietzsche's critique of nihilism and of dialectical philosophy. Since McNally's project is to validate some form of dialectical thinking, dealing with Deleuze's reading of Nietzsche at that level would seem more productive than projecting an overriding concern with language onto his text.

One theorist McNally does engage in a fairly systematic, albeit brief, way is Derrida. McNally argues that Derrida takes over the worst elements of the theory of language of Ferdinand de Saussure; namely, the notion that linguistic meaning is a product of differentiation within language systems, that meaning is constituted out of the difference between signs within a system. For McNally, this notion of language is an exact replica of the functioning of commodities within capitalism, wherein the value of a thing is determined by its relationship to other things rather than in relation to some intrinsic value or usefulness. Saussure's theory of language is modeled on an economic system, but that system is taken as timeless and universal, whereas in truth it is historically specific. If anything, Derrida is more consistent than Saussure in following this model, McNally claims, a consistency that is best illustrated in Derrida's Given Time: I. Counterfeit Money. There, Derrida is said to construct a notion of the subject as capitalist, as a calculator of identity through debt and exchange, "[a]nd since subjects are constituted in and through language for Derrida, language too must be a system of calculation, a capitalist system" (p. 61). In such a system, there is no discerning between the real and the counterfeit, between cash and credit. McNally then links Derrida to Jean Baudrillard's writings on simulacra to establish the point that postmodernists have reproduced the contemporary world of financial markets and consumer sovereignty, and thus fallen prey to the phantasms of a commodified society.

The phantasm theme and a notion of language that originates in a prelinguistic material world is the principal subject of McNally's largest chapter, on Walter Benjamin. But before he gets there, McNally turns first to contemporary work in evolutionary biology, then to the literary studies of the Russian writers Valentin Voloshinov and Mikhail Bakhtin. Neither are necessary. The survey of Darwinism, paleontology, and anthropology is there to prove a few things: that bodies "speak" through gesture and mimesis, that the capacity to think and to cooperate therefore precedes language, and that the body is historical. All of this may be true, perhaps even more than trivially true, but McNally's confidence will not be shared by everyone, since he is selectively synthesizing a wide variety of theories that support his polemical purposes. His effort here might be reminiscent of Rousseau's use of the materials available in his time to construct a hypothetical evolution of human beings and society in his Discourse on the Origins of Inequality, but McNally lacks Rousseau's sense of irony.

Voloshinov is enlisted to provide a theory of language that is attentive to a "diverse range of socially structured contexts in which people live their lives," which are in turn products of specific relations of production (p. 117). However, McNally finds that Voloshinov cannot transcend such undialectical oppositions as between the natural and the social and the biological and the historical. Bakhtin has the merit of bringing the body back into language and McNally emphasizes his interpretation of carnival as an occasion not only for the inversion of dominant notions of the body in the carnivalesque celebration of the body's "lower stratum" (genitals, bellies, excretory functions, etc.), but also for the expression of unrealized communal aspirations. But McNally also criticizes Bakhtin's interpretation for failing to place the carnival within the context of developing capitalist markets and to see the role carnivals also played in legitimating various social hierarchies through the exclusion or parodying of oppressed

McNally's interpretation of Benjamin's theory of language emphasizes the notion of mimesis, "the act of imaginatively entering into material things" (p. 185). This concept figures in Benjamin's understanding of childhood play as an entering into the physical world. Happiness is this oneness with the world, a relationship that is occluded in adulthood, and the mimetic faculty "takes refuge in language." Thus there emerges "a sort of linguistic unconscious" that is the repository of our sensuous relationship to the world of things (p. 187). McNally rightly emphasizes that Benjamin increasingly came to identify the relationship between people and between people and things in terms of the fetishism of commodities. The task, politically and intellectually, thus becomes to liberate the happiness that is repressed in language and to realize a nonfetishistic relationship to the world of things. McNally notes that Benjamin's notion mirrors Freud's concept of the unconscious and that Benjamin tried to work out on a collective basis Freud's idea of shock. Dialectical images played this role for Benjamin, images that would disrupt the fetishized world of experience and release the repressed memory of happiness. The key move here is to reproduce Freud's notion of the individual unconscious as a collective unconscious, individual memory as collective memory, which is particularly prevalent in Benjamin's unfinished Arcades Project. This is a dubious move in Benjamin's theory, at best, but McNally reads Benjamin as maintaining that, in the era of mass consumption, "[b]ourgeois society produces ... a tremendous uniformity of desires and wishes, its inhabitants really do dream the same collective dreams" (p. 199). This notion is never demonstrated by McNally with any concreteness, and its general character effaces the language of class and gender he is otherwise at pains to deploy.

McNally's polemical intentions thus undermine the parts out of which this book is fashioned. He is determined to find commonalities among theorists as divergent as Deleuze. Derrida, and Baudrillard and begs the question by labeling them all postmodernist. The specific texture and concerns of these writers and others are thus lost to view, and the very real challenges they pose, in turn, to McNally's "materialist" categories are ignored or glossed over. The chapter on Benjamin, in many ways the most interesting, comes up short when Benjamin's concepts prove to be less orthodox than McNally's. It is also noteworthy that in attempting to reclaim Benjamin from those whom he classes as postmodernists, McNally ignores the engagement with Benjamin's notion of language by Derrida or Paul De Man. McNally's book thus not only begins but also ends in a polemic that leaves everything standing as it was before.

Citizenship and National Identity. By David Miller. Cambridge, MA: Polity, 2000. 216p. $29.95.

Jacob T. Levy, University of Chicago

From the title one might expect a sequel of sorts to the author's highly regarded On Nationality (1995). The volume is both less and more than that, although mostly more. David Miller has long been critical of the Anglo-American liberal approach to political theory and has advanced his criticism along a number of fronts. To oversimplify, Miller is not a liberal, he is a civic republican; he is not a universalist liberal, he is a nationalist; he is not a liberal democratic, he is a deliberative democrat; he is not an economic liberal, he is a social democrat.

Some North American critics of liberalism eventually become concerned to show that, really, they are liberals, too, and they are only concerned to debunk certain metaphysical or rhetorical moves made by certain liberal theorists. Miller does not go in for that sort of backsliding. (The now common references to the theory of On Nationality as a species of the genus "liberal nationalism" therefore does him something of an injustice.) He advances serious, careful, civil criticisms of what he takes to be the standard liberal approaches to fundamental questions of political order. He does not blur the distinctions between liberalism and his own views. Liberalism seems to him too individualistic and too universalistic, insufficiently attuned to the collective political, economic, and social projects that take place and ought to take place at the level of the nation-state. In this book he draws those themes together. This makes for a work that, instead of developing much farther the nationalist argument in On Nationality, shows the links between that work and the theories Miller has elsewhere (e.g. Market, State, and Community, 1989; Principles of Social Justice, 2000) developed regarding social justice and citizenship.

Eight of the ten chapters have been previously and separately published, but they hang together quite well. The oldest, written nine years ago, is a piece on deliberative democracy and social choice theory that does feel somewhat dated. It advances what has become the standard view: Deliberation about the common good diminishes the force of social choice theory concerns regarding the coherence of democratic outcomes. But it sets the stage for subsequent chapters in which Miller argues for the close tie between an ideal of deliberative democracy and his understandings of republicanism and nationalism. The balance of the book is largely concerned with demonstrating the value of citizenship in a democratic-republican nation-state and defending it against both more local and more global claims.

Miller argues that "nationality answers one of the most pressing needs of the modern world, namely, how to maintain solidarity among the populations of states that are large and anonymous, such that their citizens cannot possibly enjoy the kind of community that relies on kinship or face-to-face interaction" (pp. 31–2). His is a nationalism stripped of much of the pretense that national sentiment is somehow an extension of the desire for a homogeneous, local, immediate community. Indeed, Miller is acutely concerned to defend the extended community of the nation-state against the claims of ethnic and cultural communities that might more closely approximate a face-to-face ideal. Roughly half the book consists of arguments against various forms of multiculturalism, the politics of difference, and pluralism that might shift citizens' primary loyalties downward from the nation-state.

Miller suggests that liberal and libertarian understandings of citizenship and pluralism are too fragmentary, and a robust republican conception of citizenship is necessary to overcome the centrifugal forces of modern pluralism. He thinks there are genuine national identities attached to the British, Spanish, and Canadian states, and not only to the Scottish, Catalan, and Quebecois subunits; and where nationality takes this nested form, secession by the national minority is not only imprudent but also unfair and actually contrary to the principle of national self-determination. (The British nation has to have a voice; the decision cannot be made by the Scottish nation alone.) He defends the shared project of deliberative democracy against those who say that it disadvantages minorities.

Some parts of this argument are more persuasive than others. In the chapter on liberal, libertarian, and republican responses to pluralism, Miller makes the familiar point that Rawlsian liberal citizenship is supposed to be justified in terms of respect for pluralism, but it excludes those whose religious or other primary identities are incompatible with the liberal polity. He argues that republicanism is more inclusive because it "places no limits on what sort of demand may be put forward in the political forum," and the success of any particular claim depends only on "how far it can be expressed in terms that are close to, or distant from, the general political ethos of the community" (p. 57). But the apparently greater inclusiveness at the level of political argument is bought at the very high price of a shared commitment to a unified political project, regardless of its outcomes. The (in Rawls's terms) unreasonable believers may be brought into common political life, but they must agree to make the common political project more important than their private religious lives. Miller thinks liberal and republican citizenship will converge in practice, for instance, because the republican polity will adopt the usual liberal rights. But it is by no means clear that the subordination in principle of private rights to public outcomes ought to be more preferable to religious or other minorities than the exclusions in principle of liberal public reason.

In addition to arguing against giving priority to subnational groups and identities, Miller engages with partisans of supranational politics. Pieties about cosmopolitan citizenship may jeopardize the reality and real importance of "bounded" citizenship within a finite state; we should not interpret the demands of global justice so broadly as to forget that social justice is primarily an attribute of political communities with shared histories and social understandings. "Global justice" sometimes seems to be one of those topics that attracts writers only after they have a fairly expansive understanding of it. Miller's intervention in this literature is welcome, and I hope he will develop his arguments on this front further.

In so few pages Miller cannot and does not try to restate the separate positive cases for his theories of nationality, social justice, and republicanism. Instead, the book makes the case that those theories mesh, and the combined whole is able to respond to a variety of criticisms. The reader looking for refinements to Miller's previously stated views may be frustrated; other than the (quite important) chapters on secession and nested nationalities, there is little that decisively adds to On Nationality or Principles of Social Justice. To those unfamiliar with Miller's earlier works, this volume may seem like a collection of skeptical review essays on multiculturalism, social choice theory, global justice, communitarianism, and so on, with not much argument for Miller's own preferred alternatives. Moreover, the author's ethical position in general is founded on a Humean deference to received sentiment that, even when fully developed and laid out, can be difficult to engage with. Critical argumentative steps are filled by the appeal to sentiment. Liberal citizenship provides insufficient unity for the pursuit of social justice in the nationstate. Multiculturalism undermines that pursuit; appeals to cosmopolitanism weaken it; and so forth. But the defenses of both nationality and social democracy depends on the existence of sentiments in their favor. Those whose sentiments, or principles, do not incline them toward the social democratic nation-state will sometimes find no point of intellectual entry.

All of that said, this is a valuable addition to Miller's valuable corpus. His complex but generally unified theory of politics has genuine differences with most others on the academic scene. In Citizenship and National Identity Miller makes the case for the theory's unity and politely but vigorously engages with its rivals. Both aspects of the collection help clarify the shape and scope of his intellectual project.

Hannah Arendt and the Politics of Tragedy. By Robert C. Pirro. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 2000. 224p. $38.00.

Annabel Herzog, University of Haifa

Hannah Arendt's so-called nostalgia for the Greek polis stands at the core of most readings of her work, especially in debates between proponents of her concept of action as agonistic and interpreters of this concept as associational or communicative. Many feminist theorists, participatory democrats, and liberals share an aversion to Arendt's philhellenism and criticize her machismo, her apparent neglect of Athenian injustice, and her "republicanism," with its potential for endangering individual autonomy. Similarly, Arendt's emphasis on the political relevance of stories and her self-acknowledged storytelling have also given rise to extensive interpretations. Arendt scholars, in line with many contemporary political theorists, reject the totalizing and universalizing power of theory and argue that human plurality is better expressed in stories than in abstract homogeneous theory. According to them, by exemplifying or illuminating general intuitions and propositions, storytelling concretizes the understanding of politics. They suggest that stories allow the political thinker to be critical and situated. Moreover, stories take into account forgotten parts of history, or forgotten parts of the political sphere, often denied in theories that cannot accept difference and contingency.

As Robert Pirro rightly argues, no one has really studied the link between these two sides of Arendt's thought, that is, her use of the Greek tradition and her storytelling. In his carefully argued and well-documented book, Pirro attempts to "compensate for this neglect by indicating how an unacknowledged theory of Greek tragedy... shaped her understanding of storytelling" (p. 9). He patiently analyzes the distinct foundations and intuitions of Arendt's thought and brings them together toward the discovery of a "theory of tragedy," which, by analyzing the relation between her narrative method and her admiration for Greek political culture, sheds new light on her work. In so doing, Pirro affirms the relevance of such a theory in promoting contemporary democratic participation, challenging opponents to Arendt's philhellenism, and revealing the task of the political theorist.

The book starts nicely with an analysis of the themes and narrative strategy of Arendt's early article "We Refugees," which, as Pirro demonstrates, already sets "the basic terms she would use to theorize for the next thirty years about the nature and meaning of politics in the modern world" (p. 5). "We Refugees" reveals two major issues of Arendt's thought. The first is her "struggle both to be a part of and to stand apart from a group of people with whom one identifies," which is aimed at promoting a "form of public- and critical-minded democratic citizenship" (p. 7). The second is her elaboration of a narrative "that both conveys the shocking novelty of the experiences it recounts and asserts a claim for their exemplary significance" (p. 6).

In chapters 3 and 4 we are shown how Arendt's focus on tragedy follows from these issues. Pirro emphasizes that, according to Arendt, action and freedom need to be limited, or shaped by a stable framework. In other words, contingency appears only in a predetermined structure (pp. 52–3), the lack of which characterizes our modern times. He shows that Arendt distinguishes among three historical periods: a Greek period, during which the stable structures of political freedom were provided by tragedy; a period starting with pagan Rome through to the nineteenth century, defined by authority; and postauthority, contemporary times. In our world, so long as a substitute for authority is lacking, there can be no real practice of political freedom. In ancient tragedy, Arendt finds examples of a political life with a stable framework but without authority, which help her elaborate a postauthority alternative.

Indeed, Pirro's opposition to the widespread view that Arendt is no stalgic for authority is a major quality of his book. Yet, to say that tragedy offers an image of a nonauthoritarian public life does not necessarily imply that the polis was managed in such a nonauthoritarian way. Moreover, Pirro suggests not only that tragedy was, for Arendt, a faithful image of the Athenian polis way of life (p. 75) but also that it promoted such a way of life, that is, a life without authority (pp. 78-9). He is therefore led to the conclusion that Arendt was a pure product of a "predominantly German tradition of thought, which contends explicitly that Greek tragedy acted as the foremost institution of political education" (p. 78). This would be only of historical relevance were not Pirro to suggest that Arendt recommended some "equivalent of tragedy as a contemporary replacement for ... authority" (p. 79). This equivalent is storytelling, which serves "to promote political freedom as a mode of being that is accessible, continuous and durable" (p. 76).

To understand how storytelling achieves such a purpose, Pirro turns (in chap. 4) to Arendt's notion of judgment and its corollary, the political spectator. He shows that, again, Arendt finds her examples in Greece, namely, in the Athenian tragic spectator (p. 99). Thus, what seems to interest Arendt in tragedy is not only its educative political content but also a way of listening and looking at the world that tragedy induces in its spectators (p. 139). Pirro then formulates the theory of tragedy implicit in Arendt's work, a theory of "reconciliation and initiative-taking" (p. 142) based on the identification of the audience "with the hero in his twofold role as immortal and as member of the dead" (p. 141).

This formulation of Arendt's understanding of Greek tragedy is highly plausible, as is Pirro's suggestion that her storytelling was intended to replace authority in modern times. Some other claims are less persuasive. Pirro provides many examples of Arendt's analysis of Greek tragedy but almost no examples of her own method of writing. This lack has two main consequences. First, one may still feel entitled to wonder about the modern political relevance of a theory of Ancient Greek tragedy. In other words, Pirro does not evoke the original and new features of Arendt's storytelling and portrays her as focused on preauthority times. Hence, we are still given a "nostalgic Arendt" and find it difficult to understand her contribution to contemporary times.

Second, Pirro provides a lengthy description of the significance for Arendt of tragedy in politics but virtually ignores the tragic features of her own narrative. In other words, he shows what Arendt has to say about tragedy but not what she told tragically. This results in a contradiction. On the one hand, Pirro's emphasis on the importance of storytelling as against or complementary to theory leaves us with a convincing theory of tragedy but fails to provide an account of the political function of storytelling in our times. On the other hand, his exhaustive account of how tragic storytelling worked on Athenian citizens fails to show how a theory of tragedy works on modern citizens. Hence, Pirro fails to contribute to our understanding of how Arendt's theory of tragedy might help resolve modern political problems.

Total Freedom: Toward A Dialectical Libertarianism. By Chris Matthew Sciabarra. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2000. 390p. $65.00 cloth, $24.50 paper.

Peter G. Stillman, Vassar College

Sciabarra's book attempts to conjoin dialectics with libertarianism to produce total freedom. He is led to this seemingly odd conjunction by a concatenation of concerns. He sees dialectics as the logic or method most attentive to contexts and libertarianism as a radical political ideology of freedom. He sees the opportunity to free dialectics of its totalitarian (including Marxist) overtones and libertarianism of its apparent irrelevance, which is the more galling now that once-popular Marxism has failed as radical social theory. He wishes to combine his own academic appreciation of the dialectical elements of Marx's method with his long-standing love of libertarian ideas. Primarily, he hopes to expand libertarian thought from a narrow concentration on economic self-interest and the state as repressive to a broader concern with the cultural, social, and historical preconditions of freedom, and he sees dialectics, with its emphasis on contexts, dynamism, and relations, as a method that can be appropriated by libertarians to realize these broader concerns and to propound a comprehensive and radical social theory. No longer need libertarian thought be seen as atomic individualism struggling for freedom against state violence; building on dialectical thinking shorn of its Marxist content, libertarians can embrace whole individuals living in rich social environments that can carry out, without violence, the social powers that the state has illegitimately appropriated.

The result is a long book divided into two almost-equal parts: "Dialectics: History and Meaning" and "Libertarian Crossroads: The Case of Murray Rothbard." The book ends with a brief chapter surveying recent exemplars of dialectical libertarianism and a briefer epilogue expressing the hope of continuing this new way of thinking. Sciabarra's approach in both parts verges on the encyclopedic: He presents a topic or thinker by encompassing a wide range of secondary sources or alternative positions (or both). Whether the topic is Marx on the dialectic or Rothbard on the origins of the state, he wishes to report almost every possible opinion that might be germane, and his bibliography (48 pages) shows it. He responds to critics of his past two books on points relevant to this one; he appends explanatory or exploratory footnotes that mention interesting, significant, or tangential issues; and he includes many footnotes thanking colleagues for helpful comments or communications, implying a community of scholars and interested parties working together on a novel but important political undertaking. No one can doubt the amount of his scholarship, his commitment to his topic, his generosity of spirit, and his desire to encompass as many opinions as possible.

The result is a hefty book. But I kept wishing that the book were twice as long, so that Sciabarra could have made informative arguments about every issue he mentions, or—and better—half as long, so that he could have focused on the central points and developed them with careful analysis and examples. I also kept thinking that Sciabarra has written two books—one scholarly, the other hoping to influence libertarian ideas—that are melded uneasily into one volume.

In Part One, his first three chapters present a history of dialectical thinkers and his fourth ends with a definition of dialectics (p. 173) and a 15-page "unpacking" of the definition: the chapters are a treasure trove of statements about dialectical methodology. How readers evaluate these chapters will probably vary widely; I do not find them illuminating. In his treatment of Hegel, for instance, Sciabarra uses all sorts of secondary sources—late Victorian Hegel scholars, contemporary ones, those who use Hegel for their own ends such as Fukuyama, and economic historians such as Heilbronertreating their remarks with equal weight. On the other hand, he does not touch on the masterful discussions of Hegelian dialectic in Michael Forster's Hegel and Stepticism (1989). Charles Taylor's Hegel (1975), or George Armstrong Kelly's Hegel's Retreat from Eleusis (1978). Moreover, most of what Sciabarra says derives from what others say about Hegel's dialectic, not from analysis of what Hegel himself says; and when Sciabarra does refer to Hegel's famous dialectics of master-slave (pp. 71-2) and the opening triad of the Logic [being, nothing, becoming (pp. 67–8)], his brevity means that he necessarily omits what many would see as crucial: He mentions only work and satisfaction in the master-slave relation and, oddly, labels "becoming" as a "halfway-house" between being and nothing. Hegel's stress on the dialectic as concrete, his emphasis on negation and, especially, "determinate negation" (mentioned in passing on p. 64, note 26), his refusal to speculate about the future and his argument that freedom can only be comprehended as existent in the present (not posited in some future)—all these are almost completely ignored. As with Hegel, so throughout Part One: many sources, used (or ignored) without apparent discrimination, few references to (and little analysis of) original texts, and even fewer examples of the dialectic at work. The result, however, is mixed: While I find the resulting definition disconnected from the history and too general and vague (so that many thinkers are dialecticians by Sciabarra's definition without knowing it), some might find the sheer volume of information useful, and Sciabarra himself might well reply that he wishes to present a workable sense of dialectics for libertarian thought and so gives statements that lead to defining it in terms that can be readily understood and easily applied, even if unsatisfactory for scholars.

I have the same types of problems with Part Two. Sciabarra's wide-ranging and extensive presentation of Rothbard's libertarianism is doubtless the best secondary treatment of the subject, including both sympathetic understanding and severe critique—though much of the critique focuses on Rothbard's (nondialectical) dualism. Reading Sciabarra raised for me a further set of questions. Can a philosophy of origins, like Rothbard's, which presents a hypothetical original condition containing central continuing norms, ever be effectively dialectical (because the central norms are historically unchanging from the original condition)? Can a philosophy built on a Manichean dualism between the good market and the evil state be dialectical? Following Hegel's insights (Philosophy of Right, Sections 242-6), does the libertarian tendency to talk about a free market without mentioning wage labor or poverty involve ignoring essential contexts or aspects of the market? Of these three queries, Sciabarra does not address the first; he spells out dualism (pp. 344-6) and asserts that for Rothbard the state will be replaced by voluntary cooperation, but does not show the dynamics or logic for this change (see pp. 346-7); and he mentions and buries wage labor in a two-sentence footnote (p. 259, note 34). Since especially my last query addresses dialectics as "context-keeping," Sciabarra's informal core definition of dialectics, his refusal to address the issue is as disconcerting as his willingness to mention it.

In short, this book is not a scholarly or analytic discussion of dialectics or a complete dialectical critique of Rothbard's libertarianism. But perhaps it was meant to be not a scholarly work but a book dedicated to reshaping libertarian theory and ideology. Total Freedom suggests that relational, contextual, and dynamic (i.e., dialectical) methods might strengthen some of the weak points of libertarian theory and might overcome some of the unpopular gaps in libertarian ideology. So it should be read by libertarians and by those who study Rothbard's thought. Even beyond the project of dialectical libertarianism, Sciabarra's book might provoke some thinkers to look again at dialectics—but they will have to go beyond his book if they wish to make sense of dialectical thinking.

Cinematic Political Thought: Narrating Race, Nation, and Gender. By Michael J. Shapiro. New York: New York University Press, 1999. 176p. $55.00 cloth, $18.50 paper.

John Seery, Pomona College

Writing on the outskirts of Hollywood, where my college campus episodically turns into a set location for the filming of West Wing or, most recently, Pearl Harbor, I have picked up a few pointers about the biz just by keeping my ears perked. "Talk to me, babe! Luv ya. My agent will get back to you on that. What's my motivation?" And so on. Clichés and formulas do matter, however, in such a large-scale collaborative enterprise because often they provide the underlying rules of the game. The first rule of screenwriting, any insider knows, is that you must hook your reader on page one. If you do not grab your audience right from the start, even before the opening credits roll, the rest of the spec script will surely get tossed, and the movie will never get made.

Michael Shapiro begins his Cinematic Political Thought: Narrating Race, Nation and Gender thus: This book is both a series of investigations into aspects of contemporary politics and a more general attempt to articulate a critical philosophical perspective with politically disposed treatments of contemporary cinema.... What I offer is a politics of critique, which, in a Kantian spirit, specifies an attitude rather than a particular destination. My investigations treat various aspects of the present, but they are anti-diegetic and non-hermeneutic; I attribute no clear historical direction to the temporal differences with which I deal and I do not seek to attract a particular interpretation of contemporary life-worlds.

The second stock rule of screenwriting is that plot and dialogue should adhere to Aristotle's Poetics. Rewrite coaches often cite Aristotle's line: "Character and thought are merely obscured by a diction that is overbrilliant" (Poetics 25). Applying that advice to the above passage, I would have bluelined at least anti-diegetic.

To be fair, perhaps Shapiro's text should not be assessed as a potential script, but he invites such a direct comparison by stating explicitly that he is attempting to write much of the book cinematically (pp. 6–7). Gilles Deleuze, moreover, served as Shapiro's Muse (his "sustained inspiration") for this project:

By directing a series of engagements and juxtapositions among different thought models and different historical moments, I seek to make the present surprising and contingent rather than simply a refinement of certain widely accepted chronologies of historical political trends. In addition to engaging in critical interventions that make use of genealogical and deconstructive modes of interpretation (among others), I make use of the radical temporality of cinematic composition, which, by its mode of presentation, resists the perspectives of the characters and groups whose actions it portrays.

By "cinematic" writing Shapiro means poststructuralism by other means. He wants to deploy jump-cuts, flash-backs, montages, and voice-overs in order to disrupt a more linear or bounded narrative and exemplify an alternative politics of shifting and unsettled identities. Cinematic presentations both show and tell, but the former can undercut the latter. The question we might pose about Shapiro's overall aspiration toward filmic creativity is: Should we regard this particular production, departing as it does from industry standards, as an indie flick, an art-house experiment, or a mockumentary?

Shapiro assembles and directs an ensemble cast of Deleuze, Derrida, Foucault, Lyotard, Guattari, Benjamin-and even Carl Schmitt makes an important cameo appearance—but Kant is the star of the show. Some might question booking Kant as a headliner (hardly the show-stopper with his humorless penchant for talking-head monologue), but Shapiro insists that Kant has been unfairly typecast as a mere method actor posing as high-minded aesthete. Indeed, that is the high concept for the book as a whole: Kant, whose dramatic range allegedly extends from cognitive philosophizing to protopoststructuralist performativity, can be enlisted to illuminate the real-world effects of several off-beat and low-budget films, which in turn allegedly confirm his cross-over appeal. Does the stretch work? Will Shapiro be able to attract financial backing to get the idea off the ground? If not, what is the point? Why not call a book a book and title it simply and aptly, Kantian Political Thought? (The third time-tested rule of screenwriting is, know your genre; keep within it; avoid

As a work of political theory, Cinematic Political Thought makes many bold, intelligent, and impressive moves. It is not the first book to move toward a confluence of political theory and film studies; one recalls Stanley Cavell's landmark The World Viewed (1980) or, more recently, Michael Rogin's Blackface, White Noise (1998), Mary Nichols's Reconstructing Woody (1998), Hanna Pitkin's The Attack of the Blob (1998), and others. Shapiro's eclectic appropriation of Kant, on reflection, makes perfectly good sense, even if the presentation is polemically pushed and rushed. Shapiro contends that Kant's legacy ought to be understood not only in philosophically stabilizing terms but also in critically political, even radical ways. Kant constructed personhood not just as an apprehending structure of cognition but as a judging intellect that emerges in a political context.

Scratch at the transcendentalist overlay and right below the surface you will always find a Kantian acknowledgment of untamed contingency. Kant moves toward enlightenment neither initially nor even ultimately to introduce unquestionable universalist truths but, rather, to resist ongoing closed-mindedness. He mobilizes a global citizenship that opposes parochial allegiances. In the Kantian scheme of things, the world cannot be understood and experienced without mediation, and any mediating structure betrays some kind of productive human intervention. Shapiro is ambivalent about many of Kant's contributions but finally views him as a critical healer, not as a polarizing dogmatist, which is why he deserves star billing.

The purported connection between Kant and cinema is that both produce an enlarged subject that assumes communicability to a wide audience. The unspoken trick is that such a hyperbolic fantasy can in turn condition and shape further experience, which is to say that in the modern mass-mediated world, the mass media are not simply reflective but also implicitly productive of our cultural meta-narratives; and those backlighted productions often provide arrested, entrenched, occluded, and invidious forms of identity. Kant's formal critique of modernity, invoking a sensus communis, is instructive, according to Shapiro, but at the same time is insufficient to resist institutionalized forms of intelligibility.

To decode even further the circulatory politics informing modern movies and vice versa, Shapiro turns from Kant to post-Kantian Nietzscheans Foucault and Deleuze. In order to exhibit rival notions of time (à la Deleuze) in order to expose racialized narratives involving sports disciplines (à la Foucault), Shapiro compares two movies, Hoop Dreams and Barry Lyndon. In short, one is frenetically fast, and the other is painfully slow (trust me, do not assign Barry Lyndon to undergraduates as much as you might respect Shapiro's viewer picks); and the separate pacing evinces and reinforces separate epistemes of temporality.

Subsequent chapters take on globalization (and its discontents) and masculinity (and its discontents), respectively. According to Shapiro, many of our nationalist and globalist narratives are based on identity stories that become fix-framed in a collective imaginary. Puritans, Zionists, CPAs, Christian ecumenicals, and security analysts such as Sam Huntington are all prone to such exclusionary conjurations. Shapiro draws upon the movies Father of the Bride II and Lone Star to make his case. Anxiously heteronormative notions of masculinity and whiteness, prominent in the 1980s and 1990s and bound up with statist and capitalist concerns, can be teased out through a close screening of To Live and Die in LA, aided by Shapiro's astute commentary. Since a copy of this film may not be available in your neighborhood Blockbuster, one has to wonder about it, Father of the Bride II, and some of Shapiro's other citations: How representative or influentially performative have such films been?

The erudite is situated right next to the kitschy, and Shapiro foregrounds his jarring juxtapositions by calling them cinematic. I see them instead as elegiac, or as another kind of jeremiad, in either case symptomatic of another possible anxiety, namely, that bookish political theory increasingly is being displaced by multimedial modalities in the late-modern world. Our filmic eye candy probably stands in some need of heavy-handed contestation, but somehow I doubt that many movie-goers will be running out of the theaters to pick up a copy of Kant's Third Critique as a result of this book. From my armchair perspective, I give Cinematic Political Theory a thumbs up for learned decency, a thumbs down for prolixity, and a "PG" rating overall (recommended for postgraduates only).

Rethinking State Theory. By Mark J. Smith, New York: Routledge, 2000. 281p. $100.00.

Bob Jessop, Lancaster University

Mark Smith has written a dense, challenging, and provocative analysis of three contrasting approaches to power and how they are shaped by different philosophies of social science. This is not a book for the theoretically faint-hearted or metatheoretically challenged. Indeed, those who pick it up expecting to find a simple guide to recent state theory will be badly disappointed. For it does not provide a survey or critique of state theory as such. Nor does it provide a new theory based on self-evident assumptions about the nature of the state and politics. Instead its author offers a sustained meta-theoretical commentary on the intellectual conditions of possibility of serious engagement with the state and state power from a broader, societal perspective. Smith attempts this because he discerns a crisis in the taken-for-grantedness of the typical objects of inquiry of such disciplines as economics, politics, and sociology. He claims that their respective objects are increasingly seen as complex, uncertain, and contested spaces and that these disciplines themselves have become disoriented. Inter alia, this requires a rethinking of the state as an analytical object. In pursuing this meta-theoretical project, Smith draws heavily on the "critical realist" position (initially known as "transcendental realism" or "critical naturalism") of the British-based philosopher of science, Roy Bhaskar. Thus his analysis begins with some crucial distinctions among empiricism, idealism, and realism and explores their different ontological, epistemological, methodological, and substantive implications for the analysis of social relations. It then addresses the philosophical and theoretical development of three very different theorists of power, who are taken as interesting if not wholly representative exemplars of empiricism, idealism, and a mixture of idealism and realism, respectively. Smith concludes with some of his own meta-theoretical comments on state theory.

The three theorists chosen for dissection are, according to Smith's own labels, the neopluralist Robert Dahl, the interdisciplinary neoliberal Friedrich von Hayek, and the neo-Marxist Bob Jessop. Smith justifies his choice on three grounds: their relevance for contemporary discussions about the state and the good polity, their distinctive focus on the relationship between the state and cultural and economic institutional forms, and their distinctive ontological and epistemological standpoints. He also claims that each advances "an account of the 'sociality of politics,' i.e., the embedding of politics within a broader social order. This takes the form 'polyarchic civility" (a distinctive form of citizenship enabling citizens to exercise full autonomy) in Dahl's mature work, "intersubjective catallaxy" (enabling knowledgeable economic actors to engage in the realization of plans and motives in market economy—in part through what they learn observing the effects of their actions) in Hayek's writings, and the relationship between the state and "societalization" (or the production of society effects) in Jessop's work. In exploring the foundational assumptions of these three theorists' reflections on power, their different intellectual trajectories, and the limitations in their mature theoretical and political positions, Smith hopes both to generate new insights into their respective analytical objects and to develop his own guidelines for rethinking the nature of the state.

Based on his distinctions among empiricism, idealism, and critical realism, Smith provides an extended analysis of Dahl's movement from an empirical realist, one-dimensional analysis of power to an idealist (in ontological and epistemological terms) account of the structural preconditions and subjective requirements of polyarchic civility. He emphasizes that Dahl shifted toward a normative commitment to democratizing the economy as well as the polity and suggests that this shift is rooted in Dahl's adoption of a neo-Kantian idealist epistemology. Nonetheless, Dahl continues to neglect the complexities of the state's internal structures and mechanisms, of the public-private distinction, and the circuits of formal and informal power that shape policy making and implementation. However, it is only by exploring these issues, Smith claims, that can one fully understand the link between political institutions and their cultural conditions.

He then examines Hayek's social and political thought. He argues that, in addressing the problematic standing of time and the social distribution of knowledge within economic theory, Hayek forges a creative synthesiis between the Kantian critique of rationalism and phenomenological explanations of social action. In this context, Hayek develops the notion of catallaxy (a self-generating economic order) and then extends it to a particular account of the "constitution of liberty" based on the rule of law and a nightwatchman state as a matrix for the exercise of individual free choice.

Smith then explores the present reviewer's work. He provides a very detailed analysis of my work from its earliest presentation in 1979 through work published in 1997. I learned much about my own intellectual development from this, even though I do not fully recognize some aspects of his interpretation. Smith correctly identifies the major turning points in my work and, in particular, its concern with synthesizing the regulation approach in political economy, a neo-Gramscian interpretation of Poulantzas's state theory, and critical discourse analysis and the catalytic role of my "coquetting" with ideas from the German systems theorist, Niklas Luhmann. Whether or not Smith is correct to argue that my work in 1997 still retained strong elements of idealism (in its ontological and epistemological senses) as well as moving toward critical realism is best left to others to decide. For no theorist is ever completely contemporary with his or her intellectual development.

The book concludes with some critical comments on the recent popularity (described as "me too-ism") of critical realism because it encourages theoretical complacency. Thus Smith rejects Jeffrey Isaac's recent description of the later Dahl as a critical realist, Tony Lawson's critical realist appropriation of Hayek, and my own claim to have embraced critical realism. Above all, he suggests that all three theoretical approaches tend to miss the importance of ontological depth of the real world (i.e., the stratification of the real world and its associated causal mechanisms, capacities, and liabilities) and that they are insufficiently sensitive to the complexities of representing that world both in everyday practice and in scientific observation. This leads him to present in the final pages of the book a new critical realist model of concept formation and empirical inquiry that would be adequate to the sociality of the political, i.e., its embedding in the economy, political institutions, and civil society.

This book is not an easy read for those without a solid grounding in the philosophy of the social sciences and a ready familiarity with the works of the theorists investigated. Indeed it places demands even on those with such background understanding. But it certainly merits close attention by those who want an intellectual challenge and, like this reviewer, are interested in the meta-theoretical foundations of social inquiry. The summaries of the work of Dahl, Hayek, and Jessop are full and fair, the criticisms are well developed and well defended against alternative interpretations, and the theoretical agenda presented by way of conclusion merits attention. This is a book that can be recommended to specialists and for library purchase rather than for course use. It will prove valuable to those interested in exploring the hidden philosophical assumptions of other currents in social theory and in developing a well-founded postdisciplinary analysis of the sociality of state power and the conditions for effective political participation.

Civic Liberalism: Reflections on Our Democratic Ideals. By Thomas A. Spragens, Jr. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 1999. 271p. $70.00 cloth, $24.95 paper.

Stanley C. Brubaker, Colgate University

Of the many endeavors in the last three decades to restate the central aspirations of liberalism, this important work is one of the most balanced, nuanced, and cogent. Part of its success lies in its willingness to stretch the boundaries of what we call liberalism, but in doing so, Spragens only brings liberal theory into better alignment with intuitions and sensibilities underlying liberal practice.

His argument is divided into two parts. The first assesses the state of contemporary liberal thought; the second offers his own "civic" alternative. Spragens groups theorists of liberalism into four broad schools, each characterized by a tendency to mistake a central but partial truth for the whole. Thus, "Liberal Realists"—a motley group that includes Hobbes, Rorty, and Shklar—teach us to respect the sober and somewhat fragile achievements of security and civil peace, which safeguard us from our worst fears but neglect our best hopes. "Libertarians" stress moral reality and integrity of individual lives and the economic and political benefits of a market economy but exaggerate the absolutism of self-ownership as well as the tendency for government regulation to set us on "the road to serfdom." "Liberal Egalitarians"—Rawls and company—remind us of the role of chance in the allocation and development of natural talent, but fail to take seriously our separateness as distinct and morally responsible individuals. "Difference Liberals," such as William Connolly and Iris Young, properly warn of the tendency of dominant groups to "naturalize" and "privilege" contingent differences, thereby threatening the ideals of liberty and equality, but they themselves privilege and so encourage overstated claims of oppression, thereby facilitating the balkanization of political life.

In light of the success and failures of these other models, Spragens offers in Part Two his "civic" alternative. As befits a liberal theory, liberty and equality retain their central place, but neither is conceived as a goal to be maximized. Instead, liberty is restated as "autonomy," a "constitutive" and "threshold" good, that puts together the "positive" and "negative" dimensions of liberty that Isaiah Berlin misleadingly sundered. Equality is restated as a "moral postulate" that recognizes our distinctively human capacities for rational self-direction and moral judgment as well as an instrumental good that facilitates other aspects of civic liberalism. In politics, it seeks a substantive equality of influence. In economics, it competes with the need for incentives and the moral claims of individual desert, presumptive self-ownership, and beneficence among family and friends.

Important as are these restatements of liberty and equality, what gives civic liberalism its most distinctive character is its emphasis on civic friendship and virtue. Friendship, of course, is not a distinctively liberal ideal and, for many theorists, is an ideal that is not even compatible with liberalism. Rejecting Aristotle's account of friendship in favor of that of C. S. Lewis, Spragens places less emphasis on the essential goodness of friends than on their "common affection for an object that they do not embody but rather appreciate" (p. 202) whether that be pushpin or poetry—and by lowering the bar, he seeks to render friendship complementary to liberalism's ideals of autonomy and equality. Furthermore, by fostering goodwill and trust and thus greater capacity for social action, friendship, he argues, is conducive to limited government, toleration, deliberation, and compromise. Friendship combines with equality to place renewed emphasis on public venuespublic libraries, parks, zoos, museums, festivals, and schools. And it moderates autonomy to preserve their civic atmosphere and purpose; so schools need not tolerate disruptive students, libraries can throw out the drunks, and museums can insist on decorum.

There is much to admire in this work: its criticisms are incisive, but balanced; its restatement of liberal ideals is nuanced, mindful of the trade-offs among political goods, persuasive, and well moored in the moral intuitions underlying liberal practice; its spirit is generous, though tough-minded; its style is clear, lively, and friendly. Indeed the work exemplifies many of the ideals that civic liberalism extols.

Despite his rhetorical effort to stay within the liberal tradition, it might be more accurate, however, to understand Spragens' work as a synthesis of liberalism and republicanism. And it is important to note that the republican tradition on which he draws is "horizontal" rather than "vertical," that is, its morality derives more from equality than excellence. Accordingly, his work is not altogether immune from the risks of the former or mindful of its need for the latter. In extending equality in politics from the formal equality of voting to substantial equality of influence, he casually endorses restrictions on political speech (or at least spending on political speech), ignoring the empirical literature on the limited independent impact of money and neglecting the warnings from Madison's Federalist Ten on the threat of such egalitarian impulses to the "first object" of liberal government. One must wonder then how well civic liberalism would safeguard freedom of speech against other contemporary lateral pressures such as the feminist attack against what it calls pornography (i.e., whatever has the effect of subordinating women) or the politically correct attack against "insensitive" speech on college campuses. The "vertical," or perfectionist, strand of liberal republicanism, in contrast, by differentiating types of freedom and holding speech higher than mere expression, allows for the restriction of obscenity and vulgarity without threatening political speech or the pursuit of wisdom. Despite its relation to his project and independent importance, however, Spragens gives perfectionist liberalism comparatively little attention. More emphatically than most liberal theories, civic liberalism does stress the importance of virtue in the citizenry. But virtue becomes an instrumental good serving the ends of autonomy, equality, and friendship, not the embodiment of human excellence. Jimmy Stewart and Charles Kuralt, not Socrates or Lincoln, are its exemplars.

Civic liberalism would bring us a polity better suited for the human spirit than any of the four models Spragens criticizes. It would underwrite a centrist approach to a range of policies—welfare, social security, health care, and immigration—with substantial support in the polity but championed by neither left nor right. It would restore a civil society of vibrant voluntary organizations. And it would support a vital public realm of "effective public schools, accommodating public spaces, inviting public parks, accessible public libraries, and fiscally viable public hospitals" (p. 258). Perhaps it is too much to ask of a liberal theory that it also be inspiring.

Reproducing the State. By Jacqueline Stevens. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1999. 307p. $49.50 cloth, $18.95 paper.

Somer Brodribb, University of Victoria

Jacqueline Stevens grapples with the meanings of political society and affiliation and how we think about what constitutes family, nation, ethnicity, and race. How do we come to know ourselves and others through these political artifices and naturalized identities? Her project is to trouble our complacencies and make visible the arbitrary practices that produce the inclusions and exclusions of the "state-nation" (p. 43). She examines democratic, communitarian, and liberal theories of political society and finds little attention there to the problem of membership and the ways groups are constituted. Birth, the family, ethnicity, and national origin are undertheorized or considered to derive from natural, ancestral ties. Stevens addresses these inadequacies, and superbly reveals the centrality of birth and kinship practices to political societies.

Reproducing the State is a stunning and original rethinking of justice and the politics of difference. Stevens draws attention to Rawls's understanding of political society "as the location that settles differences, rather than the form that gives rise to them" (p. 4). Her challenge is this: "People starving to death in Ethiopia, dying in cattle cars en route to the United States from Mexico, and losing their homes for want of the right ethnicity in Bosnia...all of these necessarily follow from the prerogatives of political societies to regulate membership according to family ties. These events are not accidents in a world system of familial-based nation-states, but rather are their bases and outcome" (p. 7). The state constitutes and then regulates the intergenerational family form. and this grammar of membership underwrites the nation and reinforces the rules of affiliation and the racial taxonomies of political society.

Methodologically, Stevens draws from Foucauldian forms and practices, Hegelian sense-certainty, and Derridean deconstruction. She is critical of Marx (who somehow forgot intergenerational wealth) and Foucault (who dismissed the sovereign power of the state). Politically, Stevens draws from Rosa Luxemburg and turn-of-the-century anarchists, who "understood that the façade of 'citizenship' which follows from the state obliterated the rights of human beings around the world" (p. 41). Theoretically, she positions herself "critical, neo-Hegelian" (p. xiii). Practically, she urges us "to think through ways of reproducing political societies so that kinship principles would play a diminished role. Two means for accomplishing this would be the elimination of any state involvement in marriage and the curtailment of citizenship requirements based on birth or ancestry" (p. 280).

In contrast to other feminist scholarship, Stevens takes up the role of states in creation of gender rather than the role of gender in the creation of states (e.g., see Carole Pateman, The Sexual Contract, 1988). Certainly, this book is a phenomenology of affiliation, not a philosophy of birth (e.g., see Mary O'Brien, The Politics of Reproduction, 1981). Stevens is concerned with the traffic in kinship, not the traffic in women (Gayle Rubin, "The Traffic in Women: Notes on the 'Political Economy' of Sex," in Rayna Rapp Reiter, ed., Toward an Anthropology of Women, 1975). For Stevens, gender is constituted through, rather than constitutive of, political societies.

In the context of critical studies of racism and nationalism, this work is unlike the materialist approach to the racist appropriation of labor power represented by Colette Guillaumin (Racism, Sexism, Power and Ideology, 1995). As Stevens tells us, the book is "largely about the heuristics of certain forms of being" (p. 280). Contrary to those who contend that racism creates race, she argues that "race always entails race-ism" (p. 173). Indeed, race is "the culmination of political society, family, nation" (p. 173).

An exercise in meticulous scholarship, Reproducing the State unravels the complexities of categories of being and belonging. Same-sex issues are clearly of interest to Stevens, and their importance is raised throughout the book. Chapter 4, on race and the state, and chapter 6, on religion and fundamentalism, are rewarding reading. Stevens challenges all origin stories and racial taxonomies based on geographical territories and outlines how they are reproduced through birth certificates and laws of miscegenation and legitimacy.

I am ambivalent about the contribution made by Reproducing the State. Often, feminist critical race theory and lesbian/queer scholarship are not fully engaged. A discussion is begun but not sustained or is relegated to the footnotes—truly moved to the margins, and in excruciatingly small type. This is odd in a wide-ranging collection by a well-read scholar who can balance discussions across the Norman conquest, surrogacy adoptions, and an equal rights complaint about Kozy Kitten cat food. The effect is to shortchange these critical analyses, and this diminishes the significance of her contribution. Yet, she challenges some of the key notions of these literatures.

This attempt at a political theory based on how the state reproduces and recognizes populations is situated too narrowly in a structural analysis of discourse with phenomenological longings. In the end, Stevens returns to Hegel rather than hegemony, or at least centered and not scattered hegemony (e.g., see Inderpal Grewal and Caren Kaplan, eds., Scattered Hegemonies: Postmodernity and Transnational Feminist Practices, 1994). Emphasizing how identity is tied to the state, Stevens has little room for communities of resistance, social movement praxis, or oppositional imaginations. One clipped and unsatisfying paragraph on "what is to be done" concludes the book. Perhaps it could not be otherwise if transnational feminist practices and literatures are not critically considered. Work on racialized boundaries and democratic futures that could have been analyzed includes M. Jacqui Alexander and Chandra Talpade Mohanty, eds., Feminist Genealogies, Colonial Legacies, Democratic Futures (1997). Nevertheless, her book would be well considered alongside transnational feminist cultural studies that confront liberal theory (e.g., Caren Kaplan, Norma Alarcon, and Minoo Moallem, eds., Between Woman and Nation: Nationalisms, Transnational Feminisms, and the State, 1999).

This is a dense and challenging work that nevertheless maintains strong thematic coherence as it ranges across political theory, philosophies of language, a phenomenology of belonging and otherness, cultural anthropology, and the legal histories of naming, inheritance, migration, and kinship. It is beautifully prefaced with a fabulously engaging story of the author's work in a library in Croatia, her own genealogy of belonging and classification. Overall, it offers intriguing insights into urgent intellectual and practical problems and provides careful empirical evidence to illustrate how normative claims are substantiated. Jacqueline Stevens has produced a rich and profound work of scholarship that deserves serious attention.

Democracy and Trust. Edited by Mark E. Warren. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999. 370p. $59.95 cloth, $22.95 paper.

Virginia A. Chanley, Florida International University

The essays in this edited volume are the product of a seminar and conference at Georgetown University. In different ways, each contribution addresses the complex nature of the relationship between democracy and trust and helps to define the issues and questions involved in this relationship. The contributors address the topic from a variety of perspectives, some primarily theoretical and others combining theory and statistical analysis. As editor and contributing author, Mark Warren provides an effective framework for the diverse set of contributions that comprise the volume and develops a typology of theories of trust and democracy.

In the introductory chapter, Warren defines the topic of democracy and trust as it is developed in the volume and describes the organization of the chapters around a set of distinct, but closely related, questions. He identifies increasing societal complexity and interdependence as creating a paradoxical relationship between trust and democracy (pp. 3-4). With increased complexity, differentiation, and interdependence, individuals have greater choice and opportunity. Along with greater choice, however, there is both a greater need to trust and a reduced ability to participate, either directly or indirectly, in the decisions that shape one's life. In other words, at the same time that individuals are faced with greater choices, there is less opportunity to be involved in making those choices. Rather, citizens must increasingly rely on their elected representatives and other governmental authorities if they are to take advantage of the increased opportunities that accompany increased complexity and interdependence. Thus, Warren identifies a central task for scholars of democracy and trust as developing an understanding of the conditions under which trust is justified and identifying the institutional arrangements that facilitate the development of justified trust. Increases in justified trust help to reduce the costs associated with political decision making while, at the same time, enhancing the possibility of democratic decision making in increasingly complex and interdependent societies.

Warren organizes the book around a distinct set of issues, including questions about whether and when trust is desirable, the kinds of trust that benefit democracy, the relationship between trust and civil society, and the relationship between trust and collective action. In the first set of contributions, Russell Hardin, Claus Offe, and Ronald Inglehart each address the question of whether and when trust in government is desirable. These contributions are also useful for illustrating both the strengths and the weaknesses of the volume as a whole.

Proceeding from a rational choice perspective, Hardin argues that trust is possible only when someone knows the motivations of the person who is being trusted. In this view, it does not make sense to speak of trust in the institutions of government, as citizens are unlikely to know their elected representatives or the bureaucratic agents involved in governing well enough to be able to assess the motivations of their actions. Rather, Hardin proposes that it makes sense to speak of depending upon government or feeling reassured when government is predictable. Trust in government, however, is not desirable, because in modern society citizens are not in a position to assess the trustworthiness of governmental officials.

In contrast to Hardin, Offe argues that trust in the institutions of government is both possible and desirable. For Offe, trusting an institution requires knowledge and mutual acceptance of institutional rules, values, and norms, as well as the expectation that these rules, values, and norms will be followed. If there is a lack of trust in the institutions of government, this presents a problem for democracy, as strong governments are typically required to resolve complex problems of collective action that face modern societies.

Inglehart takes yet another approach to address the question of the desirability of trust in government. Based on empirical analysis of data from 1990–1991 and 1995–1997 World Values Surveys in 41 countries, Inglehart argues that the stability of existing democracies relies on subjective well-being and interpersonal trust. In contrast, trust in the institutions of government or trust in political elites is not particularly important for the maintenance of existing democracies. In Inglehart's view, declining trust in the institutions of government reflects a decline in respect for authority that has resulted from increased material well-being and the development of postmaterial cultures. Citizens now evaluate their governments by a more exacting standard, and trust in government has declined without posing a threat to the stability of government.

Illustrating the strength of this edited volume, Hardin and Offe approach the question of the desirability of trust from alternative theoretical approaches, whereas Inglehart addresses the question on the basis of statistical analyses across a range of nations. Thus, the reader is presented with alternative conceptions of trust and a statistical analysis that provides for an empirical assessment of the importance of trust in government. Illustrating the weakness of the volume, the reader is left with questions about which approach is most useful or accurate in addressing the question about the desirability of trust. Similarly, the contributions by Eric Uslaner, Orlando Patterson, Jean Cohen, Rom Harre, James Scott, and Jane Mansbridge do not rely on a single conception of either trust in government or democracy. Like Inglehart, Uslaner and Patterson employ statistical analyses to test some of their ideas. Like Hardin and Offe, the remaining authors employ a more theoretical approach to address the issue of trust and democracy, relying on examples as appropriate to illustrate their arguments.

Given that many of the issues raised in the volume are not new to the study of trust in government, perhaps the most unique and important contribution of the work is Warren's outline of a democratic theory of trust (see pp. 310–43). Distinguishing among three approaches to trust in democratic theory, which he identifies as neoconservative, rational choice, and deliberative, Warren proposes that the deliberative approach provides the most promising model for addressing questions about the kinds of political institutions that are most likely to solve problems associated with the paradoxical relationship between trust and democracy.

Overall, the volume makes a valuable contribution to the study of trust and democracy. The authors raise more questions than they answer, but the volume as a whole introduces readers new to the topic to current theoretical and empirical approaches in this area of research. Moreover, in drawing attention to questions about the relationship between trust and democracy and identifying distinct approaches in studying this topic, the volume helps to provide direction for future research.

Democracy. By Albert Weale. New York: St Martin's Press, 1999. 244p. $59.95 cloth, $19.95 paper.

Richard Bellamy, University of Reading

Like other volumes in the series Issues in Political Theory, which Weale edits with Peter Jones, this book combines an overview of the topic suitable for advanced undergraduates and above with an original argument reflecting the author's distinctive perspective that is likely to stimulate fellow specialists. The combination is an attractive one, which, when it works—as it does in this case—ensures that we do not get the sort of deadly dull textbook that merely rehashes other people's ideas. There are two novel features of Weale's argument. The first is his justification of democracy in terms of its capacity to enable members of society to advance their common interests as political equals in a situation of human fallibility. The second is his attempt to delineate the form of democracy, including the type of representation and decision rule, most likely to promote this purpose. I take each in turn.

Weale believes that we should justify democracy mainly in terms of its having consequences that we can defend as beneficial on principled grounds. In Weale's view, the main attraction of democracy lies in its ability to promote certain public interests under conditions of fallibility, in which no one occupies a privileged position with respect to their political knowledge or judgment, and in communities where people regard themselves as political equals. As he admits, quite a lot is packed into this thesis, that many will find contentious. Nonetheless, in my view it has the great virtue of stressing the important yet limited practical role of democracy. It acknowledges, for example, that there are circumstances in which expert adjudication, hierarchical decision making, or individual judgment might be preferable because fallibilism, equality, or public interests, respectively, do not apply. To that extent, his approach has decided advantages over those defenses that appeal primarily to its intrinsic merits in realizing a favored principle or principles, such as autonomy. Of late, theorists have tended to favor this tack. Yet it can lead to the assumption that democracy is either good in itself or good for everything. Different versions of deliberative democracy tend to fall into each of these traps. On the one hand, deliberation gets praised for its role in developing individuals as "political" creatures but in ways that make democracy sound like an educational seminar rather than a decision making process. On the other hand, democracy is expanded to all areas of social life, thereby threatening to overload the capacity of any system to make decisions effectively. In contrast, Weale offers a much more instrumental view that simply stresses that if collective decisions are adequately to reflect the different and often conflicting concerns of those to whom they apply, then we need a form of legitimation that nevertheless protects individuals from having their concerns be simply discounted. As he notes, this aim embodies the most practical interpretations of autonomy and consent arguments for democracy—namely, their antipaternalism and their stress on the importance of people sharing moral responsibility for collective decisions. Both notions can be derived from political equality and are far more suited to a pluralist society than arguments linked to more comprehensive justifications that link democracy to self-realization.

Weale's emphasis on the practical uses of democracy also leads him to give greater attention than many theorists do to the institutional arrangements needed to ensure that democratic processes operate in the desired way. He seeks to make what he regards as realistic assumptions about human motivation and social circumstances that avoid either excessive pessimism or utopian optimism. So he denies that knavery should be taken as a general rule and supposes that ongoing political communities embody a degree of reciprocity that cannot be entirely conceived as merely enlightened selfishness. However, path dependence sets limits on what institutions, no matter how well designed, can achieve in themselves. So representation must balance statistical representativeness against ensuring the accountability of the representatives, and the best mix will have to be sensitive to the complexion of the society concerned. Likewise with decision rules, with the majority principle needing to be modified to reflect a diversity of opinions and the likelihood that different majorities exist for different issues. Weale's advocacy of a Condorcet count to settle these kinds of problem is one of the most interesting parts of the book.

In most respects, I found myself broadly sympathetic to Weale's approach. My main criticism lies in his not pushing his argument a bit farther. For example, given the sort of instrumentalist line he takes, it is surprising that he gives no attention to contestatory mechanisms of the kind that Philip Pettit has recently insisted upon as vital means for ensuring that democratic decisions genuinely track the public rather than factional interests. Indeed, the republican concern with the avoidance of domination captures much of the reasoning behind his justification of democracy. Given the emphasis on democracy's practical value, I also found the final chapter relating his ideal to real-world situations frustratingly (if also interestingly) elusive. For example, he gives a brief discussion of the infamous "democratic deficit" of the European Union, a topic on which he has written at length elsewhere. This is the sort of issue where I feel his approach has real strengths, though, disappointingly, he fails to bring them out here. Many commentators adopt the sort of arguments criticized above, whereby it is simply assumed that because democracy is a "good thing," the EU must have as much of it as possible. But this begs precisely the sorts of problems Weale's justification raises—namely, is this an area where collective decisions can appropriately be made? If so, concerning what? Are they likely to be better made democratically rather than by elites or technocrats? What forms of representation and decision rule will be necessary to secure political equality? These are rather concrete questions, ones surprisingly rarely posed by policy makers, and it is the merit of Weale's book to focus our attention on them.

Inclusion and Democracy. By Iris Marion Young. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000. 304p. $29.95.

Barbara Cruikshank, University of Massachusetts

Engaging her contemporaries in debates over democratic ideals and processes, Iris M. Young offers a collection of seven essays that mitigate arguments on either side of those debates (participation vs. representation, localism vs. state, segregation vs. integration, identity vs. difference) by applying the critical ideal of inclusion. She argues that the normative legitimacy of democratic decisions rests upon the extent to which those affected by decisions are included in or have the opportunity to enter the decision making process. One might think that inclusion solves only one problem, the problem of exclusion, for democracy. However, Young extends the ideal of inclusion across manifold debates in democratic theory and speaks broadly to the less than ideal conditions under which we now practice democracy.

Hers is a process-oriented conception of inclusion rather than a spatial or physical one. Inclusion is not the end point, but a condition of democratic legitimacy. To be included one need not enter into a space of deliberation at all; participation cannot be limited to face-to-face interactions and representation is necessary in large-scale multicultural societies. Among other reasons, direct democracy should not be our ideal because our relations to others extend well beyond the local level at which we encounter others physically. If we think of representation in terms of process rather than identity or substitution, as the ongoing relationship of constituents to one another and to their representative, we will be able to sustain a larger measure of inclusion.

Young rejects the idea that inequality and difference necessarily stymie political inclusion. The deeper conditions of inclusion are not only social, economic, or racial, but also procedural: being heard and understood, autonomy, representation, and the ability to move across political jurisdictions that range from local and civic to global. Even under conditions of structural inequality we might still enliven democratic practice if we explicitly acknowledge and accommodate social structural difference in the democratic process. For example, in these terms an argument for inclusion under conditions of residential segregation need not take a side in favor of either group solidarity or integration, of difference or identity. Segregation can be both good and bad; it offers the supportive backdrop of group solidarity for those marked by difference but it also leaves those whose privilege it is to be unmarked by difference unchanged. Still, it matters less where or how we live differently among ourselves (even if it is not perfectly voluntary) if we think of inclusion in terms of process rather than the integration of spaces, institutions, or neighborhoods or the assimilation of cultural difference. Separateness itself is less the problem than that democratic processes do not take existing structural differences into account. That would mean shifting the focus away from the excluded and toward the processes that privilege certain social perspectives and modes of expression.

Young offers the ideal of "differentiated solidarity" as an alternative to the ideals of integration and cultural assimilation as a means of balancing inclusion with the realities of a divided world. She develops the conceptual tools to counterbalance the dangers of involuntary exclusion against the autonomy of groups and persuasively uses social structural difference as a means of mitigating debates over identity and difference. Less persuasively, she suggests that difference can be transformed from an obstacle to a resource in democratic deliberations. Consistent with the critical traditions that she invokes, Young favors ideals for their critical potential.

Viewed procedurally, democracy is above all the best means we have for collective problem-solving because it allows us to approximate the ideals of inclusion, justice, and equality. Young makes a sound case against orienting deliberations toward the common good. Whether the starting point or the conclusion of our deliberations, unity excludes those who do not share our perspectives and understandings. We also exclude the possibility that democratic engagement will transform us or our interests and perspectives on the common good. There is one serious omission in this collection of essays. If we accept a procedural and minimalist theory of democracy as a means of collective problem-solving, we will need to know how a problem gets defined as a collective one. How will we come to accept, say, the problem of racial segregation as our problem rather than their problem? Young's answer is caught up in solving the problem of inclusive political communication and does not directly address how the agenda is set for collective deliberation. This is an old problem in democratic theory but one that continues to nag the critical tradition in particular.

Young can be charged with having too many things both ways. For example, she criticizes the literatures on civil society for imposing exclusionary norms of civility upon politics. In defending unruly demonstrations and boisterous modes of expression and debate, Young unmasks the biases and exclusions that norms of deliberation impose. At the same time, she proposes that one of the most important powers of otherwise powerless groups is to shame the powerful into recognizing their claims to justice. How can we deliver both a politics of shame and a politics that does not impose cultural norms upon others? Distinctions between shameful and inclusive actions are not easy to sustain beyond examples like the WTO and anarchists. The focus here on procedure solves some problems and, of course, generates others.

Young takes up the crucial question of jurisdiction introduced in her earlier work. Our jurisdictions should extend as far as our obligations of justice to accommodate our relations to any others affected by our decisions. Citing Onora O'Neill, Young argues that our obligations of justice follow a causal chain that extends globally. She couples that argument with one for "relational autonomy." Procedurally, autonomy means noninterference, while relationally a group must remain accountable to the interests and perspectives of others. In addition to the problem of scale, how can we be both autonomous and accountable in any meaningful way? How can democracy accommodate both autonomous local institutions and global obligations of justice? It is her style to mitigate, to find a way of posing the question so that we might have it both ways. It is persuasive and simultaneously inconclusive.

As the ideals pile upon one another in these essays, the reader might get a sense that we are getting too far away from the real world of democracy. Her ideal of a reasonable citizen seems pretty far-fetched in the real world of debate TV and partisan politics: A reasonable citizen is one who is open to having their views and perspectives change in the process of deliberation. How many citizens do you know who are rational by this measure, who go into a political debate with the expectation that their opinions, their perspectives, and their interests will be transformed? But Young's conception of deliberation, like her conception of democracy, is minimalist. If we do not expect to undergo transformation, we cannot be engaged in authentically democratic deliberation. By treating democracy minimally and procedurally as a means of collective problem-solving, Young does in fact achieve a balance between the real and the ideal that stands out brilliantly in the field of normative democratic theory. Her voice, like her arguments, is temperate but never tepid. However subtle, there is a potent set of arguments here that will draw the attention of those who favor agonistic theories of democracy back to normative theory. It will bring those who favor radical democracy back to exiting conditions and the shortage of negative liberty. Proponents of civil society are reminded that the state is the only institution we have for coordinating public expenditures. All in all, these essays will be of critical interest to everyone working in democratic theory and especially to those ready to grapple with the paradox of her opening line: "Democracy is hard to love" (p. 16).

American Politics

Crossing Borders, Crossing Boundaries: The Role of Scientists in the U.S. Acid Rain Debate. By Leslie R. Alm. Westport, CT: Praeger. 2000. 160p. $58.00.

William R. Mangun, East Carolina University

Leslie Alm presents what may be the best study yet produced on the acid rain policy debate, at least with regard to its scientific underpinnings. The book describes the evolution of the current U.S.-Canadian acid rain policy agreement and focuses on the role of scientists in the formulation and implementation of acid rain policy. Alm found that most natural scientists believe they have little influence on the policy process. He suggests they are not trained to understand policymakers, and policymakers are not trained to understand science. Both have a narrow focus that causes them to perceive selectively what the other is saying. As does Lynton K. Caldwell (Between Two Worlds: Science, the Environmental Movement, and Policy Choice, 1990), Alm informs us that scientists and policymakers operate in two totally different worlds using two different languages and two different time scales; this complicates the policy process.

Crossing Borders, Crossing Boundaries is a most important book for both natural scientists and political scientists interested in how science affects public policy. This book is particularly important for scientists who are even remotely interested in becoming involved in the shaping and analysis of public policy. They will gain insight into a totally new and strange world of politics, in which perception is equally or more important than factual reality, almost totally unlike the world of science, where hard facts rule. Alm does a good job of selecting important quotations from congressional hearings that point out to scientists that they, like Dorothy and Toto, are no longer in Kansas but in a totally different and unknown world. He shows how policymakers who attempt to make scientists appear to be advocates of positions the policymakers favor can manipulate "scientific research." The book also does a good job of informing scientists of what to expect if asked to testify before Congress and, accordingly, how to prepare testimony. The author demonstrates how science must be made policy relevant.

Students of the policy process will acquire considerable insight into the complex world of scientific issues as well as many of the difficulties inherent in the translation of scientific results into public policy. They will learn that scientists seldom are willing to provide conclusive "cause-and-effect" evidence that will support a particular proposal. Alm suggests that scientists who become substantially involved in promoting a specific policy do so at the risk of endangering their professional reputation. Such concerns encourage many scientists to be conservative in their statements, because they realize that new scientific evidence may be just around the corner that could substantially alter the basis of their research findings. Such conservatism often frustrates policy entrepreneurs trying to sell a specific policy solution. "Policy makers are selective, predisposed, and want certainty and scientists cannot give them that" (p. 92).

Alm employs John Kingdon's policy agenda setting framework to describe the role of scientists in acid rain politics. For example, Alm goes to considerable lengths to describe the central role that scientists play in establishing a consensus about the need for policy action on environmental problems, in general, and acid rain in particular. Similar to Kingdon, Alm shows how scientific experts have helped shape the alternative policy courses in the acid rain debate.

Alm's research spans more than ten years. During this time, he scrutinized public hearings on both sides of the U.S.-Canadian border in order to obtain detailed information about which scientists were called upon to participate in acid rain deliberations. He also conducted numerous interviews with American and Canadian natural and social scientists. His attention to detail provides considerable insight into the complex interaction between science and politics in public policy formulation.

Alm depicts what happens when the highly complex world of science collides with political realities. His interviews with scientists highlight necessary ingredients for successful collaboration with policymakers. Neither group has an accurate perception of the world in which the other must operate. Scientists do not appear to realize that compromises must be made among competing interests, and policymakers do not seem to realize or want to acknowledge that science-based policies simply have to operate with a high degree of uncertainty.

This book also has strengths with regard to insights into comparative politics. Alm perceptively identifies both political and scientific aspects, shaped by science, that continually loom over the delicate webs of cross-national policy linkages. He points out that natural and social scientists in the United States and Canada have different perceptions of their roles in the policy process. He also suggests that such differences may influence the policy position of the two governments, which potentially threatens the very foundations of transnational agreements. Alm made extensive efforts to address both Canadian and U.S. positions (scientifically and politically), and those interested in obtaining a better understanding of the intricacies of cross-national policy formulation and implementation should read this book. Despite a somewhat narrow focus on acid rain policy, this volume is useful as a case-study text for courses in environmental politics, international environmental policy, and science, technology, and public policy.

Judicial Politics in the D.C. Circuit Court. By Christopher P. Banks. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1999. 200p. $38.00.

Isaac Unah, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

For decades the U.S. courts of appeals were afflicted with the proverbial middle child syndrome. They were given less than deserved attention by legal scholars and political scientists, and their decisions commanded less media and popular attention than rulings by the Supreme Court and even decisions of federal district courts. To many observers, the appeals courts were relatively invisible. Circuit courts are convalescing from this affliction because increasingly political scientists are turning their analytical attention to these thirteen important stations of judicial power in American society.

Scholars have used a variety of techniques to analyze these courts. Some choose to examine the courts of appeals comparatively, by emphasizing differences in institutional structure, decision outcomes, and judicial personalities. Others perform a detailed and intuitive case study of only one. This latter technique may limit generalizability, but it gives political scientists and, especially, students of the judiciary a useful sense of the historicity and doctrinal contributions of individual courts. Christopher Banks has written an important book that falls within this second category.

Judicial Politics in the D.C. Circuit Court contributes to the broader judicial politics literature by providing a detailed historical account of the major political and jurisprudential developments in the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit after 1960. According to Banks, the post-1960 period was one of significant transformation for the D.C. Circuit. It emerged from relative obscurity to become a dominant political force not only in supervising local community courts and liberalizing the rights of criminal defendants in the Washington, D.C., area but also in superintending the policy decisions of federal administrative agencies and in serving as what is putatively the most fertile ground for the cultivation of prospective nominees for the Supreme Court.

The book is divided into five chapters. Chapter 1 chronicles the D.C. Circuit's great authority in the judicial hierarchy. Chapters 2 and 3 discuss the internal and external political forces that have shaped the current status of the D.C. Circuit.

Chapter 4 discusses the significance of en banc reviews and the degree of scrutiny afforded by the Supreme Court over circuit decisions. Chapter 5 summarizes the main argument and speculates on the D.C. Circuit's future. From the outset Banks notes accurately that, with few exceptions, precious little has been written about this court, even though it occupies a central place in the federal judicial system.

Part of the difficulty is the lack of detailed data (beyond the descriptive material available from the Administrative Office of the Courts [AOC] that would permit rigorous empirical analysis. The recently completed court of appeals database compiled by Donald Songer (Principal Investigator) begins to address this difficulty. Indeed, analyses using AOC data are by necessity historical and descriptive rather than deductive and theoretical. Banks relies upon descriptive data from this federal agency in his coverage of the D.C. Circuit and all the numbered circuits, and these data enable him to emphasize the distinctive features of the D.C. Circuit. Yet, like many scholars who write about the courts of appeals, Banks could not obtain comparative data on the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, the only circuit court with limited subjectmatter jurisdiction and the court most similar to the D.C. Circuit in jurisdiction and geographic location.

Banks does not explicate and test a new theory of judicial behavior. Instead, he seeks to write a descriptive book about an important circuit court, and he succeeds. Banks relies upon a critical evaluation of various theories of judicial behavior, especially the hierarchical model (chap. 4) proposed by Donald Songer, Jeffrey Segal, and Charles Cameron ("The Hierarchy of Justice: Testing a Principal-Agent Model of Supreme Court-Circuit Court Interactions," American Journal of Political Science 38:3 [August 1994]: 673–96), to analyze events within the D.C. Circuit from 1960 to 1997.

The main argument is that, since the 1960s, the D.C. Circuit has had two distinct reputations in the legal community, and each influences the court's work. The first was developed during the 1960s, when the D.C. Circuit positioned itself as a progressive forum for adjudicating criminal disputes. Because of escalating crime in American society and the social upheaval of that period, the circuit was vilified for its progressive or lenient stance on the rights of criminal defendants. Congressional Republicans championed wholesale changes in the court's personnel and jurisdiction in an effort to fight crime and restore public order.

The second reputation is that of a quasi-specialized, de facto court for adjudicating administrative appeals, a direct result of the transformation of the court's personnel and jurisdiction. In chapter 3, Banks describes how political forces both inside and outside the D.C. Circuit influenced the court's decision making in administrative law, including differences in orientation among the judges, which led to the development of the popular "hard-look" doctrine that expanded the scope of judicial supervision of administrative agency decisions. In examining both reputations, Banks helps us understand how powerfully Washington politics permeates the judicial system.

Toward the end of the book, Banks addresses the politically controversial issue of subject-matter specialization in the courts. Political elites are sharply divided on the propriety of establishing specialized tribunals staffed with experts to adjudicate legal controversies in a specific policy area. Banks spells out the pros and cons in this debate. Although he seems tepid on this issue at first, his preference is clearly pronounced by the end. The D.C. Circuit is traditionally considered a generalist court, but since the 1970s the court has decided the greatest proportion of administrative agency appeals directly involving the federal government. Therefore, Banks advocates congressional reform to restrict its substantive jurisdiction to cases from administrative agencies because "the D.C. Circuit operates best as a specialized court" (p. 136). This would turn the D.C. Circuit into a specialized court of administrative law. But Banks is extremely cautious and calls repeatedly for more studies of the issue before any reforms are implemented. This caution undermines the force of his own evidence showing that the D.C. Circuit is the most active tribunal in deciding administrative appeals and that this makes it appropriate for the D.C. Circuit to be formalized as a specialized court.

Legislative Learning: The 104th Republican Freshmen in the House. By Timothy J. Barnett. New York: Garland, 1998. 333p. $60.00

Gregory R. Thorson, University of Minnesota at Morris

The 1994 elections were watershed elections in several respects. Perhaps most significantly, the Republicans gained control of both chambers of Congress for the first time since 1953. In the process, the 1994 elections also swept into office a large, relatively homogeneous group of 73 House Republican freshmen determined to change the political system. With size comes an opportunity for power in Congress, and the 73 Republican freshmen elected in 1994 were determined to exert considerable influence over the legislative process. Not since the 1974 elections produced the 76 freshmen Democrats (i.e., the Watergate Babies) have political scientists focused so much attention on a single class of legislators. Timothy Barnett's Legislative Learning is a nice complement to similar books already written about this interesting group of legislators, including Richard Fenno and Michael Armacost's Learning to Govern: An Institutional View of the 104th Congress (1997) and Nicol Rae's Conservative Reformers: The Republican Freshmen and the Lessons of the 104th Congress (1998).

Whereas Fenno and Armacost focus on the inexperience and failures of the Republican leadership to develop this new group of legislators adequately, and Rae shares his "insider" experience as an APSA Congressional fellow during this period, Barnett's primary contribution is finding the theoretical significance to these important historical events. In this respect, he is quite successful. His treatment of the rise and subsequent fall of the Republican freshmen class of 1994 is put into a rich theoretical context that includes extensive discussions of Fenno's multiple goal approach, ambition theory, and Sinclair's application of principal-agent theory.

Most of Barnett's arguments do not defy previous interpretations of the events that took place during this period. For example, most political scientists have long argued that the goals of the Republican freshmen class of 1994 were more policy-oriented than reelection-oriented. Barnett's treatment is dedicated not so much to determining the factual basis of these claims but to examining their theoretical relevance. His focus is on to what extent the behavior of the Republican freshmen class of 1994 was consistent or inconsistent with other members and whether any differences are supportive of certain theoretical perspective more than others found in the literature. For example, Barnett's treatment of the tension between Mayhew's reelection goal perspective and Fenno's multiple goal approach is both provocative and insightful.

The evidence used in Barnett's book is largely anecdotal and is derived mostly from secondary sources. Nevertheless, Barnett uses these sources skillfully. For example, in some of his most interesting observations, Barnett describes in great detail the difficulty the House Republican leadership had in controlling the Republican Class of 1994 during the passage of special rules governing debate for committee funding of the House Oversight Committee and the flood relief bills passed in 1997. His coverage of these events leads to broader discussions of the motivations and goals of the class generally.

Barnett also introduces a limited amount of original data and presents the results of several personal interviews as well. His survey data are limited to just 10 questions answered by members' high-level legislative staffers. The survey had several measures aimed at determining the cohesion of the class as well as its perceived mandate. Not surprisingly, Barnett finds that members of the 1994 Republican Freshmen class had a high level of class cohesion and the perception of a reform-oriented mandate.

Overall, Barnett's Legislative Learning is a well-done theoretical volume that attempts to understand the Republican Freshmen Class of 1994 through competing interpretations of principal-agent analysis and member goal and ambition theories. Scholars hoping to find specific hypotheses developed and tested with empirical data will be disappointed. Nevertheless, due to its focus on the theoretical implications of this important class of legislators, I would recommend it to supplement the Fenno, Armacost, and Rae texts.

Presidential Transitions: From Politics to Practice. By John P. Burke. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner, 2000. 437p. $65.00.

Mary Anne Borrelli, Connecticut College

Scholars have long been participant-observers in presidential transitions, which provide extraordinary opportunities to refine their understanding of continuity and change in the presidency. Political science, more generally, has benefited from this engagement. Whether we read the elegant memoranda of Richard Neustadt or the advice-laden briefing papers of the White House 2001 Project, we gain a new appreciation for the challenges confronting a chief executive who must build an administration, establish a policy agenda, and achieve demonstrable political results within a few short months of the election. In Presidential Transitions. From Politics to Practice, John Burke makes a notable contribution to our knowledge of these events, both as historical drama and as political developments. Quite simply, this book can be enjoyed for its narrative and appreciated for its analysis by those interested in presidential institutions and policymaking.

Burke focuses on the decision making processes that are established during the preinaugural weeks and tested during the postinaugural months. He gives due attention to the cabinet and to various units within the Executive Office, but his attention is fixed on the White House staff. He readily acknowledges that the White House office is an institution, which is to say that it evidences autonomy, adaptability, complexity, and coherence. Yet, Burke insists, it is remarkably flexible and even malleable. Presidents have conceptualized and managed the personnel and units within the White House office in very different ways, even in the most recent decades, which has significant implications for both executive and (by extension) legislative decision making. "The way in which transitions craft, or do not craft, those processes has consequences, sometimes severe" (p. 377).

The transitions of four presidents—Carter, Reagan, George H.W. Bush, and Clinton—are assessed from their preelection planning efforts through to their postinaugural outcomes. The work of presidents-elect is analyzed in terms of the transition organization, nomination and appointment decisions, and the development of a policy agenda; that of the presidents is examined in terms of decision making processes, presidential management of the White House staff, and domestic and foreign policy outcomes. Bracketing these discussions are chapters that consider the role of transitions in the modern presidency, the limitations of rational actor models in explicating this aspect of the presidency, and the lessons to be learned from the four administrations. As this array of topics suggests, Burke is as attentive to the concerns of practitioners as he is to the interests of scholars.

What distinguishes this work is an extensive reliance on (and cross-referencing of) primary documents and sources. The collections of the presidential libraries and other archives, as well as extended interviews with the principals, reveal the course of managerial and policy decisions. Without venturing into counterhistorical speculations, Burke weighs the importance of roads taken and not taken, including the implications of each for White House operations. Although the Clinton chapters necessarily rely more on secondary sources, they offer original data and insights. Burke explains this book's relationship to other works on presidential campaigning and governance, and it will undoubtedly serve as a springboard for future studies.

In essence, Burke's analysis can be distilled into a forceful assertion that the president is at the center of the presidency—notwithstanding the influential roles played by various other actors and offices—and that each president's managerial choices are important. Transitions matter, then, because they reveal a president-elect's organizational priorities vis-à-vis the White House, as distinct from the campaign or from prior executive positions. Although attuned to patterns of political behavior, Burke is sensitive to the distinctive character of each president, which makes his rejection of rational choice models, for example, entirely comprehensible. It also increases the likelihood that this volume will serve as a lightning rod for debates about research design and methods in presidency studies.

Martha Kumar, in her written and oral presentations as director of the White House 2001 Project, stresses four basic components in setting up the White House office: organization, process, personnel, and values. Burke, who contributed an essay to that project, considers each of these elements in Presidential Transitions, but he places greatest emphasis on organization and process. Who holds which position in the White House is important, but Burke maintains that their choices and actions occur within an organizational and procedural context. Values certainly matter, but he suggests that they are most routinely manifested through relationships and decision making. Thus, an investigation of personnel and values is part of the larger study of organization and process. Each is integral to the White House office, but Burke assigns a particular primacy to organization and process. This claim challenges the presumptions of many organizational theorists, as well as presidency and policy scholars, and fuels debate about the White House staff as a bureaucracy and as an institution. In turn, the book's empirical richness, in conjunction with its theoretical contentiousness, ensures that it will be a valuable resource for political scientists as researchers and as educators.

Maximization, Whatever the Cost: Race, Redistricting, and the Department of Justice. By Maurice T. Cunningham. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2001. 192p. $62.50.

Mark E. Rush, Washington and Lee University

With the Supreme Court decision in Easley v. Cromartie, the 1990s round of redistricting litigation came to an end just in time for the new decade's round to commence. Looking back upon the Court decisions from the 1990s as well as the extensive scholarly commentary on them, anyone new to the field of voting rights in the United States might wonder how the Voting Rights Act, which was a straightforward attempt to remedy indisputably unjust political practices, could have given rise to the I-85 district in North Carolina.

The key, says Maurice Cunningham, is the evolution of the strategy taken by the Voting Rights Section of the Civil Rights Division (CRD) of the Department of Justice to implement the Voting Rights Act (VRA). Cunningham approaches the furor surrounding minority voting rights as a disinterested observer who laments the loss of prestige and credibility (p. 10) that the CRD has sustained as a result of its actions under the VRA in the 1990s. Under the leadership of John Dunne and Deval Patrick, the CRD gradually yet unquestionably shifted its approach to maximizing the number of majority minority districts from a policy that balanced competing concerns about minority representation with state-level concerns about incumbency, different aspects of local representation, and so forth. To recapture its prestige and credibility—and therefore reestablish its capacity to protect effectively minority voting rights—the CRD must "recapture the balance missing from its effort in the 1990's"

Maximization, Whatever the Cost is a refreshing addition to the VRA literature because it is not a piece of advocacy. Instead of criticizing the stands taken by supporters and critics of the CRD and the Supreme Court in the 1990s, Cunningham demonstrates that the CRD is subject to the same pathologies and interest group pressures that affect any other bureaucratic arm of government. The result is an intriguing study of the tensions within the CRD and the role and influence of the interest groups that lobby it.

Cunningham's book is bound to upset many participants in the voting rights policy arena precisely because the analysis is so evenhanded. Minority voting rights advocates are bound to chafe at the contention that the CRD's maximization policy was not in keeping with the spirit of the VRA. Similarly, the author notes that critics of the CRD's maximization policy also suffered from tunnel vision. They were justified in at first fearing and then fighting against the maximization policy, but it is also clear that their very narrow interpretation of the VRA would hardly have served the purposes for which the cet was intended.

In large part, the CRD suffers because it is charged by the VRA with two contradictory roles. On the one hand, Section 2 empowers the CRD to assist minority plaintiffs in vote dilution suits. On the other, Section 5 charges it with an adjudicatory role in assessing changes to state election laws. Cunningham argues that in the 1990s the CRD subsumed the latter role in pursuit of the former.

The CRD dispensed with the first prong of the Section 2 vote dilution test set forth by the Supreme Court in Thornburg v. Gingles (1986) (which required that a minority group be geographically compact) in favor of a standard that defined "discriminatory intent" on the part of a legislature as the adoption of any other districting scheme when one that provides for more majority-minority districts is available. The CRD then incorporated this interpretation of Section 2 into its Section 5 preclearance procedures. The result was a policy that withheld preclearance unless a state could demonstrate that it had indeed maximized opportunities for minority representation.

Cunningham demonstrates the effect of interest groups on the CRD's policymaking. It is no surprise that members of what he calls the voting rights issue network (the ACLU, NAACP Legal Defense Fund, Mexican American Legal Defense Fund the Lawyers' Committee, and so on) lined up behind and worked closely with the CRD and its staff attorneys in advocating the policy of maximization. The intimacy of this relationship ultimately did the most damage to the CRD's integrity because it appeared as if the division had allowed itself to be captured by interest groups. This was manifested most clearly in the criticisms leveled at the CRD in the Johnson v. Miller (1995) litigation emanating from Georgia. Of course, the newcomer to the field will wonder what the Republican Party was doing right there, working alongside all these groups that would seem to be its traditional adversaries. Cunningham indicates that it made sense for the GOP to pursue and advocate the maximization policy (despite its philosophical opposition to affirmative action) because it enhanced opportunities to elect Republicans.

Îronically, the CRD's focus on maximization not only blinded it to the counterproductive effect it was having on minority interests (by helping the GOP) but also rendered it deaf to the pleas of black elected officials. They were willing to "settle" for minority influence districts precisely because they had gained positions of influence and established themselves as effective politicians in a manner clearly envisioned by the framers of the VRA.

Cunningham's study reveals several different fates that legislation can suffer at the hands of interest groups. The right thing can be pursued the wrong way (enhancing minority political opportunities via a maximization policy). The wrong (or at least unintended) thing can happen the right way (using the VRA to enhance Republican interests at the expense of Democratic power and therefore minority interests). Finally, the right thing can be done the right way (implement the VRA in a manner that balances theoretical ideals of minority voting rights with the concerns of local—including minority—elected officials).

Perhaps the most poignant discussion concerns the tension manifested by the second scenario. "Elite" actors, such as career voting rights attorneys, found their theoretical yet abstract vision of justice at odds with the interests of the minority elected officials (and, presumably, their constitutents) for whom they were supposed to be working. Cunningham notes (pp. 100–1) that members of the voting rights issues network became so preoccupied with achieving their maximization goal that they overlooked the fact that the VRA was designed to enhance and repair the democratic process in general.

This slender volume merits much praise. My only criticism is the wish that it were a bit longer. Cunningham peppers his discussion with excerpts from and references to interviews with key players, and it is extensively footnoted with references to respected academic sources and state actors. But at points I found myself wishing for more detail and embellishment, such as Dunne's reconciliation of his maximization policy with his membership in a Republican administration, or the discussion of how the state legislators finally caved into CRD pressure to maximize the number of majority-minority districts. The account of how black elected officials were accused of selling out because they had problems creating bizarre districts, such as the I–85 district in North Carolina, is gripping—and makes the reader wish for even more detail.

Maximization, Whatever the Cost is a breath of fresh air and a succinct inquiry into the politics and implementation of the Voting Rights Act. It puts the many works of advocacy that characterize the voting rights literature into a thoughtful political science perspective.

The Prudential Presidency: An Aristotelian Approach to Presidential Leadership. By Ethan M. Fishman. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2001. 160p. $52.50.

Michael J. Korzi, Towson University

A sense of puzzlement is likely to be the first reaction to Ethan Fishman's book. Aristotle and presidential leadership? These are topics that we tend not to associate with each other. Yet, as Fishman makes clear in this admirable and provocative work, Aristotle had much to say about proper political leadership, much that is directly applicable to evaluating and understanding American presidents and their acts of leadership.

Fishman is very clear about what he wants to accomplish, and his book is accordingly brief and tightly argued. It is not meant as an exhaustive theoretical account of Aristotle or as a detailed examination of presidential leadership acts. Rather, Fishman intends to "provide a straightforward application of an ancient strategy for effective leadership to information presently available in a language and style accessible to general readers and students in courses on the American presidency and the history of political philosophy" (p. 13). He begins with a theoretical chapter that explicates Aristotle's theory of prudential leadership and discusses three other "competing leadership strategies that [Aristotle's] theory implies-idealism, cynicism, and pragmatism" (p. 6). With this theoretical foundation in place, the bulk of the book constitutes an application of these concepts to particular acts of presidential leadership. A concluding chapter considers further the implications of Aristotle's theory of prudential leadership for presidential studies in particular and presidential leadership more generally.

There are several audiences for this book—general readers as well as students and scholars of political philosophy, the presidency, and leadership studies—but most especially presidency scholars. Fishman is rightly critical of the lack of normative analysis in presidency studies and, indeed, political science in general. Presidency scholars (Fishman singles out for special consideration Richard Neustadt, James Barber, and George Edwards) often do yeoman work in explaining the causes and effects of presidential behavior, but they are typically reticent, or perhaps evasive, when it comes to normatively judging that behavior. Presidents are labeled "good" if they are energetic, or persuasive, or successful in passing legislation. But political scientists rarely question whether the decisions presidents make, or the policies they pursue, are moral or laudable or, to use a rather unfashionable word, "virtuous." By returning to Aristotle and his theory of prudential leadership, Fishman tries to develop a language and model by which to make normative and evaluative sense of the American presidency and presidential leadership. "Presidents serve the public interest of the United States most effectively when their behavior conforms to Aristotle's venerable, but no longer generally venerated, theory of political prudence" (p. 6).

Fishman largely succeeds in giving us a language for making evaluative judgments. The leadership categories of prudence, pragmatism, idealism, and cynicism turn out to be very useful in explaining and interpreting leadership acts of American presidents. For example, idealism is an accurate characterization of Woodrow Wilson's stubborn leadership on the Treaty of Versailles, and cynical leadership best characterizes Bill Clinton's actions during the Lewinsky scandal. Of course, prudence is the key model of leadership, around which the others revolve.

Prudential leadership occurs when leaders "emphasize universal ideals without romanticizing them and do their best to honor values in the face of practical obstacles" (pp. 22–3).

This is to be distinguished from pragmatic leadership, which is often conflated with prudential leadership, that is, "values are secondary to tangible results" (p. 22). Prudential decisions in American history are Lincoln's leadership during the Civil War and Theodore Roosevelt's support of conservation; pragmatic decisions include Truman's use of the atomic bomb and Kennedy's leadership during the Bay of Pigs. Although "the difference between prudence and pragmatism is especially difficult to appreciate" (p. 25), Fishman takes us quite a way toward clarifying the distinction. Undoubtedly, some will quibble with Fishman's interpretation and characterization of certain acts of leadership, but in the main they ring true and help us better understand the range and scope of presidential leadership.

One of the more interesting and provocative contributions of the book is an understanding of the relationship between private character and public action. In light of the Lewinsky scandal, which was a partial motivator for the book (p. 14), this question takes on immediate relevance. Clinton and his defenders argued for a strict separation between private behavior and character and presidential leadership. In fact, some used Clinton to prove that there is no relationship: To wit, Clinton was an outstanding president who had a flawed or immoral private character. Aristotle and Fishman clearly disagree with this viewpoint. Aristotle rhetorically asked: "Is it not true that men who have no command of their passions will fail to serve their own interest even though they possess self-knowledge and self-loyalty and will equally fail to serve the public interest (even though they possess a knowledge of public affairs and public loyalty)" (p. 31)? Whereas Stanley Renshon (High Hopes, 1996) gave us a psychological explanation of the connections between Clinton's private and public behavior, Fishman provides a more philosophical perspective, one that is sure to provoke further debate over the legacy and leadership of Clinton.

Two aspects of the book need refinement and development. First, because the pursuit of "universal ideals" is a hallmark of prudential leadership, one would like to see a more systematic discussion of what might constitute universal ideals and values. There are oblique references to such standards as the Ten Commandments and the Golden Rule (p. 112), but a more substantial discussion is warranted. Second, and more important, Fishman's model of leadership places somewhat unreasonable expectations on presidents. "The less we expect of our presidents, the less we are likely to get from them" (p. 119). This may be true, but we need to be more discriminating about exactly when and under what circumstances we should expect great leadership of the Aristotelian, prudential stripe. What if the context and times do not permit prudential leadership?

Fishman confronts Stephen Skowronek's The Politics Presidents Make (1993) in the last pages of the concluding chapter, but he does not fully address the powerful challenge that Skowronek's arguments pose. Skowronek's seminal study suggests the very real limitations of expecting great acts of leadership from all presidents, regardless of circumstances or their place in "political time." Surely, we should criticize presidents for squandering opportunities for great acts of moral leadership, but we also should be sure that they did, in fact, have the reasonable opportunity to exercise such leadership. Thus, Fishman makes an important break with the presidency literature in his focus on normative analysis, but his individual-centered leadership perspective, being insufficiently attentive to context and institutions, is too conventional.

Nevertheless, this book is a welcome addition to the presidency (and political science) literature. Fishman has given us a language for better describing and evaluating presidential leadership, and in the process he demonstrates the continuing relevance of political philosophy and normative analysis to contemporary politics and political science. These are no small achievements.

The Power of the American Presidency, 1789–2000. By Michael A. Genovese. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000. 273p. $19.95.

Presidential Power: Forging the Presidency for the Twenty-First Century. Edited by Robert Y. Shapiro, Martha Joynt Kumar, and Lawrence R. Jacobs. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000. 525p. $49.50

Richard S. Conley, University of Florida

It has been more than forty years since the publication of Richard Neustadt's Presidential Power and the Modern Presidents (1960). In that seminal work Neustadt rebuffed systemic, legal, and constitutional approaches to emphasize the personal basis of presidential power and the centrality of presidents' reputation and persuasive skills. Michael Genovese's book and the collection assembled by Shapiro, Kumar, and Jacobs are timely and useful additions to the reevaluation of the individual and institutional bases of presidential power, influence, and leadership across time. If scholarship on the presidency is at a crossroads, these works invite us to journey in different analytical directions.

Genovese joins Sidney Milkis and Michael Nelson (The American Presidency: Origins and Development, 1998) in producing an authoritative and informative account of the historical development of presidential power. The work focuses on addressing a central problem that teacher-scholars know all too well: "Students today are a-historical; they know virtually nothing about any president who came before George Bush" (p. ix). The writing is accessible to an undergraduate and general audience. The author also engages readers with attention to the personas and sometimes humorous peculiarities of past presidents, including the enigmatic Madison and the vibrant Jackson, as he astutely situates individual presidents' shortand long-term contributions to the office.

The book is organized chronologically, and Genovese does not endeavor to forge a comprehensive theory of presidential power. He does, however, draw useful, if intuitive, distinctions between the formal (constitutional) and informal (extraconstitutional) foundations of presidential influence. Borrowing from his previous work (with Thomas Cronin, The Paradoxes of the American Presidency, 1997), Genovese plays upon the contradictory leadership expectations and constitutional ambiguities that presidents have faced since the beginning of the Republic. These include the systemic checks and balances aimed at reigning in presidential power and the wording of Article II, which provides the basis both for restrictive and expansive interpretations of presidential authority by Congress, the Court, and the electorate.

The evolution of the presidency, Genovese posits, is "a story of elasticity and adaptability; of leadership and clerkship; of strong and weak officeholders; of change and stasis" (p. 16). The themes accentuated throughout the brief studies of individual presidencies—the pivotal role of precedents, foreign policy actions, popular politics, struggles with Congress, changing economic and international contexts—emphasize broad historical cycles of rising and declining presidential influence. Genovese's central objective is to highlight the ways in which the office has been transformed across time without any fundamental restructuring of the Constitution. He notes that when presidential power has surged forward, the "great" and "near great" presidents found themselves in challenging governing positions. The common threads that link such icons as Washington, Jackson, Lincoln, Theodore Roosevelt, and Franklin Roosevelt include skill and the selfless pursuit of a higher purpose in the bid to expand presidential power. It is the combination of individual political acumen, governing context, and the demands upon the presidency relative to the larger American political system to which Genovese fittingly credits the adaptability of the institution to changing domestic and international circumstances across time.

Historians may find one of the book's main virtues, brevity, to be a liability. Because Genovese cannot cover the intricacies of each administration he is compelled to set forth the high and low points and the major historical developments succinctly. An ambitious "political time" framework à la Stephen Skowronek (The Politics Presidents Make, 1997) is not fully developed, although useful "periodic" distinctions are drawn. Genovese skillfully crafts a thoughtful, well-documented volume that will surely be appreciated in undergraduate courses on the presidency and political development.

Genovese's concise analysis of turning points in the modern era (since Franklin Roosevelt) and the challenges recent presidents have faced, particularly with respect to economic and domestic policy and the end of the Cold War, is well balanced. Above all, the concluding chapter is insightful and bound to spark lively classroom debates. By underscoring the ebb and flow of presidential influence over three centuries, Genovese reminds us that those elements of our "leadership adverse," separated system that simultaneously sanction and constrict executive power—and are often blamed for gridlock—are not wholly unique to the modern presidency. The continuity that connects the "traditional" and "modern" presidency is the enduring search for equilibrium comprising bold yet democratically accountable leadership.

What of modern presidents' attempts to surmount systemic obstacles and leave legacies commensurate with the "great" presidents of times passed? Should Neustadt's focus on personal power continue to orient presidency scholars today? Presidential Power: Forging the Presidency for the Twenty-First Century is a superlative collection of articles that critically examine Neustadt's influential legacy. Shapiro, Kumar, and Jacobs have produced a volume that rivals Michael Nelson's sixth edition of The Presidency and the Political System (2000) in theoretical scope and surpasses it in sophisticated empirical data analysis. Their volume is appropriate for advanced undergraduates and should be required reading for graduate courses on the modern presidency.

Derived from a Columbia University conference in 1996, the essays in Presidential Power take up a range of issues pertaining to Neustadt's power approach. The authors test key hypotheses, raise new questions, and challenge core assumptions. The book is organized into six parts, and a senior scholar provides an overview and commentary on the essays at the beginning of each section. Chapters by George Edwards and John Gunnell place Neustadt's approach within traditions of American political science. The second section covers issues of personal power-bargaining with Congress, the timing of presidential speechmaking, and advisory structures. The third and fourth parts focus on the institutionalization of the presidency and the position of the executive relative to other systemic actors. The fifth section discusses presidential polling and media communication. The concluding chapters consider the effect of Clinton's proposed impeachment as well as a somewhat plaintive essay by Neustadt himself on the future of presidency research.

If the essays strike a melancholic chord with Neustadt, it is because the objectives of the authors tend to be at odds with the original purpose of his classic study. Whereas that work was meant as a primer for officeholders on the practice of personal power, these essays are heavily weighted toward rational choice assumptions and the "new institutionalism." They focus less on individual skill and are far more concerned with concrete theoretical development in presidential scholarship. As Jacobs and Shapiro note in the concluding chapter, Neustadt's work "no longer offers a reliable roadmap embodying the consensus among contemporary scholars" (p. 489). Many of the contributors reject "Neustadt's emphasis on the personal basis of power in favor of an analysis of institutions and political structures" (p. 491). At the same time, some of the underlying themes of Neustadt's classic work, including "institutional partisanship" (the view that presidents should prevail over other systemic actors), presidents' relationship with the public, and reputational issues, are prevalent in the essays.

Neustadt is critiqued from a variety of angles, and some disconfirming evidence is presented alongside traces of his wellestablished insight on presidential power. Several authors take issue with Neustadt's choice to hold the institutional context of the presidency constant. Charles Cameron, for instance, considers how party control of Congress shifts legislative leadership from "coordination" under unified government to "strategic bargaining" through the veto power under divided government. Others, like Nolan McCarty and Rose Razaghian, suggest that presidents engage in more "strategic anticipation" than the bargaining model profferred by Neustadt. As they attempt to control the bureaucracy through appointments, presidents may create the false impression of a "honeymoon" early in their term by saving controversial appointments until later. Others, such as Bert Rockman, are skeptical of Neustadt's organizational prescriptions for the presidency. Neustadt touts Franklin Roosevelt's "multiple advocacy" approach as the key to success, yet Reagan, for example, was largely successful (at least in his first term) through a far more structured organization. Renée Smith finds that presidents can act as "teachers" through "selfmade happenings," but they do not always maximize the potential of "prestige" with the public. Public approval does not appear to drive decisions on the timing of presidential speeches.

Embedded in the collection of articles are other considerable insights, controversial theses, and sophisticated methods to which a brief review cannot do justice. Some of the articles draw data from archival material (Matthew Dickson and Diane Heith); Robert Lieberman compares Neustadt's approach to Skowronek's "regimes" in political time; and Congress-centered arguments about legislative delegation to the president are presented (David Epstein and Sharyn O'Halloran). All told, the collection accentuates how the new wave of research on the presidency focuses on the institutional and structural constraints on presidential power and the executive's direct connection to public opinion. This approach is at variance with Neustadt's emphasis on the personal basis of presidential power and "insider" reputation.

Not all scholars will agree with the general perspective of Presidential Power. The "psychological" presidency (e.g., James David Barber, The Presidential Character 1992) and interconnecting issues of personality, leadership style, and presidential politics (Fred I. Greenstein, The Presidential Difference, 2000; Alexander L. George & Juliette L. George Presidential Personality and Performance, 1998; Erwin C. Hargrove, Presidential Leadership, 1966) are deemphasized. Nonetheless, the critiques of Neustadt are a tribute to his pioneering work in charting the course for presidency scholarship. The essays also reflect the theoretical maturation of the subfield in recent decades as scholars continue to map out new directions in presidency research.

Not Whether But When: The U.S. Decision to Enlarge NATO. By James M. Goldgeier. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution Press, 1999. 218p. $42.95 cloth, $18.95 paper.

Sharyl Cross, San Jose State University

James M. Goldgeier makes a major contribution to the contemporary case study literature concerning American foreign policy formation. Based on extensive interviews with more than 75 key participants (William Perry, Richard Holbrooke, John Shalikashvili, Leon Panetta, Anthony Lake, Strobe Talbott, and so forth), Goldgeier reconstructs a richly detailed account of the policy process that culminated in the decision to expand the NATO alliance eastward. The study illuminates the complex interplay of political considerations, bureaucratic interests, and individual preferences and skills (even chutzpah) that led to the admission of the first tier of new NATO member nations in Eastern/Central Europe.

No less a figure than George F. Kennan, principal architect of America's post-World War II containment strategy, described the decision to expand the alliance as "the most fateful error of American policy in the entire post-Cold War era" (George F. Kennan, "A Fateful Error," New York Times, February 5, 1997, p. A23). Many scholars recognized the potential adverse consequences for relations with postcommunist Russia, the economic costs of admitting new members, questions concerning the potential military-to-military interoperability of Eastern/Central European nations with NATO members, and many other considerations, and they were at a loss to explain the administration's decision to pursue what appeared as a less than optimal policy choice. Goldgeier's balanced and objective treatment of this contentious issue makes clear the confluence of considerations—right or wrong—that resulted in a 1998 Senate vote (80-19) in support of NATO enlargement.

In this concise (six chapters) and well-written study, Goldgeier carefully reconstructs the range of variables that led the Department of State on a fast-track trajectory in support of enlargement, with the primary objective of creating an incentive for democratic transition in the newly independent states of Europe. Based on the interviews with General John Shalikashvili (Supreme Allied Commander in Europe SACEUR), Charles W. Freeman, Jr. (Assistant Secretary of Defense for Regional Security Affairs), and other U.S. officials, Goldgeier provides detailed evidence to suggest that the Pentagon was reluctant to embrace enlargement; it favored the Partnership for Peace initiative as a first step toward constructing the preconditions for eventually integration of new members into the alliance. The Pentagon also appears to have assigned a higher priority to limiting the potential for renewed confrontation with Russia. Beyond defining the core distinctions between the Department of State and the Pentagon, the analysis expands to evaluate the weight of Congress, Russian political realities, U.S. public indifference, and interest groups composed of U.S. citizens of Eastern/Central European descent in the formation of policy.

Perhaps of most interest is Goldgeier's attention to the significance of key individuals in securing U.S. commitment to NATO enlargement. "Lake and the president laid out the vision between September 1993 and July 1994, and Holbrooke had the 'chutzpah' to move the policy forward in the fall of 1994" (p. 11). The author concludes: "My numerous interviews with enlargement opponents within the administration and with enlargement proponents outside of it have created the overwhelming recollection that in October 1994 Assistant Secretary of State for European and Canadian Affairs Richard C. Holbrooke pushed forward an enlargement policy that was no more than theory to that point" (p. 152).

Goldgeier persuasively establishes the significant influences exerted by National Security Advisor Anthony Lake and, even more important, Assistant Secretary of State Richard Holbrooke in securing U.S. backing for NATO enlargement. Goldgeier observes that ambiguity in presidential decision making creates opportunities for policy entrepreneurs (in this case, especially Lake and Holbrooke) to strike decisively in advancing their preferences. The case study reveals how personality, skills, persistence, and conviction of the single policy entrepreneur can be directed toward "outmaneuvering" the bureaucracy to achieve desired objectives.

According to Goldgeier, Holbrooke served the role of enforcer, taking Clinton's words in support of NATO expansion to the implementation phase. Among several illustrations, the author carefully recounts a meeting in September 1994, shortly after Holbrooke's return to Washington as Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs; it involved more than thirty officials, and Holbrooke abrasively and astutely set the process in motion. Goldgeier includes General Wesley Clarke's recollection of this first interagency meeting called by Holbrooke: "Kruzel spoke first, since he was the policy guy, and said, 'Why is this policy? It's supposed to be an interagency process.' Holbrooke crushed him like a bug. He said, 'It is policy.' Ash Carter walked out of the room" (p. 74).

Goldgeier's study contributes to discounting some of the simplistic explanations put forward to account for NATO enlargement, such as the claim that Clinton favored the initiative only to gain the Polish vote. Clearly, the decision was far more complex, encompassing a range of individual actors and institutional interests.

Yet, despite the painstaking research effort, there are still some unanswered questions. Perhaps most significant, the factors that led Clinton to support expansion of the alliance are not entirely clear. According to Goldgeier's account, the visits of Polish and Czech presidents Lech Walesa and Vaclav Havel with Clinton, in conjunction with the opening of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in 1993, involved "emotional appeals" for support of NATO expansion that made a significant and lasting impression (pp. 20, 165). But did these appeals prove decisive in persuading the president to favor this policy course? Are there equally plausible alternative explanations? How were Clinton's views shaped by discussions with the policy entrepreneurs. Boris Yeltsin's admonitions concerning enlargement, or strategic considerations?

Clinton's speeches indicate that he desired dual objectives: support of NATO enlargement while simultaneously keeping Russian democratization and the favorable climate in U.S.-Russian relations on track. Goldgeier makes an interesting point advanced by psychologists: "When faced with the problem of competing objectives, individuals often convince themselves that there is no contradiction, that they can, in the words of one senior official discussing the two tracks of this policy, 'walk and chew gum at the same time'" (p. 160). Perhaps this explanation is sufficient. In the end, however, without conclusive evidence regarding the shaping of Clinton's views and motives, one critical area of the case study remains at least partially speculative. Future revelations in interviews with the former president or the release of his memoirs could yield additional material that will be useful in completing this analysis.

The study have been enhanced by devoting greater attention to the influence of the European dimension in the formulation of policy. No one can dispute that to "understand the development of NATO enlargement requires understanding the interplay of process, politics, and policy in Washington, D.C." (p. 5). Europeans and other observers might take issue, however, with the claim that "all of the key decisions were made in Washington" (p. 5). In fact, concerns were raised throughout the enlargement debate about securing the approval of the 16 NATO members and their respective legislative bodies. Even if the "whether" and "when" were ultimately answered in Washington, expansion was contingent on complex political processes within other alliance nations. Furthermore, it would be interesting to ascertain the extent to which Clinton's position—or that of his key advisors—were influenced by European perspectives or considerations.

Goldgeier offers interesting insights concerning theoretical models. For example: "A classical model of bureaucratic politics tells us that where individuals stand depends on where they sit, and that how they perceive a situation also depends on their bureaucratic role. The NATO enlargement policy process suggests that which bureaucratic position is crucial for understanding the orientation of officials at lower levels, the higher up you go, the more longstanding beliefs rather than a particular job title prove critical in many cases" (p. 156). Goldgeier insightfully observes that support of enlargement from Madeleine Albright, Lynn Davis, Anothony Lake, and others resulted from assigning the highest priority to promoting democratization in Eastern and Central Europe, and the positions of these officials derived from individual preferences, values, or personal and professional experiences even more so than any view that might have been predicted as a result of institutional affiliations at the Department of State or elsewhere.

The author challenges some of the central theoretical arguments in the literature, but core questions and conclusions advanced in this study remain quite fundamental: "How do policies typically develop within the United States government?" (p. 5) "The development of the U.S. initiative to enlarge NATO reminds us that the decision process is often just that—a process—rather than a specific moment" (p. 152). Much that is revealed in this study is likely to be of greater interest to university students seeking to understand the making of American foreign policy than to seasoned specialists, who might expect major new theoretical contributions.

This book should be a priority for those interested in a detailed, focused case study that reconstructs the complex array of factors in a post–Cold War U.S. foreign policy decision likely to have significant consequences for generations to come.

Interest Groups, Lobbying, and Participation in America. By Kenneth M. Goldstein. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999. 170p. $49.95 cloth, $16.95 paper.

Beth L. Leech, Rutgers University

Studies of interest-group influence on politics and studies of mass participation in politics typically have been quite separate undertakings. With a few notable exceptions, research projects have been designed to examine one or the other, not both, and the influence of interest-group activity on mass political activity is too seldom considered. In this broadly integrative book, Kenneth Goldstein makes a convincing argument for why this should not be the case.

Goldstein's central argument about mass participation in public policy issues is that little about it is spontaneous. For example, since 1970 the number of citizens who contact their members of Congress by letter and phone has nearly doubled. This increase is remarkable in that it took place during a period in which we have seen a sharp decline in voter turnout in congressional elections. Goldstein argues that while more citizens than ever are calling and writing their members of Congress, they are doing so as part of orchestrated efforts by elites, by organizers who facilitate the participation of those outside the beltway.

Goldstein's argument about mass participation parallels an argument made by Stephen Rosenstone and John Mark Hansen in their 1991 book, Mobilization, Participation, and Democracy in America. In that book they argued that declines in voter turnout resulted at least in part from declines in party mobilizing efforts. They, too, see mass participation as linked to efforts by elites. Goldstein extends this argument and shows that it holds true for other types of political participation, such as letter-writing and contacting government officials.

The book also contains an important argument about the nature of lobbying strategies. Goldstein argues that the main goal of an outside lobbying campaign is to create the "traceability" that Douglas Arnold wrote about in The Logic of Congressional Action (1992). A traceable issue, according to Arnold, is one that is salient, has perceptible consequences, and is linked to an identifiable government action by a legislator. An outside lobbying campaign, Goldstein argues, creates that traceability, but the grassroots message also may be used to give cues to potential challengers, signal information about the direction and intensity of constituency opinion, and frame an issue.

That is a lot of different things for a message to communicate, and the complexity of both this and Goldstein's other theoretical models provides both the strength and the weakness of his book. Lobbying decisions and lobbying strategies are complicated. Lobbyists use multiple tactics, undertaken with multiple goals in mind. Goldstein acknowledges this and eschews any attempt to simplify the process into a caricature.

Two types of evidence support the arguments made in the book. On the interest-group side, there are interviews with 41 interest-group representatives regarding their organizations' activities in 94 grassroots lobbying campaigns. On the individual side, there are survey data from participation and recruitment questions in the Battleground poll of 1994, conducted jointly by Democratic and Republican polling firms. Data from theses polls, supplemented by National Election Study and Times Mirror survey data, allow Goldstein to test the effects of recruitment contacts and to investigate who is being recruited.

Goldstein begins by developing a model of how grassroots lobbying decisions are made: when to target, where to target, whom to target, how to target. The fundamental assumption in this model is that not all grassroots lobbying contacts are equal. Some constituents will be more likely to respond to mobilization efforts than others and the opinions of some types of constituents will matter more to the legislator than others. Recruitment choices, according to Goldstein's model, will be driven in part by the desire to lower the participation costs for the citizens most likely to influence the legislative outcome. His cases support this prediction. For example, groups opposing the Clinton health-care plan mobilized constituents in the districts of members of the five committees that were considering the Clinton bill. Even within those committees, however, grassroots efforts were not evenly distributed, but were focused more strongly on members of committees where the

His theory predicts and his data show that when the lobbying objective is a short-term legislative goal, interest groups will target districts represented by undecided voters and influential legislators. The aim is to provide these legislators with information about the possible negative electoral consequences should they vote contrary to the sentiments voiced in the grassroots campaign. However, when the interest-group goal is more long-term, the objective in the grassroots campaigns shifts to providing information to voters and potential challengers in districts where there are legislative opponents who are judged to be vulnerable.

Goldstein notes that some scholars have concluded that campaigns like the "Harry and Louise" ads opposing the Clinton health-care plan were not successful because surveys at the time found little national recall of the ads. National recall is a poor indicator of success, however, because the ads were targeted only at specific districts, not the nation as a whole. He quotes a lobbyist: "We were trying to move congressional votes, not Gallup numbers. We didn't need to convince all Americans or all congressmen, we just had to convince the ones that mattered" (p. 77).

This is not a soothing book. A trade association executive is quoted: "Grass roots mobilization is used for one purpose, period—to influence legislative policy. It's not about getting more Americans involved. It's not about educating people on the issues. It's not about making Americans feel good about their political system" (p. 125). Individuals are targeted for mobilization in part based on the likelihood that they will participate if mobilized. Thus, mobilization campaigns tend to exacerbate, rather than mitigate, existing biases in representation.

Goldstein does not suggest that the interest groups are at fault here, that grassroots campaigns should be abolished, or that scholars who worry about the dangers of too much mass participation are correct. Rather, he points out that the reason stimulated participation is so effective is because mass participation rates are low. Low turnout rates make legislators pay particular attention to information about the types of constituencies that are likely to vote and less attention to those that are not likely to vote. This makes grassroots campaigns with electoral objectives easier to achieve, since narrow constituencies can have a large influence in low-turnout contests. Therefore, one solution is to work to increase voter participation, thereby minimizing the unrepresentative effects of the grassroots campaigns. An additional reform suggested by Goldstein is to require interest groups to report the money they spend on grassroots efforts. Such reporting currently is required for expenditures on direct lobbying and campaign contributions, but not for grassroots campaigns.

This book provides a richly theoretical description of lobbying and participation that crosses subfield boundaries and makes crucial connections between political science theory and the realities of political life. We do not walk away from this book with a one-sentence jingle that explains the causes and effects of outside lobbying campaigns but, instead, with a clearer understanding of the linkages between interest organizations and other political institutions.

Flag Burning and Free Speech: The Case of Texas v. Johnson. By Robert Justin Goldstein. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2000. 269p. $35.00 cloth, $14.95 paper.

Scot Guenter, San Jose State University

This is another in the Landmark Law Cases and American Society series from Kansas, joining such topics as the Salem witchcraft trials, Marbury v. Madison, the Pullman case, and Bakke. The series editors have chosen wisely in making this selection, both in topic and author. Goldstein is the nation's leading expert on legislation and judicial review related to flag desecration. He brings to this project considerable knowledge, prolific publications in this area, and a clarity of voice and focus. There are no provocative and startling new approaches or theories, but that is not the purpose. I highly recommend this book as assigned coursework for college seminars on civil religion, the separation of powers doctrine,

First Amendment rights, Supreme Court functioning, or the interplay between politics, the media, and the Constitution. It will work well in classes not only in political science but also in intellectual and cultural history, American studies, philosophy, and communication studies.

Aware that subjectivity is inevitable in an analysis of such a controversial and often emotional concern, Goldstein openly shares his stance in the Preface: "I believe that although flag desecration is usually a completely counterproductive activity that primarily alienates people, it nonetheless is a form of political expression and therefore must be constitutionally protected in a society that claims freedom of expression as its philosophical touchstone" (p. xv). He summarizes the three basic arguments in favor of criminalizing flag desecration, then ponders scenarios when it might serve "socially useful purposes" (p. xviii). Goldstein is precise in establishing chronologies of events and carefully selects quotations to let the adherents of varying positions speak for themselves.

The text is organized into nine chapters. The first is the best brief overview I have yet seen on the early cultural history of the American flag, and it emphasizes the beginning of what Goldstein terms the "Flag Protection Movement" (FPM) around 1890. Chapter 2 is a succinct yet comprehensive summation of flag desecration laws and prosecutions in the period 1897-1980. Getting to the main focus of the book, chapter 3 offers a longer, more detailed consideration of the Texas trials of Gregory Lee Johnson for his infamous flagburning protest outside the 1984 Republican National Convention in Dallas, which renominated Ronald Reagan for president. Next, there are chapters on the Supreme Court handling of and ruling in that case, the media and political backlash that followed, and a comparatively lengthy appraisal of the congressional debate provoked by that backlash, which ultimately led to the Flag Protection Act (FPA) of 1989. The last one-third of the book turns to how the FPA was tested in the courts from October 1989 through May 1990, the Supreme Court response in Eichman in June 1990, and the ongoing and unresolved struggle during the 1990s over a constitutional amendment to outlaw flag desecration.

I particularly enjoyed the way Goldstein elaborates on the workings of the Supreme Court in chapter 4, including private musings of the justices and procedural insights gleaned from clerk interviews. He also brings to life some of the more dramatic personages involved in the chain of events, such as the revolutionary Gregory Lee Johnson, the dynamic lawyer William Kunstler, or the meticulous solicitor general destined for later fame, Kenneth Starr. Two other features accentuate this work's usefulness as a college text: a handy chronology of flag desecration law and a superb bibliographic essay that points to the best reference sources should students wish to follow up on different aspects of this topic.

The American flag is the most sacred symbol in our civil religion. Historically, in times of economic and political crisis or great cultural dislocation, forces in society have emphasized cohesion through enforced demonstrations of nationalistic commitment. This is not going to change, although the specific rituals, rules, and ceremonies may. But we also have a long (and to my mind, admirable) tradition of honoring, protecting, and even expanding our interpretation of First Amendment rights. The tension of these coexisting truths has been at the core of much of America's historical experience, and the fact that this issue is not going away is what makes this book not only timely but also significant for undergraduate reading and reflection.

George Bush was in the White House in June 1990, when the Supreme Court, in a 5-4 ruling, upheld the right to express symbolic political dissent by burning a flag. He immediately renewed the call for a constitutional amendment to correct what he felt was an error on the part of the Court. That drive, of course, did not succeed, although it came very close. In 2002, in large part due to a 5-4 ruling by another Supreme Court (with two members appointed during his father's presidency), another George Bush sits in the White House, and many of his political views and practices are committed to fulfilling the earlier agendas and aims of his father. We live in a time when close Court decisions are overturning or reexamining issues of privacy, the separation of church and state, and the relationship between federal and state authority. Goldstein convincingly explains why the movement for a constitutional amendment against flag desecration diminished in effectiveness from 1995 to 2000, but he ends the book by reaffirming how divided our nation is on this issue and how it will inevitably resurface in legal and political battles.

For the most scholarly and throughly documented analysis of Texas v. Johnson or for a wide range of primary sources to assess, look to earlier books written or edited by Goldstein (Burning the Flag: The Great 1989–90 American Flag Descration Controversy, 1996; Desecrating the American Flag: Key Documents of the Controversy from the Civil War to 1995, 1996). For a handy, accessible text appropriate for general readership, and faithful to Goldstein's well-established scrupulous attention to all his sources, this is the book for you.

Nonprofits in Urban America. Edited by Richard C. Hula and Cynthia Jackson-Elmoore. Westport, CT: Quorum Books, 2000. 235p. $65.00.

Peter J. Haas, San Jose State University

This volume purports to explore questions about the changing role of nonprofit organizations in contemporary urban America. The stated theme is to explain how and why such organizations "attempt to sculpt the landscape of urban policy and political action rather than simply react or adapt to it" (p. 1), although the nine articles do not embrace it with equal rigor. The editors, who also contribute a chapter, further state that the text will explore "when and where such efforts are effective and when and where they are not" (p. 1). These are timely and important issues, given the Bush administration's stated goal of increasing reliance on nonprofit organizations.

The essays are extremely uneven, both in terms of their ability to deliver on the editors' vision and in their overall quality. The highlight of this nevertheless worthwhile volume is the synthesis in the first chapter by Steve Rathgeb Smith. He does an admirable job of weaving a comprehensive literature review on the evolution of scholarly thought about the origins and roles of nonprofits into the more specific concerns of the articles in this volume. His contribution deftly identifies the lacunae in existing theory, which tends to overemphasize the role nonprofits can play in enhancing social welfare, and points to more explicitly politically significant functions that nonprofits are fulfilling in urban areas. He seeks to show how the other contributions to this volume exemplify various aspects of this more political purpose for nonprofits.

Although generally trenchant, Smith's essay creats something of a straw man argument that is repeated several times throughout the book. Smith maintains that Lester Salamon's oft-cited "partnership" theory of nonprofit organizations cannot account for the emergence of more politically motivated nonprofits. Yet, few readers will be surprised to learn that some nonprofits may frequently take a more independent and even antagonistic stance toward the public and private sectors. It is true that Salamon's theory emphasizes the economic logic behind nonprofit creation, but it seems unenlightening if not unfair to discredit it on the basis of what may well be a limited number of exceptions that are the focus of this text.

There are many inadequacies in most of the subsequent chapters, which for the most part focus on a particular community or type of nonprofit organization or both. A common foible is that the cases tend to underplay severely potential concerns about method. Beyond a brief article based on a limited survey of nonprofit directors, the essays are only loosely anchored in any kind or rigorous approach to data collection and analysis. Contributors Joseph Cordes, Jeffrey Henig, and Eric Twombly, for example, make the rather bold assertion that increasing "privatization" of nonprofits may risk "further depletion of the role of purposive mission," converting them into "more material-based organizations" (p. 59). Yet, they offer only anecdotal examples of this sort of conversion, which leads me to wonder whether and to what extent it is really occurring.

Todd Swanstrom and Julia Koschinsky argue that community-based housing organizations (CBOs) have the primary goal of "addressing place-based inequalities... that limit the ability of citizens to realize their full potential as active economic, social, and political beings" (p. 75). They find that contemporary CBOs are instead emphasizing "service delivery and real estate development" (p. 85). Once again, however, the evidence is at best sketchy, and the reader cannot judge the validity of the authors' analysis, including the extent to which CBOs actually embrace the authors' notions about their goals. One does not expect definitive data in a volume of essentially case studies, but the contributors collectively ignore such concerns.

Several articles freely substitute normative assertions for more objective analysis. A common undercurrent is the idea that nonprofit organizations should be vehicles of political change, rather than merely alternate modes for urban service delivery. Several authors suggest (as do Swanstrom and Koschinsky) that cutbacks in public funding have forced nonprofits to "sell out." If that is indeed the case, they need to consider to what extent, if any, the clients of these organizations would be better served by more focus on political expression and less on the delivery of tangible goods and services.

Some of the articles seem to be too sanguine about the effect of political efforts by nonprofits. In their essay, editors Hula and Jackson-Elmoore describe the development of "governing nonprofits" in Detroit. These are defined as nonprofits for which "targeted empowerment" of otherwise disenfranchised or alienated groups is a "core organizational goal" (p. 130). They strongly suggests that such groups have succeeded in increasing the representation of African Americans and, therefore, the city's "civic capacity" to address social and economic issues. They fail to consider that this development occurred during a period when Detroit lost a significant portion of its white population to suburban areas, which made increased minority representation almost inevitable, and they do not demonstrate that African Americans are now any better off than they would have been absent these organizations. Similarly, Marion Orr extols the "crucial role" of Baltimoreans United in Leadership Development (BUILD), citing a few limited accomplishments, such as the city's support for a "living wage" that was essentially ignored by corporate employers. I wonder whether and to what extent the political presence of BUILD is actually improving the lives of poorer residents.

In sum, Nonprofits in Urban America is an often provocative but equally disappointing foray into the political aspects of American nonprofits. Too frequently, potentially significant questions are posed (or implied) but left unanswered or are answered with inadequate documentation. Nevertheless, the volume offers a useful descriptive survey of the range of political dimension of nonprofit organizations, particularly for those unfamiliar with this terrain.

Faithful and Fearless: Moving Feminist Protest Inside the Church and Military. By Mary Fainsod Katzenstein. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1998. 270p. $40.00 cloth, $18.95 paper.

Laura R. Woliver, University of South Carolina

The power of social movements to transform what we take for granted and what we contest is beautifully displayed in Faithful and Fearless. Mary Fainsod Katzenstein shows how some protest in American society has moved inside institutions. Particularly, she means, feminist protest: "Less lawbreaking than norm-breaking, these feminists have challenged, discomfited, and provoked, unleashing a wholesale disturbance of long-settled assumptions, rules, and practices.... Sometimes by their mere presence, but more often by claiming specific rights, and by demanding in certain facets the transformation of the institutions of which they are a part, feminists have reinvented the protests of the 1960s inside the institutional mainstream of the 1990s" (p. 7).

The study takes as its starting point the fact that what used to be seen as outlandish has become commonplace in our society. The book offers an account of how feminist activists have worked to effect change in core institutions of American life. Katzenstein's fieldwork and interviews focus on the institutions of the United States military and the American Catholic Church. From 1988 to 1997 she interviewed about 120 individuals active in women-centered reform efforts within these two institutions. Her findings are compelling for many reasons. One is that the two institutions she studied represent the best test cases for her thesis. If change is occurring within the Catholic Church and the military because of feminist/ womanist pressures (two of our stodgiest, thickly mossbacked, phallocentric institutions), then indeed the "sisterhood is powerful." Different tributaries flow from a common feminist source and set in motion social changes.

She studies the feminists, mostly women, not in the public eye who throughout the last three decades (1960-1990s) have challenged in their everyday lives the institutions in which they work and live. The women engage in unobtrusive mobilization within these patriarchal edifices. These very same institutions, in turn, have a power of their own to shape differences in contemporary feminism. For example, military feminists have a strong belief in equal rights and equal opportunities. Their strategy is simply to have existing laws implemented within the military. The military women are liberal feminists, practicing interest-group feminism, whereas the Catholic feminists are more radical. They want to transform cultures, institutions, and society. They directly confront and contest poverty, homophobia, racism, war, and violence. The feminists within the Catholic Church in America are activists for radical equality. This Catholic feminist protest is a more radical discursive politics. Discursive politics, Katzenstein explains, is the politics of meaning making (p. 17). The American Catholic feminists utilize language, cognition, books, and conferences to process and articulate their vision of a just world which includes a feminist worldview. Their meetings, networks, prayer groups, conferences (indeed, confessional conferencing), and reports constitute discursive activism. They have, therefore, a difference in perspective. They form organizational habitats (protected spaces) within the larger institutions. Within the Church, their enclave becomes like a "women-church;" it is not removed from the male bastions of power but seriously engaged as a dissenting, discursive voice. Like the women in the military, the women-church activists use the ethics and rhetoric of the institution to force the institution to abide by its own promises and principles. The Leadership Conference of Women Religious, for instance, works to revision women in the Church and the Church's role in social justice.

Radicalism in the Church is shaped by the lack of legal redress since the Church is a private and religious organization. These feminist radicals in the Catholic church are seeking an understanding of the structural or systemic bases of inequality in the church and in society. They are not like Mother Teresa of Calcutta, nursing the poor and ameliorating their pain and suffering. Rather, they focus on "the identifying and rooting out of the very systems that cause the poor to be poor, the homeless to be homeless, and that cause people to die of poverty or oppression" (p. 21).

Katzenstein's research displays the multilevel significance of the law for women who seek equality within institutions. The legalization of claims making in American politics can assist in the institutionalization of feminist protest. She also explores the meaning of protesting from inside institutions. Katzenstein cautions us against the view that inside activism signals the end of the challenges that movement politics initiates.

For women within the military, Katzenstein explains the complicated and contradictory role of the law. She writes, "The law's role is also a normative one, shaping the way activists come to define themselves, see the world around them, and prioritize their agendas. For how can we explain otherwise the fact that activists seize some opportunities but not others?" (p. 165). The military women are feminists by any other name. They do not directly claim the mantle of feminism, yet all their beliefs, positions, justifications, and orientations are feminist.

Katzenstein shows how these women must be Faithful and Fearless: "Given the previously rigid gender-cast system in both military and church, and given the continued risks to career, status, and respect that those who challenge gender ascription incur, such women must be fearless to be faithful to their institutions on feminist terms" (p. 164). Cultures agree on what requires debate and what does not (p. 35). Feminist issues now require debate, and this is great progress. Backlashes against feminism, then, occur because of feminist progress. Katzenstein deftly proves that by demanding a coequal place inside male-dominant institutions, feminists have transported protest into mainstream institutions and have changed institutional and social givens.

Katzenstein's study is sure to be a classic in social movement, feminist, religious, and democratic theory. It is richly deserving of all the awards it has already received (the Marion Irish Award of the American Political Science Association for the best book in women and politics, for instance) and will receive in the future.

Environmental Injustice in the United States: Myths and Realities. By James P. Lester, David W. Allen, and Kelly M. Hill. Boulder, CO: Westview, 2000. 216p. $19.00.

Michael E. Kraft, University of Wisconsin-Green Bay

Over the past decade the study of environmental justice has sparked considerable debate, with conflict often exacerbated by conceptual and definitional muddles, scarcity of pertinent data, and disagreement over which methods to employ. This book by the late James Lester and his colleagues is unlikely to diminish the controversy. Yet, as a comprehensive attempt to clear out the conceptual underbrush and bring hard data to bear on difficult empirical questions, the book merits attention by all those concerned with issues of environmental equity. The preliminary findings have been presented at conferences from 1994 on, and many are already familiar with this research. As the authors note, however, they began with a skeptical posture toward the strident assertions made regarding environmental justice. In the end, they reconsidered that position and found much evidence to support concern over environmental inequities in U.S. society.

Environmental justice issues rose rapidly on the policy agenda during the 1990s, prompted by numerous but flawed studies that suggested a disproportionate effect of toxic chemicals and hazardous wastes on low-income and minority communities. Those findings were reinforced by political pressures from environmental justice groups to take corrective action to address what was often termed environmental racism. Horror stories of communities that suffered from high levels of exposure to air and water pollution and hazardous waste sites made the arguement both graphic and compelling.

Political scientists entered the fray to try to identify the key empirical questions and to bring appropriate data to bear. Attention has focused on class and race inequities in exposure to environmental risks (and the presumed health consequences), largely from living in close proximity to hazardous waste treatment, storage, and disposal facilities. As scholars such as Evan Ringquist have noted so well, the methodological challenges faced in trying to address such concerns are formidable.

For example, we have good data on the location of polluting facilities, but living near such a facility is not the same as exposure to its toxic emissions. We also have fairly accurate measures of major chemical emissions by industries, courtesy of the U.S. Toxics Release Inventory (TRI), from which we infer human exposure. Further complicating the situation is the circumstantial evidence that links toxic chemical exposure to health effects, which may appear decades later.

The challenge for scholars has been to unravel this complex situation, largely by examining the relationship between chemical releases and the demographic characteristics of exposed populations. Even when statistical relationships of this kind are found, they may not tell us why environmental inequities occur and what might be done through public policies to reduce them.

Lester, Allen, and Hill offer a multilevel analysis of these relationships at different periods using multiple dependent variables. They examine the contiguous 48 states, the 2,080 U.S. counties for which TRI data are available, and the 410–414 U.S. cities with more than 50,000 residents where they could use TRI data. They employ seven measures of environmental harm to broaden the picture, including TRI chemical releases, air pollution levels, and Superfund sites. They focus on four categories of possible explanations for environmental inequities: race and ethnicity, class, political mobilization, and exogenous variables, such as pollution severity, political culture, government fiscal capacity, business climate, and the strength of environmental interest groups.

The argument is presented in ten relatively brief but densely written chapters, accompanied by 13 figures and 28 tables. The early chapters examine the nature of the environmental justice problem, review the literature (with particular attention to conceptual and methodological issues), and provide an elaborate history of the environmental justice movement.

The heart of the book is a well-developed model of environmental justice that seeks to integrate the variables noted above; three chapters that separately examine environmental injustice at the state, county, and city level; and a summary of the findings and conclusions. The authors find no relationship between political mobilization and environmental injustice, mixed results for social class, and strong evidence of race-based injustice. Most of the additional explanations examined here, other than the severity of pollution, also yield mixed results. Two final chapters deal with policy implications. The authors review federal and state policy on environmental justice, noting in particular the impressive variation across states, and they systematically examine alternative policy designs based on the criteria of rationality, equity, and efficiency.

Readers may quibble with the selection of particular methods and in some ways question the writing style. For example, why focus on states, counties, and cities but not, as some scholars do, on finer levels of analysis, such as ZIP codes or Census tracks? The review literature tends to be rather heavy on citations (15 or 20 for some sentences) but light on a summary or assessment of what other scholars have done. This may not matter for those already familiar with the literature, but it will be difficult for undergraduates, and even many graduate students, to follow the authors' reasoning in these sections.

Similarly, the authors argue that case studies are an unreliable way to study environmental justice and that only national data of the kind they use can permit generalization. But case studies have some redeeming virtues. They often do a better job of conveying the real human burden created by environmental injustice as well as the political, economic, and social constraints that affect efforts to change the situation. The addition of some case studies might have complemented the statistical analysis.

The two policy-oriented chapters will be of special interest to many. After a detailed and finely structured policy analysis, the authors conclude that a risk-based solution that reflects the severity of pollution problems best meets their criteria. It can be justified in terms of rationality, efficiency in the use of scarce societal resources, and equity for all concerned. This conclusion squares well with arguments of environmental policy scholars over the past decade about the need to set priorities based on such risk levels. Yet, it is at odds with the views advanced by leaders of the environmental justice movement, who tend to favor race- or class-based solutions.

Lester, Allen, and Hill have much to say about how to study environmental justice and how to deal with the inherent conceptual and methodological complexities. Their analysis offers valuable insights into the multiple causes of environmental injustice and what might be done to address it. As a research report that seeks mainly to advance knowledge and further the debate over environmental equity, the volume will be of greatest interest to other scholars in the subfield and to graduate students in environmental politics and policy.

Putting Trust in the U.S. Budget: Federal Trust Funds and the Politics of Commitment. By Eric M. Patashnik. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000. 231p. $54.95 cloth, $19.95 paper.

Daniel J. Palazzolo, University of Richmond

Nearly four decades ago, in a path-breaking book, Aaron Wildavsky taught us, among other things, that "in the most integral sense the budget lies at the heart of the political process" (The Politics of the Budgetary Process, 1964, p. 5). Building on Wildavsky's study, many scholars have contributed to our understanding of various aspects of budget policy and politics. Some have discussed the role of trust funds in the federal budget, but none have made them the central focus of their research. Eric Patashnick fills an important void in the literature by explaining why trust funds are created and how they affect deliberation over tax and spending decisions. Using the trust fund mechanism as a point of reference, Patashnik also tests theories of policy history, public choice, and institutionalism.

Aside from a chapter that contains a regression model to test the response of trust fund and general revenues to political and institutional factors, the empirical focus is on case histories of five trust funds—Social Security, Hospital Insurance, Highway, Airport and Airways, and the Superfund. Also examined are the failed attempts to create trust funds for energy security and lead paint abatement. The regression analysis shows that political forces have differential effects on trust fund revenues and general revenues. This chapter is somewhat unrelated to the case histories, which are more central to the book's main objectives, that is, to explain the origin, evolution, and consequences of trust funds. Using the historical-institutionalist method, Patashnik draws out the variations among trust funds, the common traits, and the nuances in their design and evolution.

Patashnik's central argument is that trust funds are intentionally designed policy instruments that seek to provide durability and reduce uncertainty over spending and revenue decisions. They are created when program advocates convince others that establishing a long-term commitment to a program is better than maintaining the flexibility to make ongoing policy adjustments. Among the four distinct rationales for trust funds (making users pay, maximizing budgets, reducing uncertainty, and guarding the Treasury), reduced political uncertainty is found to be most important in all the cases (p. 189). Program advocates for each trust fund demonstrated the value of locking in policy commitments and the need to bind future policymakers. Conversely, in the energy security and lead paint abatement cases, advocates were unable to demonstrate that a trust fund was needed to make the programs work or that a long-term commitment was preferable to preserving flexibility.

By dedicating revenues to a specific purpose for both present needs and future contingencies, trust funds create an implicit contract and define the terms for subsequent policy debates. In this respect, they are similar to entitlements and indexation because they contain procedural safeguards, have greater autonomy than routine programs, and provoke symbolic sensitivities that limit the flexibility of policymakers.

Patashnik deftly points out, however, that although trust funds constrain future choices, the programs financed by them are neither insulated from politics nor impervious to change. The programs are typically financed on a pay-as-you-go basis, and they are challenged by threats of insolvency, new ideas, pressures from interest groups, or changes in institutional procedures. The durability of trust funds rests on their capacity to serve a mediating role in policy debates. "Trust fund financing clearly does not eliminate the impact of other political forces, such as struggles among contending groups. But trust funds do influence how those struggles are played out by distributing procedural advantages, reinforcing symbols of moral deservedness and blame, and affecting perceptions of political fidelity and defection" (p. 16).

Patashnik also describes the variation in the design features, autonomy, and durability of trust funds. Social Security is the most durable because individual beneficiaries rely heavily on the government to make good on the program's promise. The Hospital Insurance Trust Fund for Medicare, which is as politically potent as Social Security, is less stable partly because it is more reliant on general funds. The Highway Trust Fund's durability relies on the support of a nexus of producer groups, government officials, and motorists, but it has a low degree of individual beneficiary reliance and periodically has been challenged by budget guardians, environmentalists, and urban mass transit interests.

Despite the variation among trust funds, Patashnik identifies four common attributes that distinguish successful adoption: a base of support for the expenditure program, plausibility in terms of a precedent and an appropriate revenue source, a demonstration that trust fund financing is necessary to make the program work, and neutralization of opposition to the idea (pp. 183–6). Trust funds often are supported both by program advocates, who want the program protected from the vicissitudes of the annual budget process, and by fiscal conservatives, who view the mechanism as a means of cost control.

Patashnik's insights into the politics of trust fund budgeting contribute significant new knowledge, but the theoretical aspects of the book should not be overlooked. The author effectively points out the shortcomings of the policy inheritance perspective, which views policymakers as severely constrained by their predecessors, and rational choice theory, which argues that institutional structure dictates policy. Patashnik shows that institutional arrangements mediate rather than cause policy outcomes; that policymaking is an evolutionary process and programs are responsive to historical nuances and acts of individual policymakers; and that ideas, not just interests, are critical forces in the resolution of policy conflicts.

In terms of the design and durability of trust funds, Patashnik finds that both competing theories of political transaction costs are incomplete. One of these contends that institutions are efficient and inherent to government, and the other maintains that costs are inflated and contrived to serve the narrow interests of politicians. Either theory might lead us to expect that more trust funds would have been adopted over the years. Yet, not only do agencies such as the Congressional Budget Office and the Office of Management and Budget fight to limit trust funds in order to maintain as much flexibility as possible over annual spending and revenue decisions, but also "Congress itself seems to exercise a degree of collective self-restraint" (p. 193). Patashnik notes that "trust fund advocates rarely can win merely by asserting their narrow mutual interests.... Given the multiplicity of veto points in the U.S. system, it is difficult for a coalition to get its structural projects enacted without fairly board support, and other factions cannot be expected to share the former group's parochial interests" (p. 195).

The only shortcoming is the very limited effort at the end to consider the normative challenges to trust funds. Serious consideration of these matters would require at least another chapter. Yet, any suggestions about what could have been done take nothing away from what has been done. Patashnik's study is a very important contribution to the literature on budgetary politics and policymaking generally. Some may wish for a more parsimonious explanation of the origin and evolution of trust funds, but political scientists would not be better off for it.

In Defense of a Political Court. By Terri Jennings Peretti. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1999. 371p. $27.50.

Sara C. Benesh, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee

Peretti's book purports to refute conventional constitutional scholarship about the dangers of a political Supreme Court, lauding such a political nature as supportive of the peculiar brand of democracy practiced in America. It seems, in large part, that she is quite successful in doing so, although I am certain that it is far easier to convince me of such a notion than it would be to convince the legal scholars whom Peretti so vehemently attacks.

Peretti begins her book with a thorough exposition of the state of legal scholarship on the Court, especially with regard to the undemocratic nature of judicial review and the legitimacy costs involved in such Court behavior. Indeed, the breadth of the review is remarkable. She discusses and defines neutralist approaches to judicial review, critical legal studies analyses, and reviews conducted by so-called skeptics. She finds fault with all of these interpretive models. First, the neutralists are "simply wrong" (p. 35) in thinking that an objective theory of constitutional interpretation exists that justices can apply neutrally, which allows them to maintain legitimacy and thus reconciles judicial review with democracy by allowing the Court to play a "special" apolitical role. The critical legal studies folks are right about the indeterminacy of the Constitution, but their responses to this reality (utopian speculation and judicial restraint) "are of no practical value" (p. 54). Indeed, according to Peretti, a Court that subjugates its preferences by restraining its power actually detracts from democracy and is more apt to hurt its legitimacy than a raging ideological Court would. Finally, the skeptics are misguided because, while they recognize the indeterminacy of the Constitution and recognize the potential for judicial mistakes, they still regard the Court as special, arguing that sometimes its decisions should be final because they are philosopher kings or prophets of some kind. They see the Court as superior to Congress in making certain types of decisions, yet argue that the Court should be subject to this inferior branch. Peretti deems this accommodation of judicial review and democracy "nonsensical" (p. 70).

In Part II, she attempts to defend her central claim that "there is nothing wrong with a political Court or with political motive in constitutional adjudication" (p. 73). Indeed, she argues that there are democratic benefits to such behavior by the Court. Value-voting on the Court promotes political representation (since judges are selected for and then decide in accordance with their political values), engages political checks on the Court (since policy-minded justices will care more about the policies they are espousing and as such be sure that they are implemented), and leads justices to consensusbuilding activities (since justices need to accommodate abhorrent views in order to install their policy preferences). The constitutional scholars are also wrong in their assumption that a political court begets legitimacy crises (since the public knows little about the Court, cares little about the Court, and is not adversely affected by politically driven decision making). Peretti systematically discusses each and defends each via reference to a huge body of empirical political science research.

Additionally, all of these theorists are fundamentally wrong, according to Peretti, because they totally misunderstand the U.S. brand of democracy. She argues that, because it is based on pluralism and not majoritarianism, complaints about the Court's lack of electoral accountability lose their bite. Indeed, in a pluralist democracy, in which emphasis is placed upon multiple means of influence for multiple groups, the Court's behavior is perfectly normal. The Court is merely one of several coequal branches of government, each offering different sorts of responsiveness and different levels of attention to certain types of groups. The Court is a unique entry point, first, because it may be better suited to hearing claims of the otherwise disenfranchised (although I am not altogether impressed by her justification of this point) and, second, because of its ability to review laws once they are in action and applied to a given controversy. In this way, the Court sees the unintended consequences of legislation, which the legislature is unable to see. Neither the Court nor the constitution is mythical in Peretti's analysis. They are merely additional checks in a pluralist nation. And this, in itself, is worthwhile.

However, there are a few things that I think Peretti could have done better or made stronger arguments for. For example, she discusses in detail the various external checks on the Court, concluding that even though they are not often used. they may still constrain the Court. I think, given her focus on quantifiable arguments and her criticism of the constitutional theorists who make remarks that are not quantitatively justifiable, that she should avoid making a strong argument for the efficacy of external checks. Indeed, little quantitative evidence of such an influence exists and the studies she cites are not convincing in that they are overwhelmingly case studies of peculiar instances where such an effect is identifiable. Not just neutralist legal scholars argue that political checks on the Court are ineffective; many attitudinal scholars also do so. Additionally, it is not clear why only policy-motivated justices would behave in this manner. Surely those judges who are motivated by legal policy, a particular reading of the constitution, or the intent of the framers also care greatly about the policy being made? Too strong a case is made for the influence of public opinion and for the nonfinality of Supreme Court decisions given the empirical evidence on this point.

Peretti could strengthen her argument that Congress is as countermajoritarian an institution as the Supreme Court (if we use constitutional theorists' definitions which center on electoral accountability) because of the incumbency advantage that exists. Surely, electoral sanctions are not perfect in that most-representative body and so that institution may also make decisions that are not strictly accountable to the public.

In short, this is a good, worthwhile book for both legal and judicial scholars. Political scientists can learn much from Peretti's review of constitutional theory, and constitutional theorists much from her review of empirical political science. Perhaps we all need to critically analyze our opinions about the Supreme Court. Is it really all that special?

The Art of Political Warfare. By John J. Pitney, Jr. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 2000. 256p. $24.95.

Michael John Burton, Ohio University

For political scientists, the world of politics is often comprised of policy markets and aggregated data points. Regression models, actor preferences, and game structures are disciplinary norms. For political professionals, however, politics often has a strongly militaristic bent: It is war by other means. John Pitney analyzes political affairs in the way that political professionals commonly do, using armed conflict as a metaphor to understand complex political phenomena.

Pitney argues that "politics resembles warfare, so military literature can teach us something about political action" (p. 3). The language of politics owes much to military combat—Pitney notes "the war[s] on poverty, crime, cancer, drugs, and AIDS" along with Bill Clinton's campaign "war room" and Pat Buchanan's ringing exhortation: "Mount up everybody and ride to the sound of the guns" (pp. 8-9). Political officials, activists, and operatives see politics as a species of warfare, and "military metaphors ... in turn make politics more warlike" (p. 4). The similarities between politics and war run deeper than just language. Both activities are passionate, confrontational endeavors that "expose participants to peril and uncertainty" and require "elaborate strategies and tactics" for their conduct (pp. 5-6). Politics is not exactly the same as war, but neither is politics just like a marketplace, an academic metaphor that is apt to neglect "hard-to-quantify phenomena such as duty, courage, and compassion" (p. 19).

Throughout the book, Pitney draws tight parallels between war and politics. For military and political leaders, strategy is the integration of means and ends, and political professionals and military planners attend to the tactical details of "geography and logistics" (pp. 140–59). Battle terrain opens some military options and forecloses others; political context defines the range of tactics available to political strategists and sometimes decides the location of the conflict. "The leaders of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference targeted Birmingham, Alabama, in 1963 because they knew that city government would overreact and bare its segregationist teeth" (p. 146; see also p. 94). Martin Luther King, Jr., in the tradition of the great generals, studied the tactical contours of the battleground and planned accordingly (p. 184). Pitney's book is filled with similar anecdotes that reinforce a warfare-driven interpretation of political events.

The Art of Political Warfare is not a simplistic restatement of battle doctrine; it is a sophisticated understanding of political problems in terms of military strategy and tactics. Pitney once served as a senior researcher for the Republican Party, and he understands that no single strategy can fit all political situations. The reason for studying Sun Tzu's Art of War, Carl von Clausewitz's On War, and even contemporary military training manuals is to gain and understanding of strategy and tactics from a discipline—military science—wherein these things are matters of survival (p. 20). The prospect of war has provoked rigorous thinking about the nature of strategy. Political scientists, who study a domain of human activity that often relies on strategic principles, should not overlook the intellectual value of military scholarship.

Pitney's book serves an important function: It introduces basic concepts of military theory and demonstrates their relationship to political phenomena. Students of war examine mobilization, fatigue, intelligence, deception, and stealth. Those who study legislative politics have an intuitive grasp of such military problems as defining victory, navigating through the fog of war, and eliminating internal friction. Passage of the 1990 Budget Enforcement Act resulted from "a combination of stealth and congressional fatigue" that allowed a major legislative agreement to get through both houses of Congress "even though most members were barely aware of it" (p. 191). "A military approach would draw scholarly attention to such muddy patches of the political process" (ibid.). More generally, adding the military lens to political interpretations based on games, markets, physics, ecology, medicine, theater, and education-and, one might add, written texts, human sexuality, artificial intelligence, and other metaphors current in political scholarship—"will help us understand the political battlefield": "The picture may not always be pretty, but we can learn much from appreciating the art of political warfare" (p. 199).

Pitney does not claim that warfare is the only metaphor applicable to politics; he believes that political understanding demands a broad range of scholarly approaches. Nevertheless, he argues vigorously that the military metaphor receives less attention than it deserves. By representing politics as warfare, Pitney invites political scientists to seek a more detailed understanding of military strategy. The Art of Political Warfare merely begins the conversation.

Pitney does not elaborate on the stark differences between the teachings of Sun Tzu, who sought nimble conflict, and Clausewitz, who counseled total war. He does not try to reconcile seeming contradictions: On one hand, the threat of brutality toward the conquered can hasten surrender (p. 103); on the other hand, combatants who fear violent recrimination tend to stiffen their resistance (p. 178). The delineation of military classics and the resolution of long-standing tactical disputes lie beyond the scope of the book. Its mission is more carefully focused. Writing in a discipline that does not comprehend the full value of military metaphors, Pitney persuasively argues that the literature on warfare can bring fresh insight to the study of politics.

The Art of Political Warfare is sufficiently lively and readable to suit any undergraduate course in American politics, and it would work particularly well in a graduate seminar that attempts to view the broad sweep of the political landscape. More important, the thrust of Pitney's argument might encourage some scholars of politics and government to begin studying not only David Easton and William H. Riker but also military historians, such as John Keegan and Shelby Foote. Reading Pitney's book, advocates of an interdisciplinary science of politics may find new value in the literature on warfare.

Capital, Labor, and State: The Battle for American Labor Markets from the Civil War to the New Deal. By David Brian Robertson. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2000. 320p. $75.00 cloth, $22.95 paper.

Andrew Battista, East Tennessee State University

This important new study argues that American labor markets have been and are governed by employers to a degree unique among Western capitalist democracies; that this pattern of governance is the outcome of crucial struggles among unions, employers, and middle-class labor reformers from the Civil War to the New Deal; and that American political institutions strongly shaped the struggles and their outcome. In the nineteenth century, all Western countries largely protected employer control of hiring, firing, wages, hours, and working conditions, but in the twentieth century nations other than the United States began to curb employer prerogatives and extend worker protection in the form of labor regulations, trade union and collective bargaining laws, public management of labor supply and demand, and work insurance (the four major types of policy in Robertson's framework). In the United States, fewer such protections were established, and the fragmented federal and state labor policies that were enacted were often undermined by lax enforcement or court rulings. On the eve of the New Deal, Robertson shows, U.S. employers had a degree of autonomy in labor markets unparalleled in European and other industrialized countries.

Capital, Labor, and State analyzes and explains this result by means of the changing and conflicting "policy strategies" of unions, employers, and labor reformers as well as the influence of political institutions in shaping and selecting among policy strategies. By the onset of the twentieth century, the American Federation of Labor (AFL) had concluded that it could not rely on government to protect workers. It abandoned the strategy of seeking inclusive public policies in favor of the union shop approach, whereby unions relied on their own economic power to organize employers, control the supply of labor, and manage the terms and conditions of employment through labor contracts. The strategy was decisively defeated, however, by the open shop campaign of both large and small employers in the first two decades of the century.

Thereafter the AFL retreated into a narrow defense of craft unions and skilled labor, otherwise conceding employer sovereignty in labor markets. Labor reformers led by John R. Commons and his colleagues, who initially favored governance of labor markets by industrial commissions staffed by middle-class experts, also then tailored their policy proposals to employer dominance. Later, the New Deal "mounted the most formidable challenge to employers' labor market prerogatives in the nation's history" (p. 260). But Robertson argues that New Deal labor market policies were limited in duration and effect, and by the 1950s employers again had an exceptional degree of control.

These strategies and conflicts were shaped and resolved by the limited authority of the federal government, the separation of powers at both the federal and state level, and economic competition among the states ("competitive American federalism"). From the Civil War to the New Deal this institutional structure, according to Robertson, made it very difficult for labor to win—or even place on the public agenda—policies that meaningfully limited employer authority and thereby channeled it along the path of "voluntarism" and the union shop strategy. The structure not only favored employers opposed to changes in the policy status quo but also, by allowing mergers but prohibiting collusion, encouraged large and small firms alike to resist unions rather than use them to help stabilize production and prices. Even during the Depression this institutional structure limited the extent to which New Deal policies curbed employer sovereignty in labor markets.

Capital, Labor, and State has many virtues and makes a substantial contribution. It is distinguished by its careful conceptualization of labor market policy, thorough research in both primary sources and secondary literature (in political science, labor history, and industrial relations), focused and well-developed argument, and effective blending of historical, institutional, and political-economic analysis. To my knowledge no other work analyzes developments before the New Deal so comprehensively and systematically (a separate chapter is devoted to each of the four types of labor market policy) or with such careful and sustained attention to all four actors—unions, employers, academic reformers, and government.

Moreover, various scholars have emphasized the role of law and courts in shaping labor politics and industrial relations in the late nineteenth century, but Robertson makes a very strong case that other political institutions, especially federalism and separation of powers, had at least as great an influence. Indeed, even for political scientists not deeply concerned about labor market policy, this book should be of interest as an unusually detailed and cogent case study of how the distinctive governmental structure of the United States molded the development of political conflict and public policy.

I have two reservations about Robertson's argument. First, the claim that at the start of the twentieth century the AFL's union shop strategy aimed at a "fully unionized industrial capitalist economy" (p. 66) and "posed a militant, sweeping, and credible challenge to employers' prerogatives" (p. 85) surely exaggerates the potential of that strategy. Although the AFL grew significantly between 1897 and 1903, which generated an employer counterattack, the federation's small size and narrow social base, exclusion from or weakness in key new industries, subordination of industrial to craft unions, and lack of solid political allies all weigh against such a claim, which could not reasonably be made even of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) of 1937 or 1945.

Second, although Robertson makes a powerful argument that U.S. labor market policy has been and remains exceptional among the Western capitalist democracies, the "exceptionalist" approach limits his comparative analysis and the light it could shed on the U.S. case. That approach inevitably downplays differences in labor market policies, or any other characteristic, among the other Western countries and does not reveal whether and why the United States is closer to some countries than to others in its labor market policies or union political strategies. Capital, Labor, and State is by no means blind to these issues, but they are overwhelmed in the exceptionalist form of argument it pursues.

Yet, any reservations are themselves overwhelmed by Robertson's remarkably rich and impressive study of an issue that so agitated American politics from the late-nineteenth century to the middle of the twentieth. Capital, Labor, and

State is a considerable achievement that should be widely read and discussed.

The U.S. Supreme Court and the Electoral Process. Edited by David K. Ryden. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press, 2000. 322p. $65.00 cloth, $23.95 paper. Campaigns and the Court: The U.S. Supreme Court in Presidential Elections. By Donald Grier Stephenson, Jr. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999. 363p. $49.50 cloth, $19.50 paper.

John B. Gates, University of California, Davis

The controversy surrounding the 2000 U.S. presidential election has already generated major scholarly work and will do so for years to come. Both works reviewed here were written before the historic judicial events surrounding the November election of 2000. Far from irrelevant, each work offers unique insight into the fundamental rules surrounding political conflict and the historical flow of elections with major social and economic change. As such, we learn much about political science and the struggle over the proper analytical lens for understanding politics.

David Ryden's edited volume, The U.S. Supreme Court and the Electoral Process, examines the fundamental rules surrounding some neglected and not so neglected areas of election law. The charge to the distinguished contributors is weighty given the issues and resurgence of interest in the questions surrounding democratic governance. Can or should the U.S. Supreme Court adopt and defend, on the grounds of neutrality and consistency, a theory of representation? How does the judiciary approach one of the most important arteries of representation? More specifically, what rules should govern how political parties struggle with the inevitable tension between majority representation and minority interest in such diverse areas as regulatory politics and campaign finance? What reforms, if any, can the Supreme Court either endorse or initiate given the immediately "suspect" character of an unelected body deciding the constitutional course of representational politics?

Yet the Supreme Court may be ill suited to deal with the incredibly complicated and innately political context of representation. Nancy Maveety provides a useful framework for analyzing the Rehnquist's Court's general approach to political representation. She ultimately describes the Court's treatment as atheoretical. Howard Scarrow's more focused and even more pessimistic account the of the Court's treatment of legislative districting reveals how the Court often veers far from the standard of neutrality and logic. A comparison of these two chapters highlights the challenges before the authors and the U.S. Supreme Court. Neither more general nor narrower investigations of representational rules can avoid the inherent value choices available to the judges at the level of the Supreme Court.

Anyone interested in election law, political parties, and democratic governance can learn much from this microanalytic work on the rules laid down in the American context. It is striking that the authors tackle these questions both with rugged scholarship and with an often-hidden eye toward how the different answers could play out in the new international political arena. Yet international readers, and even casual observers of the U.S. Supreme Court, should come with a rather broad knowledge of the Supreme Court's decisions on the U.S Constitution and political representation. It is a shame that books must have broad and intriguing titles because their flaws ultimately are noted in the lack of coverage of a particular area. Nonetheless, given the quality of the work contained in The U.S. Supreme Court and the Political Process and the events surrounding Bush v. Gore, 121 S.Ct, 525 (2000), readers should find this volume in a second edition very soon.

Donald Grier Stephenson's work on electoral politics is much different in its approach, theoretical focus, and method. Stephenson sets forth several macroanalytical propositions in Campaigns and the Court. As such, he examines each proposition with an historical method eschewing quantification and precision. He also employs a broader time frame and a very different focus beyond the institutional rules at the forefront of the Ryden volume. Stephenson forces us to integrate how environmental and broad social changes precipitate and interact with the complex character of the U.S. Supreme Court. More specifically, he examines the Supreme Court in the periods before and after so-called "critical" presidential elections. He seeks to test five propositions contained generally in the existing literature. First is the proposition that partisan involvement with the Court is more likely when the Court uses its power of judicial review to overturn rather than uphold the policy choices of the popularly elected branches. This proposition finds strong support in the historical record.

The second proposition is well-known: The Court will become embroiled in policy conflict with a new majority coalition following elections denoting major and long-term partisan change. Stephenson's third proposition relates to such major partisan shifts: The Court will begin within a decade to make policy more consistent with the new majority. This proposition does hinge on several nearly stochastic events such as turnover on the high bench. The fourth proposition focuses on how the Court's decisions can "clarify" or "define" the response of party leaders and their constitutional options on the issues surrounding major partisan change. Finally, when the Court becomes involved in the politics of the divisive issues surrounding major partisan change, there are attacks on the Court's legitimacy and its power of judicial review.

None of these propositions will be considered novel by careful readers of the work of Robert Dahl (1957), David Adamany (1973), Richard Funston (1975), William Lasser (1985), et al. Yet no single work in this literature attempts to test the validity of each proposition across such a long time frame, spanning from 1800 to the mid-1980s. With this book, Stephenson may well enter the ranks of constitutional historians such as Charles Fairman and Charles Warren. Rarely does one find such care and scholarship in addressing so many interesting and difficult questions.

Clearly, Stephenson has mastered the historical method and uses it to address generalizable propositions about the dynamics of the Supreme Court and important presidential elections. Similarly to those who use a strained theory to address important questions with precision and technical expertise, one walks away from the method utilized with serious reservations. Each conclusion is so qualified that no settled answer follows. While some may blame the method used, it is documented that other methods generate similar qualifications on these very questions. The reason is simple: Huge, macroanalytic questions often belie a single analytical strategy. Nonetheless, Donald Grier Stephenson's work stands at the forefront of a research tradition he warmly embraces.

The U.S. Supreme Court is dynamic in its rules and its place in American political history. Such trite offerings in no way take away from the lessons learned by Ryder's fine volume or Stephenson's masterful historical analysis. Yet one is reminded of Terri J. Peretti's In Defense of a Political Court (2000). The American judicial ideal of neutrality and consistency is perhaps nowhere more difficult to meet than when confronting the U.S. Supreme Court and the fundamental questions surrounding representation and democratic governance.

A Logic of Expressive Choice. By Alexander A. Schuessler. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2000. 177p. $49.50 cloth, $16.95 paper.

Michael C. Munger, Duke University

An interesting aspect of life at Duke is the annual construction of our local Brigadoon. The well-ordered but ephemeral tent city is named "Krzyzewskiville," after Duke's head basketball coach. K-ville appears once a year in the weeks before the game against UNC-Chapel Hill, our arch rival. So many students want to see this game that an elaborate nonprice rationing scheme, based on a queue, has evolved to allocate tickets. "Tenting" students may have to wait two weeks or more to get tickets. The game is in January or early February, so they sleeping outside and try to keep up with their school work despite rain, snow, and subfreezing temperatures at night. Random checks (even in the middle of the night) are conducted by student representatives; if a tent is empty too often it is taken down, and the residents lose their place in the queue.

Why do 3,000 students queue up for 2,000 seats (which are never used, since students stand throughout the game)? Because the game is sold out (tickets on the "spot" market sell for $1,000 or more), it is always televised over both broadcast and cable networks. Students cite fun as the reason, but deeper probing reveals a nearly uniform response: "I want to go to show support for the team. I'll cheer them on!" In other words, they tent out for two weeks in freezing temperatures because they feel their support makes a difference. No individual student can believe s/he makes a difference, of course, since that person's seat would be taken by someone else, just as fanatical, if s/he stayed home. Furthermore, one voice has a negligible effect in the cauldron of noise that is Cameron Indoor Stadium on the night of battle. No one fan "matters" in any important respect, yet each student eagerly pays huge queuing costs for the chance to be there.

What does this have to do with voting in a political contest? In a way, that question in Alexander Schuessler's starting point in A Logic of Expressive Choice. He claims that "individuals often are motivated by a desire to express their tastes, or preferences, because such expression has direct influence on who they are—on their identity." (p. 3) Schuessler's choice of title is interesting and gives an insight into his approach: He is proposing "a" possible logic of expressive choice, one that is different from, although not entirely opposed to, the more standard logic of collective action of rational choice theory.

Schuessler's goal is to give an internally consistent account of why a citizen might rationally (although not strategically) choose to express a preference in an election.

For example, and most simply, it is the voter's statement of her preference for the Democratic candidate, through voting, that makes the voter a Democrat. This self-definition through voting will at least in part determine her motivation to support a candidate. Following the very same logic, candidates campaigns are designed to draw voters into an election by making it attractive for them to identify with their vote choice. Consequently, to understand voting fully requires us not merely to map out the instrumental consequences of the individual's vote on the electoral result, as in modern political economy we most typically do; it additionally requires us to investigate the expressive, or in some sense existential, consequences of the voter for the voter herself (p. 3, emphases in original).

Schuessler (wisely) does not pretend to "resolve" the knotty paradox of participation. The argument rests, rather, on two key points. First, he claims that the paradox simply disappears when the problem is realistically considered. Participation is not a contribution to a public good, with the associated problems of free riding and underprovision. Rather, the public good is an outcome, which will occur with or without the voter's participation. The participation decision is then a choice by the voter: "I can, at the mere cost of participation, purchase for myself the status of outcome-producer" (p. 5, emphasis in original).

producer" (p. 5, emphasis in original).

Second, Schuessler argues that methodological individualism is the appropriate starting point, but that this individualism should be conceived as ontological. More simply, campaigns are not a process of appealing to a preexistent and fixed set of preferences. Instead, the preferences being expressed by voters are the product of the campaign itself. An effective campaign, according to Schuessler, will focus on the "who" and "how many" dimensions of the electorate. The who aspect derives from the (potential) voter's perception of the candidate's standing among the rest of the electorate. The how many aspect is a product of beliefs about just which people, or groups, can be expected to offer support. The aggregation process implied here is much more of a macro (social) to micro (individual) process.

I expect that many traditional rational choice theorists will be profoundly uncomfortable with this approach, and not a few will reject it out of hand. That would be a mistake. Theoretical rational choice is, or should be, quite agnostic about the source of preferences. The notion that they might be determined endogeneously is not outlandish, particularly when the behavior in question is collective and social. Given the way that Schuessler specifies preferences, his citizens are perfectly rational.

Overall, this book is terrific. Unusually well-written, it offers many insights, large and small, into the voting choice and the nature of campaigns. It is this last point that may prove to be the book's lasting contribution; if voters behave as Schuessler claims, the very nature of the campaign will have to be rethought. This provocative and important book is a large first step toward directing that new thinking.

Crowded Airwaves: Campaign Advertising in Elections. Edited by James A. Thurber, Candice Nelson, and David A. Dulio. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution. 2000. 178p. $39.95 cloth, $16.95 paper.

Karen M. Kedrowski, Winthrop University

The essays in this short volume address three themes: the characterization of political campaign television advertising, the need to measure its effects, and the role and implications of issue advertising. This is an ambitious agenda, but the book makes some important contributions to the literature on campaigns and on political ads specifically.

There is much to like. First, the book is comprehensive. Various chapters address all federal elections—presidential, Senate, and House. Both the issue ads sponsored by interest groups and those produced by the campaigns themselves are covered. Most chapters attempt to combine methods and to place analyses within the broader context of campaign studies. For example, in the chapter on House races, Herrnson and Patterson analyze district-level data in both competitive and noncompetitive races and in open-seat and incumbent races. Scholars know that these variables change campaign dynamics greatly.

Second, the authors take on important questions. For instance, much of the literature on voting behavior suggests that the key predictor is partisanship, and the media have no influence on vote choice, which is a serious blow to the careers of those who study political campaign ads. Yet, the Iyengar and Petrocik chapter reminds us that "correlation is not causation." The authors start with the premise of "basic rule voting," that is, presidential vote choice can be predicted by either partisanship or approval of the incumbent. The latter accounts for the vote choices of independents, disgruntled partisans, and such outliers as Reagan Democrats. They show some intriguing evidence that media exposure over the course of a campaign may mobilize partisans to vote and may convince potential defectors to stay with the party's standard bearer.

Another fine chapter, by Kim Fridkin Kahn and Patrick Kenney, covers Senate elections. They test whether voters learn more from negative advertising rather than positive or issue ads. They conclude that more learning does occur from negative ads.

The features that make this book appealing to scholars are likely to make it unappealing to other audiences. For instance, the comprehensive review by Richard Lau and Lee Sigelman covers about 55 studies over 15 years on the effectiveness of negative campaign ads. They cautiously try to determine the "majority opinion," and although the chapter is rather thinly cited, it is worth reading. The bibliography is a treasure trove for anyone studying for comprehensive exams or doing a literature review for a dissertation.

Another example of narrow appeal is chapter 3, which categorizes political advertisements. Kathleen Hall Jamieson, Paul Waldmen, and Susan Sherr make two methodological points of considerable interest to scholars but of less interest to practitioners, undergraduates, or others. The first is that the conventional classifications of positive and negative ads are too facile. A more sophisticated approach would change the unit of analysis from the ad to the ideas and arguments it contains, which would reveal a smaller amount of negativity in campaign ads. Their second argument deals with the superiority of the Annenberg School's collection of presidential campaign ads over the University of Oklahoma collection. Again, this is a point of some importance only to scholars.

The last substantive chapter concerns issue ads. Written by Darrell West, it is different in focus and approach from the other chapters and does not fit as well into the entire volume. Most of the other essays are quantitative, but West uses a qualitative approach to describe the rise of issue advertising in federal elections nationwide, and he describes the various "solutions" proposed to this problem. The chapter includes little original research and relies primarily on anecdotal evidence. In the end, West does not convince me that issue ads are a "problem," much less that relatively incremental recommendations would solve it.

The Courts of International Trade: Judicial Specialization, Expertise, and Bureaucratic Policymaking. By Isaac Unah. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1998. 233p. $47.50.

Stefanie A. Lindquist, University of Georgia

• • •

In The Courts of International Trade: Judicial Specialization, Expertise, and Bureaucratic Policymaking, Isaac Unah has ventured into territory that has remained largely uncharted by scholars of judicial politics. With the prominent exception of Lawrence Baum's work on specialized courts, few researchers in political science have chosen to explore courts that fall outside the federal judiciary's core hierarchy. Yet as Unah points out, these specialized courts, including the U.S. Tax Court, Claims Court, Court of International Trade, Bankruptcy Courts, and the Federal Circuit, perform critical functions that have the potential to affect business interests and shape bureaucratic performance in highly complex regulatory and economic areas. In this book, and in his previous published research, Unah has initiated an important expedition into unfamiliar but promising terrain.

By focusing on the U.S. Court of International Trade (CIT) and the Federal Circuit, Unah raises a series of interesting research questions. First, how does decision making differ between generalist and specialized courts? Do models of judicial behavior developed in the context of generalist courts apply to judges on specialist courts? How does the institutional structure of administrative agencies affect judicial review of agency decisions? And do these specialized courts exhibit any particular policy orientation, even after controlling for the partisan affiliation of judicial personnel? Fortunately, the CIT's docket is composed of cases that allow Unah to construct a straightforward research design to analyze several of these questions.

The CIT hears cases appealed from the International Trade Commission (ITC), an independent regulatory commission, and from the Department of Commerce (DOC), an executive agency, both of which render related judgments in antidumping and countervailing duty (AD/CVD) cases. In these cases, the ITC judges the adverse impact of unfair trade practices on domestic industry, while the DOC determines whether a claim of dumping or foreign government subsidization can be supported by hard evidence. Both tasks are critical for the imposition of protective tariffs but are rendered by separate bureaucracies with different institutional structures. Aggrieved claimants can appeal an unfavorable determination by either agency to the CIT, where individual judges render decisions in AD/CVD cases under a deferential standard of review. A loss in the CIT may be appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit and ultimately to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Unah begins his analysis by setting forth a series of theoretical propositions regarding the behavior of specialized courts. Although his theoretical discussion tends to drift into normative territory, Unah first suggests that judges with specialized knowledge and expertise will less often defer to administrative agency decisions. To test this proposition, Unah compares reversal rates at the CIT of appeals from administrative agencies with reversal rates of agency appeals in the federal district courts and U.S. Supreme Court. Perhaps not surprisingly, Unah finds that the CIT is significantly more likely to reverse the agency's decision. While this finding may be suggestive, it cannot be viewed as conclusive, since the types of agency decisions appealed to the district courts differ substantially from those appealed to the CIT. In a later chapter, Unah compares reversal rates of agency appeals in the Federal Circuit and the D.C. Circuit, finding (contrary to expectations) that the Federal Circuit demonstrates a higher level of deference in agency appeals than the generalist D.C. Circuit. Of course, many cases in the D.C. Circuit are appealed directly from federal agencies, while the Federal Circuit hears cases appealed from a lower court. The Federal Circuit's deferential stance toward trade agencies could thus be attributable to the agencies' choices not to appeal losses in the court below

Drawing on research presenting integrated models of judicial behavior based on legal and extralegal factors, Unah turns to theories of judicial decision making. In specifying a series of decision models at the CIT and the Federal Circuit, Unah includes variables that reflect judges' party affiliations, certain case facts related to the applicable statutory standards, economic indicators reflecting trade deficits and other factors, and industry-specific measures related to party resources. To evaluate his hypothesis that decisions rendered by an independent regulatory commission will receive greater deference than those rendered by an executive agency, Unah also includes a variable measuring whether the case was appealed from the ITC or the DOC. Based on his models of CIT decision making, Unah concludes that the court generally adopts a protectionist orientation, that it is more likely to reverse the DOC than the ITC, that statutory standards are significant determinants of CIT decisions, that industry political power has some, but not an overwhelming, effect, and that the political affiliation of CIT judges has little impact on case outcomes. At the Federal Circuit, Unah tests similar models and finds that the Federal Circuit is more likely to protect U.S. industry when the plaintiff is an economically powerful industry, when the U.S. holds a high trade deficit with the trading nation, and when the panel is dominated by a Republican majority. And, as in the CIT, the Federal Circuit is more likely to affirm the ITC's decisions than those of the DOC.

From these findings, Unah draws several broad conclusions. First, he argues that bureaucratic structures condition judicial review. Based on the finding that decisions from the ITC (an independent regulatory commission) are more frequently supported than those of the DOC (an executive agency), Unah suggests that the bipartisan, quasi-judicial ITC renders more defensible judgments than the more political DOC. Of course, this interpretation is somewhat speculative, since Unah's data do not allow a clear conclusion concerning the causal connection between institutional structure and judicial review. It is possible, for example, that the ITC is affirmed more frequently because its judgments concerning economic consequences for domestic industry are more clearly susceptible to proof with reliable data. Second, Unah concludes that integrated models of judicial decision making best account for judicial behavior in the CIT and Federal Circuit, as both specialized courts are sensitive to statutory factors, as well as extralegal pressures such as party capability.

Finally, Unah suggests that CIT judges' expertise translates into less deference to the judgments of administrative agencies, and that these specialized judges "embrace uncertainty far more courageously than do generalist [judges] in their dealings with the bureaucracy" (pp. 175-6). While it may be true that expertise leads to more intensive judicial review, some might quibble with Unah's characterization of such review as "courageous." As Dean Leebron of the Columbia Law School noted in 1999 at the Eleventh Judicial Conference of the Court of International Trade, "some have said that expertise-there may be too much of a good thingmay lead to a distortion in a standard of review, as members highly experienced with the subject matter might be more inclined to second-guess administrative agency determinations" (195 F.R.O. 89). From this perspective, Unah's findings could support the more negative interpretation that expertise engenders overly intrusive judicial review.

Unah's book thus raises interesting empirical and normative questions about the nature of judicial review by a specialized judiciary and will surely generate further research on the relationship between specialized courts and the bureaucracy. Because the book represents an extended foray into rarely explored territory and substantially expands our knowledge of the specialized judiciary, Unah has made a significant contribution to the literature.

Reelection: William Jefferson Clinton as a Native-Son Presidential Candidate. By Hanes Walton, Jr. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999. 352p. $49.50 cloth, $22.00 paper.

Jay Barth, Hendrix College

At the end of the Clinton era, it is appropriate for political scientists to undertake analyses of this two-term president's effect on any number of political and public policy phenomena. Clinton's most obvious talent showed itself in the electoral arena, where (even in a television era) he formed deeply personal relationships with voters, and many of these analyses rightfully focus on the foundations of Clinton's public support. Continuing this line of research, Hanes Walton examines a potential explanation for Clinton's relative strength in one region of the country—the turf on which his political career began—through an in-depth analysis of Clinton's electoral base across time in Arkansas and the South. The book examines a well-justified question, about the ongoing vitality of a "native son" phenomenon but numerous problems with the method by which Walton attempts to answer that question weaken this work. Numerous factual errors and muddled writing make it even more problematic.

Walton is quite conscious of grounding his analysis theoretically. He lays out the line of research on native sons in American voting, beginning with V.O. Key's highlighting of "friends and neighbors" voting in the Old South (Southern Politics in State and Nation, 1949). Walton clearly presents the ways in which later scholars built on this tradition, culminating with his own examination of Jimmy Carter's linkages to fellow southerners (Walton, The Native-Son Presidential Candidate: The Carter Vote in Georgia, 1992). Because of the tremendous shifts in southern partisanship since Key's work, an analysis of the persistence of regionalism in voting in the Clinton era is certainly pertinent.

Walton is less clear in another theoretical chapter. He notes the inadequacies of the frameworks traditionally used to describe electoral outcomes (e.g., realignment theory) and presents what he terms a "more complete" approach. His "political party perspective" posits that individual voters' choices as well as the historical context of a particular election are both important and, of course, linked. Walton goes on to make the (quite logical) contention that race is the central driving force in this vision of electoral politics in the United States. Yet, the discussion of the political party perspective is muddled, and, more important, Walton's argument about race is not well grounded in the literature on the interaction between race and American politics. In addition, the linkage between the native son theory and the political party perspective is never made.

Walton then sets out to paint a picture of the political-historical context of Arkansas and, more specifically, of its racial context. In the second of these chapters Walton makes his greatest contribution, one that is of primary relevance for students of Arkansas politics. As he makes clear, voting by African Americans in Arkansas has not received adequate attention, and Walton employs creative techniques that he terms "political archeology" to recapture their role in the state's politics in the late-nineteenth and early-twentieth century.

Walton then discusses Bill Clinton's political entrance into this context and undertakes a chronological journey through the ups and downs of his political career in Arkansas. The roles of Clinton's home counties and counties in which black voters are most prevalent are examined as the two parts of the state that serve as "friends and neighbors," to use Key's term. Unfortunately, a variety of methodological problems undermine Walton's attempts to investigate the two tangentially related parts of his theory as they relate to Clinton's electoral life.

By necessity, scholars of American electoral politics often rely upon county-level data. Walton, however, is not careful to note the limitations of such analysis in gaining an understanding of the voting behavior of the individuals living in those counties. Moreover, Walton fails to introduce key control variables to enhance one's confidence that home county or racial composition are the true explanatory factors of electoral patterns. Throughout this portion of the text, Walton moves back and forth between analyzing vote percentages and raw votes. Because county populations differ, any statistical analysis of raw votes is irrelevant, but Walton relies upon correlation data on raw votes in drawing conclusions. He also ignores the fact that presidential and nonpresidential elections affect turnout, which undermines other of his points. In short, the rudimentary statistical analyses are very questionable.

More specific problems arise with the two theoretical arguments. Regarding the native-son phenomenon, Walton examines only electoral behavior in Clinton's home counties, not the homes of his opponents. In addition, in his analysis Key employs maps, and more of these would have made Walton's points much clearer than the series of confusing tables he uses.

Even more problematic is the analysis of race. Throughout the text, Walton uses the three counties in the state that have remained majority black to provide empirical insights. The electoral results in those counties, which have a large number of white voters, are his gauge of Clinton's support from African Americans in the state as a whole. Issues of statistical validity aside, Walton fails to discuss the fact that white southern voters, as Key found, behave differently depending on the size of the black population in their locale; whites in counties with a majority of African Americans feel "threatened" and base political actions on this fear. Furthermore, the role of African Americans in Arkansas politics is never united with the theoretical framework presented earlier in the work. This disconnection between the theoretical and empirical portions of the work is a weakness.

The descriptions of Clinton's races in the state are surprisingly weak. In the coverage of his first race for Congress in 1974, there is no discussion of the role of Watergate in aiding the Democrat Clinton against a long-time Republican incumbent, and the coverage of other races is lacking in crucial detail. Moreover, there are some obvious errors, including the outcome of a key gubernatorial election in the 1960s, the fact that Governor Winthrop Rockefeller (from New York) was not "homegrown," and the identity of the congressional district in which Little Rock lies.

Factual errors mar the credibility of the work more generally. These range from stating that Richard Nixon ran for president in 1964, to misidentifying both the states that George Wallace won in his 1968 bid for the presidency and the southern states captured by Clinton in 1992 and 1996, to the date of the Lewinsky scandal. Also, the writing is not of high quality, and arguments are not pulled together or clearly explained.

Walton attempts to compare the performance of Clinton as a presidential candidate in his home state and region with that of Jimmy Carter. It quickly becomes apparent, however, that dramatic changes in southern presidential politics during the Reagan-Bush era make comparisons of limited relevance. In the end, Walton makes the point that there remains a "regional variable," at least for southern candidates in presidential elections, but this work fails to move our understanding of contemporary southern politics beyond this truism.

The Politics of Women's Rights: Parties, Positions, and Change. By Christina Wolbrecht. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2000. 266p. $55.00 cloth, $17.95 paper.

Kathleen Dolan, University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee

When we talk about the gender gap, students in my Women and Politics course are always surprised to learn that men used to be more likely than women to support the Democratic Party and that Republicans were the original supporters of the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA). Many people forget, or are not familiar with, the significant party transformations on these issues over the last 50 years. Christina Wolbrecht's new book provides important insights into this transformation and is a valuable contribution. The study of political parties has not, to date, accounted for this phenomenon, and gender studies too often ignore the crucial role of political parties in our system.

Wolbrecht is generally concerned with exploring how, when, and why party issue realignments occur. More specifically, she seeks to explain the 180-degree turn of the two major parties on women's rights during 1952–92. On both counts, she succeeds admirably. A major contribution of this work is the careful explication of a theoretical framework that accounts for adoption of and change in issue position by parties. Drawing on theories of critical realignment, issue evolution, agenda setting, and congressional behavior, Wolbrecht suggests that the two parties' relative positions on any issue are determined by three factors: the issue, the party coalitions, and the party elite. She then incorporates a discussion of issue equilibrium and disruption, processes through which one can view changes in party position.

A second contribution is the thorough discussion and analysis of the broad issue of women's rights during the period under study. Wolbrecht carefully details the important players, events, societal changes, and political aspects of a movement that had profound consequences in our society. Beyond this, she moves from description to explanation through the application of her theory. She outlines a debate that began between the Democratic Party and its support for protective legislation and the Republican Party and its support for the ERA; it evolved into a debate between liberation (the Democrats and their embrace of feminism) and tradition (the Republicans and the increased influence of social conservatism).

In unraveling the changes in the debate, Wolbrecht addresses questions about the public salience of women's rights, the changing nature of the party coalitions, and the coincident changes in elite behavior. Relying on data from several sources, she demonstrates how the social and political context of the 1960s and 1970s gave women's rights greater salience among the public and political elites. The resultant disequilibrium in women's rights led to profound changes in the party coalition interests of the Democrats and Republicans and the responses of their leaders. Today, the two major parties take positions on women's rights that are very different from the past and also are very different from each other.

A third strength is the ability of the author to tackle difficult measurement questions and bring several different sources of data to bear on the central argument. The methodological aspects of the work are rigorous, appropriate, and follow from the theoretical framework that underlies her arguments. Documenting a complex transformation over 40 years is not easily accomplished, but Wolbrecht pulls together several creative sources of information to do just that. She employs survey data and content analysis of the New York Times to show the importance of increased public salience to the process of issue equilibrium disruption; material from congressional hearings and party platforms to illustrate the process of issue redefinition and agenda change; and cosponsorship of legislation, roll-call data, and interest group ratings to establish the shifting behaviors of party elites.

My one quibble is with chapter 6, where Wolbrecht attempts to show how changes in interest coalitions and the composition of party elites contributed to the transformation in issue position. "It is important to distinguish between party elites, such as members of Congress and party leaders, and the parties' coalitions of interest," by which she means "the general array of interests associated with each political party ... identifiers, voters, convention delegates, funding sources, activists, and organized allies" (p. 182). Yet, she relies on the composition of party delegations in Congress (arguably party elites) as a proxy measure of the composition of party coalitions. To that end, she offers party unity scores and geographic and ideological data on members of Congress for the years under study. In discussing the changes in party elite behavior, she also uses data on members of Congress, in this case cosponsorship of women's rights legislation as a measure of changing behaviors. Wolbrecht points out the difficulty of measuring party coalition activities, but since she makes an important distinction between coalitions and elites, her use of data on members of Congress to measure the behaviors of both leaves us without a clear sense of how external groups and actors influence party behavior.

But this is a small exception to take with a work that succeeds at many levels. It provides a strong theoretical framework in which to consider the development and change of party issue positions, and it provides a rich and detailed summary of a complex movement and set of issues. Scholars of political parties, public opinion, and gender politics will find much in this volume to like.

Pursuit of Justices: Presidential Politics and the Selection of Supreme Court Nominees. By David Alistair Yalof. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1999, 280p. $27.50.

Sheldon Goldman, University of Massachusetts at Amherst

It is a pleasure to review this well-written book, which should be of enormous interest to every serious student of judicial politics and the presidency. Based upon a thorough mining of the presidential papers of seven presidents and numerous interviews with key participants in the selection process, along with other primary and secondary sources, Yalof gives us a presidency-by-presidency take on the recruitment of Supreme Court nominees.

In his introductory chapter, Yalof lays out the variables that shape who is nominated. Among them are the timing of a vacancy, the political and ideological composition of the Senate, the popularity of the President, the attributes of the justice responsible for the vacancy, the realistic pool of available candidates, and the decisional and bureaucratic framework used by the President to reach the selection decision. Yalof suggests three decisional frameworks: an open recruitment process whereby recruitment begins after the vacancy occurs; a single-candidate process in which the nominee has been, for most intents and purposes, chosen in advance of an actual vacancy; and a criteria-driven process whereby, in advance of a vacancy, the president specifies criteria to guide selection.

In addition, Yalof discusses 10 factors that help explain how the recruitment process has evolved. Perhaps the most important of them are the growth and bureaucratization of the Justice Department; the growth and bureaucratization of the White House, particularly the White House Counsel's office; the divided government; an increasingly public confirmation process; increased participation by interest groups; and increased media attention. The variables including the decisional frameworks as well as the factors are considered more or less systematically in the subsequent five chapters and then in a more focused fashion in the last major chapter.

In his chapter on Harry Truman, Yalof traces Truman's personal process of picking Supreme Court justices, offering new light on the twists and turns that culminated in Truman's appointments of Burton, Vinson, Minton, and Clark. In contrast, Dwight Eisenhower's selection of Supreme Court nominees after Earl Warren was dependent upon the top officials of the Justice Department, who worked from the constraining criteria that Eisenhower imposed including judicial experience, age (no one older than 62), and, as Yalof documents, religion in terms of finding a Catholic to appoint before the 1956 presidential election. The chapter on Kennedy and Johnson points up the differences between Kennedy/Johnson and Eisenhower and also between Kennedy and Johnson in the selection of Supreme Court justices. The path to the selection of Byron White was more circuitous than that for Goldberg. Most remarkable in the history of Supreme Court selection was Lyndon Johnson's, in effect, creating vacancies that he could fill with Abe Fortas and Thurgood Marshall, stories told before but well recounted and documented here by Yalof.

Yalof offers some fascinating revelations in the Nixon and Ford chapter including Warren Burger's behind-the-scenes maneuvering to get appointed to the Court as well as events leading up to the nominations of Haynsworth, Carswell, and then Blackmun to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Abe Fortas. The story of finding replacements for the Black and Harlan seats is discussed and the documentary evidence suggests that Richard Nixon was indeed serious about wanting to place a woman on the Supreme Court.

Events leading to Ronald Reagan's appointments to the Court including the ill-fated nomination of Robert Bork and the aborted one of Douglas Ginsburg have been told before, but not until this book have they been grounded in the Reagan presidential papers, which gives Yalof's account greater authenticity. Concluding the main body of the study, Yalof notes several trends in the evolution of the selection process including the near-lock that federal appeals court judges have had on nominations since 1968 (Yalof points out that 16 of the 19 nominees have been appeals court judges) and the shifting of selection from the back pocket of the president to the back rooms of the White House Counsel's Office and Justice Department. Yalof notes that there has been a shift to the criteria-driven decisional framework. The open decisional framework accounts for only five nominations since 1945, the last one being that of Stevens in 1975. The single-candidate framework accounted for 9 nominations but the criteria-driven framework can be seen with 14. Yalof provides an epilogue in which he provides what he calls a tentative analysis of the Bush and Clinton appointments to the Supreme Court relying on newspaper and secondary sources.

As thorough a study as Yalof's book is, there is an important omission. In only two footnotes do we find mention of President Jimmy Carter. Of course Carter did not have an opportunity to name a justice to the Supreme Court but he had ample opportunity to name lower court judges and the Carter administration selection process had an important influence on administrations to come. In particular, during Carter's administration key White House Counsel and Justice Department personnel began regular meetings to decide on recommendations to be made to the president. This was the beginning of the joint White House-Justice Department Judicial Selection Committee that has been a part of the process since. And most importantly, Carter and his administration pushed affirmative action in judicial appointments. Had Carter not been so insistent on finding qualified women for the bench and had he not been widely expected to name a woman to the first vacancy on the Supreme Court (he was seen as grooming Ninth Circuit judge Shirley Hufstedler, who resigned her lifetime position to join Carter's cabinet), it is questionable whether Ronald Reagan would have made his pledge to appoint a woman to the Supreme Court during the fall 1980 presidential campaign.

There are a few typographical or other errors. As for the latter, for example, the discussion of the growth and bureaucratization of the Justice Department fails to mention the Reagan Administration's creation of the Office of Legal Policy, which undertook the responsibility of screening, vetting, and processing all judicial nominations (p. 13). Edward H. Levi is described as "only marginally active in Republican politics" when in fact he was a former Democrat turned political independent (p. 126). Senator Hruska is described as being from Alaska when in fact he was from Nebraska (p. 247). Miller v. California is footnoted as the case that "included some pornography within the First Amendment's protections" (p. 133), instead of Stanley v. Georgia.

It should be evident that the errors are minor and that this book is a major contribution to our understanding of the nominating of Supreme Court justices. David Yalof is to be congratulated for his outstanding work.

Comparative Politics

Political Culture in Post-Communist Russia: Formlessness and Recreation in a Traumatic Transition. By James Alexander. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000. 267p. $65.00

Richard Sakwa, University of Kent at Canterbury

Of all the "traumatic transitions" in the postcommunist world, the Russian one ranks as one of the most tortuous and painful. Why is this? Does the problem lie in the institutional structure created in the early postcommunist years, or do the roots lie deeper, in Russia's innate authoritarianism and cult of strong leadership? Employing the concept of political culture, this is the question that Alexander seeks to answer. He approaches the idea in an unusual way, however, by focusing rather more broadly on the concept of "culture" and its potential for change rather than any narrowly defined notion of "political" culture. He insists that a nation's political culture cannot be reduced to one or two simple and measurable parameters but is a complex web of malleable relations and contradictions; and he seeks to understand them by using what he insists are nonstandard approaches.

The book takes an ethnographic approach to the study of postcommunist society. The fieldwork was conducted in the cities of Syktyvkar (the capital of the Komi Republic) and Kirov (formerly Vyatka) between October 1993 and August 1994. The material is marginally updated as a result of a further research trip to Syktyvkar in summer 1997, but the work stands or falls on the material gathered during the earlier research to these two provincial towns nearly a thousand miles to the northeast of Moscow. The general argument, rehearsed repeatedly though the book, is that traditional and predominantly quantitative methods fail to grasp the complexity of political culture. Alexander insists that only ethnographic methods, above all, open-ended face-to-face interviews, can provide the nuance that is forgone by closed-question surveys.

The two towns selected as case studies are illustrative of two federal categories: Syktyvkar is the capital of a republic and thus enjoys enhanced federal privileges and greater independence from the central authorities. Kirov, on the other hand, is just one of Russia's 50-odd ordinary oblasts (regions). A further difference between the two is that Kirov is an industrial town tied to the fortunes of the military industrial complex, whereas Syktyvkar is a relatively small administrative center in a republic that has great natural resources that were once exploited by prisoners in the many labor camps that formed part of the gulag archipelago. The differences between the two towns allowed conclusions to be drawn from the differential impact of economic reform on public attitudes, assessed on the basis of some 30 interviews with representative individuals in each place. The author insists that it is misleading to suggest that there is a homogeneous national political culture and, instead, argues that each community will have contours of its own. To a degree this is proven, but largely in matters of detail: there appears to be a remarkable underlying similarity between the two areas in broader cultural responses to the breakdown of the old order and the troubled birth of the new.

The analysis is structured in terms of a tension between two types of political culture, "democratic" and "authoritarian," although Alexander allows some subtle blending of the two. He adds another variable, the notion of "formlessness," to suggest the flux undergone by political culture in a period of accelerated change. The basic conclusion is that Russian political culture still bears the imprint of Soviet authoritarianism, yet was "primed" (p. 3) for liberal democracy as it exited communism. The work explores the tension between continuity and change, examining the dynamics of both and the often contradictory political culture that emerges as a result. Crude versions of the "continuity" thesis-of an unbroken and implicitly unchangeable Russian tradition of authoritarianism-are rejected. Alexander nevertheless insists that the dominant trend in Russian political culture is support for the symbols and values of what we may call "Russian traditionalism." Although Alexander does not say so, his findings appear to be confirmed by the rise of Vladimir Putin's distinctive blend of a liberal modernizing agenda cast in a traditionalist form. The book suggests that a political system out of kilter with the political culture (pace Eckstein's notion of congruence) will be unstable and that the optimal outcome is a "resting place" (pp. 40-1) in which the two reinforce each other. It remains to be seen whether Putin's system is that stable "resting place" for Russia.

The work is thus an unusual combination of "thick explanation" (not description; p. 67) and a methodological critique of the traditional survey approach to the study of political culture. The author insists that the latter cannot begin to identify and quantify the nuances of popular understandings, beliefs, and preferences, arguing that words and concepts take on different meanings as they travel between cultures. This point is perhaps rather labored, since the better studies of political culture have always been aware of the need for historical contextualisation, but appears to be part of the author's own liberation (suggested in his comments about his two years spent in the Peace Corps in Ecuador in the mid-1980s) from the tyranny of quantitative methodologies. Similarly, the concept of "formlessness" is not adequately theorized: One wonders whether there would be substantively greater "form" in Western popular perceptions of terms such as "democracy" and "freedom." The precise relationship between formlessness and the broader problem of regime change and societal transition is not adequately spelled out; that is, to what degree is the so-called formlessness a structural characteristic of a society that has responded in traumatic ways to the challenges of modernity for well over a century? Or is it a local phenomenon confined to the postcommunist transition? The associated issue of the direction of causality is not adequately addressed: The relationship between institutional development and societal characteristics—the eternal tension in transition studies between state-centered and societally oriented approaches—is left hanging in the air.

The key test of any work studying political culture is the durability of the evidence and results. The bulk of Alexander's research was conducted in the early 1990s, at a particularly traumatic time of institutional change, culminating in the violent confrontation between the presidency and the parliament in Moscow in October 1993. To what degree can his findings help us understand long-term patterns of development? The blend of political science and anthropological methods (although I doubt whether professional anthropologists would recognize his approach as in any way anthropological) does in fact produce results that transcend the narrow limitations of the time and place in which they were conducted. Although some of the claims for methodological originality are rather exaggerated, the study does help establish the contours of the formlessness (a contradiction that is recognized in the work itself), insisting that the experiences of democratization and marketization themselves contribute to shaping political responses; and thus primordialist approaches to the study of political culture are rejected. The enduring value of this work, however, perhaps lies not in the detailed analysis of the formlessness of the transition, but in the establishment of a framework in which we can begin to understand the process of "recreation" of a stable political order. This book takes us some way along this path but is constrained by its limited time horizon and its engagement in other debates. However, any attempt to understand the way in which tradition and innovation are being recombined in contemporary Russia will be the poorer without drawing on Alexander's theoretically sophisticated, methodologically robust and empirically rich work.

Public Health Policies and Social Inequality. By Charles F. Andrain. New York: New York University Press, 1998. 292p. $50.00.

The Politics of Health in Europe. By Richard Freeman. Manchester, UK: Manchester University Press, 2000. 164p. $69.95

Governing the Health Care State: A Comparative Study of the United Kingdom, the United States, and Germany. By Michael Moran. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1999. 196p. $69.95 cloth, $24.95 paper.

Accidental Logics: The Dynamics of Change in the Health Care Arena in the United States, Britain, and Canada. By Carolyn Hughes Tuohy. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999. 312p. $45.00.

Theodore Marmor, Yale University

International meetings about health-care issues—conferences, symposia, cyber-gatherings—have become something of an epidemic in the past decade. There is a brisk trade in the latest panaceas offered for the various real and imagined ills of modern medical care systems. When policy fixes fail in their country of origin, they are regularly offered to unsuspecting audiences elsewhere. Moreover, what travels as comparative analysis is often simply a collection of parallel descriptions of national health arrangements. So when there is a flurry of systematic comparative studies of health care by political scientists, a development illustrated by the four books under review, one ought to pay attention.

Ten years ago, there were relatively few political science texts on health care—the only truly comparative treatise by Odin Anderson was published in 1972, a book dealing with postwar medicine in Britain, Sweden, and the United States. (And Anderson was a sociologist.) It is not that health care was ignored, but the ferment was most evident in the growth of health economics texts.

Yet, over the last decade, there has been a literal explosion in comparative studies by political scientists and others. Academic conferences on comparative health studies have attracted many scholars. A spate of comparative reports by international organizations such as the OECD and WHO has provoked commentary and controversy, as well as supplying a wealth of comparative data. Now we see a third stage, one of book-length treatment, four of which this review examines. (Two other works of comparative politics came to my attention too late for review here. One is the admirable 1998 portrait of Japanese medical care—contrasted with that of the United States—by John Campbell and Naoki Ikegami, The Art of Balance in Health Policy, 1998. The other is Colleen Flood's wide-ranging "legal, economic, and political analysis" of International Health Care Reform, 2000.)

One can evaluate this literature by, at a minimum, two standards. One is the degree to which the work advances our understanding of how and why various nations have developed their health-care systems. The second is the extent to which the analysis permits readers to draw plausible policy lessons—predictive and prescriptive—for the national systems studied? The issue for this essay is, How well do the four scholarly works of comparative politics under review satisfy these standards?

Tuohy's Accidental Logics stands out as a sophisticated, thorough, and insightful synthesis of comparative politics and policy in Canada, the United States, and Britain. As she makes clear in her title, the book concentrates on explaining patterns of policy continuity and change, buttressed by a thorough understanding of both the institutional details of modern health care and the demands of comparative political analysis.

Tuohy's central thesis is that a "common logic" dominates health-care policy cross-nationally. But, she argues convincingly, the working-out of that logic in any given country reflects the "accidents" of history, the combination of which gives rise to each country's particular national system. Tuohy examines the national relationships between the market and the state in health care along two common dimensions: the balance of influence among types of actors (state, private finance, and health-care professionals) and the mix of instruments of social control (hierarchy, market, and collegiality). This framework not only descriptively illuminates the medical care we see, but also enhances the reader's understanding of seeming puzzles in the tumultuous area of health care policy. Tuohy's discussion of the United States over the past two decades illustrates her contribution. She understands recent American health-care developments as a result of the intersection of "the logic of entrepreneurialism inherent in market-based systems" and the increasing "influence of private financial actors at the expense of the medical profession" (pp. 158-9). Her general medical-care discussion reflects as well a profound scholarly understanding of the complexity of professional regulation. And her analysis of professional autonomy highlights the centrality of physicians, a group that has influenced and continues to influence health-care policy everywhere in the world of industrial democracies.

Accidental Logics begins by noting the features of medical care that make it the object of intense policy concern, analyzing the pressures for change internal and external to contemporary national health arrangements. The speed of change in the three countries she studies intensively differs according to the particular "institutional mix" (defined as the degree of government hierarchical control, market forces, and professional collegiality) and the "structural balance" among state, medical professionals, and private financial interests. With this approach, Tuohy then illuminates the variation in the impact of reform ideas on policy practice in the three Anglophone nations she knows so well. Substantively, Tuohy gives us national portraits that conflict with much conventional wisdom: comparative stability in the basic policy framework of Canada since the 1960s, tumultuous change in the United States in the 1990s, and a more limited degree of change in the world of British medicine from Thatcher to Blair.

Richard Freeman's contribution is of a different order. His book's scope is very ambitious. It is about," as he states on the first page, "health, politics, and Europe." The central question for the non-health-care specialist is whether the focus on publicly provided health care—which is what Freeman really has in mind, as opposed to the broader topic of health—illuminates European politics in especially striking ways. For health politics specialists, the issue is how the book's theoretical or empirical content advances the understanding of the subject.

Freeman's book is a readable, useful guide for the nonspecialist to the shape of European health-care systems, their origins, major institutional features, and contemporary disputes. (By contemporary, I mean over the last two decades of the 20th century.) Indeed, the focus of the empirical chapters is the disputes about "re-forming" health care that have raged since the stagflation of the 1970s in France and Germany, Italy, Sweden, and Great Britain. Freeman's title might well have been the "politics of health reform in five European States," emphasizing the pressures for change from those who use public health care, those who provide it, and those who pay for it.

The treatment of this subject is sensible, solidly documented, and very valuable for those trying to make sense of the very complicated, ever-growing arena of health-care funding, delivery, and regulation. The sequence of chapters begins with an introduction to the questions and the approach Freeman will take. It then moves to a very brief, but helpful sketch of European health-care politics in the century from 1880 to 1980 and takes up in comparative chapters the five national health-care programs. Freeman divides the substantive, descriptive chapters in two, distinguishing "national health services" (Italy, Sweden, and the United Kingdom) from what he conventionally labels as "social insurance systems" (France and Germany). Readers could use this dichotomy to analyze the health arrangements of other countries in western Europe, putting Holland and Belgium into the latter camp and Norway, perhaps, in the former one. Doing so would, however, raise the question of whether this particular classification is all that helpful. Does it really illuminate the political struggles over health care across Europe? Is thinking about policy arenas in terms of legal ownership/financial categories such as social insurance and national health service all that helpful in understanding what health policy matters are at issue and what patterns of resolution emerged in the Europe of the late 20th century?

The answer for this reviewer is simple. The formal designation of social insurance or national health service is but one of the potential factors shaping health-care politics and deserves no particular privileged status. Freeman concedes that the distinction is "not real" but "makes a wealth of information more manageable" (p. x). In fact, he regards the study of particular disputes in health care as warranting different analytical approaches, "necessarily eclectic," as he puts the point (p. viii). So what the reader has here is an accurate sketch of European political/medical history, a well-informed summary of salient disputes in five of Europe's nations, and some interesting, but not fully developed approaches to understanding why health-care policies and programs have worked out as they have.

For scholars (and students) of comparative politics, it will be a valuable substitute for the outdated work of Odin Anderson, a useful companion to the descriptive, statistical portraits of the OECD, and a helpful companion to the many articles on particular disputes or national programs.

What the specialist reader will find disappointing, however, follows precisely from the virtues of the book for the general reader. This is an excellent synthesis of available understandings. But there is little that advances that understanding, or reveals why and how comparative analysis can make a substantial difference in how we either explain comparative policy development or inform policy disputes about health care with an understanding of the crucial political constraints that research has revealed. Freeman does make a good case for adapting theoretical approaches to the different disputes within medical care but does not provide an especially illuminating way to conceptualize that. He suggests rightly that, for both explanation and evaluation, the comparative method is as close to experimentation as social science is likely to get. But, there again, the justification of the comparative approach does not produce in practice an explanation of change and continuity that goes beyond conventional national accounts. For that topic, Accidental Logics is superior. Freeman's contribution, however, is no less worthy for being synthetic rather than a theory-building exercise.

Michael Moran's Governing the Health Care State takes as its central question the following: How can one explain the embrace by the Thatcher government of American-inspired market reforms of the 1980s and early 1990s? The puzzle arises because the apparent motivation of those reforms—the control of health-care costs—was something that the unified government of the NHS was already capable of doing. The answer to that puzzle, Moran argues, can be revealed only by cross-national analysis. And his investigation is part of a broader concern about why "in the early 1990s the health care systems of most of the advanced capitalist nations were reformed" (p. x).

Moran's book, like Freeman's, offers a standard, competent description of the main health-care features of the United States, the United Kingdom, and Germany. But the patterns emphasized are not as illuminating as promised. The interplay of health-care institutions and the state constitute what this book regards as its central "insight," leading Moran to emphasize the analytical importance of what he terms the "health care state" (p. 10). This conception—health care as a subunit, so to speak, of the welfare state-defines the "closed loop feedback mechanism" of interaction between health-care interests (those of patients, providers, payers, drug firms, device manufacturers, etc.) and the political order. It is surely true that industrial democracies expend (publicly and privately) vast sums on health care. These in turn create a complex set of economic and political pressures. But to note that is not, in my view, to advance the reader's understanding appreciably.

The Moran analysis breaks out three elements of the "health care state"—consumption politics (access and cost), professional politics (expertise, ideology, and pressure groups), and production politics (health care as an industry commanding a substantial share of the GNP). The work is most helpful in dealing with consumption politics (chapter 3) and summarizes well developments in that sphere in the three countries. The other parts of the triumvirate are less well treated. For example, Moran unconvincingly regards the politics of professional regulation as simply what economists call "rent-seeking" by the medical professions, a "chance to gain competitive advantages in markets by securing preferential policy outcomes" (p. 14). There is no doubt that many regard professional self-regulation as simply window dressing for economic advantage. But one hopes for a more sophisticated discussion of such topics when issues of the quality of care are real and, in the case of the United Kingdom, a central feature of current criticisms of the NHS.

Moran returns in the end to his initial puzzle of why the United Kingdom turned in the latter 1980s to reform models inspired, he claims, by U.S. intellectual entrepreneurs. His unremarkable conclusion is that "the form and direction of health care policy are responding to some forces deeper than pressure for cost containment" (p. 174). But Moran is unable to explain precisely why precisely the particular class of innovations appealed, although along the way the reader receives an overview of changes taking place in all three political and health-care systems. Descriptively helpful, this book promises more than it delivers in making sense of continuity and change in the health-care arrangements of these three democracies.

Charles Andrain's book on inequality and public health is the most ambitious of the works under review and the most disappointing. Andrain approaches health-care policies deductively. He treats the topic as derivative of three models of the modern welfare state, using Gosta Esping-Anderson's typology as his organizing analytic framework in Part I of the book. He attempts to describe and explain developments in eight countries, placing each in one of the three welfarestate models—entrepreneurial, organic corporatist, and social democratic. Canada and the United States are treated as instances of the first category; Germany, Holland, Japan, and France exemplify the second; and Sweden and Britain are examples of the social democratic mode. It is unclear whether Andrain uses these categories to characterize the respective governments per se as the predicate for understanding its health policies or whether, as he sometimes suggests, these models reflect his understanding of each countries health-care features (pp. 14-5). To the extent that it is the latter, one must wonder about the applicability of these models.

Consider the result for Canada. Its universal coverage, global provincial budgets, and bans on extra billing and supplementary health insurance place Canada, according to Andrain's scheme, in the same "entrepreneurial" category as the United States, with its hundreds of health insurance firms, millions of uninsured and underinsured, and no overall budget setting by government (p. 19). On the one hand, there is no doubt that Canada' economic system and national culture resembles the United States' more than it does Sweden's (Andrain's exemplar of social democracy). But that fact does not substantiate the claim that Canada's medical-care arrangements rest on core entrepreneurial values—as opposed to those of corporatism or social democracy. Indeed, Canada's hospital and physician insurance arrangements are among the world's most egalitarian, and I can think of no specialist literature that supports Andrain's conclusion here.

Andrain's mistaken treatment of Canada is worth emphazing because it illustrates a key weakness of his approach to the comparative study of public policy, health, and social inequality. That weakness is empirical, the absence of a firm command of the literature on health-care systems. (His footnotes are extensive, but they come clustered at the end of paragraphs that do not link particular pieces of evidence with a specific argument. In that sense they reveal industry more than accuracy.) Canadians, we are told, "live "under a more decentralized system than the Americans" (p. 36). This characterization reflects the powerful role played by provincial governments in administering Canadian Medicare. The implication is that substantial variation exists in Canada because of that provincial administration of a program whose core features are actually enshrined in federal legislation. The fact is that Canadians—across the provinces—have in their hospital and medical insurance a substantially common policy. But this does not imply—unfortunately it does for Andrainthat the United States is more centralized. By most measures America's nonuniversal "system" has a smaller role for government of any type, whether federal or state, and reflects substantial decentralization of health-care policy and practice. The constraints of Andrain's deductive approach not only produces mischaracterization in this particular instance, but also undermines the credibility of his entire enterprise. Andrain begins with the presumption that "social inequality influences public health policies and their outcomes on people's health" (p. ix). That presumption, rather than a careful analysis of health-care policy, dominates the subsequent interpretations.

Even more fundamentally, this book rests on a conflation of public health and health-care policy. For Andrain, "public health policies" encompass all government decision making about health-care funding and allocation. At times, the term expands to include environmental, worker-safety, and labor policies. So what is presented is the work of a political scientist most interested in social inequality and governance, where health policy broadly understood is a vehicle for describing what is worthy and unworthy public policy. Social democratic governments, Andrain's logic suggests, "should promote the equality of workers," while entrepreneurial systems are presumed to reflect "fragmented power structure[s]" where "low income people must rely on public health programs for their health care services, [programs] based on means-tests [that] usually supply niggardly benefits" (p. 15). This logic, however, makes incomprehensible either Canadian Medicare or American Medicare.

Understanding health-care systems and how they fit into their political setting is demanding. It requires analysis that is both theoretically illuminating and substantively accurate. Judged by these exacting standards, the Tuohy book is an extraordinary work, concentrating more on explaining policy developments than designing a framework for evaluating reform options. The other three books fall short of her exacting comparative standard, but in quite different ways. Freeman's contribution is that of synthesis, not theoretical advance. In the case of Moran's work, the analytic contribution promises more than it delivers, though the book's comparative portraiture will be useful to many teachers and students. In contrast, the Andrain book is, to this reviewer, an unhelpful contribution to the comparative politics of health care.

The comparative politics field, however, gains from this expansion of scholarship into health-care politics. Not only is health care central to the fiscal status of most governments—consuming an average of approximately 9% of the GNP among OECD nations—but the arrangements of care prompt intense political conflict. The varieties of those conflicts are substantial—from the moral disputes over cloning, abortion, and assisted suicide to the intense labor struggles over hospital closures and union organization, from the ideological struggles over rationing to the distributive struggles over research funds. Charting and explaining these differences more fully remain on the agenda for future works on health care and comparative politics.

Cuba Today and Tomorrow: Reinventing Socialism. By Max Azicri. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2000. 396p. $55.00 cloth, $24.95 paper.

Sheryl Lutjens, Northern Arizona University

Max Azicri writes with acumen on the Cuban revolution in the very different decades of the 1960s, 1970s, and 1980s, and he offers an insightful assessment of the changes and challenges of the 1990s. His objective is to answer the puzzle of what he calls the "Cuban miracle": the island's surprising survival in the face of the deep economic crisis associated with the collapse of the socialist bloc and the ongoing "punitive" policies of the United States. Azicri is not the only scholar to attempt an interpretation of Cuba in the 1990s. Susan Eckstein (Back from the Future: Cuba Under Castro, 1994), Ken Cole (Cuba: From Revoution to Development, 1998), Julia Jatar-Hausman (The Cuban Way: Capitalism, Communism, and Confrontation, 1999), and Robin Blackburn, ("Putting the Hammer Down on Cuba," New Left Review, July-August 2000 (4):5–36) are among those who have examined the nexus of Cuba's past and future in the post-Cold War context. An explosion of travel writing also demonstrates the intrigue of contemporary Cuba, as does the list of new detective thrillers—some of them bestsellers—with a Cuba setting. Azicri's book has a distinctive place in this literary landscape.

Cuba Today and Tomorrow is a careful, thoroughly documented, and wide-ranging analysis of landmark events in Cuba and its international relations in the 1990s. The factfilled journey begins with the collapse of the Soviet system and the disturbing social dislocations of adjustment in Cuba, including a resurgence of prostitution; moves on to the economic and political reforms that enabled survival and then recuperation; and explores Cuban-U.S. relations during the Clinton administration, Cuba's outreach to the reordered world, and Pope John Paul II's visit to the island in 1998. Azicri distinguishes between domestic and external "environments," and his "underlying theme" is "that Cuba is undergoing another radical social transformation under the revolution, different from what was experienced before" (p. 5). This radical transformation is "reinventing" Cuban socialism. A more away from the "total socialism" of previous Cuban strategy (and dreams) "is not a matter of choice" (p. 5), but other choices matter in the reinvention of socialism in Cuba.

Azicri catalogs the increasingly well-known reforms of the 1990s, all of which serve three objectives: "to resist and overcome economic collapse, to safeguard the socialist system, and to integrate the country into the world economy" (p. 304). Economic reforms reflect capitalist adjustments to Cuba's economic model, ranging from legalization of dollars and self-employment to new fiscal policies, the opening to foreign investment, and free trade zones. Obdurate problems of development-and socialist development-persist, but the policy achievements (and failures) of previous decades explain mid-decade recovery as well as the potential for successful reinsertion in the global economy (p. 129). Which paradigm Cuba will pursue as it leaves behind the "total socialist" model is not yet clear (p. 175), and Azicri advises an expansion of private entrepreneurial space as well as renewed state control of the social programs (p. 175) that temper the pernicious combination of scarcity, tourism, and new inequalities, in order to reaffirm the egalitarian commitments of Cuban socialism.

The political reforms of the 1990s are more modest, among them the revision in 1992 of 77 articles of the Cuban constitution, the acceptance of "believers" as party members, and the inauguration of direct elections for provincial and national representatives. Azicri explains that democratic centralism has been redefined (p. 114), and he warns that typical questions about representative democracy are not "germane to the organic structure of a socialist political system" (pp. 121–122). He identifies two crucial issues within the single-party system: expanding the base of the party and ensuring that its role is one of policymaking, not implementation (p. 122). "Sensible electoral and political reform would reinforce the system as a socialist democracy, while increasing its political legitimacy at home and especially abroad" (p. 128).

The dynamics of reform in Cuba are contextualized in

The dynamics of reform in Cuba are contextualized in Azicri's discussion of the complexities of finding allies and friends in the postsocialist world, of UN deliberations on human rights and U.S. wrongs, and of the Pope's historic visit. Tensions between Cuba and the United States figure prominently in the external environment, including the unprecedented legislative aggression of the 1992 Cuban Democracy Act and the Helms-Burton sequel enacted after the two-planes incident in 1996. Although thorny issues of dissent, democracy, and development are indeed caught up in the interplay of Cuban exiles' actions, U.S. domestic politics, and official foreign policies that have harmed Cuba, Azicri advises that "most problems on the island should not be blamed on Washington" (p. 296) and "the reform process must continue uninterrupted regardless of hostile U.S. policies" (p. 307). Azicri recommends that the reinvention of socialism continue with a further opening to resurgent Catholic/Christian values. These would provide an ideal moral and ethical antidote for the "creeping materialism" associated with economic reform and would foster political reform by pluralizing official ideology and the ideational foundations of everyday life (pp. 304-5).

Azicri does not engage in debates about how to study Cuba and does not forge his argument in opposition to others' interpretations. He writes with regard to the nature and outcomes of reform: It "is in the detail more than at the macro level that the nature of things is defined" (p. 305). Indeed, much is quite familiar in the Cuba that Azicri presents, including his assumptions about Castro's leadership. "Power is personalized in him," and Cuba's political culture—a "civil (secular) religion"—is Castro's (p. 302). Less familiar, however, are the many claims for the achievements of the revolution—its strength and resilience, for example, or the "inventive policy making, grassroots ingenuity, and vital national character resources" that aided survival in the special period (pp. 19, 7). Azicri also focuses with uncommon respect on the refinements of Marxist theory in Cuba in the 1990s, and although he is ecumenical in the sources he uses and drives the study with detail rather than a framework, his conclusions advocate the dialectical method. In daring to take seriously the possibility of a better and still-socialist "tomorrow," Azicri problematizes Cuba and what we are willing to see and know about it. He may leave some important details out of focus, including Afrocubans and their religious orientations, but his contribution to renewed debate is timely, intelligent, and welcomed.

Elections and Democratization in Ukraine. By Sarah Birch. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000. 212p. $65.00.

John T. Ishiyama, Truman State University

Elections and Democratization in Ukraine represents a valuable contribution to our understanding of the dynamics of party systems development in postcommunist politics. Unlike many volumes that rely on largely anecdotal evidence and narrative, this book is extremely well organized and systematic. There is a clear theoretical structure, and systematic evidence is employed to test specific hypotheses. Using some of the classic works on the development of party systems and relations between parties and voters to provide a theoretical framework, the author derives a set of hypotheses about characteristics that might affect voter choices over time.

The empirical scope of the study is quite impressive, covering elections from 1989 to 1998, including the referenda on the fate of the USSR and on Ukrainian independence, as well as two parliamentary and two Presidential contests. Data were collected from the Archives of the Supreme Rada of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, archives of individual regions in Ukraine and the Crimean Republic, and local newspapers. In addition, the book relies heavily on extensive fieldwork, particularly data derived from a March 1998 voter survey.

The author's central question is, What forms long-term electoral cleavages in postcommunist Ukraine? In answering this question she argues that, contrary to the currently popular claim that the Soviet Union left in its wake an atomized society with weak social divisions, the Ukrainian electorate has, from the advent of competitive elections, exhibited a relatively stable sociogeographic cleavage structure, a structure which can be explained by social cleavage patterns that developed in the Soviet period.

In particular, the author emphasizes the importance and persistence of regionalism in post-Soviet Ukrainian politics She divides the country into five regions—"West," Bank" and "Left Bank" of the Dniepr, "South," and "East." She convincingly demonstrates continuing, strong support for nationalist parties, candidates, and positions in the West. On the other hand, voters in the South and East have tended to back parties of the "left"—communists, socialists, and agrarian socialists. In addition to the regional cleavage, there have been continued (although slightly declining) ethnic bases for electoral support of the Ukrainian political parties. Indeed, she shows that, over the years, proponents of statehood and Ukrainian nationalism have drawn largely from ethnic Ukrainian supporters, whereas opponents are derived mainly from Russian speakers or are of Russian descent. Further, religious factors also help define political cleavages in post-Soviet Ukraine, where the highest level of nationalist support is found among Ukrainian-Rite Catholics and Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox believers, whereas adherents of the Russian-affiliated churches (the Ukrainian Orthodox Church-Moscow Patriarchate and the Russian Orthodox Church) tend to support the Left parties. These ethnic, regional, and religious cleavages have remained remarkably stable over time, contributing to continued debate within Ukraine over the nature of the state. A somewhat less salient cleavage structure (although increasingly important) exists concerning the nature of the economic system, which manifested itself particularly after the parliamentary election

One of the more interesting findings of the book is that there appears to be little evidence to suggest that the underlying cleavage structure has molded itself closely to that of the party system. In other words, despite the existence of fairly stable patterns of sociopolitical cleavages, these are not matched by parties that represent these patterns of political cleavages. Indeed the parties in the Ukraine are largely conglomerations of shifting coalitions of personalities, without strong attachments to particular social constituencies (a pattern of development which is not unlike that in many other postcommunist states, such as Russia). In part, the author suggests that the evolution of the party system has been limited by the small number of contested elections held in Ukraine compared to other postcommunist states. In addition, there also exists a popular aversion to party politics, as such, and a tendency of many voters to vote on the basis of the nonparty attributes of candidates. This has led to the weakening of the ability of parties to match particular patterns of social and political cleavage.

This argument is consistent with the observations of many other scholars who have noted similar patterns of development in postcommunist Russian and Eastern European politics. Indeed, to a large extent, the pattern of Ukrainian party development is not very different from the patterns found elsewhere—that despite the existence of persistent voter cleavages, the party system does not match these cleavages. Perhaps one reason for this (a reason noted by other scholars but not emphasized by the author of this book) is that voting on nonparty attributes has something to do with the fact that the Ukrainian system (as in Russia) has maintained presidentialism coupled with single-member district elections. Both of these institutional characteristics tend to favor individual personalities over party programs in electoral competition.

Another minor problem with this book is the absence of a discussion of party behavior in the Rada. This would have been useful in discerning whether distinct party orientations were emerging in parliament, providing an important corollary to the author's analysis of party development on the ground (among voters and candidates). Given that early parties in the West grew out of the legislatures as coalitions of political elites, we might expect a similar process of development in the Ukrainian parliament. Thus, some analysis of political elites within the Rada would have provided a more complete picture of party development in the Ukraine. This would have given greater insight into party system development (the focus of Chapter 7) than viewing party development only from the perspective of the "party on the ground."

Finally, the conclusion is very short and offered almost as an afterthought—there is some attempt to discuss the findings in light of larger theoretical issues, but not much more. What would have been of great benefit is a discussion of the findings in some comparative way—particularly in the conclusion. Indeed, given the substantial amount of work, among both East European and Western scholars, who find remarkably similar processes of the development of the electorate in countries as diverse as Russia and Lithuania, the Ukrainian case represents yet another example of the mismatch between party development on the ground (among voters) and party actors that comprise the postcommunist party systems.

Nonetheless, these rather minor omissions do not detract from the high quality of this book. In particular, this book will prove to be indispensable reading for scholars who seek to employ the systematic techniques derived from political science to understand better the realities of postcommunist politics.

Cycling into Saigon: The Conservative Transition in Ontario. By David R. Cameron and Graham White. Vancouver: University of British Columbia Press, 2000. 224p. $75.00.

S. J. R. Noel, University of Western Ontario

One defining feature of a constitutional democracy is that the defeat of the governing party in a general election leads to a peaceful, orderly, and more or less routine change of government. Given the inherently combative nature of electoral politics and the potential for disruptive action by the losing side, this is no small achievement, and when it happens it is justly celebrated. Transitions in constitutional regimes, moreover, provide a unique if momentary window through which to view the mainsprings of political power. This volume is a study of the 1995 transition from New Democratic Party (NDP) to Progressive Conservative (PC) rule in the province of Ontario. It makes an important contribution to the sparse literature on transitions in Canada and in parliamentary regimes generally. For students of comparative government, it usefully complements recent work on presidential transitions in the United States, particularly Charles O. Jones, Passages to the Presidency: From Campaigning to Governing (1998).

In the United States, a change of president involves an elaborate and prolonged process that is controlled by partisans and results in thousands of offices changing hands. In Britain, a change of government is swift and unceremonious: In 1997, moving vans arrived to remove the personal effects of the defeated prime minister from Number 10 Downing Street less than twenty-four hours after the election. The changeover of personnel, however, is limited to ministerial offices and ministers' political staff, and the mechanics of the transition are handled by career civil servants. In Ontario, as in the Canadian federal government in Ottawa, transitions are somewhat slower and more politicized than in Britain, although there is no turnover of unelected officials comparable to that which occurs in Washington following a change of president or in most states following a change of governor.

The broad theme of this study is that transitions can be done well or badly, and how they are done has a major effect on an incoming government's performance—specifically, its ability to carry out its agenda. It would have been helpful if, at the outset, the authors had more clearly identified and ranked their criteria for evaluating transitions. Instead, it gradually becomes clear from their analyses of three transitions (1985, 1990, and 1995)—the first characterized as a modest success, the second as an abject failure, and the third as a brilliant triumph—that they attach primary importance to the quality of the working relationship established during a transition between politicians and senior public servants, since a transition "centrally involves taking control of the public service" (p. 151). In order to achieve a productive working relationship, they conclude, it is essential for opposition political parties with a chance of winning power to engage in thorough, systematic, preelection transition planning, and incumbent governments must authorize preelection planning exercises by the bureaucracy so that it, too, will be properly prepared if the election results in a change of government.

In assessing transitions, the authors rely heavily on material gathered through unstructured interviews (presumably, since the questions asked are not revealed). These were conducted on a not-for-attribution basis. Among the principal subjects were nineteen civil servants (ten deputy ministers and nine others of an unspecified lesser seniority) and thirteen members of the two opposition parties' transition teams (eight PC and five Liberals). Only three politicians gave on-the-record interviews: two minor PC ministers and the former leader of the Liberal party, Lyn McLeod, who resigned following her party's electoral defeat. It is not reported how many potential respondents were approached but declined to be interviewed. The lack of any explicit attention to methods is a serious weakness in a study of this kind. Nevertheless, the authors' key findings are amply supported by insightful (if also anonymous) quotations that only could have come from well-informed insiders.

In sum, they find that Ontario's NDP government of 1990–95 was handicapped from the outset by a disastrous transition, whereas the PC government that took power in 1995 benefited from an outstandingly well-executed transition. One of the most appealing features of the book is the detailed, incisive, and eminently readable account of these events.

The failed transition of 1990 is clearly explained and appears in retrospect to have been virtually inevitable. The NDP never expected to win the election and did no serious transition planning; it was confused over its goals and priorities; and some of the newly appointed NDP ministers and political staff were left-wing ideologues who were deeply mistrustful of what they saw as the inherent conservatism of the public service. When the premier appointed his notoriously partisan chief political advisor to the post of Cabinet Secretary (the head of the Ontario public service) and parachuted a number of other partisans into the higher echelons of administration, career bureaucrats understandably interpreted these moves as signals that the NDP was intent upon politicizing the public service. In one of the most interesting sections of the book, "Politicizing the Bureaucracy" (pp. 44-9), the authors come to the surprising verdict that the bureaucrats' case against the NDP is not proven. Nevertheless, as their study demonstrates, the antagonistic atmosphere during the transition had a lasting and ultimately debilitating effect.

The 1995 transition, which is the main focus of the study, is dealt with in an equally illuminating and readable fashion. It is also an original contribution to scholarship in the field. The authors show how the PC, from the very beginning, approached the election with "a governing mindset." Transition planning was given a high priority by the party leader, Mike Harris, who as early as January 1994 put in place the core members of a capable and experienced team of transition advisors. Consequently, when the PC won an upset victory it came to power ready to govern. It helped that the party also had an unambiguous right-wing agenda that it was determined to push through, and that Harris took immediate steps to placate the bureaucracy. As the authors state, the PC transition team "viewed the incoming government's relationship with the public service as the most important element in taking power effectively, and it sought and received a good deal of advice from former public servants who knew the system and the senior players well" (p. 85).

The authors also give due credit to the Cabinet Secretary, whose appointment by the NDP had provoked outraged cries of "patronage" and "politicization." It is an ironic ending to the story (and to his career as a bureaucrat, since he was fired by the Conservatives immediately after the election) that he contributed greatly to the success of the PC takeover by doing a thoroughly professional, nonpartisan job of preparing the bureaucracy for a transition.

A concluding section, "Practical Lessons and Recommendations" (pp. 153-9), neatly sums up the authors' advice on transition planning. It is so wise and plainly stated that their book will almost certainly become essential reading for future transition teams in Canada, and it merits attention in other parliamentary democracies as well.

The book's obscure title is not explained until page 102. It derives from an arch joke by an unnamed PC transition planner. Upon entering the deserted Cabinet office the day after the election, he recalls, he had the eerie sense that bureaucrats were watching him from behind the potted plams. "I felt," he said, "like the first Viet Cong soldier cycling into Saigon after the Americans had left."

The First Chinese Democracy: Political Life in the Republic of China on Taiwan. By Linda Chao and Ramon H. Myers. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1998. 371p. $47.00.

Democratization in China and Taiwan: The Adaptability of Leninist Parties. By Bruce J. Dickson. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998. 276p. $69.00

Steven Goldstein, Smith College

These books address the same issue, the democratization of Taiwan, but use diametrically opposed analytic frameworks. The results are individually unsatisfying but, paradoxically, complementary.

The key question for Bruce Dickson is whether ruling Leninist parties can evolve toward democracy without collapsing? Working from the assumption that both the Kuomintang Party (KMT), which dominated Taiwanese politics until 2000, and the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) on the mainland are "Leninist" by nature, he presents a detailed comparison of their evolution. He concludes that the democratization of Taiwan suggests a positive response to this central question. There, a reforming leadership, aided by favorable international and domestic conditions, responded to growing societal demands by sharing political power. On the mainland, a party dominated by nonreformers who perceived an unfriendly international and domestic environment choose to suppress societal demands. The recalcitrant record of the CCP leadership, Dickson concludes, offers little hope for its ability to adapt fully.

Linda Chao and Ramon Myers explicitly reject a depiction of the KMT as Leninist. They seek to explain the uniqueness of democratization in Taiwan when compared with other Chinese societies in the twentieth century. They present a typology of three different kinds of relationships between the political center and the rest of society: "a subordinated political center" and a political system that responds to society (democracy); an "uninhibited political center" and a society that "passively complies" with the political system; and an "inhibited center" that "does not control many of society's resources" and "gives more leeway to other loci of decision-making" (pp. 8–9).

Whereas Dickson argues that democratization was the result of KMT success in overcoming the limits of its Leninist origins, Chao and Myers view it as the result of the decision by the ruling elite to establish, from the outset, a non-Leninist basis for the party. Rather, they established an inhibited political center or limited democracy, characterized by a commitment to full democracy but without a timetable, and allowed limited oppositional activity. According to Chao and Myers, Taiwan followed a path from an inhibited to a subordinated political center, whereas the CCP has only recently evolved from an uninhibited to an inhibited political center. Thus, rather than ultimate failure to democratize on the mainland, the authors suggest that the two societies may gradually be converging as they follow similar developmental trajectories.

A review of this length does not permit a full assessment of the arguments. There is much that is useful and intellectually stimulating in both studies, especially the emphasis on the evolution of the electoral system on Taiwan. Yet, each fails in its response to the "big question" it poses because the premise from which each proceeds is flawed.

Although he recognizes differences between the CCP and the KMT and acknowledges that his comparison is inexact, Dickson does not make a convincing case for the KMT as a Leninist party. To be sure, at its founding in the 1920s and after its arrival on Taiwan, Leninist trappings were evident, but the KMT was a very selective and truncated version of a Leninist party. Specifically, what was largely absent was commitment to the central orthodoxy of Lenin's thought: the dogged insistence that the "consciousness" of the party/state should guide, not respond to, mass demands ("spontaneity"). Rather, the KMT was guided by a jumbled ideology (with a vague suggestion of political tutelege) and was an incomplete Leninist organization.

If one proceeds from this premise, it is not difficult to understand why democratization came to Taiwan and not the mainland. The ruling elite and their party organization in the People's Republic of China were/are fundamentally Leninist, whereas the system on Taiwan was Leninism manqué. In this light, Dickson's conclusion seems somewhat more modest than he suggests: Leninist states cannot adapt, and incomplete Leninist states can.

Similarly, the Chao and Myers depiction of the KMT as committed to democratization from the time of its arrival on Taiwan is very hard to accept. First, the authors never fully develop the content of the "Sunist ideology," which they claim was the basis of this commitment. Second, their use of Chiang Kai-shek's rhetoric to demonstrate a commitment to democracy is simply far-fetched. He made such statements even as his oppressive government decayed on the mainland. In the late 1940s and early 1950s this rhetoric became more intense as Chiang sought to gain American support for the idea of a "free China." More important, the practice of "limited democracy" during his rule was certainly far more brutal and less accommodating than the sanitized version presented by Chao and Myers. One could equally—and perhaps more accurately—term this period limited autocracy.

These two very different books complement each other. Myers and Chao remind us that the KMT was always a divided party under foreign pressure and institutionally weak in all but its coercive capacities. It was certainly not as Leninist as the CCP. Yet, elements of Leninism were there, as Dickson suggests. Moreover, Dickson's identification of the three elements that contributed, over time, to Taiwan's democratization, when stripped of their Leninist assumptions and comparisons with the CCP, provides a far more sophisticated conceptualization of the process presented in great historical detail by Chao and Myers, but placed by them in the less useful paradigm of limited democracy.

Theories of Comparative Political Economy: New Paradigms. By Ronald H. Chilcote. Boulder, CO: Westview, 2000. 316p. $28.00 paper.

James Petras, State University of New York at Binghamton

Ronald Chilcote is a leading radical political economist, and this book is a fine illustration of his well-earned reputation. It is a comprehensive survey of most of the major writers and themes that have dominated the literature on liberal and radical political economy, organized historically and by schools of thought around key concepts: class, state, imperialism, and transitions. The core of the book focuses on these four conceptual areas.

In the chapter on transitions, Chilcote outlines the major shifts—from feudalism to capitalism and from capitalism to socialism. The scholarly debate ranges from Paul Sweezy's notion that feudalism was largely a result of the emergence of a merchant class engaged in international trade; to Maurice Dobb's theory that the transition was the result of internal class conversions; to Robert Brenner's argument for the centrality of peasant-based class struggle. The diverse explanations posed by Chilcote highlight the complex reality of transitions and call into question the simplistic and schematic Rostovian stages of growth and Wallersteinian so-called world system approaches.

Chilcote's own approach to political economy is most clearly revealed in his discussion of class analysis perspectives. He recognizes the limitations of "class reductionist" approaches but argues very persuasively for examining the interface of class structure, productive processes, and state institutions in order to understand long-term, large-scale change. An additional benefit is the annotated bibliography at the end of the chapter, which includes many of the major authors in the debate.

In the chapter on the state, Chilcote suspends his class categories and refers to the liberal state and the progressive state. He returns (p. 42) to class categories in assessing the dichotomy, but without elaborating on the distinction between regime and state—a problem endemic among many theorists. Chilcote's summary of theorizing by Philippe C. Schmitter and Bob Jessop would have benefited from the extensive critical literature that highlights the many pitfalls of using the concept of corporatism to describe fascist, social-democratic, and nationalist-populist regimes.

The discussion of neoliberal views on the state accurately describes ideological principles (favoring a minimalist state) but does not analyze neoliberalism's powerful statist thrust: the state role in subsidizing capital, bailing out banks, intervening in civil society to limit the role of labor, and so on.

Neoliberal statism is most clearly a very current perspective and requires full exposition.

Chilcote provides a wide-ranging discussion and classification of the rich and sophisticated debates on the state by Marxist scholars. He evaluates and compares the Marxist, institutional, instrumental, regulation, and feminist perspectives. Surprisingly, there is no examination of the imperial state or of what some writers call the globalized state, although these topics are at the cutting edge of debate in the new millennium. The imperial state plays a major role in the world market by establishing new trading rules for expanding the influence of its multinational corporations and by directing international financial institutions to bail out crisis-ridden regimes and impose structural adjustments that facilitate privatization and buyout by Euro-American investors.

Chilcote's exposition of the capitalist-democracy debate provides excellent background on the historical and theoretical disputes between liberals and Marxists. Once again, however, a clear distinction between regime and state would help explain the apparently contradictory position of U.S. policymakers toward democracy in Latin America. In transition from military rule to democracy, the United States supports regime changes when the apparatus remains intact, but it opposes democratic changes when the apparatus is dismantled and replaced by a revolutionary state. The pertinent question is not whether capitalism opposes democracy but whether the transition to democracy entails changes in property relations.

The chapter on theories of imperialism, as distinct from the imperial state, is probably the strongest in the book. Chilcote provides a highly informative comparative-historical discussion of imperialism from Marx, to Schumpter, to those he describes as the contemporary analysts of imperialism, including Paul Baran, Paul Sweezy, Harry Magdoff, and Eric Hobsbawm. Various schools have focused on issues of unequal trade, foreign investment, and/or the role of multinational corporations, whereas newer schools address the problem of the internationalization of capital (p. 235). Mention is made of globalization theory, but the burgeoning literature in favor of an interdependent world in which stateless corporations govern through international financial institutions is largely ignored. Although globalization theory is the hegemonic perspective, it does not lack for critics, and certainly its claims to have eclipsed the imperial paradigm are short on data and weak in accounting for the unipolar world that emerged after the collapse of the U.S.S.R. This highly informative chapter would have benefited from the inclusion of globalization theory.

The survey of debates and theories and the classification of schools of thought on the major historical changes in the nineteenth and twentieth century provide a useful starting point for developing new theories and approaches to the problem of imperialism. Moving from theory to current policies and structures of the international political economy, one discovers an enormous gap between abstraction and practice. For example, neoliberal or free-market doctrines circulate widely and are formally embraced by Washington and Brussels, but the actions of these imperialist powers more closely resemble mercantilist than genuinely liberal policies. Although the United States demands from its Latin American trading partners the elimination of trade and investment barriers, it upholds and enforces quotas on agricultural commodities, textiles, steel, and a host of others. In addition, it applies antidumping regulations in a very loose and haphazard manner, which leads many countries to suspect that these are a "nontraditional" form of protectionism.

Massive state subsidies to U.S. agriculture and technology ($30 billion in the case of agriculture) allow U.S. multinationals and exporters to capture markets, but the U.S. government pressures the International Monetary Fund to enforce budget cuts in Latin America directed at similar subsidies. The Bush administration's Free Trade Area of the Americas Treaty would consolidate U.S. economic dominance in the hemisphere based on the mercantilist relations currently in place. Neither Samir Amin's Accumulation on a World Scale (1974) nor Immanuel Wallerstein's world system approach provide any empirical or conceptual guidance in understanding the particular forms, policies, or effects of neomercantilistic imperialism. I am suggesting that Chilcote's book would have benefited from testing the various theories of international political economy with some contemporary case studies in order to allow readers to evaluate the explanatory power of the competing theories.

This book is a much needed antidote to conventional political economists who ignore the issues of imperialism, social class, and large-scale, long-term changes. When the next major U.S. military intervention takes place, I hope that the major professional journals will not ignore the imperialism hypothesis, as was the case during the U.S.-Indochina conflict. By broadening our analytical vision and introducing key concepts, Chilcote does a great service to the study of comparative political economy.

Israel and the Politics of Jewish Identity: The Secular Religious Impasse. By Asher Cohen and Bernard Susser. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2000. 167p. $36.00.

The Politics of Religion and the Religion of Politics: Looking at Israel. By Ira Sharkansky. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books, 2000. 161p. $40.00.

Yael Yishai, University of Haifa

Religion has played a prominent role in Israel's history. The country was founded in 1948 with a declaration of being a Jewish state, not only a state for the Jews. This definition has been the source of two thorny problems. The first involves the relations between state and religion, the second the relationship between two communities, namely, the secular majority and the religious minority. The two books under review tackle these problems in a fascinating manner. They complement each other by presenting different aspects of the intricate religious issue in Israel. They also contradict each other by offering conflicting conclusions based on historical and contemporary analysis.

Sharkansky focuses on the relationship between religion and politics. His point of departure is comparative. Judaism is not unique, and politics in Israel is not exceptional. There are, according to his thesis, rules that govern the relationship between the two domains. His major argument is that religion and politics interpenetrate and actually resemble each other, having much in common. Neither can claim to have a monopoly of virtue or to be free of evil. Both religion and politics attract majorities, most of whose members remain loyal across time; both have their mainstream and their extreme elements. Leaders in both spheres tend to mix the promotion of spiritual and symbolic goals along with material payoffs for the faithful. Both are creative, inventing new doctrines and rituals, despite claims about absolute values; both attempt to distinguish themselves from their previous allies and current antagonists. In both religion and politics ambiguity is part of success and failure. The essence of the similarities lies in the policy arena: Religious issues are often the subject of political dispute. Religious demands, however, are not fully met because they come up against one another and because they encounter secular or antireligious opposition. The result is generally a stand-off in which neither religious nor antireligious activists can overcome the other.

This thesis is widely demonstrated by Israel, with its long history of a "thick" mixture of politics and religion. In a breathtaking journey through Jewish history and contemporary politics, Sharkansky demonstrates his thesis and shows that dispute over religious issues is a chronic phenomenon. At stake are problems of conversion, of personal matters, of observing Sabbath and holidays, and of the composition of religious institutions. Religious parties, described in detail in the book, exert demands that, if yielded to, may turn Israel into a halachic state, governed by religious law. This, however, has not been the case. Although religious issues are often on the political agenda, neither religious nor secular groups can overcome the other. The agenda of both proponents and opponents of religion is not translated into public policy.

According to Sharkansky, the reasons for this failure are grounded both in the universal attributes of the commonalties between politics and religion, on the one hand, and in the particular characteristics of the Israeli scene, on the other. The following reasons are prominent. First, although religious groups unite in seeking to advance their interests, they also compete with one another. Second, Israel as a state is so imbued with religious values that it is difficult to define the labels "religious" and "secular." Not only does a substantial share of the population consider itself "traditional," but also daily practices of individual secular Israelis are embedded in religious symbols, constituting part and parcel of the national culture. Third, the fact that no party has ever won a majority in the Knesset elections has served to mitigate the conflict between the secular and the religious. Fourth, surrounded by hostility, Israel is forced to maintain a degree of unity in order to survive. Politicians' pursuit of consensus and conflict minimization also contributes to easing the tensions. The result is that neither religion nor politics has gained total victory or encountered total failure.

Sharkansky's book makes an important contribution to understanding both the religion-politics nexus and the problems of religion in Israeli politics. The richness of data and the abundance of issues covered are overwhelming. In a brilliant exploration across time the author does not skirt any religious issue raised on the public agenda in Israel, be it trivial or major. The fit between the theory, captivating in its originality, and the case study is impressive. This is a thorough, innovative, and important work.

Cohen and Susser tackle the problem of religion in Israel from a different angle, focusing on the relationships between the two camps, the secular and the religious. Their major thesis contradicts that of Sharkansky. The picture they paint is not at all optimistic. In fact, they lament the decline of consociationalism in Israeli politics, implying that the secularreligious cleavage is in a new and unprecedented perilous phase. Not only are past animosities part of present realities, but also important changes have taken place in the character, context, and personal aspects of the religious-secular confrontation. In the authors' view, something qualitatively different has occurred in recent years, and there is a mounting potential for destructive crises along the religious-secular divide. "The language of consociational reciprocity, compromise, and mutual adjustment is quickly giving way to strident talk of total victory" (p. 139).

After elaborating the principles of consociationalism and the conditions that favor its emergence, Cohen and Susser adapt their conceptual framework to the Israeli scene by emphasizing the moderating and compromising effect of these arrangements, particularly in a society riven by deep cleavages. They then delve into Israel history, demonstrating the efficiency of consociational arrangements in the first generation, from the state's independence to the change of power in 1977. Admittedly, even in that peaceful period there were thorny and highly disputed problems. The authors give a detailed account of these, including the drafting of the constitution, military service of religious students and women, observance of Sabbath and holidays, religious education, and the formidable problem of who is a Jew. These problems were dealt with in the past in line with the consociational spirit, namely, by mutual adjustments and accommodation.

From this point onward Cohen and Susser differ with Sharkansky. They maintain that the second generation witnessed an enhanced power of radicals, ideological transformations both in the secular and the religious camps, and most important, a growing correspondence between Jewish identity and the territorial issue; all of these have eroded consociationalism in Israel. The causes of breakdown are grounded in the political, ideological, and social domains. Succinctly put, the transition from a dominant-party system to a balanced two-bloc system with the growing empowerment of the religious, especially the Haredi parties, is the first reason. These parties are no longer minor groups with limited assets but pivotal parties able to determine the composition of the ruling coalition. Changes have occurred also within the religious camp, and there is growing dominance of the Haredi over the national religious party. The dramatic convergence of religiosity with militant views regarding the future borders of Israel has produced overlapping cleavages in Israel's public life. Ideology, according to these authors, has become more prominent.

Contrary to Sharkansky, Cohen and Susser believe that "religious values are understood to be absolute, and the tendency to present them in ultimative fashion is, therefore, only to be anticipated" (p. 41). Radicalization of demands, backed by deepening social rifts and by effective use of the political constellation, is the main reason for the crumbling of the consociational arrangements that have kept the religioussecular rift at bay. The broadening of judicial intervention in politics and the constitutional revolution have added fuel to the flames, making the two camps drift apart. In addition, demographic, cultural, and religious transformations have put consociationalism under pressure. Among the most noticeable are the growing influence of the media, the growing insistence on "good government," and the immigration of many non-Jews. Cohen and Susser have written an excellent book. well organized and highly systematic. They present their argument clearly and concisely and provide ample evidence to prove their point.

The two books have some omissions. Sharkansky overlooks the radicalization tendencies in the religious-secular rift. Assuming that religion and politics are alike does not mean that they cannot clash. Although, as he suggests, both invoke compromise, the process has its drawbacks and shortcomings. By presenting the grand design of the religious-politics nexus, he pays too little attention to undercurrents.

Cohen and Susser do the opposite: They rely on contemporary events to explain processes of a much broader scope. A good example is their reference to the peace process (p. 72), which has been nipped in the bud. Both books disregard civil society, whose activity has both invigorated the consensual spirit and fueled the flame of extremism. Cohen and Susser refer in passing to "grassroots initiatives that mobilize support across communal lines, [and] detour the normal political leadership" (p. 87), but activity appears to be flourishing. A plethora of movements and associations are active on the scene, which is no longer monopolized by political parties and elites.

Despite these slight oversights the two books are mandatory reading for anyone interested in Israeli society, which excellently exemplifies the relationship between the two leading forces in human history, politics and religion.

Transitional Citizens: Voters and What Influences Them in the New Russia. By Timothy J. Colton. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2000. 324p. $65.00 cloth, $24.95 paper.

Unexpected Outcomes: Electoral Systems, Political Parties, and Representation in Russia. Robert G. Moser. Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh Press, 2001. 183p. $19.95.

Sarah Oates, University of Glasgow

As the Soviet regime recedes farther into the past, two types of scholars are now working hard to put the post-Soviet experience in comparative context. Some are those who built their careers on a study of the Soviet Union and have now significantly expanded on their work, while another group comprises scholars of the post-Soviet regime who completed their dissertations after the collapse of the Communist regime. These two books represent some of the best of both of these groups, and both are important in their scope in bringing Russian politics into one of the most important fields in politics, namely, that of elections, parties, and voters.

Timothy Colton's latest work on the former Soviet Union, Transitional Citizens: Voters and What Influences Them in the New Russia, breaks ground into new and exciting territory. He imports models of voting behavior, drawn mostly from the U.S. literature, into a postcommunist country. After a careful literature review and construction of a model, Colton applies the model to Russian voting behavior, using a series of three national surveys conducted in 1995 and 1996. The results of this methodical and groundbreaking work are engaging and fascinating and represent a major step forward in what social scientists can reap from studies of postcommunist states. The premise of Colton's book is that study of postcommunist politics has not always been informed by comparative theory and most work on voting behavior in Russia has not used a fully cross-national model.

Colton orders his research into several themes, including an examination of the socioeconomic determinants of vote choice; the development of partisan allegiances to parties and candidates; the impact of attitudes on vote choice; and what role personality, retrospection, and perspective evaluations play in elections. Throughout, he compares his results from the parliamentary elections to that of the presidential elections. Colton finds more similarities than differences in Russian voting behavior when comparing it with results in the West. For example, it is clear that socioeconomic characteristics such as age, rurality, and education have affected vote choice, particularly for the well-established Communist Party of the Russian Federation. In addition, there is compelling evidence for nascent partisan identification. Issues appear to have an impact on vote choice, as do evaluations of parties and candidates as well as evaluations of their past and future performance.

The book by Colton, who has written extensively on the Soviet Union and Russia, is a wealth of information for those who study Russian voting behavior, dealing with issues ranging from contact from campaign workers to the evaluation of parties on particular issues. The panel design of the survey allows Colton to make a convincing case of the stability of opinion on many issues. Colton's experience in studying Russia and his earlier work on public opinion and voting behavior are clear in the careful question design for the survey. For example, Colton makes a distinction among weak, moderate, and strong partisan identification, which is particularly important in understanding the origins and strength of possible party identification in a postcommunist state. In his study of the impact of attitudes about the economy, he is careful to clarify that Russians are not dealing with relatively small issues of policy but are coping with global change in their polity.

Colton deals deftly and well with the bewildering range of Russian political parties, election laws, and candidates, yet the book raises several points that offer scope for further research. For example, his survey data indicated that those who were well educated and more attuned to politics were more likely to be influenced by the media in elections. This raises two interesting questions. Although Colton sees this as positive, it also suggests that the media is immensely powerful if it has more influence among the most politically sophisticated. In addition, the book does not differentiate between the highly polarized state and commercial television broadcasts. Colton notes that there is a lack of trust in television; further studies have found that there is a high level of trust in the prostate, state-run media but not in the commercial media, which championed the case of some contenders for power in the 1995 elections. Meanwhile, he does see media as particularly important in Russia (p. 60): "The question of media impact is more piquant in protodemocratic Russia than in a settled democracy because of the disproportionate leverage the state, and business interests affiliated with it, have over mass communications."

In Unexpected Outcomes: Electoral Systems, Political Parties, and Representation in Russia, Robert Moser uses Russia as a test case for hypotheses about the impact of electoral systems on party formation. Moser eloquently argues that Russia shouldn't be disregarded because the outcomes of electoral design were different from those predicted by theory. Rather, the "conclusion is simple, yet surprisingly absent from much of the neo-institutionalist research: context matters" (p. 4). Thus Moser makes a careful study of the Russian case to provide convincing evidence for his theory. Yet his argument is wider than a study of Russia or even the role of institutions in the formulation of democracy in postcommunist states. As he writes, it is "better to integrate the study of less developed democracies into comparative politics and develop hypotheses that describe and explain patterns of behavior found in these contexts" (p. 5). In this attitude, Moser joins many of the "new wave" of scholars of Russian politics in seeing the importance of integrating the Russian case into general comparative politics.

Why does Russia provide this laboratory? The irony is that Russia's electoral system is informed by political science research (as it now is a subject of the same). Faced with the need to create a party system in a matter of months after the revolt of parliamentarians in 1993, Russia's political advisers chose to implement a mixed electoral system for the 1993 parliamentary elections. Half of the 450 members of the lower house (the Duma) would be elected through a national party-list contest and half would be picked through first-pastthe-post races in 225 single-member districts (SMD) across Russia. Moser considered this institutional design a perfect opportunity to study the impact of different electoral systems on party formation (and, to a lesser degree, on voting behavior). However, he is careful throughout the book to note that the Russian context also will inform the nature of the political "game." Moser does find several elements to the formation of Russian political parties that he considers somewhat unique, Although he feels that other third-wave democracies aside from Russia have a high electoral volatility, weak party identification, and little party organization (p. 31), what is distinct in Russia is the large number of independent candidatess who contest and win elections. But rather than perceiving this as an argument for making Russia sui generis, he writes, "Given that weak party institutionalization is a common feature of third-wave democracies, the experience of the Russian case may have broader implications for many new democracies."

In addition, Russia's party-list system defies the expectations of certain classic political theories, namely, Duverger's law and the Downsian spatial analysis of party preference. Rather than dismissing Russian politicians or voters as irrational or immature, however, Moser makes a careful analysis of possible rational preferences for an explosion of political parties by the 1995 elections. He finds that "party proliferation in the PR tier seems in part to be one of hidden rationality caused by the many competing incentives of the mixed electoral system" (p. 39) like nested games. Moser also argues that the proliferation of candidates in the SMD tier was caused by the weakly institutionalized party system. In Chapter 6, Moser tackles the puzzle of why Russian voters have twice elected a fairly reactionary Duma and a relatively reformist president a few months later. Moser argues that it is not irrational or even particularly unformed voting preferences; rather, the differing outcomes are the result of the institutional design of the electoral system. Moser uses an analysis of voting patterns for broad ideological camps to show that there was relatively little change from the Duma elections of 1995 to Yeltsin's election in 1996; what changed "were the rules of game that structured the vote choice and translated the vote into political power" (p. 97).

However, in this analysis some of the context does in fact matter, in that it is difficult to categorize particular party groupings, as Russian parties are often based less on ideology than they are on personalities or the needs of particular bureaucrats. Moser posits that the key factor in Yeltsin's surprising reelection in 1996 was the consolidation of reformist and centrist voters behind a single candidate. His arguments on the importance of ideology and the presence of rational voting behavior should, however, have taken more into account some of the distortions of the 1996 presidential campaign. Notably, Yeltsin enjoyed full control of the primary state and commercial television channel, as well as virtually unlimited access to funds and political "pork" as both a carrot and a stick for voters. While it is worthwhile to assess and measure voter preferences, it could be argued that there needs to be some additional compensation for the particularly unfair elements in the Russian political system, namely, the domination of the media, public funding, and public office by some political parties. These distortions have become more important over time, particularly in the most recent Russian elections (not covered in this book).

Both Colton and Moser's books provide an important contribution to the understanding of voting behavior and party formation in Russia. More importantly, they use comparative theory to inform the discussion about Russia and, in turn, illuminate points about this theory in general. Russia is a fascinating laboratory for political scientists, as parties develop in a sort of "Big Bang" rather than at the evolutionary pace that they did in much of the West. As such, it is possible to observe and measure phenomena such as the development of partisan identification and the relative effect of party-list structure on party formation in an accelerated manner.

Both Colton and Moser are guardedly optimistic about the development of democratizing patterns in voting behavior and party organization along Westernized lines. There is worrying evidence, however, that any movement toward a Westernized, liberal party system in Russia has stopped. As both of these books are based on studies of elections in 1996 or earlier, it was impossible to include in-depth analysis of the 1999 and 2000 elections in the volumes. Preliminary studies indicate that while studies of voting behavior and party organization are still relevant, the ability of powerful state bureaucrats to use ephemeral political parties and the media to manipulate electoral results has increased markedly. Realistically, future studies of elections in Russia must now take into account theories of propaganda and authoritarian "staging" of elections that are more reminiscent of the former Soviet Union than holding promise for a democratic Russia. However, the way in which Colton and Moser have integrated the study of Russia into the larger questions of the discipline remains an example for other scholars to follow.

East Asian Democratization: Impact of Globalization, Culture, and Economy. By Robert W. Compton, Jr. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2000 224p. $68.00.

Cal Clark, Auburn University

Studies of Asian politics tend to follow one of two divergent analytic strategies. Area specialists emphasize the importance of Asian culture in shaping the politics and economics of those nations, whereas comparative theorists apply broader models of political behavior to the Asian context. Robert Compton seeks to integrate these two traditions, which generally speak past one another, by proposing a promising (albeit somewhat limited) model of the dynamics of democratization in East and Southeast Asia. The model explicitly incorporates the distinctive cultures of these nations as the central causal factor explaining the process of democratization and the characteristics of the democratic polities that have emerged in the region. Furthermore, in terms of normative questions, Compton uses this analysis to critique both sides in the current debate between advocates of democracy and critics who claim that democracy is incompatible with "Asian values." Thus, East Asian Democratization should be of interest to a wide variety of scholars concerned with Asian politics or with theories of democratization.

Compton's theoretical analysis is developed from a central empirical finding that party systems in the democracies of East and Southeast Asia are systematically different from those in the industrial societies in Europe, North America, and Oceania. In particular, the analysis focuses upon "competitiveness" and is based on an index that has two distinct components: (1) the fractionalization of the system as measured by the partisan dispersion of seats in the national parliament and (2) the variety in the system as measured by the difference in the proportions of seats controlled by parties representing the "power elite" of business, the military, and the bureaucracy and by those representing other, nonelite sectors of society. Statistical analysis demonstrates that the party systems in Asian democracies are considerably less competitive than in other industrialized nations. Moreover, increasing levels of industrialization and urbanization do not bring greater party competitiveness in Asia, thereby controlling (at least crudely) for their status as late developers.

One easily discernible explanation for these findings is that the emphasis in Asian cultures on respect for authority and community solidarity, as opposed to the assumedly paramount Western values of individual freedom and autonomy, shape political parties that differ significantly from their Western counterparts. Compton's theoretical model, however, goes far beyond such a simplistic static comparison. Instead (and almost certainly appropriately so for cultural analysis), the author takes a much longer historical perspective and views political development in these nations as an integral consequence of their economic development strategy. During the postwar era, first capitalist East Asia and then Southeast Asia cast their fates to the winds of the international marketplace. Their development strategies, however, were far different from Anglo-American laissezfaire practice and reflected instead a "Confucian" or communitarian capitalism led by developmental states that were generally authoritarian. The stupendous success of exportled Confucian capitalism ultimately challenged these political regimes by expanding the educated middle classes, who pushed for political reform. The governmental elites, in turn, eventually responded with a "top-down" form of democratization that differed significantly from Western democracy.

In the developmental state model, as adumbrated by Compton, Asian governments, especially the economic and financial bureaucracies, created their developmental states by melding modern and traditional components in a very creative manner. In the economic realm, they were quite modern as they created internationally competitive industries. They essentially turned to the traditional culture, however, for their political legitimacy, which was based on a combination of three sources in Asian cultural values: (1) respect for authority and for government officials, who are seen as a "guardian class"; (2) patron-client relationships that are part of paternalistic authority patterns; and (3) a greater concern for community and family than for the individual.

The political cultures in East and Southeast Asia were largely constructed by the elites in these developmental states—bureaucrats, the military, corporate leaders, and (where elections were permitted) electoral politicians. Compton, to sum up, conceptualizes the economic and political development of Asian democracies as going through a series of stages defined by the relative power of these four elite segments. He then applies the model to three case studies—Japan, South Korea, and Thailand. The first two, despite significant differences in the ability of their developmental states to gain popular legitimacy, fit the model quite well. The fit is not quite so good for Thailand, but the hypothesized developmental stages can be discerned there, too.

This analysis also has implications regarding the quality of Asian democracy. Elites success in leading economic development and the nature of the prevailing political culture combined to limit participation in the Asian democracies that did evolve, in particular by continuing the near exclusion of labor, students, women's groups, and environmentalists from positions of influence. In addition, the emergence of strong parties was prevented by several factors, including the strength of government bureaucracies, the prevalence of patron-client ties, and the marginalization (even after democratization) of groups outside the traditional power elite. Consequently, Compton challenges both sides in the democracy versus Asian values debate. On the one hand, the assertion of conventional modernization theory that Western-inspired capitalism and democracy are spreading around the world is clearly invalid; rather, economic and political development in Asia constitutes modernization without westernization. On the other hand, the fusion of economic and political elites based on Asian values creates problems as well. Corporate leaders have used economic power to subvert democracy, and the pursuit of economic gain by politicians delegitimizes the Overall, Compton's model is a valuable heuristic tool that should make us think more deeply about important aspects of the political economies in East and Southeast Asia. It needs to be extended in several important regards, however. First, the book provides very little direct description and analysis of democratic politics in the region. For example, the scores of the individual countries on the two components of the party competitiveness index are not given; and the case studies of South Korea and Thailand overwhelmingly treat the predemocratic era. Second, as Compton's treatment of Thailand suggests, the nature of the state and its relationship to the economy vary widely in the region. Third, this also suggests that a much more nuanced use of Asian culture would be valuable. For example, Lucian Pye's Asian Power and Politics (1985) presents a typology of political cultures that appears well suited for differentiating the political and economic structures in the region.

Discordant Comrades: Identities and Loyalties on the South African Left. By Allison Drew. Aldershot, Hampshire: Ashgate, 2000. 282p. $74.95

Courtney Jung, New School University

Drawing on a wealth of new information made available by the opening of the Comintern archives, Drew sheds the light of hindsight on the relationship between the Communist Party of South Africa (CPSA) and, in turn, the Soviet Comintern, the South African liberation movement, and the white and black trade union movements in the first half of the twentieth century. This rich book makes a unique contribution to our understanding of ties between the Comintern and its satellite parties as well as the early history of the South African antiapartheid movement. There are only two other major books on this period of party history, and both are memoirs of party members who try to establish a particular version of the record. Drew contests the teleology of their accounts of communist party history and instead weaves a contingent narrative that identifies major turning points that narrowed the possibility for a radical reorientation of the party (p. 281). It was not inevitable that the party would split and finally dissolve in the way it did-other outcomes were possible, almost until the end. That they were not taken was the layered result of personal and ideological rivalries and party alliances that made socialism, and socialists, perpetually weak and vulnerable in the context of South African politics.

Drew argues that much of the internal weakness of the CPSA derived from its relationship with the Comintern. South African communists were always vulnerable to external influence, in part because most communists were recent immigrants from Europe with connections to European parties, and in part because South Africa had no socialist tradition of its own. As a result, the Comintern was exceptionally influential in South Africa, particularly in the late 1920s, and the CPSA had difficulty maintaining a steady party line and leadership because the Comintern vacillated among positions almost year by year. As ideological stances fell out of favor, so did the leaders most closely associated with them. Internal rivalries and splits were raised to the level of doctrinal challenges as conflicting sides turned to Moscow to confirm, and legitimate, their position. In a local reflection of the international division, those who fell out of favor were called Trotskyists, regardless of their ideological views. The split between (Stalinist) communists and Trotskyists was mapped onto racial politics in South Africa, as each side aligned with different black opposition groups.

Although the Comintern played such an important role in guiding the party, its ideological directives had little to say about the main problems facing South African communists: how to organize across racial lines when local conditions (racism as well as legal constraints) precluded such organization, and whether African nationalist organizations were legitimate engines of social change. Before 1924, the CPSA focused most of its recruiting efforts on organizing white labor. As the most skilled and stable sector of the working class, whites were expected by some within the party to be the vanguard of an urban proletariat. White workers consistently saw their interests as separate from and even conflicting with those of black workers, however, and refused to align across racial lines to build a unified working class. The CPSA finally turned its attention to black workers in 1924, demonstrating some ability to respond to local conditions and to the growing significance of black labor. In the 1930s and 1940s, party members such as Ray Simons played a crucial role in building a black trade union movement through the painstaking work of organizing on the factory floor. That movement is one of the lasting legacies of the early CPSA.

What stands out most is precisely how small and isolated the CPSA was, considering the important role it later played in South African opposition politics through its influence on the liberation movements. At its peak in 1929, the CPSA had only 3,000 members. By the time it was banned through the Suppression of Communism Act in 1950, it had fewer than 2,000. Yet, many of the positions and rhetorical flourishes made familiar through African National Congress (ANC) discourse turn out to be early socialist positions—from which the much more conservative ANC quickly distanced itself.

The relationship between the South African communists and other oppositional organizations, such as the All African Congress, the anti-Coloured Affairs Department, the ANC, and the Non-European Union Movement, was complicated by "the race question," which confounded CPSA ideologues and strategists for most of the century. How to handle race in the effort to forge a class struggle was a central problem for South African communists and was a decisive, and indeed divisive, problem between the CPSA and the Comintern. In 1929 Sidney Bunting, an influential South African communist leader, established the League of African Rights. It was meant to be a broadly based organization that included strands of democratic and national liberation as well as communist ideology. The league was growing quickly, particularly in comparison to the tiny ANC, when the Comintern ordered it disbanded.

Drew speculates that if the League of African Rights had survived, it could have offered the basis of a working class or social democratic challenge to the ANC (p. 278) Instead, the CPSA pursued a policy of tactical alliance with the ANC through the 1940s, even as both groups were careful to maintain an independent identity. The ANC considered the CPSA too radical, and the CPSA feared being tainted by ANC nationalism. When the CPSA was banned in 1950, party leaders unilaterally elected to disband completely, to the surprise of many members. The party was reconstituted underground three years later, but it was almost completely subverted within the ANC. Drew ends her account of the South African Left in 1950, perhaps because, "in the era of apartheid and the Cold War, South African socialism subordinated itself to nationalism" (p. 280).

This narrowly constraining perspective unnecessarily pits nationalism and Left as opposing paradigms. In the case of South Africa, as in many others, nationalism was harnessed to the project of the Left after 1953. For example, the 1955 ANC Freedom Charter included such provisions as "the land belongs to all who work on it." The true legacy of the CPSA was its influence on the ANC, from within, and later also on the United Democratic Front. In the final decade of apartheid, the state was challenged by mass-based people power anchored in the black trade union movement. This also was the Left, speaking simultaneously in the voice of race and class and confounding the oppositions that long structured South African intellectual and academic discourse—is it race or class conflict? It was both, and leftist opposition expanded to occupy all the spaces of domination and marginalization. Today, the CPSA is one of very few communist parties in power anywhere in the world, as part of the Tripartite Alliance with the ANC and Congress of South African Trade Unions. Yet, the alliance with the trade unions and the liberation movement has hardly strengthened the hand of the Left. In the postapartheid era, it has finally subordinated itself, not to nationalism but to governance and neoliberalism.

Women, Religion, and Social Change in Brazil's Popular Church. By Carol Ann Drogus. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1997. 226p. $26.00.

Mala Htun, New School University

Historically, the Roman Catholic Church is seen as an obstacle to progressive social and political change in Latin America. Beginning in the 1960s, however, the Second Vatican Council and the growth of liberation theology prompted doctrinal and institutional changes in the church in Brazil and several other countries. From an ally of the conservative oligarchy and establishment, the church turned into an engine of mobilization for grassroots movements and a focal point for popular opposition to authoritarian governments. One of the more significant and widely researched changes in the "popular church" was the establishment of thousands of ecclesiastical base communities (CEBs) among the poor. The fact that the majority of CEB participants are women has received far less attention.

In this well-researched and engaging book, Carol Ann Drogus analyzes women's participation in the CEBs of Brazil's popular church with the intention of addressing two theoretical concerns. The first is the extent to which gender acts as a filter for religious experience and interpretation of liberation theology. Can the failure of CEBs to make a more radical contribution to Brazilian politics be attributable to the fact that they are comprised largely of women? The second question focuses on how women's participation in the popular church has affected their attitudes toward gender. Have CEBs empowered women, and if so, has this led to development of a gender consciousness among them? Drogus's findings are based on extensive fieldwork that consists of interviews and participant observation in seven CEBs in Santo Antônio, a low-income parish on the outskirts of São Paulo. The book contains rich descriptions of the daily lives of the women and their families (interviews with a core sample of 30 women who are CEB participants provide most of the data) and of the development of the popular church in Brazil.

Drogus found that, although the women face similar challenges in daily life and share a history of "long, intimate identification with the Church" (p. 78), they interpret the messages and symbols of liberation theology quite differently. Identifying at least three distinct religious personality types (liberationists, traditionalists, and Samaritans), Drogus argues that women as a group have neither "energized nor stymied" the liberationist project (pp. 81-107). Their political attitudes also vary. Liberationists are prone to link their personal struggles for survival with the status of the working class in general, and traditionalists are more likely to accept being poor as part of the natural order of things and to perceive strategies for upward mobility in individualistic terms. Despite their differential acceptance of liberation theology and class consciousness, however, the women share a positive response to the social movements endorsed by the church. They mobilize to participate in day care, sanitation, and land movements, which they see as mothers' movements that enable them to work on behalf of children—"their own and all poor children more generally" (p. 142).

To what extent do the CEBs empower women and promote gender consciousness? To be sure, CEBs are not hotbeds of feminist activism. The popular church conforms to traditional Catholic doctrine in condemning civil divorce, abortion, and birth control. Virtually every woman in the study endorses these traditional views.

Liberation theology, moreover, tends to subordinate gender to class oppression (p. 157). Yet, CEBs encourage women's active participation in the public sphere and offer opportunities for women to assume new religious and political roles. In some cases, the fact that their domestic gender roles and family lives almost never change in parallel to their changing public role plants a seed of gender consciousness. Frustrated with the lack of change in men's attitudes and behavior, some of the liberationist women in the study want more help around the house and also argue "for real equality and a division of labor that allows women to assume what they see as their right to participate" (p. 172).

The strength of the study lies in the compelling narratives about religion, politics, and daily lives. The fact that Drogus elicited this level of candor from her subjects is a testament to her skills. Yet, the research design permits the author to address only the second of the two questions posed at the beginning of the book. The data allow Drogus to advance claims about women's reception of liberation theology but not the analytical significance of gender. An understanding of how gender filters religious messages requires a control group—in this case, men.

I also have some concerns about generalizeability. The author claims to have chosen Santo Antônio as a "critical case" region, the idea being that if "liberation theology does not flourish in the conditions its proponents have deemed most hospitable, it is unlikely to do so elsewhere" (p. 20). The area had a "famously liberationist bishop" and "pastoral workers with a clear liberationist agenda" (p. 21), which created a particularly "propitious context" for CEB development. The parish participated in some of the major civil uprisings of the late 1970s that weakened Brazil's military government. Because CEBs had only a limited effect on these women, I have the impression that in the rest of Brazil the effects of CEBs are small to nonexistent.

It may be significant that only liberationist women demonstrated a class consciousness and a desire to change gender roles. Given their underlying activist predispositions, one wonders whether they would have found modes of public participation—in neighborhood movements, for example in the absence of CEBs. After all, women's changing attitudes toward gender "have been largely an inadvertent byproduct of their participation rather than something with which the CEBs should be directly credited" (p. 179). This implies that the effects of CEBs on the attitudes of even liberationist women may have been largely epiphenomenal, a possibility that should be considered more seriously in the book. Incidentally, Drogus is too quick to endorse the proposition that gender characteristics account for women's rejection of party politics (pp. 138, 184). When political parties fail to offer equal opportunities to women to participate as militants, to rise in the party ranks, and to stand for office, it is quite rational for women to avoid them.

The book should be of interest to scholars of religion and politics, Latin American politics, and gender and politics.

Brokers and Bureaucrats: Building Market Institutions in Russia. By Timothy Frye. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2000. 272p. $65.00 cloth, $24.95 paper.

Stefan Hedlund, University of Uppsala

Over the past decade, Russia's attempted transition to a market economy has attracted a great deal of scholarly interest. Given the complexities at hand and the rather disappointing outcome, it is natural that debates have been acrimonious at times. Some have argued that we are witnesses to a great success; others, that we are seeing a monumental failure. A book that promises to deal with "building market institutions in Russia" might harbor yet another contribution to such debates, but that is not case. Timothy Frye is careful to note (on p. 12) that his book "does not attempt a holistic analysis of the process of economic and political reform in Russia."

Leaving the overall assessment of success or failure for others, he chooses to tell a more specific story, and to use that story to advance our understanding of an important field in social science theory, namely, that of institutions and the problem of social order. The factual story, which has great merit in itself, covers the rise of three types of markets in post-Soviet Russia: currency futures, commodities, and corporate equities. The accounts are based on a combination of published materials and personal face-to-face interviews with brokers.

The aim of the five case studies presented is to explain differing degrees of success among brokers seeking to establish functioning systems of self-governance. It is also here that we may find the author's claim to originality: The absence of state agents from existing theories of self-governance constitutes a hole in the literature.

In a broader sense, Frye's undertaking represents a continuation of a large body of literature. Those who are not familiar with the field are given a very quick tour, ranging from Hobbes onward to Ostrom, Putnam, North, and new institutional economics.

The main thrust of his argument, however, is not to refine but to challenge the predictive value of previous economic and sociological theories of self-governance, arguing that his "political" approach is better suited to explain the cases at hand. Based on factors such as taxation and delegation, his discussion of the interaction between brokers and bureaucrats sheds valuable new light on the processes at hand. He deserves credit for highlighting the roles that may be played by state agents in promoting or hindering the emergence of institutions to support self-governance. But to what extent does he succeed in advancing the main body of theory? My problem here is chiefly one of presentation, of claims to have climbed mountains that really turn out to be hilltops.

From an institutional point of view, the role of the state as an outside enforcer is to promote such norms that we may achieve sustainable progress. If self-governance emerges in association with methods that go clearly against that longerterm goal of the state, then we have a mixed outcome indeed. By ignoring this dimension, Frye in some sense flushes the baby out with the bath water.

In a narrow sense, he presents an interesting analysis of factors that decide whether actors will rely on self-governance or turn to private protection, but he fails to note that in the broader picture even a formally successful case of selfgovernance will depend for its sustainability on the functioning of the surrounding state. More specifically, we must question the validity of Frye's critique against those who have argued that the roots of social capital are "lost in the mist of history" (p. 107). While he is correct in saying (on p. 154) that "culture is too broad a variable," he clearly goes too far with claims that his technical explanations of organizational competition offer a "more general explanation for the rise of the racket in Russia." If it is true that culture cannot explain specifics, then it is equally true that exactly the same set of formal rules will have very different outcomes in different cultural contexts. From a policy point of view, these are important distinctions.

More generally, the political approach based on state agents can be held up as "better" than, say, the criticized economic approach only in a very narrow sense. By failing to incorporate the dynamic aspects of institutional change, as laid out by North and others, it has little to say about the broader issue of how the newborn social order will evolve. Thus it also has limited policy relevance.

In this sense Frye also greatly overstates when arguing (on p. 155) that his technical explanations are better suited to explain the weakness of the Russian state than arguments relating to the neoliberal ideology of the reforms. He is right only if we ignore completely the formation of social norms to support the formal rules of the reforms.

Turning to another problem, much emphasis is placed on the corporate equities market, as a prime example of successful self-governance. Again, the interplay between brokers and bureaucrats is given an interesting and certainly valid interpretation. But perhaps it might be better in this case not to speak of "state agents" at all, but of the interplay between foreign operators with clear money-making strategies and young Russian reformers eager to impress their foreign benefactors. The mechanics of formal rule setting would remain the same, but we would also capture all those problems of moral hazard that, inter alia, have led the U.S. government to file a law suit against Harvard University for activities undertaken by Harvard-employed advisors to the Russian government. What "state" did these "state agents" represent?

Throughout, the text also has a certain gloss of success. Chapter 8, in particular, which details the process leading up to the crash in 1998, studiously avoids any mention of bad behavior by Russian actors. I have no problem with this, but it does go against the declared ambition of staying clear of any broader assessment of success or failure.

My real problem with this book is that it ends up a halfway house of sorts. By neglecting to deal with some of the more unsavory aspects of Russia's emerging markets, such as the protection of minority shareholder right, it fails really to come to grips with the broader story, which is a pity. At the same time, by neglecting to deal with the full scope of theory, such as the formation of norms and the consequent risk of institutional traps, it also fails to derive real benefit from the Russian example, which, perhaps, is even more of a pity.

Audacious Reforms: Institutional Invention and Democracy in Latin America. By Merilee S. Grindle. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press 2000. 269p. $45.00 cloth, $17.95 paper.

Brian F. Crisp, University of Arizona

Merillee Grindle addresses three questions: Why would rational politicians choose to give up power? What accounts for the selection of some institutions rather than others? What are the political consequences of the creation of new institutions? She studies cases of decentralizing political reforms in Venezuela, Bolivia, and Argentina. Her case studies are loosely guided by eleven hypotheses deduced from three schools of thought. The schools to which she refers in an introductory and concluding chapter are rational choice, comparative institutionalism, and new institutionalism (the latter has two subvariants: transaction costs and institutional design). The theoretical perspectives are apparently not equally useful across questions, as new institutionalism is not used to deduce hypotheses on why politicians would choose to reform, and rational choice is not applied to the reasons some some institutional changes are chosen over others.

Devoting two chapters to each national case, Grindle marshals a variety of materials about how politicians and groups in civil society justified their positions regarding the need for and content of political reform. In Venezuela the decision was made to elect directly state governors (previously presidential appointees) and mayors (an office that had not existed previously). In Bolivia the Popular Participation Law made it more difficult for national officials to rely on patronage, and it formally recognized the citizenship and participation claims of the large ethnic population. In Argentina the government of Buenos Aires, where 10% of the population lives, was granted greater political autonomy, including increased control over its own financial resources and the direct election of its executive (previously a presidential appointee). To assess the consequences of reform, the author draws on the opinions of those involved and traces trends in partisan identification, voter turnout, and parties' electoral support. In addition to a brief summing up at the end of each case-oriented chapter. she provides a concluding chapter that explicitly returns to the hypotheses deduced at the beginning of the book.

Given the complexity of the issues, the research design employed, and the unwieldy nature of several key concepts, it is inherently difficult to make compelling statements about whether support was found for a particular theoretical approach. Regarding the motivation for reform, Grindle interprets politicians' willingness to decentralize in an effort to recoup legitimacy as support for a rational choice approach. The lack of mobilized groups who champion the cause of decentralization undercuts the usefulness of comparative institutionalism as an approach. A related lack of overt conflict among organized factions regarding the content of reform signals a lack of support for the comparative institutional approach in relationship to Grindle's second question. Instead, the relatively consensual design of reforms by specialists who are motivated by explicit critiques of existing institutions is taken as support for the transaction costs and principalagent variants of new institutionalism. Grindle concludes that politicians and parties did alter their behavior in predictable ways after the reforms, which supports both rational choice and comparative institutional approaches. The case studies yield mixed results regarding support for both variants of new institutionalism because transaction costs and principalagents issues vary across actors—some benefited from reforms, and others found politics more difficult.

Readers interested in decentralization and its contribution to the further democratization of already democratic regimes will find empirical details of great interest here. The case studies provide insights into the motivations of several types of actors. Although never formally conceptualized, the arenas through which they come into contact (the previously existing institutional designs) are covered in some detail. Grindle points out that history, including previous institutions, helps explain the problems that provoke reform and the diagnosis of those problems but not the content or timing of reform. One wonders whether a pattern would emerge with the coverage of more cases, more explicit conceptualization of the (historical) institutional features hypothesized to influence the content of reform, or consideration of additional types of democratizing reform (e.g., electoral reform at the national level). Grindle's point about the inability to explain the timing of reform seems particularly troublesome for comparative (historical) institutional approaches. Recent literature on path dependency and critical junctures is not get reviewed in Audacious Reforms, but the author's conclusion that we cannot systematically explain the timing of institutional change defines a challenge for institutionalists of all stripes.

Another challenge to scholars emerges through Grindle's accentuation of "leadership" as key to explaining many outcomes. For example, politicians decided to decentralize despite the lack of focused pressure from below to do so, and specialists played a key role in determining the content of reforms. How does "leadership" fit into the theoretical perspectives tested in this book? Grindle notes that comparative institutionalism might provide the most promise in this regard, leading one to wonder whether there is a relationship between leadership as used here and preference formation as discussed in much of the literature on institutions. Attention to preference formation is supposed to be a relatively strong suit of historical approaches, and it may be that the stress on leadership is nothing more than recognition of the importance of preference formation in a different guise. Yet, the seeming importance of creative leaders may simply be an artifact of the research design. In the book, the dependent variable, the adoption of decentralizing reforms, is held constant. If it were allowed to vary, we might find equally creative leaders in other countries who did not choose to pursue decentralizing reforms or who preferred to do so but failed

In sum, Audacious Reforms takes on an important topic and assembles a rich array of case materials. Those with an interest in decentralization or politics in Venezuela, Bolivia, and Argentina will undoubtedly find this a rewarding book. Both explicitly and implicitly, the book is very thought provoking on larger theoretical concerns that will be of interest to a wider readership.

Democracy and the Media: A Comparative Perspective. Edited by Richard Gunther and Anthony Mughan. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000. 496p. $85.00 cloth, $29.95 paper.

Media and the Presidentialization of Parliamentary Elections. By Anthony Mughan. New York: Palgrave, 2000. 179p. $65.00.

Margaret Scammell, London School of Economics

The themes of crisis and transformation have fueled a miniexplosion of research on media and democracy in the last decade. Researchers within or close to the "media studies" school have developed a burgeoning literature on questions of citizenship and the public sphere, in the context of deregulation, expanding media markets, and rising interest in the arguments of the deliberative democrats. Scholars more closely connected to political science have pursued an overlapping but different agenda. From the United States and western Europe, amid concern at signs of a crisis of citizen engagement, the focus increasingly is on media power to mobilize or demobilize voters. From Eastern and central Europe and Latin America there is an emerging corpus on the role of media in the transition and consolidation of democracy. Cross-cutting these various strands are the Internet revolution and the question of globalization and, more specifically, U.S. potency to lead or at least predict trends in political communication for the democratic world.

Mughan and Gunther's edited collection is a substantial contribution to these more identifiably political science themes. With the one notable, if understandable, absence of the Internet, the book brings together admirably the concerns of established and establishing democracies. A strong cast of scholars analyzes the contemporary contribution of media to democracy in 10 countries: the United States (Thomas Patterson), Japan (Ellis Krauss), the United Kingdom (Holli Semetko), Germany (Max Kaase), The Netherlands (Cees van der Eijk), Spain (Gunther et al.), Italy (Carlo Marletti and Franca Roncarolo), Russia (Ellen Mickiewicz), Hungary (Miklós Sükösd), and Chile (Eugenio Tironi and Guillermo Sunkel). The various individual parts are knitted together by Mughan and Gunther's introductory and concluding chapters. They establish the organizing principle, which is to combine micro-level analysis of media impact in specific circumstances and elections with a macro focus on media systems and their inferences for the distribution of power.

Comparative volumes usually work best when a clear overarching hypothesis is tested against the experience of the individual cases (for example, David L. Swanson and Paolo Mancini. Politics, Media and Modern Democracy, 1996). This book is not so tightly connected. Its research question is more open-ended and descriptive. It says, in effect, let us bring together macro and micro evidence in key countries and then assess it for patterns in media environments and the democratic character of political regimes. This approach pays some dividends. The chapters on the newer democracies, Russia, Hungary, Chile, and Spain, are especially fascinating reading. This is less because they tell us things we did not know-research on these countries is fairly readily available elsewhere—but because they are brought together, side by side, and amount to a riveting account of the importance of media in high politics. Clear cross-country patterns do emerge in totalitarian and authoritarian control over press and television and, equally, the crucial role of media in every case to the progress of democratization. Anyone who doubts the political importance of the media would do well to read these chapters and, indeed, the ones on Italy and Berluconi's adventures and van der Eijk's provocative account of the media's leading role in the depillarization of Dutch society.

The appeal of this book rests precisely in the quality of some of its individual chapters. Equally, the chapters that work best are those rooted most firmly in politics, especially the politics of transformation. This is not quite the same thing as saying that the political impact of the media is most interesting in those countries with the most intriguing politics, although that is a tempting conclusion. Rather, it is to say that the macro-level analysis of politics and media is the most valuable contribution of this work. The idea of micro-level analysis was a useful one in theory. It is instructive to know the state of media effects research in the various countries and the consensus verdicts about their impact on public opinion and elections at key times. However, this was generally the most variable and least satisfactory contribution of the countryspecific chapters. Methodological approaches to the micro either were simply not comparable from country to country, or were not well elaborated, or were indeed detailed but too time-specific to add greatly to general arguments. Despite this, the editors' conclusion makes strong, too strong, claims for the direct impact of media in individual elections and, more broadly, for the "socializing" effects of media in central European countries. To take one example, it is simply not proven, or capable of proof from the evidence as presented here, that continued support for socialism in central Europe was the direct consequence of "four decades of government censorship and propaganda." Direct media effects are notoriously difficult to prove beyond doubt, and the editors simply did not need to overegg the evidence of their authors: There is abundant material here anyway for the political impact of the media.

One would not wish to quibble too much with editors, given the sheer amount of the work in this book and the general value of its contribution. Yet one cannot help being struck by the irony of some of their U.S.-centric assumptions, given the internationally collaborative nature of the work. One such example is their major conclusion, which is to challenge the "conventional wisdom" that the freer the media are from government, the stronger the contribution to democracy. This may be the conventional wisdom in the United States, although they offer few references in support of it. However, it is simply not the conventional wisdom in Europe, where for more than 10 years media researchers have sought to protect key elements of public service systems precisely in the interests of a democratic public sphere. The free market/democratic media equation just does not hold as strongly in Europe. In fact, the editors unwittingly admit as much with their comment that European Union commitment to public service systems suggests that it is unlikely that many democracies will copy the U.S. system. A second example is their introductory comment contrasting the current wave of pessimism about media performance with earlier decades of apparent contentment. Again, this simply ignores the European critical tradition, the Frankfurt School, and the critique of sociology-grounded media studies. With these caveats, the editors deserve congratulations for a volume that is a sure-fire certainty on all political communication reading lists.

Mughan's solo book, The Presidentialization of Parliamentary Elections, is, in contrast, far less grand in its ambition. It is a careful and rigorous study of the theme for which he is most familiar in Europe, the trend toward "presidentialization" of parliamentary politics. He confines the study to Britain, which, he argues reasonably, is a fair test-bed. If the proposition is that presidentialism is a broad phenomenon of democratic politics, it should certainly be apparent in Britain, with its strong majoritarian electoral system. A key contribution of this work is Mughan's attempt to define the phenomenon of "presidentialism" and "presidentialization" and, more importantly, to deconstruct it into testable elements. Presidentialization is defined as a movement over time away from a system of collective to one of personalized government, within the parameters of an unchanging constitution. He tests two aspects of this. First, presentation: Has there been a move from predominantly party- to predominantly leader-focused presentation? Second, are leader effects becoming more influential on voting decisions? This is a helpful approach to a subject that is as ubiquitous as it is vague in the political communications literature. Personalization, we are told endlessly, is a defining feature of modern democratic politics. Rarely, though, are the core concepts defined and, even more rarely, carefully tested against empirical evidence. So in this sense Mughan's book is a welcome addition.

Beyond that, though, it is slightly disappointing. Mughan's test of personalization of presentation comprises primarily content analysis of Times editorials in election campaigns since the 1950s and Gallup opinion polls conducted for newspapers. There are two main difficulties with these data: one admitted, one not. The first is that since the Gallup surveys do not include a measure of party identification, there is no way of disentangling party and leader preferences. The second is the use of Times leaders as a proxy for party campaigns. It is neither uncommon nor unreasonable to suggest that campaigns have become more leader-centered, but it is not verifiable or otherwise from these data. One is left wondering quite what Mughan's content analysis adds to the existing body of research, which does indeed demonstrate increasing media attention over time to leaders. He concludes that there is a trend toward presidentialization consistent with the "threshold" model, that is, a substantial increase in personalization at threshold elections, followed by fluctuations, which never return to the prethreshold lows. However, beneath the claim for the trend, Mughan's conclusions are modest and predictable from preexisting studies: Leadership is still far less important than party and probably sufficient to swing results only in exceptionally tight contests. This is solid stuff from Mughan, but aside from his opening discussion of the core concepts, it is more safe than exciting.

Constructing Sustainable Development. By Neil E. Harrison. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000. 175p. $54.50 cloth, $17.95 paper.

Rodger A. Payne, University of Louisville

Nearly 15 years has elapsed since the World Commission on Environment and Development—the so-called Brundt-land Commission—popularized the idea of "sustainable development." The phrase turned out to be unusually slippery, providing both political cover and ammunition for almost anyone engaged in debates about the global environment and/or development. Indeed, scholars and policymakers of all theoretical or ideological stripes found creative ways to employ the phrase "sustainable development" to support a wide array of arguments in these discussions.

Neil Harrison has written a clear and concise book that addresses important questions related to the ambiguous and multiple meanings. He analyzes, in the postmodern tradition, three dominant, yet often conflicting, policy narratives of sustainable development. These are efficiency, equity, and ethics. For each narrative, Harrison explains and evaluates the premises and arguments borrowed from various social, economic, or political theories. Then, over the course of five short chapters, he highlights logical inconsistencies that make viable policy goals literally impossible to achieve. The author reveals the conceit often hidden in these narratives and, in turn, promotes greater humility. His arguments are sharp, but his purpose is not mere deconstruction. In fact, Harrison often notes the elements of a narrative that might be made to work and that should be preserved in some fashion.

Still, Harrison concludes quite forcefully that "sustainable development is a Holy Grail that does not exist. It is a legend, a myth.... [The term] cannot be objectively defined, cannot be known" (p. 99). So what would people have to do to make development sustainable, which is the goal the author establishes on the book's first page (p. vii)? The answer is certainly not found in traditional literatures on economics, politics, or environmental ethics. The chapters on efficiency, for example, describe and critique biases in the neoclassical vision of the market and then dissect alleged technological fixes, which are not likely to be developed in the current political-economic context. The chapters on equity likewise explain why neither redistribution of wealth nor international cooperation is about to occur. Finally, Harrison demonstrates that no society can embrace ecologically ethical policies without first embracing environmental ideals. This presents a bootstrapping dilemma, since ideas cannot be changed absent education policies that promote ecology.

Harrison offers his own recommendations in the final chapter. He borrows from the postmodern tradition to find metanarratives that might be able to transcend barriers across the political, economic, and social divides he has identified (p. 101). From this perspective, the author derives a need for a far more participatory politics and an ecological view of science that values flexibility and adaptability. Data need to be accumulated, and education promoted, he asserts, so as to match the most appropriate policy initiatives to local needs. Perhaps most controversially, Harrison wants sustainable development to be "the central concern of political discourse" (p. 118).

If most of these prescriptions seem somewhat vague and (at least to the informed reader) mundane, Harrison is unapologetic. On the last page, he returns to an earlier admonition (Chapter 2) that policies supporting sustainable development (or virtually any policy goal) "are always stabs in the dark, best guesses in an uncertain world" (p. 118). Harrison's broad challenge to "rational" economics, science, and policymaking, however, might tempt readers to question whether his preferred choices are better than those he critiques. After all, the author warns that sustainable development seems to be "the ultimate 'postmodern' issue" and "can be interpreted to support any agenda, or objective" (p. 102).

Consider Harrison's plea for education. While the author means his claims to be taken differently, it is difficult to imagine that college administrators will be persuaded to build their general education or liberal arts curriculums around the idea of sustainable development precisely "because it can mean everything to everybody" (p. 118). Harrison stresses that education should be sensitive to ambiguity and that teachers should take diverse perspectives into account when considering something as elusive as sustainable development. In practice, however, his warnings literally seem to imply that nothing is valid and that everything is valid.

Why should an idea like the precautionary principle (pp. 16, 111), for example, presumptively favor environmental goals? A probusiness advocate might argue that caution demands favoring jobs and economic well-being over "risky" policies to defend the environment. During the Cold War, "worst-case planning" meant spending hundreds of billions of dollars on nuclear weapons to promote "security." No one should assume that environmental goals would come out on top if the most basic societal goals started to be compared. Harrison's argument for community and participatory politics could even subvert environmental objectives. In actual debates about forest policies, loggers of the U.S. Pacific Northwest apparently prefer to retain their jobs to the preservation of owl habitats.

Anyone who has perused the right's antienvironmental literature (e.g., see Ronald Bailey, Eco-Scam, 1993), quickly learns how postmodern insights and arguments can be turned against environmentalists. Scientists have often been wrong about past warnings of ecological or resource collapse, the skeptics assert, so why should anyone make costly policies based upon their latest warnings about global warming? The problem is magnified when a scientist or two challenges the environmental views.

Postmodernists, ironically, might fault Harrison for failing to embrace their project more fully. He acknowledges that his "approach is not specifically postmodern" (p. 112) and at times he seems to favor the employment of both material and instrumental measures. For instance, he advocates substantial increases in aid to poor countries, which would essentially bribe them to support sustainable development. He also supports higher taxes on consumption to influence consumer demand for resources. Yet material levers distort dialogue and would not necessarily promote an ecological mindset.

Harrison's book seems most useful for educators who teach undergraduate or master's-level courses about the environment. Students would benefit from the author's succinct and lucid critique of prevailing economic, political, and ethical theories and from his application of postmodern theorizing. No doubt, Harrison's arguments would provoke interesting and useful classroom exchanges.

Eroding Military Influence in Brazil: Politicians Against Soldiers. By Wendy Hunter. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997. 243p. $45.00 cloth, $19.95 paper.

Craig Arceneaux, California Polytechnic State University

Writing at a time when the literature on transitions to democracy was fixated on the mode of transition, and when concepts such as authoritarian legacy, authoritarian enclave, or the shadow of the past dominated, Wendy Hunter's 1997 book, Eroding Military Influence in Brazil, went against the grain. In a direct attack on institutionalist approaches that emphasized the resiliency of military prerogatives in transitions from military regimes, Hunter argues that democracy itself would, over time, reduce the influence exerted by the armed forces. A solid theoretical orientation, rich casework, and insightful commentary on the dynamics behind the creation of civilian control all mark the book as a noteworthy contribution to the literature on democratic transitions, civil—military relations, and Latin American politics.

Guided by a rational choice perspective, Hunter argues that elected politicians answer first and foremost to their own immediate self-interests. Their aspirations directly impinge on the armed forces insofar as the retention of military prerogatives hinders the capacity of politicians to cater to the demands of the electorate and secure patronage to aid their future careers. Brazil is viewed as an exceptional case study because of the control exerted by the military during the democratic transition. Insofar as the military used its control to instill its advantages into political institutions, Hunter has a case that allows a test of her theory against that of historical institutional approaches, which hold a higher expectation of institutional resiliency. Hunter views institutions as the product of existing political desires and conflicts, while the institutionalist approach argues that institutions are not so malleable and, in fact, produce expectations, desires, and conflict independent of the interests and interactions of current actors.

The subtitle of the book, Politicians Against Soldiers, in fact obscures a more complex approach which recognizes the different pressures faced by executives, on one hand, and legislators, on the other. Both presidents and legislators can be threatened by military bullying, but legislators face a collective action problem that prevents them from feeding military desires to offset the threat-insofar as a response to the military demands a reduction in patronage resources, one legislator cannot be certain that his colleagues will follow. Hence, during times of crisis, only presidents answer to military intimidation. The second difference is the types of goals pursued by executives and legislators. Particularistic goals refer to the patronage distributed by officials to garner support from specific groups, while programmatic goals are those that cater more to the interests and principles of society as a whole. Both goals are important to politicians in a general sense, but smaller, regional constituencies lead legislators to be more concerned with particularistic goals, while presidents are more attuned to programmatic goals.

To illustrate the expression of legislative particularistic aspirations, Hunter devotes a chapter to budgetary politics and argues that the draw to patronage leads policymakers to withdraw funds previously devoted to military spending, although military pressure on the executive can offset some of this decrease. In another chapter, she uses advances in labor policy to illustrate the pursuit of programmatic goals by both legislators and presidents. The third case is devoted to Amazon policy. The immediate connection to democracy is not very clear in this third case. Changes in land-use policies and concessions to indigenous groups did infringe on military security interests, but pressure to do so came not from the Brazilian public but, rather, from international organizations, NGOs, and foreign governments.

While the discussion of eroding military influence distinguishes the book in a literature which largely thought otherwise, Hunter is not naively optimistic. In the conclusion, she recognizes that civilian control involves not only the reduction of military power, but also the establishment of mechanisms of civilian control such as greater civilian input in defense issues, education and training, the military justice system, and other areas that do not conflict with politicians' quest for patronage resources and, in fact, often entail greater costs than benefits. Civilian supremacy demands not only the destruction of military influence, but also the construction of civilian oversight, and democracy does more to contribute to the former. Indeed, insofar as the short-sighted interests of politicians prevail, democracy may actually hinder civilian supremacy. This allows her theory to be more dynamic and to account not only for eroding military influence, but also reversals in democracy. Some comparisons to other South American cases are used to illustrate the applicability of the theory.

While the focus on democracy itself is interesting, and an important contribution, one cannot help but recognize that other, perhaps more important, factors are at work in the Brazilian case and elsewhere. In particular, Hunter seems too quick to dismiss the role of institutions in her effort to distinguish her rational choice approach from historical institutionalism. The Brazilian case was a controlled transition, but military prerogatives were not as institutionalized as in, for example, the Chilean case. Hunter herself notes that the armed forces very often expressed their interests through "entendimentos" (understandings) rather than codifying them into institutions, and this makes the case less of a "most likely" scenario for historical institutionalism. Indeed, institutions are largely responsible for the democratic dynamic in Brazil: Intense electoral competition is closely tied to Brazilian electoral rules (e.g., open lists, liberal state funding, ease of party creation); the lack of legislative influence over the placement of military bases and the insularity of defense production from civilian producers both remove areas that might typically tie military interests to legislative electoral interests; the 1988 constitutional changes gave the legislature more control over the budget; and the ruling that congress must work within the budgetary level set by the president constructs a zero-sum game between legislator and military budgetary interests. One need look no farther than the United States for evidence that congressional and military interests can coexist. Democracy comes in many forms, and its institutional configuration does more to set the battlefield for civilmilitary interaction than do individual interests. The indeterminacy of individual interests can be teased out of Hunter's theoretical discussion when she notes that presidents have the capacity to exert civilian control but lack the incentive (due to the greater fear of a military reprisal), and legislators have the incentive but lack the capacity (due to the collective action problem). How do we get from here to there? The answer rests at a higher level, within institutions, which rational choice approaches too easily dismiss as simple reflections of individual interest. Indeed, if institutions were so malleable and so directly reflective of rational individual interests, we would expect Brazilian politicians, who hold traditionally poor records of reelection, to concentrate first and foremost on creating an electoral regime to better secure their futures.

The second factor that would contribute to a better understanding of civilian empowerment after transition would be the military itself. The Latin American military has changed dramatically since the transitions to democracy—the post-Cold War world calls for new roles and missions, foreign actors scrutinize their actions as never before, and time itself under democracy has allowed the military to alleviate some of its traditional mistrust of politicians. Changes in military perceptions, beliefs, and attitudes have led the armed forces to be more open to civilian calls for reform in some areas. Tips in the civil—military balance are thus the result of not only civilian pushes, but also rethinking and acceptance on the part of the military—in some policy areas more than others, and in some countries more than others.

Eroding Military Influence forces scholars of democratic transition and civil-military relations to consider seriously democracy itself as an influential factor. Further research would do well to heed this advice, as well as to recognize the roles that institutions and the military itself play.

Policy, Office or Votes? How Political Parties in Western Europe Make Hard Decisions. Edited by Wolfgang C. Müller and Kaare Strøm. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999. 319p. $59.95 cloth, $21.95 paper.

Michael Laver, Trinity College Dublin

This book is about the motivations of political actors. Many of the most commonly used models of party competition and government formation are grounded in explicit assumptions about the motivations of party strategists. These tend to assume one of three basic and interrelated motivations—the desire to fulfill policy objectives, the desire to control the perquisites of office, and the desire to maximize votes. While recognizing that living and breathing people may be driven by any or all of these motivations, among others, and that these may interact with each other in complex ways, most theorists ground their models in assumptions of policy-seeking OR office-seeking OR vote-maximizing by key political decision makers. Indeed this distinction between motivational assumptions is one of the most common ways to classify models of party competition. In part the grounding of models in a single motivational assumption is for the sake of analytical tractability; in part it is because the heuristic insights made possible by these approaches are enhanced if the models are kept simple and their relationship to core assumptions is kept straightforward.

The publication of Müller and Strøm's edited volume is timely because there has been a growing feeling in the literature that the time has come to move on. It has always been the case that, when analysts have applied formal models to realworld examples, they have explained anomalies by acknowledging motivations that go beyond those in their models. Thus the refusal of Communist or Green parties to converge on the center ground may be excused in vote-maximizing models of party competition on the ground that they are policy seekers. The willingness of ideological strange bedfellows to get into coalitions with each other may be explained in policy-driven models of government formation by the assertion that these particular parties care much more about getting into office than about enacting their policy program. Increasingly, these observations are leading theorists to try constructing models in which politicians have multiple motivations, which they must typically trade off against each other when making hard choices.

It is one thing to write down a model containing such trade-offs. It is quite another to apply it to the real world, an exercise that requires the analyst to provide at least a ballpark estimate about how a particular politician might trade off such-and-such a probability to getting into office against such-and-such a dilution of fundamental policy objectives. If my model tells me that you can increase your probability of being in government by 40% if you drop your long-standing policy objective of nationalizing the commanding heights of the economy, how do I know a priori whether or not you will do it? I need some realistic information about how you trade off office and policy motivations.

Müller and Strøm have provided us with the first booklength empirical study of precisely this problem. Essentially it is an edited collection of thickly descriptive case studies, topped and tailed by general chapters by the editors in reviews that are sensitive to a range of the theoretical implications of this material. They set the scene in an opening chapter that does not contain a model or even a typology of trade-offs and hard choices, but that sets out to clear away some of the conceptual underbrush entangling these—a task that necessarily precedes the construction of such a model. We then have 10 case studies written carefully by well-established experts in their fields. Each of these takes a particular set of hard-choice trade-offs in a particular country, providing a detailed post hoc interpretation of this. The countries covered, in chapter order, are Ireland, Denmark, Spain, The Netherlands, Italy, Austria, Norway, Germany, Sweden, and France. This book was a long time in the making and the case studies are not wildly up-to-date, but that is not the point in this instance. What the case studies do is use a lens fashioned by the editors to throw serious light, pretty much for the first time, on the real-world trade-offs and hard choices that will be of critical importance to theorists who want to construct improved models of party competition based on more complex sets of motivational assumptions.

There is no space here to go into detail on the substance of each case study, but it should be said that the authors of the case studies have a sure touch with the detail of their material that should inspire confidence in those who might wish to build on these foundations. The main virtues of this book are thus the astute way in which the editors have identified a theoretically important matter that requires a preliminary empirical survey and the professionalism with which the authors of the case studies have set about their tasks. This is thus essential reading for those who have ambitions to build more complex models of party competition. It is also an attractive supplementary text for those teaching courses on party competition.

Shades of Citizenship: Race and the Census in Modern Politics. By Melissa Nobles. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 2000. 248p. $49.50 cloth, $16.95 paper.

Howard Winant, Temple University

A thoughtful book on a subject that can be quite vexing, Shades of Citizenship benefits greatly from the comparative analytical framework employed. The central poles of comparative attention are the U.S. and Brazilian censuses, but Nobles also comments on a range of other national processes of census-taking and systems of racial classification employed; Germany and South Africa as well as other Latin American, African, and European countries are mentioned.

Censuses are treated as political in a dual sense. The obvious political logic of population enumeration is state centered: The census is a central instrument in the administration and organization of the nation/polity/society. It is a crucial tool of governmentality, which has all sorts of implications. The second political meaning is civil society based. In recent times the census has often been seen by groups as a vehicle for recognition; indeed, it has been viewed as a logical target of political mobilization by those excluded from the full benefits of citizenship or by those experiencing discrimination. Looking at censuses both in the United States and Brazil, and considering census politics both from the state and the civil society vantage points, Nobles develops a sophisticated comparative approach to this complex topic.

Race quickly becomes the touchstone of debates, the key issue, when we examine census politics. Why is that? Why are not classifications of social stratification/class, occupation, even education or health the central themes? The answer lies in the fundamental character of racial classification in many societies (certainly in the United States and Brazil), the relatively intractable and ineluctable nature of racial identity, and the relationship, which is deeply rooted in national (and global) histories, between race and citizenship. To study census politics is in a fundamental way to study racial politics.

That is the overall rationale for this book, summarized here but well articulated by Nobles. The rationale is particularly important because the chief concerns of the project might easily be relegated to technical realms, might easily be dismissed, if the census were viewed as "simply" a means of information gathering. This is how many demographers would view the book, for example. But Nobles is explicit about framing her concerns differently, and that is the point of the extensive introductory chapter.

The fundamental concerns of the book are the historical evolution and fairly explicit racialism of the U.S. and Brazilian censuses as well as the way recent conflicts about and changes in procedures reflect those issues. Considerable attention is paid to state-centered political logic in framing and carrying out censuses. The author's crucial point is that strategies to demarcate racial categories and then locate populations in terms of them not only classify and measure, are not only investigative, but also are constructionist in both a social and political sense. This constructionism goes beyond the responsibility to create categories for empirical enumeration and analysis. It extends to the role of the state in "making" society or in this case race. This claim has large theoretical implications in many areas because it involves a certain view of racial formation; a political sociology, particularly of race and citizenship; and the historical treatment of ideas about race, a sort of sociology of racial knowledge or history of racial ideas. All this is presented with respect to the evolving census apparatus and practices in the two countries, from slavery to contemporary debates. I both commend the empirical work of Nobles and question the theoretical limits of the text. Although she offers a solidly grounded historical account of the evolution of census policy in both countries, there is very little interpretation. Yet, Nobles does signal her awareness of most of the interpretive questions I am raising, and she focuses her analysis on the question that most interests her: political struggles over racial meanings.

The key contemporary chapters present accounts of census-oriented popular campaigns in each country. In the United States the issue was framed (in the 1980s) around a "mixed-race category" and a proposal by the Office of Management and Budget (Statistical Directive No. 15) to incorporate such a category in the 1990 Census. In Brazil the issue was framed (in 1990–91) around "lightening" or "whitening": There was a limited but real effort on the part of a coalition of black groups to convince people to report their race "accurately," that is, not to pass for white. In each case nonwhite organizations demonstrated a much greater awareness of the political significance of census classification than ever before. As Nobles notes, the fact that these two campigns emerged and prefigured future conflicts is itself a reflection of the changing dynamics of racial politics in the two countries.

In my view the situation was considerably more politicized in the United States than in Brazil: The U.S. civil rights movement and its legacy had no real equivalent in Brazil, and the Brazilian military regime eliminated race-focused questions from the 1970 and 1980 censuses (except for a limited house-hold study). Thus, the reinstitution of race in the 1990 (or 1991, as it worked out) Brazilian count posed far more basic questions about race than existed in the United States. The comparative logic is limited as far as the details of the two campaigns are concerned. The chapter on the campaigns would have benefited from a more conceptual or more theoretically nuanced focus, which would have made the different political contexts more central. Despite this objection, Nobles's central concern—grassroots campaigns against the top-down politics of the census as framed by the state—is well addressed.

Although the book's conclusion is very solid, I want more. Nobles focuses on the (in)effectiveness of the census in capturing the meaning of race and its occlusion of, or even collusion in, the fundamental political questions that are the core of what race means, of its social-historical significance and so on. This she brings out very well, linking these themes to such issues as official classifications of race and methods of enumeration. That is very valuable. What I would like is a larger set of theoretical points about how and why these two states are constructing race in a certain way, about how racially defined minority movements understand these processes (and race itself) differently, and what this indicates for the comparative state of racial politics in the two countries. But that is a tall order. Notwithstanding these small criticisms, Shades of Citizenship is a very valuable, well-conceived, and well-researched work. It is important in several respects: as a study of racial politics (particularly on a comparative level), as an historical treatment of issues of race and citizenship, and as a contribution to our understanding of the census.

A Virtuous Circle: Political Communications in Postindustrial Societies. By Pippa Norris. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000. 398p. $59.95 cloth, $21.95 paper.

Stephanie Greco Larson, Dickinson College

Scholars of media and public opinion in Western Europe and the United States will find plenty of useful information and much to argue about in A Virtuous Circle. The data are rich and broad, and the conclusions drawn are provocative and relevant to some of the major debates in the field. The central question addressed is whether the news media discourages political engagement.

Pippa Norris challenges the increasingly popular idea that cynical news and passivity of television viewing create a disengaged public. Instead, she characterizes the relationship between news media and political attitudes and actions as a healthy and reciprocal one. This relationship is called a virtuous circle in which "watching the news activates existing predispositions to vote and, simultaneously, the predisposition to vote prompts people to seek out more news" (p. 264). Political interest and knowledge also stimulate attention to news, which results in more interest and knowledge. In addition, people who lack interest give news too little attention or trust to be adversely effected by it. Therefore, the news media is judged to have a positive to benign influence on civic life.

The evidence in support of these claims is cross-national and ample but, as the author admits, falls short of proving causation. Nevertheless, the conclusions resonate with longstanding minimal and conditional consequences theories of media effects and resurrect voting behavior studies that came before The American Voter (1960). The book reminds us that any rush to scapegoat the media not only overlooks other culprits but also ignores much of what we know about attitude change and information processing (e.g., selective perception, reinforcement, and the knowledge gap). Even those who find videomalaise (Michael Robinson, "Public Affairs Television and the Growth of Political Malaise," American Political Science Review 70 [June 1976]: 409-32), The Spiral of Cynicism (Joseph N. Cappella and Kathleen Hall Jamieson, 1997), and the notion that television culture has left Americans bowling alone (Robert Putnam, Bowling Alone, 2000) more compelling than the "virtuous circle" (either rhetorically or substantively) will still need to consider this book's critiques. The comparisons of media systems and public opinion in numerous democratic nations and the close look at the timing of trends in media use and political behavior raise serious concerns about the media malaise thesis.

Another contribution of this book is its careful and comprehensive discussion of how media have changed over time. The five chapters in Part 2 describe trends in political communication and the structural differences in news environments of 29 Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) nations. The complexity of the current communication systems is evidenced by an expansion of news from diverse sources and formats, which makes a broad range of news available to growing audiences. New media supplement old media, rather than replace them. For example, Internet users still read newspapers and watch television. The special attention to the Internet audience (in chap. 2 and 12) raises concerns about how many people are fully engaged in the virtuous circle, since only 4% of Internet users contact groups and officials about politics or have political discussions online (p. 270).

Chapters 7 and 8 will be of particular interest to those who study the media and elections. Norris describes an "evolutionary processes of modernization" (p. 137) in campaign communication that entails three major stages: premodern, modern, and postmodern. This discussion judges the role of the media in contemporary campaigns less harshly than do most critics. "The postmodern campaign can be seen to represent a new openness and tolerance for alternative views and multiple forms of understanding, as well as a source of anxiety and disorientation as the familiar standards are swept away" (p. 178).

In addition to building the virtuous circle argument, chapters 9 and 10 stand alone as a comprehensive study of news coverage and public attitudes about the European Union. The extensive content analyses of 189 newspapers in 15 member states from January 1995 to autumn 1997 and 10,000 hours of television coverage from six countries is impressive and illuminating. It reveals that coverage of the European Union was minimal and focused primarily on monetary policy and development. Overall, the direction of this coverage was moderately anti-Union (especially on television). This tone coincided with a low level of public support for Union membership and the euro.

A Virtuous Circle is likely to stimulate research that supports, expands, and challenges it. More attention needs to be paid to the content and consequences of entertainment media, since this book points out that heightened political participation of television news viewers coincides with lower participation rates among heavy entertainment television viewers. In addition, the one panel survey used in this book suggests more questions than it answers. Therefore, laboratory and social experiments should be conducted to get a better sense of the causal mechanisms at work. Conclusions about how media environments, political institutions, and public opinion interact could also be enriched by studying non-Western nations. The effect of news on civic life in Latin America would be an interesting contrast to Europe, given the author's brief discussion of their media and campaign systems. Finally, some scholars will likely follow the author's advice to look to systemic problems to understand political disengagement. "Blaming the news media is easy, but ultimately that is a deeply conservative strategy, especially in a culture skeptical of regulation of the free press, and it diverts attention from the urgent need for real reforms to democratic institutions, which should have our undivided attention" (p. 319).

Uncivil Movements: The Armed Right Wing and Democracy in Latin America. By Leigh A. Payne. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2000. 328p. $42.50.

Martha Huggins, Union College

Leigh Payne greatly enriches our knowledge of Latin American transitions from authoritarianism to democracy. The Armed Right Wing focuses on the role of violent right-wing groups and government responses to them in three Latin American countries, with application elsewhere. Explaining that uncivil social movements "use political violence . . . to promote exclusionary objectives . . . as a deliberate strategy to eliminate, intimidate, and silence political adversaries" (p. 1), Payne contrasts these movements with "civil" social movements. They employ rule-breaking (and violence) to "expand [rather than curtail] citizen rights and freedoms" (p. 1).

Payne defines uncivil movements in the first chapter and in the second chapter develops her analytical approach. In three following chapters she presents three Latin American "uncivil" right-wing movements: Argentina's promilitary carapintada after the "Dirty War"; the powerful Brazilian landowners' Rural Democratic Union (UDR); and the Contra movement in Nicaragua after the civil war. This ambitious research project, which involved open-ended interviews and secondary research in three countries and three languages, uses carefully crafted structured-focused comparisons to explain the emergence, evolution, and demise of uncivil social movements.

Payne makes six central claims. Uncivil movements are a unique blend of civil-institutional and uncivil-mobilization politics. Political threats are necessary but not sufficient for the emergence and growth of uncivil movements. Leaders "sell" perceived political threats to potential members by using culturally available myths and images. Uncivil movements' inherent contradictions weaken them over time, but not before they have negatively affected the democratic process. Democratic governments can exacerbate or lessen these movements' negative effect. Uncivil movements can emerge in "consolidated" and transitional democracies.

Payne's discussion of the difficult ethical, personal safety, and methodological problems faced by scholars who study secrecy and danger resonate with two recently completed projects of my own. How does one conduct research when groups' activities are either totally or partially clandestine? How does one obtain a satisfactory sample of respondents when informants' names are difficult to uncover? To address these problems, Payne started with each uncivil movement's most visible leaders and used their trust to obtain interviews with others.

Once interviewees were identified, nagging ethical questions emerged: How does one strike a balance among protecting anonymity, disclosing illegal and/or human rights violations, and protecting one's own personal safety? Payne's solution was to disclose only the names of already well-known movement leaders—even though the possible cost was (and is) violence against her—and withhold the names of less powerful voices associated with or outside the movement. Anyone interested in social science research methods, especially the problems associated with interviewing powerful or not-so-powerful violence supporters and perpetrators, should read Payne's fascinating explanation of her research methods.

The author skillfully incorporates into each case analysis a wealth of synthesized political science, sociological, and social-psychological thinking on social movements, and she rigorously weaves social movement variables into each case analysis. Payne astutely incorporates and revises political science institutionalization and social group mobilization theories to bring out their policy implications for a government's handling of uncivil social movements.

Consider, for example, how Payne weaves interview data into social movement theory in her analysis of how uncivil movements develop political power. They grow by leaders "framing" and "cueing up" culturally resonant images to support their activities and by creating "legitimizing myths" and selling these to their publics. How this process unfolds and whether it uses sufficient culturally viable images in part shape the success or failure of an uncivil movement. Payne, for example, illustrates how Argentina's carapintada military officers and Brazil's landowner association successfully promoted their power by drawing both on older autochthonous cultural cues and by developing new ones. In contrast, she argues, the 1990s Nicaraguan Contras were unsuccessful as an uncivil social movement precisely because they were unable to frame their movement as distinct from, superior to, and more legitimate than other political groups.

A particular challenge for the leaders of uncivil social movements is to expand the appeal beyond the hardliners who make up the movement's core. Payne finds that an "entrepreneurial" charismatic figure is required to manage the process. A new framing and operational style develops out of these conflicts and adjustments.

For example, in order to convince "pragmatists," which uncivil movements need in order to grow, that the movement is legitimate, the charismatic entrepreneur must present himself as different from the movement's earlier authoritarian leaders. The fact that these new leaders—urban, educated, and urbane—are in fact different from their predecessors is not enough. Leaders have to "frame" and "cue up" the movement's new persona: Argentina's carapintada needed to be seen as not self-serving, ruthless military caudillos; Brazil's UDN could not be merely a reincarnation of the older rustic and uneducated landowner coroneis; Nicaragua's new Contra leaders were not merely brutal "Somosista" National Guardsmen. How and to what extent these changes are "sold" to pragmatists and a wider public will shape the course and operational success of each uncivil movement.

Factors inherent to these movements can promote or undermine them. If the goals are highly specific, then achieving success puts the movement out of a job. The original leader's charisma poses a destabilizing succession problem. The personal ambitions of these charismatic leaders often make them easy prey to those in government who subscribe to institution-building theories about democratically shaping and incorporating uncivil movements. Yet, political institution theorists will discover from Payne that incorporating these leaders or their agendas into democratic institutions can backfire: Lending them power and legitimacy disguises their violence, builds membership, and fosters their goals.

Payne recognizes the importance of timing: President Alfonsin of Argentina may have moved too soon and too strongly against the military. "Without the [military] trials the carapintada would not have emerged" (p. 97). This created conditions for the attenuated military coups. Governments may enter into negotiation with carefully selected movement factions, but Payne recommends they investigate uncivil movements and prosecute their violence. Transition governments must build up and reform judiciaries.

Payne's term "uncivil movements" should be discussed and debated. Some will ask why she did not use the more traditional designation "counterrevolutionary" in the usual continuum: "conservative," "reformist," and "revolutionary" social movements. Cannot the Contras—"contra" for "counterrevolutionary"—best be described as a counterrevolutionary movement? Is it questionable to define uncivil movements as only right-wing? Have there been un-civil (exclusionist, violent) movements on the Left? Payne would argue that leftist movements struggle for the systemically disadvantaged, whereas uncivil movements protect, foster, or seek to restore the powers of the previously (or currently) advantaged. Every reader will find Payne's definition and designation of uncivil movements theoretically and analytically useful and thought provoking.

Another source of lively debate arises in Payne's last chapter, which compares uncivil movements in Latin America to those in other societies. In particular, she focuses on three consolidated democracies—Le Pen's Front National in France, Meir Kahane's KACH Zionist movement in Israel, and militia movements in the United States—and one in a transitional government, South Africa's AWB Afrikener Resistance Movement. There will be debate and analysis about the movements left out of Payne's "uncivil" categorization.

Payne raises and addresses most questions, however, and just enough in her extraordinary analysis is left unstated to generate new and alternative questions and explanations. The literature on social movements, on politics, and on Latin America is significantly advanced by Payne's careful research and scholarly analysis.

Disaffected Democracies: What's Troubling the Trilateral Countries. Edited by Susan J. Pharr and Robert D. Putnam. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2000. 348p. $65.00 cloth, $19.95 paper.

Markus M. L. Crepaz, University of Georgia

A specter is haunting the Trilateral Democracies—this specter is called civic malaise. It has visited these countries before; rearing its head for the first time a quarter-century ago, proclaiming the demise of democracy due to the inability of governments to respond to the onslaught of waves of new forms of participatory democracy and political action. (Michel Crozier, Samuel P. Huntington, and Joji Watanuki, The Crisis of Democracy: Report on the Governability of Democracies to the Trilateral Commission, 1975). Too much democracy, as it were, may be too much of a good thing. Fortunately many of these dire predictions have not materialized, perhaps partly because they were highlighted a quarter-century ago. The sequel, Disaffected Democracies, celebrates the silver anniversary of the original Crisis of Democracy. This successor volume is similarly concerned with the fate of democracy in rich countries. These democracies are "troubled" (p. 7), so the argument goes, because their public institutions are undermined by declining confidence in government and sagging interpersonal social trust. The authors of this edited volume situate the sources of these "disturbing" (p. 13) developments squarely in the political sphere. In other words, the origins of the decline in confidence in political institutions is not explained by a frail social fabric but, rather, by failures of government and politics themselves. Despite a tight focus on the temporal (the last 25 years) and spatial (the Trilateral countries) parameters of this edited volume, it is refreshing to see so many diverse and innovative diagnoses as to what is ailing the rich democracies.

Of the 13 essays that compose the text (bracketed by a foreword by Samuel Huntington and an afterword by Ralf Dahrendorf), three are single country studies: two on Japan, by Hideo Otake and Susan J. Pharr, and one on the United States, by Anthony King. Even though King's contribution is entitled "Distrust of Government: Explaining American Exceptionalism," what all three of these essays have in common is that they locate the sources of civic erosion firmly in the untrustworthiness of politicians, for once making the United States NOT exceptional. Similarly, Donatella della Porta's three-country comparison of Italy, France, and Germany finds that confidence in government was highest in Germany and lowest in Italy, where the lowest and highest levels of corruption were found, respectively. France took a medium position. The contributions by Alberto Alesina and Romain Wacziarg and by Kenneth Newton and Pippa Norris take a wider view, each looking at a larger number of countries. Both research teams conclude that the culprit of low public confidence may have to be found in the subpar performance of government policies and the institutions designed to implement these policies. The somewhat more "philosophical" contributions by Russell Hardin and Fritz Scharpf speculate on the decreased need for the state in modern societies leading to reduced trust in the state (Hardin) and on the quality of discourse between elites and masses: A more realistic discourse between these groups should prevent wishful thinking and bring the desires of the electorate closer to the actual capacities of governments (Scharpf). Pippa Norris' essay on the effect of watching television on social capital does not unequivocally find that the former undermines the latter, thereby reducing confidence and trust in government. It simply depends on what you watch. Peter Katzenstein looks at the lessons from smaller democracies and finds that neither the end of the Cold War nor internationalization is a valid predictor of the already much less accentuated civic malaise that has befallen the smaller countries of Europe. They are characterized by well-developed welfare states and inclusionary political structures that cushion their citizens from exogenous shocks, with the effect of creating a less polarized society with a citizenry that is not turned off by government.

Just when the reader's sense of impending doom in the rich democracies is becoming unbearable, along come the two essays by Russell Dalton and Sidney Tarrow, both of which put a more cheerful spin on this dire topic. Dalton argues, refreshingly, that value change is an ongoing process, driven by changes in the skills and knowledge of citizens in postmaterial societies, that institutions and political parties are constantly challenged, and that democratic regimes simply must adapt to these processes. For Tarrow, new forms of political activism have arisen, leading to short-lived and shifting coalitions with little likelihood of sustaining high levels of confidence in government.

As this description of the individual essays indicates, there is a rich diversity in explanations regarding the origins of the decline of public trust and confidence in government. This very diversity, however, has the effect of connecting the various essays rather tenuously with one another and, while they are superbly written and argued, encourages even more speculation as to what is actually disquieting the democracies of the world. Perhaps the liberal democracies have advanced "too far," i.e., the toxic mix of radical individualism, hyperconsumerism, and economic individualism makes "public" institutions look anachronistic. Perhaps people today are simply more educated, so they criticize more. Perhaps their lack of trust and confidence in governmental institutions can be interpreted as a maturation process, or a process of emancipation in which citizens take a more alert and cautionary stance against political institutions—indeed if this were the case, there would be no need to be "troubled." Or perhaps the reasons for the civic malaise are to be found in the decreasing capacity of the state to integrate ever more atomized, detached, and fragmented citizens? Is it conceivable that rising inequality, particularly in the United States, is reducing the pool of people who still trust government and have confidence in their political institutions? This book will certainly leave you with a strong desire to explore these fascinating topics further.

However, perhaps the most crucial question of all is, how seriously should we take these observations that seem to show that citizens are upset? With the advantage of hindsight we can say that the original message of Crisis of Democracy was unnecessarily alarmist. The democracies have adapted and become even stronger. Today's concern with the troubled democracies may again turn out to be nothing but a tempest in a teapot, 25 years hence. After getting closer to the substance, we may realize that this specter was nothing but a mirage after all.

The Anatomy of Public Opinion. By Jacob Shamir and Michal Shamir. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2000. 320p. $52.50.

Barry J. Balleck, Georgia Southern University

What is public opinion? In this aptly named book, authors Jacob Shamir and Michal Shamir attempt to address their perceived deficiencies in public opinion research by posing a new theoretical framework for the study of this important subject. Though hundreds of books, articles, and monographs have addressed public opinion, the authors contend that current theories of public opinion are too deterministic and that they fall short of explaining the full range of public opinion possibilities. Existing studies attempt to interpret public opinion on the basis of the observed outcomes—i.e., Why was a particular opinion expressed? What does it mean in the context of the instrument constructed to measure that opinion? The authors believe that to understand public opinion, one must come to understand the role of the information environment in which that opinion is located. In other words, Shamir and Shamir are not interested simply in the static outcomes of public opinion but in the environment in which that opinion is constructed. To this end, they propose a new theoretical construct by which to interpret it.

According to the authors, "Public opinion lies at the juncture of society, communication, and the individual; of the public and the private domains; of civil society and the state; of citizenry and politics; of masses and elites; of social control and rationality; of norms and events" (p. 2). Current theories are inadequate in that they have not captured the various constituent elements of public opinion, particularly the nuances and motivational factors by which public opinion is constructed and maintained. To correct these deficiencies, Shamir and Shamir propose a theory that lies at the confluence of communication, social psychology, social cognition, political science, and political psychology. They base their theory upon four premises.

First, public opinion is a social construct and, as such, is "perceptible, exposed, shared, and relevant to all citizens as well as to government" (p. 3). Public opinion is not static, but rather an "organic entity" which emerges and is continually recreated through societal discussion and debate. Public opinion is the product and reflection of the society in which it is found. However, it also helps to construct society in its continual expression. Public opinion thus maintains a symbiotic relationship with society.

Second, public opinion is multidimensional and cannot be reduced to a single expression. Current theories of public opinion concentrate on measuring attitudes and what these attitudes mean in reference to policy issues and/or political candidates. Such attempts do not assess the values of individuals or society, or the various dimensions that underlie these values. The authors attempt to assess public opinion in all of its facets while recognizing the various guises in which public opinion can manifest itself—i.e., symbolic, verbal, individual, group, electoral, etc.

Third, public opinion is dynamic and evolutionary. Shamir and Shamir contend that there are multifaceted divergences and convergences in public opinion. One such divergence, that of the concept of the "silent majority," is indicative of the discrepancy that exists between the evaluative and the expressed facets of public opinion. By coming to understand the silent majority and if it, in fact, exists, the authors hope to answer the "nagging political and theoretical question" of which public opinion the government should heed in making its policy choices.

Finally, public opinion consists of an "information environment" whose nature must be studied and understood in order to determine the processes that the expression of public opinion will set in motion. Previous studies of public opinion have included little about attitude distributions and the component elements of public opinion. The authors intend to study public opinion not simply from an observational standpoint, or from a point "outside the box," but from an interactive standpoint by climbing into the box and dissecting public opinion and then recombining it through meaningful interpretation.

With these four premises as their theoretical impetus, Shamir and Shamir set out to decipher the information environment in which public opinion is formed. Their task is a formidable one. Indeed, the authors recognize that their study is broad in its scope and that their efforts are but scratching the surface of a full understanding of public opinion. However, they are quite successful in laying the foundation for an interesting and innovative approach to public opinion research.

Using as their case study Israeli public opinion on issues of peace and territories before and during the first Intifada, Shamir and Shamir combine an innovative use of survey instruments and "thinking-aloud protocols" to help decipher the cognitive elements which comprise public opinion. Their research is guided by a rich and detailed survey of public opinion literature, though they rely upon the works of Elizabeth Noelle-Neumann to an unusual degree in their research. Despite their lengthy discussion of such terms as "pluralistic ignorance"—which is the gap between "aggregate distributions of opinion and their perceptions by the public at large" (p. 1), and which comprises the entirety of Chapter 5—the most interesting aspect of the authors' approach to understanding public opinion is their use of "thinking-aloud protocols."

Pioneered by Anders Ericsson and Herbert Simon (Protocol Analysis: Verbal Reports As Data, 1984), thinking-aloud protocols are designed to provide clues to the cognitive processing of individuals as found in their verbal reports. By utilizing the thinking-aloud methodology, Shamir and Shamir provide rich insights into the "information environment" of Israeli public opinion. Indeed, their interpretations of their subjects' responses to questions concerning peace and the return of territories during the Intifada period are crucial to understanding the multidimensional facets which make up the information environment as well as the variability of that environment.

By virtue of their methodology—particularly the thinkingaloud protocols—the authors conclude that estimates of public opinion are an exercise in everyday reasoning—not formal reasoning as evidenced by exercises which measure problemsolving abilities. Thus, people use cognitive shortcuts and heuristics when assessing public opinion, but the process is far from infallible. In fact, citizens still make mistakes in their assessments—such as those manifested by pluralistic ignorance. These mistakes occur because the cognitive shortcomings of individuals do not allow for adequate information processing to take place.

Believing that typical public opinion research has ignored motivations, the authors delve into how citizens construct their opinions, what information they rely upon, and how well they discern the overall environment of public opinion. Thus, a major issue for the authors is the role which values play in the formation and maintenance of attitudes. These values can be assessed in light of the "climate of opinion" which exists in any society. This climate in which the values of the individuals are found is a socially derived phenomenon which is collective and shared. The climate itself is the result of societal processes and interactions, such as those manifested by the direct relations of individuals (one-on-one interactions), small groups, various social networks, and large aggregations of individuals and groups (a community or state). Shamir and Shamir find that individuals base their opinions on their own personal experiences, as well as those of their family, friends, and colleagues and the groups of which they are a part. These findings are interpolated from the thinking-aloud protocols and reinforce the authors' contention that public opinion is not simply a number manifested by a poll or a sampling of attitude distributions. Rather, it is a dynamic phenomenon which is created by the information environment in which it is found, but is also re-created at various times and shapes the opinions of those who find themselves in that information environment.

The Rise of the Agricultural Welfare State: Institutions and Interest Group Power in the United States, France, and Japan. By Adam D. Sheingate. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2001. 279p. $45.00.

Grace Skogstad, University of Toronto

This is a helpful addition to the growing body of historical institutionalist literature that demonstrates the influence of macro- and sectoral-level institutions on policymaking. The central arguments, examined here with regard to agricultural policy, are two. First, institutional relationships among state and nonstate actors may facilitate one policy objective but impede other policy goals. Neither novel nor inconsistent with the literature, this proposition is advanced through elaboration of how various interrelationships between political parties and interest groups shape governments' policy capabilities. Second, Sheingate argues that the American institutional framework of dispersed authority and pluralism does not necessarily render governments incapable or subject to interest group capture. In advancing this proposition, he seeks to put paid to popular depictions of American agrarian politics as constituting iron triangles and all-powerful farm groups.

To elaborate these arguments and demonstrate the particular effects of American institutions on agricultural policymaking, Sheingate adopts a long historical perspective—from the 1860s through the close of the twentieth century—and contrasts developments in U.S. agricultural policy over this period with those in two countries with quite different institutional structures: France and Japan. The first objective is to demonstrate the interrelationships among the respective American and Japanese/French institutional structures of dispersed versus concentrated political authority, pluralist versus corporatist farm group representation, and separated versus aligned political party and farm group relations. The second goal is to show how these institutional relationships have affected governments' abilities to develop the "agricultural welfare state."

Sheingate argues that four phases are common to all three countries and present "a distinct policy task that requires different relations between government and farmers" (p. 21):

the era of promotional policies (1860s to 1910s), market intervention and production controls (1920s to 1940s), a mature subsidy regime (1950s and 1960s), and retrenchment (1970s onward). U.S. institutions, he maintains, facilitated the first and last phases and frustrated the second and third. The policy effects of the French and Japanese institutional frameworks were just the opposite, enabling market intervention and a mature subsidy regime but handicapping retrenchment policies.

This historical and comparative analysis is well executed. Although the national agricultural policy expert is unlikely to learn anything new—the discussion of Japanese and French agricultural policies draws heavily on secondary sources, and English sources alone in the case of Japan—the book makes a contribution by virtue of its historical sweep and the quality of research. Analyses are well documented, with good use of summary tables and figures to capture distinctive expenditure patterns, structural transformations in agriculture, and agricultural representation in national legislatures.

The Rise of the Agricultural Welfare State is not without limitations. In contrast to other historical institutionalists who seek to examine the role of ideas in policy making, as factors in their own right and in interaction with institutions, Sheingate makes no such attempt. The analyses here are resolutely structural, save for an occasional nod to the role of exogenous factors, such as the state of the economy and international developments. The author dismisses the possibility of ideational differences between the U.S. and Japan/France regarding agriculture's contribution to the public good (p. 36), and he makes no effort to examine the role they play in agricultural policy outcomes across the three countries. Institutions bear virtually all the explanatory weight for policy outcomes and government policy capabilities. To carry the burden, they are sometimes miscast (e.g., the relationship between French farm groups and the state is described as more corporatist than the reality of plural and competing farm groups warrants), and their importance is overplayed. An example of the latter is the claim regarding the significance of links between French conservative parties and the dominant farm group. There is evidence that the power of the French farm lobby transcends the ideology of the governing party, which suggests the need for an argument that goes beyond the organizational strength of French farmers and their linkages to political parties. It requires recognition of the role that ideas about the multifunctionality of agriculture play in agrarian politics in France and the European Union more generally.

On occassion, theory-building and empirical data are not fully compatible. Sheingate constructs a careful theoretical argument on how the U.S. institutional framework facilitated retrenchment of agricultural policies whereas the French and Japanese frameworks thwarted it. Retrenchment policies, he argues, require frameworks like the American system that facilitate blame avoidance, venue change, and entrepreneurship. But the argument is problematic empirically, undermined by expenditure data—Sheingate's chief indicator of retrenchment—subsequent to the 1996 agricultural reforms, which demonstrate sharp escalations in government transfers to American farmers. Expenditure data are only a partial measure of a government's capacity to effect radical reforms, and Sheingate's undue reliance on them undermines the strength of his own claims about the policy autonomy afforded governments by the American agricultural institutional framework. To his credit, Sheingate stresses the contingency of radical policy reform in the U.S. institutional framework and the role of exogenous factors, but he remains adamant that interest group "capture" is impossible in this institutional context (p. 239). The reservation of that appellation to state-farm group relations in Japan and France is probably not unwarranted. At least in the instance of Japan, however, it lacks the nuance of a relationship under stress as detailed by Aurelia George Mulgan, a leading authority on Japanese agrarian politics (The Politics of Agriculture in Japan, 2000).

These examples illustrate the book's capacity to provoke. They do not diminish its theoretical and empirical contribution to comparative public policy and to our understanding of the effect of institutions on policymaking and policy reform.

The Politics of Institutional Choice: The Formation of the Russian State Duma. By Steven S. Smith and Thomas F. Remington. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2001. 180p. $42.50 cloth, $16.95 paper.

John Londregan, Princeton University

Politics of Institutional Choice is an important contribution to the literature on legislative institutions. The authors' backgrounds complement each other to good effect. The result is a study that is both conversant with the literature on legislative politics in the United States and Western Europe and solidly grounded in the politics of contemporary Russia. The collapse of the Soviet Union and the adoption of reformed legislative institutions by the Russian Republic in 1993 left the newly elected representatives with the need to devise a working set of parliamentary institutions for the newly formed bicameral legislature. The "building materials" out of which these were fashioned—legislative committees, party caucuses, rules allocating agenda control to leaders—resemble those of the U.S. Congress and Western European parliaments, but the institutional structure was adapted to the needs of Russian politics.

Smith and Remington use the choices made by Russian legislators as they crafted their new parliament to learn about the motives of members of the Duma in particular and about legislators in general. The authors are interested in measuring the relative weight of what they call "policy incentives," "electoral incentives," and "party incentives." To do this they examine three attributes of legislators: policy preferences, measured on a one-dimensional continuum from Left to Right; mode of election, that is, some Duma members were elected from single-member districts (SMDs), and others were chosen through a system of proportional representation (PR); and faction membership. These three characteristics create a taxonomy of Duma members.

The authors link the three characteristics to "incentives," but this is problematic. For example, knowing that PR and SMD deputies behave differently does not directly measure the strength of reelection incentives (often refered to in other literature as "office motivation"). Differences in what it takes to be elected from SMD and PR constituencies may lead office-motivated deputies from SMD constituencies to behave differently from their PR counterparts, but this is only one of many possible explanations. Another is that ideologically motivated independent deputies with no interest in reelection may view competing on an artificial party list as an infringement on their independence, whereas ideologically motivated members of major parties find competing on PR lists more congenial. The link between incentives and a characteristic such as a deputy's mode of election is not airtight.

Smith and Remington use the multitude of institutional choices made during the mid-1990s by Duma members to gauge the effect of their three measured characteristics. They also look for, and find, evidence that preferences toward institutional arrangements evolved over time as deputies learned. The taxonomy is both a strength and a weakness. It enables the authors to ask concrete questions that can be answered, but this comes at the cost of not being able to address fundamental questions about legislatures directly. For example, how important is the "information processing" roll of committees relative to their role as gatekeepers for political parties or special interests? To what extent do legislators join parties because of their policy preferences, and to what extent are their preferences the result of their party affiliation?

The bulk of the book uses several important decisions reached during the Duma's first session as "natural experiments." The authors look for statistically significant effects of mode of election, policy leanings, and membership in a legislative faction. They skillfully draw on a range of evidence, including roll-call votes, popular election returns, organizational data, and the results of two detailed attitude surveys of Duma members. The result is a useful array of what might be called "stylized facts." For example, party discipline was highest among the communists and was generally better explained by faction membership than by location along a Left-Right continuum.

The book is organized around a core of substantive chapters, each of which begins by setting forth a set of propositions. Various relevant roll-call votes and survey responses are then used to test the propositions. Those that survive become the book's stylized facts, such as proposition 2.2, which states that SMD deputies were more opposed to allowing parties to expel PR deputies who bolted their party. The authors could do a better job of tying the hypotheses to the literature on party control and mode of election. Some of this is done, but many propositions are introduced on the basis of their intuitive appeal, and the opportunity to draw wider connections seems not to be fully exploited.

Perhaps Smith and Remington should have noted more often the relationship between legislative politics and the executive in the Russian Federation. For example, they present convincing evidence that the parties on the Left tend to prefer more centralized parliamentary control that would allow the majority to legislate more easily, whereas the "reform" parties of the Right oppose such measures. Readers unaware of the proreform president's ability to bypass the legislature using his decree powers will find this affinity of proreform legislators for the status quo puzzling, even in an opposition controlled legislature. A modicum of extra background material would have made this important book more accessible to scholars who do not specialize on Russia.

The authors are conscientious about describing their data, and they use logit models that treat their explanatory variables, such as faction membership and mode of election, as "risk factors" for voting a certain way or expressing a certain opinion. This offers a useful window on the behavioral links in their data. There is a technical problem, however. We can think of the dependent variable in a logit model as taking on two values, "success" and "failure," and the model then estimates the probability of success conditional on the values for the explanatory variables. For example, Smith and Remington analyze a vote taken in the Duma in January 1994 on whether to require any group of deputies who want to organize into a faction to have at least 50 members.

In this case, "success" corresponds to voting in favor of the amendment, "failure" to voting against it, and the explanatory variables include indicators of the faction to which a member belongs. In Table 2.2 (p. 41) the authors report that every member of the Liberal Democratic Party of Russia (LDPR) who participated in the roll-call vote was in favor, but no member of the Party of Russian Unity and Accord (PRES) voted for the amendment. An explanatory variable such as membership in LDPR that perfectly predicts success (in this case, a "yes" vote) corresponds to a logit coefficient of "positive infinity." Likewise, a "no" vote corresponds to a logit coefficient of "negative infinity." This is tantamount to removing all the LDPR and PRES members from the dataset before estimating the remaining coefficients.

A classic mistake is to include a variable such as LDPR or PRES, estimate the logit model via maximum likelihood, and stop the computer algorithm when the likelihood function ceases to register large improvements. The results will typically be an implausibly large but statistically insignificant positive coefficient estimate for the variables that perfectly predict "success" and an implausibly large negative coefficient estimate for variables that perfectly predict "failure." This is just what we see in Table 2.3 (p. 43), and it is not an isolated event. The same problem arises at least seven other times in the same table and at various other points in the book (e.g., the "DPR" coefficient in all three columns of Table 2.5. the "NRP" coefficient in both columns of Table 5.6). The authors need to be sure that removing these hidden "perfect predictors" from their data and reestimating their model does not affect the remaining coefficient estimates.

Assuming that the substantive implications of this methodological problem are minor, the book hinges on the authors' energetic pursuit of stylized facts that link behavior with their taxonomy of member characteristics. Their approach has the advantage of posing concrete questions and finding answers: Do SMD deputies exhibit lower party discipline than their PR colleagues? "Yes," barely. But the connection with members' motives is unresolved: Do the high rates of party discipline on roll-call votes mean that members join factions that reveal their policy preferences (Smith and Remington think so), or do they reflect party whipping (the authors observed no welts during their interviews with legislators)? Yet, this is a generic problem faced by any study that is primarily empirical. The theoretical controversies in legislative politics remain controversial because they tie in ambiguously to objective measures.

The authors make a serious effort to address these wider questions. Although they do not set any of the major controversies to rest, their results bring the workings of the Duma into clearer focus.

The Left's Dirty Job: The Politics of Industrial Restructuring in France and Spain. By W. Rand Smith. Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1998. 363p. $50.00 cloth, $22.95 paper.

Michael Loriaux, Northwestern University

W. Rand Smith compares socialist policies of industrial retrenchment in France and Spain during the 1980s and 1990s. Both governments sought to adapt their national economy to change in the global market, through investment incentives and labor policies, in a way that would avoid sectoral crisis or even collapse. They sought to achieve an "orderly exit" of labor from redundancy-plagued industrial sectors, notably steel and automobiles, through job retraining, help in establishing small businesses, relocation incentives, and improvements in the job market, not to mention such standard support mechanisms as severance payments and preretirement systems that supported the incomes of unemployed workers. There was a distinct convergence between French and Spanish policy around this kind of adaptive policy. Neither country after 1983 resisted global market trends through price controls or subsidies or trade protection, and neither government embraced market adjustment through more liberal policies of deregulation of capital or labor markets.

International structural factors do not explain this convergence, since those factors could just as well entail a more liberal response than the one the two governments adopted. A number of domestic factors do explain it. Weak industrial capacity is one. French industrial firms were in dire financial shape in the early 1980s, and Spain's legacy of backwardness and protectionism made its industry even more fragile. A second factor is the capacity of both states to intervene decisively to manage adjustment. Both had a powerful executive and centralized administration. Many of the industries that needed restructuring were state-owned. Furthermore, both governments enjoyed strong electoral and parliamentary majorities. The Spanish socialists were able to deploy policies that their more conservative predecessors had tried to implement but failed. The French socialists were able to effect a complete reversal in policy approach without major loss of parliamentary support. Finally, both governments informed policy with the same ideological preference for reconciling market efficiency with the activist state.

Smith devotes much of his analysis not to convergence but to differences between the two experiences. The Spanish elaborated strategies of adjustment that were more coherent than the French but in the end less effective. The author explains the greater incoherence of French policy with reference to the greater need in France to build a governing coalition among the disparate forces of the political and labor Left. The French Left that assumed power in 1981 was an alliance of a rather Stalinist Communist Party, a splinter of the old anticlerical liberal party, the Radicaux de Gauche, and a Socialist Party that was itself a coalition of four more or less independent political forces, ranging from the far left Centre d'Etudes de Recherche et d'Education Socialistes of Jean-Pierre Chevènement to the modernizing right wing of Michel Rocard's Parti Socialiste Unifié. Incoherence in policy reflects efforts to keep this wide-ranging coalition

The Spanish socialists were able to govern with minimal concerns about alliance politics. Felipe Gonzalez had solidified the Socialist Party by eliminating internal factions and by centralizing control over the party apparatus. The Spanish Communist Party was in decline, and the socialists were not compelled to enter into electoral alliance with them.

Smith explains the greater effectiveness of French policy with reference to the greater interventionist capacity of the French state and the greater weakness of French labor unions. Divisions among the unions facilitated the implementation of policy in France, whereas labor unity occasionally threatened implementation of policy in Spain. This dynamic was most apparent in the steel industry. Organized labor in neither country was able to deter the government from adapting steel to a slow market, but Spanish unions mobilized more effectively and extracted more concessions. Despite many protests in French coal and steel regions there was little effective action, in part because of divergent analyses among the unions regarding the nature of the crisis and the appropriate response. The independent Confederation Française Democratique du Travail sympathized with the need to adapt the industry to the slow market, but the procommunist Confederation Generale du Travail sought to subsidize investment and retain labor.

Smith eschews monocausal explanations and provides a rich, textured political analysis that he lays out with great clarity. He returns again and again to the importance of coalition building and the politics that informs it. In so doing, he reinvests agency in the actors who make policy and demotes the importance of international structural constraints. This is a good, rewarding book.

Unemployment and Government: Genealogies of the Social. By William Walters. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000. 240p. $64.95 cloth, $19.95 paper.

Stephen McBride, Simon Fraser University

William Walters probes understandings of the concepts of unemployment that developed and, to an extent, succeeded one another over a hundred years in British history. The British case has its own unique trajectory but parallels developments elsewhere, so the book's interest is not confined to specialists in British politics or social history. Walters applies a Foucauldinspired governmentality perspective to unemployment in order both to overcome the routine and familiar understandings that have become attached to the concept and, more broadly, to contribute to what he terms a genealogy of the social. The latter refers to a particular sphere of governance as exemplified by the practices, techniques, and institutions devised to govern processes and problem populations, in this case the unemployed. Genealogical approaches are suspicious of generalization and systematization and hold that "we can learn from the particular and the contextual" (p. 8). Thus, Walters argues, the government of unemployment will be instructive for understanding social governance generally.

Walters charts this route into the unemployment question and presents a valuable account of many of its facets. The discussion of the transition of unemployment from a moral problem (based on individual failings), to a social problem, with unemployment just one of the risks inherent in the operation of an industrial economy (and one sufficiently predictable that it could be insured against), to an economic problem (lack of aggregate demand) that appropriate Keynesian measures could counteract and control is nicely done. Similarly, the examination of administrative practices and the way they link to and reinforce certain concepts of unemployment is insightful.

The duality of purpose, in which the genealogy of the social looms as theoretically most important, leads Walters to a series of disclaimers throughout the study that seek to define what the book is not. It is not concerned with the historical experience of unemployment or its causes, and it is not a history of unemployment or of the welfare state. Rather, it is a historical sociology of the governance of unemployment. This technique serves to situate the book but perhaps is overdone and certainly lends a defensive tone to the discussion. This is compounded by the determined avoidance of confronting or testing the interpretation against those from other perspectives.

ing the interpretation against those from other perspectives. At times the disclaimers "protest too much." Walters obviously does not want the book to be considered simply as a history of ideas; yet, in pursuit of his own project, he provides a very good history of the idea of unemployment. Notwithstanding his emphasis on the institutional construction of unemployment, or techniques for governing unemployment and the unemployed, it is the ideas (definitions, conceptualization, and so on) that come through most prominently. The institutions are enmeshed in the production of ideas, new forms of knowledge about unemployment, new ways of categorizing and thinking about the subject. Conceived in this way an institution ostensibly set up to deal with unemployment "does not simply find unemployment already there. It produces unemployment.... In a sense, we are talking about the invention of unemployment" (p. 47).

The author does not consider unemployment a preexisting condition; rather, it is constructed—through discourse and through the practice of government agencies, such as the labor exchanges of the early twentieth century, established to deal with the recently defined phenomenon. This analysis contrasts with social policy or structural accounts of unemployment. But Walters does not confront that literature directly; his account evades it and is offered as another way of looking at the unemployment issue, a supplementary account perhaps.

The social conditions that made it possible to "invent" unemployment are alluded to, and it is recognized (p. 15) that changes in economic and occupational structure played a role in developing the notion of employment (and unemployment). But the failure to discuss adequately the maturation of a capitalist labor market and its first real crisis, the Great Depression in the 1870s, weakens the plausibility of this account of the arrival of the concept of unemployment in that period. The view that concepts reflect reality rather than constitute it, and institutions respond to problems rather than invent them, has much to commend it; avoidance is not an effective strategy for dealing with that position.

With Keynesianism, Walters observes, the seemingly natural link between governance of unemployment and simulataneous government of the unemployed was temporarily broken. "Temporarily" because recent conceptions of unemployment have retured to the notion of individual culpability for the experience, as expressed, for example, in explanations that rely on deficiency of skills and poor attitudes among the unemployed. On this point, Walters presents a case study of New Labour's "New Deal," a work for welfare program. The initiative is presented as steering a path between the neoliberalism of the Thatcher Conservatives and the statism of old Labour.

The case rests on the view that the New Deal is partly an ethical and moral project and thus "is shielded from the criticism that training and jobseeking schemes are somewhat limited in tackling persistent unemployment because they do little to affect the aggregate supply of jobs; it is about the ethical as much as the economic" (p. 132). Others claim that the New Deal creates few jobs, perhaps 80% of which would have been created anyway, and from which 60% of the participants drop out, and might regard it as an exercise in the politics of manipulation rather than morality. But addressing such claims is beyond the defined scope of the book, which consistently side-steps confrontation with other perspectives.

Ultimately, therefore, the genealogy of the social perspective, with its emphasis on discourse and the "invention" of social phenomena, limits itself by its failure to engage with interpretations that see institutions as responding, in various and often contradictory ways, to social problems that are, however, extant rather than invented.

Power and Wealth in Rural China: The Political Economy of Institutional Change. By Susan H. Whiting. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001. 348p. $59.95.

Benedict Stavis, Temple University

While this book does not quite cover the broad range promised by its title, it does offer a sophisticated analysis of the privatization of rural industry in China, thick in social science theory and rich with empirical data.

Whiting poses an important question: Why did the Chinese communist system endorse the expansion of private ownership of rural industries, rather than emphasizing collectively owned enterprises? What were the administrative links and feedback mechanisms among central policymakers, local administrators, and China's entrepreneurs and rural workers that led to privatization? For decades, a primary presumption in the scholarship of socialist systems was that communist bureaucrats had such deep vested interests in state ownership of economic enterprises that they would never convert. But Whiting reaches the startling conclusion that it was easier for local officials to tax and control private enterprises than socialist enterprises that were embedded in the state structure.

The tax system is crucial to her analysis. Most tax revenue came from the turnover and income taxes on rural industry. Taxes went up to the central government, but a share was retained locally, so local officials had an interest in expanding local industry. At the same time, local officials were given extensive local obligations, including education, health, etc., so they needed more revenue. Thus, they needed to increase rural industry and other sources of discretionary local income. They would be rewarded with promotions and higher salaries if they succeeded. Whiting's key point is that local officials were eager to increase their revenue, and higher levels agreed on this (Chapter 3).

In regions where the central government had earlier encouraged rural industry in the collective sector (rural Shanghai and Wuxi provide case studies for Whiting for this pattern of development), further development of collective industry was the easiest solution. Local leaders already had much influence over the collective sector and could easily get information to obtain tax revenues from them. However, and this is one of Whiting's key discoveries, local collective industry deliberately kept profits low by inflating expenses. They overstated the number of employees and expanded entertainment costs to shift expenses to tax deductions. As enterprises avoided taxes, local officials benefited indirectly from better economic and social conditions, but, at the same time, their tax revenue for themselves and higher levels was limited. (This subterfuge may also have resulted in Chinese and foreign analysts overstating the inefficiencies of the collective system.)

In areas where the central government had not helped to develop collective rural industry, private rural industry got a head start. (Whiting's case study work on this pattern is in Yueqing, near Wenzhou in southern Chejiang.) Rural officials had essentially no way of knowing the financial accounts of private industry for tax purposes, so they developed a far simpler institutional environment. A new form of enterprise, the "share-holding cooperative enterprise," was created. It was a private firm, with the restriction that it had to reinvest 50% of profits and contribute at least 25% of profits to public accumulation funds (p. 160). Moreover, a simplified sales tax of about 9-10% of gross production replaced a complex set of taxes that required far more intrusive information to compute. Both private entrepreneurs and local officials gauged this a reasonable deal. The government got reasonably high tax revenues fairly easily. Moreover, if competition and overproduction started to push prices down and banks refused to loan money to failing firms, the local officials had no financial obligation to private firms if they went into debt and possible eventual bankruptcy. At the same time, private entrepreneurs got their private investment protected with a new, safe legal status (p. 177).

Thus Whiting arrives at an important and counter-intuitive insight, that local officials could do their jobs and please their superiors more easily by dealing with private enterprises than with collective ones. By the late 1990s, private ownership was becoming better accepted and protected and was expanding as a part of China's economic system.

At a macro-political level, her insights show that Chinese citizens do make inputs into the development of state policy. The modality is not through an institutionalized formal democratic process of elections between competing parties; rather it is by withholding resources from the state by locally sanctioned tax minimization and forcing the central government to adopt new policies that encounter less resistance.

From a methodological perspective, Whiting's book is a wonderful model. Her use of public documents is superb. She has found a wide range of yearbooks, government directives, and collections of articles on both local and national levels that provide a very full image of rural industrial development. She has supplemented this with 252 interviews, so that she can convert cold laws and statistics into living social, economic, and political processes. Quantitative analyses of economic and financial data further confirm some of her hypotheses. She proves that one does not need to take the risks of internal (nei pu) documents or secret materials to do in-depth research in China.

While Whiting's argument is persuasive, it is not necessarily complete. I wish that she had explored more systematically whether officials encourage private economic development because it gives them more opportunities to help their children, other relatives and friends, and maybe even themselves to become successful businessmen and leap above the financial constraints imposed on public servants. She tantalizes us with hints, "[L]ocal party secretaries and township executives ... translat[ed] their political power into ownership of a relatively large number of individual shares in the most valuable firms, often at highly favorable prices" (p. 156), but does not treat this issue with the same rigor that she does her other hypotheses.

All in all, this is a fine contribution to our understanding of the internal dynamics of China's policy process as it continues to reform the economic system. It reminds us of the central importance of public finance institutions and policies to sustain a state. It is clear that the Chinese Communist Party understands this requirement.

Continuities in Poland's Permanent Transition. By Harald Wydra. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000. 257p. $65.00.

Arista Maria Cirtautas, University of Virginia

In studying and analyzing the postcommunist "transition" countries, it is becoming ever more apparent that what calls for explanation is not only change, as expressed in the trajectory of liberal capitalist reforms, but also continuity. Even in the face of profound institutional transformation, mentalities and behaviors associated with the past are not readily giving way to new modalities of thought and action. Accordingly, one way of approaching the problem of explaining the variability of regime outcomes in the former Soviet bloc is to focus on the particular institutional and discursive forms that the interplay of change and continuity has produced in each country. In his work on Poland, Harald Wydra encourages us to analyze this interplay from a particular point of viewone that is rooted in the lived experiences of the populations involved, as opposed to how countries measure up with respect to progress toward liberal capitalist outcomes. Consequently, he argues that even as discontinuity and change have characterized the "first reality" of post-1989 institutionbuilding, important continuities mark the "second reality of images, myths and mentalities" (p. 26). In turn, this "second reality" provides "fundamental reference points in post-1989 Poland and Eastern Europe" (p. 25) that infuse the new institutional realities with unique, culturally determined, content and meaning.

As Wydra sees it, neither elites nor publics have been autonomous or free to respond to changing circumstances according to detached rational cost-benefit calculations. Instead, their responses have been driven, at the unconscious level, by inherited structures of thought that generate collective patterns of interpretation and "processes of situational adjustment" (p. 22). These patterns, while fluid and indeterminate as to how specifically individuals or groups might combine elements of the inherited structures, are nonetheless predictable within the parameters of a society's or group's given cultural habitus. Although these inherited mentalities have most often been characterized as part of the negative legacies of communism, as in the "homo sovieticus" syndrome, Wydra remains refreshingly free of such valueladen terminology. Nor does he assume that the less educated social groups are the sole carriers of inherited mentalities. Indeed, his empirical focus is on Poland's political elites and how their choices and actions have been impacted by continuities at the level of the second reality. This is consistent with his theoretical aim of "detaching the concept of second reality from a functional meaning in the service of the antagonism of state vs. society" (p. 17). For Wydra, it is too simplistic and ultimately misleading to reduce the continuities of the "passions and identities" of contemporary Eastern Europe to a single faultline that pits unreconstructed societies against "modernizing" state elites. In contrast, Wydra directs our attention toward a more generalizable condition that continues to structure mentalities and situational responses regardless of social class. This condition is characterized by the perception of "the menacing dissolution of order." Hence, in the particular circumstances of Poland, "second realities should be regarded as subjective-emotional expressions of desire to leave an unwanted or unsatisfactory situation" (p. 17) and return to order or normalcy. According to Wydra, this desire has continuously shaped Polish political culture from 1945, and even before, to the present

Central to the sustainability of the "pre-political identities" inherited from the communist and precommunist past has been the condition of liminality or "permanent transition" in which Poland has found itself for most of the 20th century. Or, to put it more precisely, Polish elites have consistently interpreted their country's condition as one of transition from an undesirable state to a more desirable one. In this regard, the post-1989 political establishment is no different from the post-WWII communist leadership. The empirical substance of Wydra's work, and the bulk of the chapters, elaborates on the three main consequences of this worldview: (1) A utopian public discourse that is often couched in terms of mirror images or "mimetic conflicts;" (2) the organized expression of this discourse in the "anti-structures" of "moments of nationwide communities" (p. 25), most dramatically illustrated by Solidarity; and (3) the "backwardness" of Polish political elites resulting from "their imitation of blurred images of democracy and capitalism and their recurrent reference to images of the past" (p. 30).

The major contribution of Wydra's work is not, however, his empirical findings, since he relies almost exclusively on secondary sources. The greater value clearly lies in Wydra's efforts to analyze, on the basis of the Polish case, the interactions between the objective socioeconomic conditions of backwardness and the "subjective-emotional" interpretation of these conditions, and how these interpretations become consequential in their own right. This mode of analysis draws our attention to the fact that although the Central and East European countries share many objective structural attributes of backwardness and late development, the ways in which these attributes have historically been interpreted and internalized have varied: Variances which in turn have contributed to the differential outcomes of the post-1989 period. Thus, while Poland, Hungary, and the Czech Republic currently seem similarly poised to escape the debilitating "inbetween" state of backwardness by becoming fully consolidated democracies en route to European Union membership, the conflicts and cleavages that inform the political struggles and experiences of elites and citizens in these countries remain quite distinct as a result of different political traditions or, in Wydra's terms, the continuities of differing "national and social habitus" (p. 192).

Ultimately, however, Wydra's contribution to a cultural theory of change and continuity in postcommunist polities is undermined by inconsistencies in the logic of his argument, an underelaborated analytical framework, and the lack of serious engagement with alternative approaches. There is, for example, an apparent glaring inconsistency between Wydra's assertion that his "understanding of transition should be separated both from the fashionable 'transition to democracy' and from transitional post-communism as an abnormal state of affairs" (p. 202) and the implicit reference point of Western practices and mentalities employed by the author. Polish politics is, in the final analysis, evaluated according to its "considerable distance from Western democracies in terms of political trust, social cohesion, and stable political identities" (p. 204). Given such an underlying comparison between a Polish "national and social habitus" characterized by the pursuit of (unrealizable) utopian principles and the (unrealistic) perpetual demand for change, as contrasted with the author's own idealized understanding of the "normal" habitus of Western democracies, it is at times rather hard to see the difference between Wydra's approach and those that explicitly treat "transitional post-communism as an abnormal state of affairs." Such inconsistencies become even more problematic in the absence of a fully developed analytical framework. Wydra suggests that his analysis is guided by insights derived from the work of Norbert Elias, Arnold van Gennep, Victor Turner, Rene Girard, and Bruno Latour (see, especially, page 25). Little effort, however, is made to relate these insights to one another in a systematic and coherent way that would help the reader understand the author's claims, where his work fits into the existing literature on cultural theory and how, in substance, his approach might deviate from alternative approaches to the study of postcommunism. Surprisingly, Wydra does not refer to the growing body of literature on the cultural aspects of postcommunist transition. As a result, when the author claims that "continuities in Poland's transition are neither evolutionary nor linear, but repetitive and ritual-like" (p. 191), not only is the contrast itself opaque, but it is unclear how his overall analysis of the continuity of "second reality" images and myths differs from other culturally oriented studies of contemporary Eastern Europe.

In short, this work should be read both with a sense of appreciation for the author's efforts to recast our analytical perceptions of the transition and with a critical sense of how this project might be improved upon.

International Relations

German Unification and the Union of Europe: The Domestic Politics of Integration Policy. By Jeffrey Anderson. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999. 240p. $59.95 cloth, $21.95 paper.

Beverly Crawford, University of California, Berkeley

German unification presents conceptual puzzles of which comparativists dream. Has this monumental change, which boils down to full German sovereignty, growth of German power, and the emergence of new domestic political interests, altered Germany's relationship to Europe? Is Germany withdrawing from or dominating European institutions? Does the new Germany still tread its well-worn postwar path of the model "European"? The questions are important for our understanding of the sources of policy change and continuity as well as the process of regional integration in general and the course of European integration in particular. In which issue areas has Germany's postunification policy broken with the past? Is the break caused by changes in domestic politics or the increase in the power of a unified and fully sovereign Germany? Have policy changes impeded or enhanced the speed and character of European unification? Are important continuities evident? If both policy continuity and change are present, why the variation? These are the questions Jeffrey Anderson tackles in this timely and important volume.

In the decade since unification Germany's European policy has been characterized by both continuity and change. Situated securely—but not exclusively—at the domestic level of analysis, Anderson's explanation relies on the particular interaction of institutions, ideas, and interests before and after unification. He makes an important distinction between the constitutive and regulative dimensions of the European integration process, arguing that Germany has exhibited seamless continuity in constitutive politics because German "identity" was so entwined with Europe. Furthermore, as European integration deepened during the postwar period, Germany participated in shaping European institutions and securing its domestic interests within the European Union (EU).

It is within regulative policy that the real puzzle is revealed. In some areas (trade and internal market affairs) Germany's postunification policy remained constant but in others (environmental and energy policies) exhibited subtle shifts, and is still others (structural funds, state aid, and agricultural support) it underwent dramatic changes. The key to continuity and change rests with domestic political interests, their response to the unification process, the degree to which domestic actors' desire for policy change resonated with longstanding German economic beliefs, and the availability of domestic and EU institutions to translate actor demands into policy choice. When interests conformed to prevailing ideas and when institutional channels were available, domestic actors were able to push through their policy preferences. When their interests contradicted prevailing ideas and when few institutional channels were available for their voice to be heard, their policy demands were thwarted. Entrenched ideas and the institutions that support them are of crucial explanatory importance in cases in which the demands of domestic actors pose a challenge to prevailing policy; they are of little direct importance when they support—or at least do not clash with—the interests demanding policy change.

Anderson provides solid empirical evidence for this argument. Unification put the entire German economy under considerable stress and affected the interests of all economic actors. Eastern firms, labor unions, and state governments clamored for trade subsidies to enhance competitiveness, but these contradicted prevailing liberal beliefs. Bonn soundly resisted domestic pressure from the East for policy change. In stark contrast, domestic actors from the new Länder success $fully \, pushed \, for \, radical \, policy \, departure \, that \, would \, garner \, for \,$ themselves more EU aid, subsidies, and development funds. Successful policy change rested on an institutional structure in these sectors that permitted eastern domestic interests to be "partners" in the policymaking process. And the ideas supporting previous policy could be stretched enough to incorporate and justify the policy shift.

More nuanced changes occurred when both German federal and EU institutions favored the demands of German domestic interests, even when these demands appeared to fly in the face of prevailing ideas. These more subtle changes were evident in the environmental regulatory sector. Strict national regulations, exporters had always argued, hampered Germany's competitive advantage. Before unification Germany ignored this objection had led the effort to strengthen EU environmental regulation as German domestic regulations stiffened. Ideas about environmental protection prevailed over interests. But when German export competitiveness sharply declined after unification, German officials were less eager to see increasingly strict environmental policy and attempted to slow the EU process as the German process slowed.

In the energy sector, liberal ideas had favored deregulation, but hard coal interests and postwar decisions to provide a sure and cheap energy supply made Bonn drag its feet on deregulation. After unification, the cost-benefit calculations changed: Energy-intensive industries, favoring gas and oil over coal, were always eager to deregulate. Now their lobbying efforts paid off, especially in Brussels, where the European Commission also favored rapid deregulation: Bonn, hampered by hard coal interests and institutional constraints, favored a slower approach. But the economic crisis triggered by unification provided the impetus to speed it up. A coalition between German exporters and the European Commission provided the needed push to accelerate energy deregulation at the European level. That push finally gave Bonn the upper hand over coal interests and brought more rapid energy deregulation in line with liberal ideas. In these two issue areas, it was the speed of European policy change that was affected, rather than Germany's overall policy stance. Prevailing ideas about environmental protection and liberalization remained intact.

This convincing argument makes an important contribution to the scholarly debate over the sources of states' foreign policies. Some analysts behind that national policy changes result from external pressures—growing or declining power in the international system or the increasing role of international institutions in shaping states' preferences. Others look to domestic forces in the policy process as the primary cause of change. Anderson makes a convincing case for domestic explanations of policy preference. Yet, he rejects monocausal accounts, and his careful analysis shows precisely how ideas, institutions, and interests—at both the domestic and international levels—interact to influence policy choice. Unlike arguments that bundle ideas and institutions together in their explanations, Anderson gives institutions independent explanatory status, apart from the ideas that gave birth to them.

Will this argument stand the test of time as unification pressures recede? Germany is increasingly less likely to face the same mix of domestic pressures in the future, and Anderson's argument relies heavily on unification and its domestic consequences as a cause of change. Nonetheless, his analytic framework will continue to be useful under other conditions that affect one or more of the three variables.

Can the lessons learned from these seven cases be generalized? Indeed, the case of dramatic postunification changes in German export control policy seems to defy Anderson's account. Before unification, Germany's regulations controlling the export of commercial technology with military usefulness to potential adversaries were liberal, lax, and minimal, and the Germans consistently opposed the stricter control policies of European partners and the United States. The logic of export regulation was in direct conflict with Bonn's liberal trade ideas, and tight policy networks between government and industry in favor of loose controls ensured lax enforcement and minimal regulation. Institutional forces favored exporters' interests; indeed, the major industrial association virtually wrote Germany's export control regulations. Clearly, ideas, interests, and institutions combined to ensure minimal export control in the face of strong external pressures.

After 1989, however, despite heated protests from industry, Germany's export control system underwent its most dramatic transformation in history. It moved from a reluctant controller to a fervent proponent of tight controls, and its laws were among the strictest in the world. Within the EU, Germany successfully pushed for a common export control policy, and initial EU guidelines mirrored the new German legislation. Institutional changes in Germany favored tighter controls and stricter enforcement. Neither ideas, nor institutions, nor interests can explain this shift; their interaction had long worked to ensure a liberal export control policy. And exporter interests in lax controls only grew stronger after unification as competitiveness declined. Perhaps in this case, analysts must look to external pressure associated with growing German power and growing responsibility for regional security.

This objection, however, does not undermine the significance of this important book. Anderson has gone far in strengthening both the argument for domestic explanations of foreign policy preferences and arguments about the domestic sources of EU policy. Scholars will benefit greatly from the use of his analytic framework, and the argument will long continue to pose a significant challenge to those who claim that Germany's foreign policy will now be shaped primarily by external forces and its growing power on the European and international scene.

Stay the Hand of Vengeance: The Politics of War Crimes Tribunals. By Gary Jonathan Bass. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2000. 402p. $29.95.

Arthur W. Blaser, Chapman University

This excellent book is a worthwhile acquisition for anyone and any library, but it is an essential one for those concerned with international law, international organization, and war crimes. Bass combines the best of his scholarly political science training with his experience as a former correspondent with The Economist.

Bass offers comparative case studies of war crimes trials, including successes and failures. There are separate chapters on the aftermath of the Napoleonic wars, the trials at Leipzig following World War I, the trials at Constantinople after the massacre of Armenians, Nuremberg, and the Hague Tribunal on the former Yugoslavia. Along the way Bass makes points about other trials, such as the Rwanda tribunal and the Tokyo tribunals after World War II. These chapters are sandwiched between first and last chapters that offer propositions and arguments about war crimes trials.

This is a contribution to international relations that acknowledges extensive reliance on a work in political theory, Judith Shklar's Legalism (1986). As Shklar argues about Nuremberg, Bass claims that legalism, or "due process across borders" (p. 20), makes a difference. It has not made for perfect solutions, but it is preferable to the alternative, vengeance. It is the "least awful alternative" (p. 304). Furthermore, Bass's argument is important with respect to three related divisions in the study of world politics. His words will not be the last about these divisions, but they are eloquent and well supported by evidence.

First is the idealist-realist distinction. Bass belongs to the former group, although he is careful to point out that legalism is a product of liberalism, not democracy. Indeed, it may work at its best when it operates to limit democratic decisions. Bass also is careful not to claim too much for the tribunals; he is anything but a utopian. Even the great success at Nuremberg, he remind us, was achieved at great odds and was not unblemished. His work reminds me of psychologist William James's distinction in Pragmatism (1907) between the "Tough-Minded" and "Tender-Minded." When Bass offers countering opinions to those of Henry Kissinger in A World Restored (1957), for example, he is careful to provide plenty of evidence. For this section it comes from extensive documentary research; in contemporary cases, such as the chapter on the Hague (Yugoslavia) tribunal, Bass includes interviews with many of the principals.

Bass argues that tribunals may offer punishment that vengeance cannot. He describes the legalist rationale: "For public attitudes to shift, criminal leaders must be tried—their aura of mystery shattered by showing their weaknesses and stupidities" (p. 288).

Although I suggested in the first paragraph that this book is essential reading for those interested in international law, Bass specifically states this is one of three subjects he does not cover. The other two are domestic transitions to democracy and international institutions (p. 34). His concern is international war crimes proceedings. Although Bass does not get mired in abstract discussion of how states ought to behave according to international lawyers, he does describe how they have behaved, and how rules can and have affected this.

The second distinction is between traditional and descriptive approaches to international relations as opposed to more scientific and quantitative ones. Bass's work exemplifies the strength of the former approaches. The book is comparative history at its best and is very readable. There is some conceptual discussion (useful terminology to some readers, needless jargon to others) in the footnotes at the end of chapters.

Bass's argument is easy to follow owing to effective use of headings and subheadings. Figures or tables would have been useful; I found myself constructing some to clarify the attributes of some tribunals but not others. Bass acknowledges that he does not offer precise typologies of liberal and illiberal states and that there is great variety within the categories he writes about, but he points out that for his case studies a simple dichotomy is sufficient.

Finally there is the distinction, about which Bass convincingly argues that many analysts have been much too rigid, between international relations before and after World War II. He points out that the phrase "crimes against humanity" was used by Soviet Foreign Minister Sergei Sazonov to describe the massacre of Armenians and by others to describe conditions during the 1910s.

Most of my quibbles concern the book that might have been written. Bass could have said more about Rwanda and the Tokyo trials, particularly about Justice Pal's lengthy dissent. (Bass easily discredits self-serving Soviet statements at Nuremberg; Pal's Tokyo dissent would have made interesting fodder for refutation.) Although Bass acknowledges that liberal states have shown lots of self-interest, he convincingly argues that they are the only ones to have created war crimes tribunals. They also have a record of human rights atrocity, including slaughter of indigenous populations, slavery, forced relocation, and investment strategies that induce dependency (in many accounts linked to war crimes). Bass argues the merits of a universalistic worldview (p. 23); critics of Western states' policies charge that such a worldview has brought disastrous consequences to those who do not fit it. Bass comments on the new International Criminal Court (ICC) but could have offered more. His thoughts include: "If there is to be, despite American objections, a serious permanent war crimes tribunal—the ICC—then liberal governments will have to make a far stronger commitment to international justice than they have in the 1990s" (p. 282).

By offering comparative case studies, this book fills a void. Other recent works are comparable in some ways but not others. Steven Ratner and Jason Abrams (Accountability for Human Rights Atrocities in International Law: Beyond the Nuremberg Legacy (2d ed., 2001), provide many useful points of comparison but do not offer the historical breadth of Bass's book. That is important because, as Bass reminds us, "the Leipzig war trials were a disaster" (p. 80). As he observes, it will be to our peril if we remember Nuremberg but forget about Leipzig and other precedents in designing policies toward war crimes in the former Yugoslavia and elsewhere. By placing the Nuremberg tribunal in the context of others. Bass allows for more accurate appreciation of that tribunal. The book contains telling anecdotes about U.S. foreign policymakers (including Henry Stimson, Madeline Albright, and William Cohen). It is suitable for course use and is accessible to upper division undergraduates and graduate students.

Cambodia Confounds the Peacemakers, 1979–1998. By Macalister Brown and Joseph J. Zasloff. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1998. 272p. $39.95.

David W. Roberts, University of Ulster

This book takes the reader through the complexities of the search for peace in the first chapters and through the provision of the UNTAC operation up to 1993. It concludes with an overview of the 1998 elections, and in between there is a section dedicated to the period between the two polls. The first section is reasonable, but the text is repetitive and it repeats what several others have already written (Trevor Findlay, Cambodia: The Legacy and Lessons of UNTAC, 1995, and various works by David P. Chandler, Ben Kiernan, and Michael Vickery). The analysis reflects that by several of the recognized Khmer scholars, and is useful to read, but while the analysis is insightful regarding Western peacemaking processes and the Khmer resistance at various points, it does not question assumptions regarding the overwriting of Western peace paradigms onto Khmer political culture. This has a distinctly different historical evolution and an equally dissimilar set of contemporary values regarding the notions of opposition, power sharing, and social harmony. The limits of this type of analysis are present throughout the work and are probably best illustrated by the statement that the violence of July 1997 "transformed UNTAC's enterprise from what may have been termed a 'limited success' to a failed rescue of a failed state" (p. 265).

First, Cambodia was not, in 1991, a failed state. I found that most of its primary organs worked reasonably well, other things being equal. There was no anarchy, no brutal police state, and no war by October. Trade was conducted at all levels, fuel was available for commerce, and capital city hospitals were functioning at varying levels. Second, shortcomings in the operation were not UNTAC's fault, but the fault of the Paris Peace Agreement. This vessel carried peace not for Khmers in the first instance, but for the Perm-5's concerns, specifically the United States and China, regarding their relations with Viet Nam. It was not UNTAC's fault that they could not conduct an unfeasible (in practice) mandate. More importantly, the statement reflects a simplistic analysis of the peace process in and above Cambodia and seems to reflect a notion of Western superiority and the poverty of Khmer politics. This is quite noticeable when the writers discuss how a Japanese proposal, with European backing and support, provided for Prince Ranariddh to reenter Cambodia for the 1998 election after he had run away prior to the July 1997 fighting. They state that "once again, members of the international community helped provide a pathway to open Cambodia's deadlocked politics" (p. 303). But it equally can be argued that there was no domestic deadlock. A new prime minister had been appointed, the Assembly continued in its deliberations, and stability ensued in Phnom Penh, where it had been absent before. Some might view the writers' perspectives as patronizing.

These perspectives are also reflected in the title of the work. It seems that Cambodia has "confounded" the "peacemakers." That is, the West, irreproachable for all its valiant efforts at peacemaking, has been undermined by the efforts primarily, if the book is to be believed, of an arch-strongman, Prime Minister Hun Sen. It must be considered that the virtuous West ignored Cambodia in its darkest years and then created a peace framework ordained to ensure the inclusion of the Khmer Rouge in a political settlement.

That framework also rejected domestic peace overtures, such as those between Sihanouk and Hun Sen in 1987 and 1989, which would have dispensed with the need for foreign intervention. One senses a certain set of values that that are "offended" by Cambodian actions that undermine a Western "rescue," when in fact the Khmer elite were prevented from undertaking their own peace plans. The man most responsible for either steering Cambodian decision making or resisting Western planning is clearly Mr. Hun Sen, and he is the target of uncritical and partisan analysis. There is a strong sense that Hun Sen has been responsible, mainly, for the demise of the West's valiant attempts to "save" a nation. This is strongly evident in the section on the July 1997 "coup." This term is repeated frequently throughout the book in an uncritical manner that does not even consider the possibility that Hun Sen was forced to defend himself against Ranariddh's illegal practices or, indeed, that any other explanations exist. Since July 1997, a raft of evidence has been provided, some by the Khmer Rouge, that Ranariddh was involved in private deals with the former guerrillas aimed at militarily changing the balance of power against his coalition partner.

The treatment of sources is also problematic in this context. For example, Brown and Zasloff subtly challenge the veracity of Ranariddh's smuggling of private weapons disguised as machine parts by stating that Hun Sen "accused" Ranariddh of the above crime (p. 262). Similarly, in the Epilogue, the authors conceal through omission that Ranariddh was proven guilty of smuggling weapons, etc. They write that Hun Sen "contended" that Ranariddh had been guilty, and that Hun "postured" various things (p. 302). In fact, Ranariddh confessed to the act, and the papers were full of the story at the time. Given this, and given the authors' considerable use of local papers from Phnom Penh, this has been curiously avoided or neglected.

Indeed, the book leaves the impression that Hun Sen is the bogeyman of Cambodian politics. Again, such analysis is uncritical. Identifying him as authoritarian is right in some respects, but most scholars of this subject, including those who are diametrically opposed on many issues, agree that both Ranariddh and Rainsy are equally authoritarian in nature; however, this is not addressed. Indeed, Rainsy seems to have grown a halo in some parts of the book, most notably in Chapter 8, which reviews the period 1993–1997. The authors do, however, redeem themselves in recognizing Rainsy's virulent racism against Viet Namese people during and after the 1998 elections. Indeed. This section (Epilogue) contains much to commend it. It offers a clear review of the polling and, because the authors were present, recreates the atmosphere of the time, reminding even of the 1993 election. It also avoids the tedious accusations that the election was critically rigged by the Cambodian People's Party (CPP) and neutrally considers the arguments concerning the role of the CPP-biased National Election Commission in the preelection period. But once again, omission is evident. Concerning the period after the July fighting, the authors note "extra judicial killings" and then lend legitimacy and credibility to that statistic by attributing it to the U.N. Special Representative for Human Rights (no less). But there is no mention of the fact that four of those "dead" miraculously reappeared alive, undermining the credibility of the Human Rights body and embarrassing the Special Representative. Equally, no mention is made that some of the killings were undoubtedly score settling and turf wars, not extra-judicial political acts blamable on the CPP elite.

Clearly much effort was involved in the writing of this book, and the authors have studied the politics closely and visited the country. However, their analysis is often weak and evidently biased against a key political actor, undermining the neutrality and credibility of the book. The work also does not criticize the peace plan for propriety in the context of Khmer conflict management culture and does not discuss whether the shortcomings in the peace plan of a cultural nature led to more, but different, conflict within Cambodia. As a U.S. Ambassador once noted, "In 1991, we settled the Cambodian war. In 1997, the Cambodians settled the Cambodian war." Read with caution.

Sanctions as Economic Statecraft: Theory and Practice. Edited by Steve Chan and A. Cooper Drury. New York: St Martin's, 2000. 258p. $75.00.

Kim Richard Nossal, McMaster University

Edited collections usually have relatively clear provenance. Most often they are brought to life by colleagues who are intrigued by an issue or a question; they then organize a conference (or a collection) around that theme and seek a publisher for the resulting collection. Such works are commonly marked by the putative expectations associated with an edited book: There is an attempt by the editors to present the unifying theme desired (if not demanded) by most university presses and the academic reviewers whose reports determine which way the thumbs go. Usually the editors attempt to herd the cats they have invited to participate—and ask that the contributors address unifying themes or take desired approaches. Even if the cats do no more than tip a ritual bow in the direction of the unifying theme, the editors normally use the introduction and conclusion to craft at least the appearance of unification.

This collection of essays on international sanctions, published in the widely respected Macmillan series on international political economy, has none of these signposts to its origins. The editors provide no preface that might give the reader some sense of where the collection came from—or why. There is no rationale offered for the topics included or excluded. There is no attempt to provide a unifying theme or puzzle, and there certainly is no central argument. To be sure, there is an introduction, but it bills itself as an "overview" and lives up to that title, for it is no more than a brief outline of what is to come. The nine chapters that follow clearly indicate that their authors have had no herding. The only commonality among them is that they focus on international sanctions. In short, this is a collection that just is.

Taken for what it is—nine essays on sanctions between ridiculously expensive Macmillan/St. Martin's cloth covers—the book provides a useful and intellectually stimulating reflection on this tool of statecraft. First, several essays employ methods that depart from the common approaches in the international sanctions literature: A. Cooper Drury uses statistical analysis of U.S. presidential decisions on sanctioning; William H. Kaempfer and Anton D. Lowenberg prefer public choice; Valerie Schwebach uses formal modeling; Daniel W. Drezner uses Boolean analysis to explore Russian economic statecraft.

Second, this collection offers a number of analytically rich case studies that will appeal to traditionalists who might be less than taken with the results of the above approaches. Jason Davidson and George Shambaugh focus on incentives as a tool of economic statecraft, a theme picked up by Curtis H. Martin, who examines the all-too-often ignored case of the 1994 agreement between the United States and North Korea as an example of the differences between sanctions and inducements as instruments of foreign policy. Daniel W. Fisk's chapter on the American sanctions against Cuba does an excellent job of locating the Helms-Burton sanctions of the mid-1990s in a broader political perspective, looking beyond the usual arguments about the domestic roots of American efforts to sanction Cuba. Steve Chan chronicles the seemingly endless debate in the United States over whether China should receive most-favored-nation (MFN) status-or "normal trade relations," as some Americans have unilaterally decided this centuries-old European convention should now be called. Of course, the debate has continued long after MFN status was granted, although it now focuses on whether MFN status should be withdrawn over such matters as the Chinese government's crackdown on the Falun Gong movement or Beijing's initial responses to the air collision near Hainan. David M. Rowe revisits the Rhodesia sanctions of the 1960s and 1970s and examines the domestic political effects of the boycott on Rhodesia's important tobacco industry.

This collection features an interesting mix of methods and case studies, but there are some significant holes in the coverage of contemporary sanctions. For example, there is no discussion of sanctions against South Africa in the 1980s or against Iraq since 1990, even though those cases remain crucial episodes. There is no exploration of the various ways in which the international community has sought during the post–Cold War era to sharpen and smarten sanctions. (Perhaps that is not surprising, since the book tends to limit its focus to the national level, rather than explore sanctions from a multilateral perspective.) Perhaps most important, there is no extended discussion of the normative implications of sanctions, an issue that has increasingly engaged both policymakers and academics over the last decade.

International Relations—Still an American Social Science?: Toward Diversity in International Thought. Edited by Robert M. A. Crawford and Darryl S. L. Jarvis. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2001. 394p. $88.50 cloth, $29.95 paper.

Timothy Dunne, University of Wales, Aberystwyth

Early accounts of the development of the discipline of international relations (IR) attribute causal significance to changes in the "real" world. In this respect, historigraphy was a reflection in history's looking glass, such that World War I created idealism, and World War II prompted the revival of realism. The editors of International Relations—Still and American Social Science? remind us that the identity of the discipline is also a reflection of geopolitical and cultural circumstances. The sixteen essays seek to reawaken the question of the identity of the discipline and how this has been transmitted and contested. There is no doubt that the book will be widely read and is likely to find its way onto many postgraduate course lists. It is also likely to find critics and supporters in fairly equal number, which is reason alone to applaud the labors of the editors.

Stanley Hoffmann once referred to the United States as the "heartland" of IR. Given the importance of his essay, "International Relations: An American Social Science," to the forging of the dominant self-image of the discipline, the editors were right to publish it as the lead contribution to the volume. Many readers will welcome the opportunity to read once again Hoffmann's finely crafted argument and fluent prose, which qualities are less evident in many of the subsequent contributions.

Two main themes underpin the book. The first is the extent to which IR continues to be bound to the cultural and economic interests of the United States. The second, dealt with below, is whether the recent proliferation of approaches enhances the standing of the field. Regarding the former, there is broad agreement among the contributors that America continues to dominate the study of IR. I use the term "broad" because the editors are unwilling to furnish a compelling criterion for what counts as dominance. As Robert Crawford writes in the Introduction, "this volume offers no consensus on how 'American intellectual hegemony' should be conceptualized, measured, and defined, nor do our contributors agree on the degree to which nationality in any guise ultimately matters" (p. 6). Kim Richard Nossal's chapter is not so reticent. His survey of fourteen IR textbooks shows "how an image of world politics is constructed and thus world politics understood, and how this is reproduced from one generation to the next in a hermetically sealed Americocentric vacuum" (p. 183). The argument would be much stronger if Vossal had demonstrated that textbooks produced in other national contexts are not guilty of ethnocentrism.

Concerns about methods resurface in A. J. R. Groom and Peter Mandaville's essay. To sustain their argument that there is an emerging "continental" disciplinary identity, the authors conducted a survey that they describe as "dirty and very unprofessional" (p. 159). They should be applauded for being so candid about the limits of their method, but this surely provides grist to the mill of those who believe that much of what passes for scholarship outside the United States lacks rigor and precision. More substantively, there is no doubt that Groom and Mandaville are right to argue that IR in Europe is gaining in strength, but does this generate a European perspective on the international?

This relationship between national (or regional) community and world view is hotly debated elsewhere in the volume. The case of Canada is instructive here. Tony Porter contends that nationality is only one variable influencing how IR is taught and researched. Mark Neufeld and Teresa Healy support this contention through their engagement with "minority currents" in Canadian IR. Exponents of these critical perspectives share the following two propositions. The first is a disinterest in policy advocacy (which is not meant to imply a lack of concern for concrete political practice), and the second is a commitment to critical pedagogy. Here we read that realism and idealism offer only two versions of the same dominant discourse. This is contrasted with "Critical IR," which apparently succeeds in connecting with students who are concerned with issues of social justice. These observations are interesting but beg many questions, such as how this teaching strategy works with students (a majority?) who would rather work for Microsoft than join the brigade of anticapitalist protestors. At a more specific level, it would have been useful if Neufeld and Healy had told us more about the details of their pedagogy. For example, does it work best with case study teaching? Should reading be directed, or is it better to allow students to roam more freely into other disciplines and explore other mediums?

Roger Epp's chapter shows us that critical theory is more convincing when the authors "just do it" rather than talk endlessly about its virtues (while parodying the positions of so-called uncritical theory). Epp's interest is in indigenous peoples and what their neglect tells us about IR. The one theoretical approach that has engaged with them is the English School, even though its narrative of the expansion of international society has relied on "a domestication of aboriginal peoples" (p. 312). Even a rewriting of such narratives to include aboriginal diplomacy risks seeing aboriginal cultures only insofar as they were recognized by European sovereign states. Epp concludes his essay with a warning that pluralism is limited unless there is a genuine commitment not just to represent but also to listen to the other.

Feminist thinkers have long made this argument. In her chapter on transcending national identity, Jan Jindy Pettman reminds us of the gender inequalities built into both academic IR and global political practices. As a critique, this is powerful stuff. It is less convincing in the claim that there is a transnational community of women based on the "near-universal ways in which so many women experience identity conflicts and different kinds of violence" (p. 261). In support of this claim she quotes Virginia Woolf's famous contention that, "as a woman, I have no country. As a woman I want no country. As a woman my country is the whole world" (p. 261). Only a few years after Woolf wrote these words, women showed that they did want their country and made significant sacrifices for its survival. Pettman is aware of the importance of location and the fact that there are many tensions within the world of women along race and class lines. But this raises the question of how much diversity the feminist project can allow while maintaining its commitment to the emancipation of women as a transnational identity based on shared values and experiences.

D. S. L. Jarvis's chapter on identity politics has a great deal to say about feminism. It is highly critical of standpoint feminists for privileging the gender variable over other identities. Postmodern feminists are dismissed for retreating from the main IR agenda. The main contention is that identity tribalism is a blind alley: We are different in many important ways, Jarvis argues, but what matters is what we share, such as a repulsion against violence and poverty. Jarvis's answer to the second thematic question underpinning the book is that the recent proliferation of approaches does not constitute theoretical progress.

More is not better for Kalvi J. Holsti either. He mobilizes a polemical critique of those who inhabit what he calls Identityville—the "postmodernists, poststructuralists, critical theorists, feminist standpointers of unlimited hues, hermeneuticians, empiricists, historical sociologists, symbolic interactionists, and post-Marxists, just to name some of the more prominent (pp. 81–2). Interestingly, one of Holsti's criticisms of the inhabitants of Identityville is their lack of tolerance and respect for other approaches. There is no evidence that these qualities are present in Holsti's reading of critical theory. Traditionalists in glass houses should not throw stones.

Those who fear theoretical diversity might, ironically, gain some sustenance from Chris Brown's argument. In an engaging chapter, Brown argues that the discipline was founded upon Anglo-American liberal principles, and "the modern discipline has not yet escaped from its liberal internationalist past" (p. 217). In other words, the gap between traditionalists and postmodernists may not be as wide as either side would like to think.

A telling critique of the framing of International Relations: Still an American Social Science? is that all the authors are located in institutions of higher education in Western nations. To show convincingly that there is diversity in international thought, the book should have included a greater focus on the research and teaching of IR in Africa, Asia, Latin America, and so on. There is diversity out there, but not enough of it is represented in this otherwise lively collection of essays on the state of the discipline.

State Learning and International Change. Andrew Farkas. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1998. 208p. $50.00.

Erik Gartzke, Columbia University

Learning would seem to be a natural topic for the academic study of international politics. Interest in dynamic processes, however, and in learning, in particular, has been uneven, while the impact of contributions to date has been mixed. State Learning and International Change provides a thorough, thoughtful application of a complex biological learning model to international politics. The text is engaging and well written. Modeling and philosophy of science issues are addressed with aplomb and humor. For example, the author refers to the residue from social Darwinist applications of biological models to social science as "pesky," discusses stocasticity and pleiotropy with reference to striped and spotted cross-eyed bandersnatches, and mentions "deranged mutant-killer-monster snow goons" as a possible method of biological selection, all in the space of a few pages (pp. 59–67).

The core of the text is an evolutionary learning model, intended to "explain how states arrive at foreign policy decisions" (p. 1). In the model, agents (policy elites) are initially randomly assigned policy positions. Policy evolves as the weighted average of the recommendations of policy elites succeeds or fails and the weighting of recommendations is adjusted in response to performance. A later version of the model allows elites to shift their own recommendations in response to success or failure. Propositions derived from the model include the insight that extreme policy positions may improve policy (p. 101) and the finding that multiple advocacy can be counterproductive (p. 149). These propositions are in tension, however, if including extreme positions involves more policy advocates.

Evolutionary metaphors are often used to justify key "as if" assumptions of rational theory. Noting that selection generates "fitness," the quality of being successful by appropriate evolutionary criteria, Farkas is able to show that even automatons can approximate optimizing behavior. This is an appealing finding, and one that emphasizes complementarity between the rational and the biological approaches. Unfortunately, Farkas presents the evolutionary model as an alternative to rationality.

Farkas appears to criticize a particular kind or rationality, ignoring opportunities to address his concerns, while adopting practices or attributes that parallel rationalist approaches or are equally subject to criticism. For example, Farkas challenges the plausibility of assumptions used in rational choice models but assumes that agents in his game all have heterogeneous preferences over goals. While defensible on tractability grounds, it is clearly not true (Stalin and Trotsky had different goals) and it alludes to the fundamentally problematic nature of arguing over assumptions. More to the point, policy elites in the evolutionary model are egoistic and purposive, seeking to enhance their influence over policy outcomes by adopting recommendations that they believe will be successful. The critical differences, then, between the evolutionary approach and an explicitly rational theory are that elites are initially randomly assigned policies rather than being able to choose policies, that elites update recommendations based solely on past performance, and that selection is exogenous.

There are more minor lapses in the text that perpetuate common errors. For example, in the introduction Farkas asks how people "who individually do not act as if they were rational" (p. 2) can behave as such collectively. Rationality, of course, is not what Farkas is addressing. Since rationality is judged by conformity to a postulated set of objectives (derived from a preference ordering and constraints), we can say that a particular formulation of rationality is wrong, but not typically that people are not rational. Prospect theory, for example, offers a different utility function, not an assertion that individuals do not have preferences or that they fail to seek preferred outcomes.

A more important set of issues has to do with evolution and politics. As the text points out, "The evolutionary model of state learning ... depends on an analogy between beliefs and genes and policy and positions and phenotypes" (p. 62). At the core of the evolutionary model is the selection mechanism that adjusts the influence of policy elites. In biological systems, selection may be an exogenous process, but in politics seeking to manipulate the criteria by which one succeeds or fails is an important part of the game. Whether selection occurs in the consciousness of the leader (where contrary to claims in the text it would involve complex calculations), or in the institutions and norms of the state, an agent that can influence the way weights are assigned is evolutionarily advantaged. Since this requires cognitive skills (one must anticipate events and the actions of other agents), it is evolutionarily desirable in politics not to be an automaton. The assertion that the assumption of rationality is overly restrictive then appears somewhat more restrictive than allowing actors to think.

Another concern with, or potential expansion of, the model is that it assumes that objectives do not change. Policy evolves in the learning model to respond better to existing policy concerns. This is problematic if, for example, one is dealing with nuclear weapons. The ability to think and act strategically may be superior if learning from experience is dangerous or costly. Similarly, whether policy elites view the world through the insights of predecessors depends on whether these insights continue to be germane. If relevant processes remain substantially the same over time, then decision making based on inherited heuristics is sound. If, instead, environments change rapidly (as apparently occurs in modernity), then the value of inherited heuristics declines and individuals have an incentive to depend on other sources (peers, their intellect) for insight. This implies that the environments that are most ripe for the evolutionary perspective are those that do not change much or often.

In natural or sexual selection, as the rate or intensity of change increases, individuals or groups with traits that bias toward survival or desirability will increasingly predominate. However, in politics, the rapidity or intensity of change affects the salience of the evolutionary metaphor. As the rate or intensity of change increases, individuals or groups that depend on inherited knowledge will tend to do less well than those who reason. If allowed to exist, rational agents will predominate. After all, human cognitive abilities appear out of natural selection. Thus, the irony is that it would be at odds with the evolutionary metaphor to advocate the current evolutionary model of learning. In systems where knowledge is likely to be time-bound, adopting inherited heuristics biases against selection. The approach with greater fitness is to avoid heuristics and adopt rational choice.

The text emphasizes that the validity of a model depends on how much it explains. "Careful readers who are concerned with the misapplication of biological models would do well to ask how accurately a model captures the behavior it purports to represent and whether the predictions made by the model are supported by the data available to test it" (p. 67). The text offers many anecdotes, but there is no systematic assessment in the context of international relations. Further, there is substantial overlap between the evolutionary approach and existing rationalist explanations for international behavior. "The evolutionary model of learning produces outcomes that are identical—or nearly so—with those predicted by rational-choice models" (p. 76). I am willing to believe that the model has empirical leverage, but let me suggest at least one framework for a more general test.

Why not assess implications of the evolutionary approach for government institutions, rules, SOPs, etc.? There is little discussion of institutional and informal constraints on decision making in the text. This is striking because rules and other constraints are well suited to the propagation of knowledge. It is clear why incumbents seek to impose their will on future decision makers through institutional constraints. What is less immediately obvious is why subsequent decision makers would defer to such constraints. Rules carry knowledge of the relationship between policies and outcomes and so impact decision making. The evolutionary perspective suggests why and how rules develop and when they are maintained. Further, these are easily observable properties of states, so that tests of implications of the evolutionary approach should be manageable. Finally, this is an interesting aspect of politics that rationalist theories seek to explain, but not without some difficulty.

One learns from State Learning and International Change that there is much still to learn about learning in international politics. Farkas forces readers to examine conventional assumptions about foreign policy decision making. Rationality is not necessary to generate behavior that is consistent with the claims of rational models, nor need one adopt rational theory to engage in interesting, informative research. However, while contrasting rational and evolutionary approaches is of considerable value, of even greater value would be an exploration of the boundaries between, and synthesis of, rational and evolutionary models. Farkas offers a promising glimpse of the value of an exploration of learning in international politics and a hint at what the synthesis between these two perspectives can achieve. This alone should encourage readers to have a look.

Public Attitudes Toward Immigration in the United States, France, and Germany. By Joel S. Fetzer. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000. 272p. $54.95 cloth, $19.95 paper.

Gallya Lahav, State University of New York at Stony Brook

Joel Fetzer is to be congratulated for a serious attempt to bring a public opinion approach to comparative immigration politics. His book represents an ambitious step toward bridging the gap between policy input and output in the immigration equation of advanced industrialized democracies. Its occasional choppy organization and underdeveloped data analysis tend to distract from the import of the work and leave the reader yearning for a deeper and more substantive discussion.

Although the title promises to tell us about public attitudes toward immigrants and immigration, the focus is on negative attitudes, or what Fetzer calls "nativism," an American term that can be equated with xenophobia in the European context (see chap. 1, note 1). Fetzer never goes beyond a broad definition of the term, but he is careful to isolate the complex renditions of this dependent variable along three dimensions: immigration affect, policy preferences, and support for anti-immigrant movements. The author's stab at compiling extensive comparative data is impressive, especially given serious constraints in obtaining cross-national data.

The exploration of causal attitudinal factors ventures into a major polemic in our understanding of tolerance of minorities and immigrants. What explains immigrant rejection and hostility—economics or culture? Attitudinal research has yielded contradictory results over ecological and contextual factors, and theoretical advances are inconclusive. Ironically, Fetzer rarely speaks directly to a whole host of budding scholarship in the immigration field, which has made significant headway on subjects he addresses. These include the rise and consolidation of the extreme Right parties, restrictive immigration policies, and immigration politics. To these studies, Fetzer's book uniquely adds rigorous empirical data testing that relies on theories exported from social psychology, economics, and cultural anthropology.

Fetzer works in "threes." He tests three theories in three separate nation-states employing three different modes of analysis: historical, time-series, and cross-sectional analyses. The first question to be asked is how the United States, a traditional country of permanent immigration, fits into a comparative scheme with such temporary labor countries as France and Germany. More might have been said about the comparative framework, the rationale of case selection, and the convergent findings.

The prevalence of each theory—marginality, economic self-interest, and contact—is tested against models of the three forms of nativism/xenophobia. Marginality theory, whether cultural, economic, religious, or gender-based, poses that people who are considered outside the dominant cultural template of a society are ceteris paribus more likely than their native counterparts to empathize with oppressed individuals (i.e., incoming immigrants). It suggests that marginalized groups will not be socialized into the dominant norms of the society, as Fetzer argues is the case with American Jews, who maintain a culture distinct from the dominant Protestant culture of the United States (p. 9).

Economic self-interest theory includes both the typical labor market variant and the use-of-service type. It may involve relative deprivation or sociotropic effects. In terms of immigration, the theory posits that individuals who believe their economic well-being is endangered by an influx of cheap labor will be more likely to feel an anti-immigrant effect than will people who believe they are secure in their job and income position. There is a tendency here to treat immigrants as a monolithic group and to overlook the threat that the rapidly growing and important skilled labor force poses to highly educated natives (p. 21).

The contact thesis (both individual and aggregate) involves the amount and type of exposure to immigrants. Much of this theory stems from the work of Gordon Allport (The Nature of Prejudice, 1979), who identified two main types of contact: "casual contact," which promotes prejudice, and "true acquaintance," which generates more tolerance. Fetzer attempts to conduct analysis on measures that he argues represent both forms of contact. The analysis seems to fall short of effectively measuring what would allow us to distinguish between casual and true acquaintance contact. To some degree this problem can be ignored, because all the measures used to test for the presence of contact theory are not systematically proven, but it does beg some questions about theoretical utility.

Fetzer concludes that a number of assumptions of both economic and marginality theories are upheld by the data. When they contradict each other, the marginality theory has a slight advantage, especially when it is formulated in cultural terms. These conclusions are rather clear, but the explanatory power of each theory alone is somewhat compromised by the failure to account for interaction effects. Many of the theoretical streams overlap (i.e., economic marginality and economic self-interest) or appear to be at loggerheads (i.e., sociotropic versus self-interest), which underminies their predictive value. One might take issue with these competing paradigms in favor of a more interactive approach, such as that used by Jeannette Money in her analysis of antiimmigrant sentiment at the local level (Fences and Neighbors, 1999). Her study reveals that the interactive part of job competition, for example, comes not from the mere presence of migrants but their presence when unemployment rises (which is what creates labor market competition). This perspective underscores the need to identify and delineate more systematically these contextual variables so as to predict conditions under which rejection explodes.

Fetzer is much more successful at isolating the causes of xenophobia than he is in his perscriptive trajectory. Although he builds a compelling case for policy-relevant attitudinal research, his policy prescriptions do not flow from the data. Fetzer never clearly states how public opinion relates to policy articulation and elaboration. He corroborates conventional postnational arguments made by such scholars as Yasemin Nuhoglu Soysal (Limits of Citizenship, 1994) and David Jacobson (Rights across Borders, 1996) about the narrowing of boundaries, but there is some tautology in his assessment that the lines between immigrants and dominant cultures fade. In fact, this claim seems to contradict his important finding that minorities continue to ally with their "cultural" kin.

The use of multilevel modes of qualitative and quantitative analysis is commendable. The longitudinal rationale and breakdown of timeframes are not necessarily obvious, however, and the historical analysis is often anecdotal. Fetzer runs into some typical problems with cross-national measures of foreign-born populations (see tables A1.1, 4), which vary with regard to geographic or citizenship criteria. The comparative operationalization of the dependent variable is also somewhat uneven. Intuitively, Fetzer captures an important distinction in the literature between immigration and immigrant policy preferences, but his measurement of these concepts often confounds the two. Does support for Le Pen or the Front National strictly capture anti-immigrant sentiment in France (p. 85), and is it really analogous to American attitudes toward immigration levels? Furthermore, is the right to asylum tantamount to immigrant rights, as Fetzer conceives (p. 111), or does it represent the admission-type of policy areas?

Fetzer's bold foray into the critical "micro-macro question" (p. 148) is a thrilling opening to those stuck in that scholarly divide. The discussion of the two components of Allport's contact theory is a thought-provoking and welcomed alternative to the linear thinking on immigrant effects. Ultimately the book fails to answer directly the important question of individual-aggregate discrepancies, because it is not certain that it truly tests for the latter form of contact and because it defers to the promise of "further research" (p. 81). To be fair, Fetzer does not make this question the pivot of his study. In fact, his goals are much more humble and modest.

If research contributions are evaluated by the extent of questions and further research they inspire, then Fetzer's book is a promise of success. Are the conclusions generalizable? Cultural marginality does not seem to explain why, in immigrant-importing countries of the Middle East, temporary labor is recruited specifically from Asia and other non-Semitic countries. What is the role of international relations as an intervening variable (p. 59)? What is the role of political elites and the media, and how do they relate to mass attitudes? More generally, how do these attitudes relate to policy outcomes? My own comparative work on elite and public opinion has revealed far greater convergence than Fetzer (p. 149) and others project. As Fetzer readily concludes in explaining the German outlier (pp. 132, 149), leaders shape the immigration debate and therefore public reaction. If so, do public attitudes matter? My findings imply that they do, and, thus, Fetzer's work is illuminating.

By embracing the normative component, Fetzer helps fill a critical void in comparative immigration scholarship, and he makes a unique advance in the scientific inquiry into such an emotionally charged issue. Despite the disappointing array of evasive inferences, the book serves as an important prelude and invites more in-depth studies of attitudes. It will be widely cited.

Deterrence and Security in the 21st Century: China, Britain, France, and the Enduring Legacy of the Nuclear Revolution. By Avery Goldstein. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 2000. 356p. $49.50.

Lawrence Freedman, King's College, London

Clausewitz once observed that in war everything is simple, but the simplest things are very complicated. This seems to apply doubly so to nuclear deterrence. The principle is very simple: A potential enemy is persuaded not to do anything rash by the prospect of devastating retaliation. But it soon gets complicated. What difference does it make if the idea is not only to protect the homeland but also allies? As potential enemies acquire their own means of devastating retaliation, issues of preemption arise, and this requires close attention to the details of force structure. How varied, overwhelming, and surprising need the attacker be, especially if there is little interest in preemption? How much need the defender disperse, conceal, or protect forces, or develop antimissile defenses, just in case the other side is contemplating preemption? What happens if both sides are contemplating preemption at the same time? Can understandings, tacit or negotiated, between potential enemies ease the dangers of a crisis getting out of Questions such as these kept busy generations of nuclear strategists and led them to develop a substantial literature. Although this was largely concerned with the U.S.-Soviet relationship, the literature nonetheless was often abstract and theoretical, trying to work out what rational actors might do in hypothetical nuclear predicaments before worrying what the actual states involved might do. At the same time, because much appeared to depend on the hardness of concrete shelters or the accuracy of a missile warhead, this high theory had to be combined with some quite technical analyses of the properties of particular weapons. And then there was always the political dimension, concerned with the tenability of alliances and the dynamics of crisis management, followed by demands to come up with sensible proposals for force structure and arms control negotiations.

By such processes do simple problems become complicated. The deterrence industry grew even as the superpower relationship itself stabilized. The stability was the result of the practice being a lot simpler than the theory. Politicians understood the essential point. If you were going to risk nuclear war, you had to be really sure of your calculations. The consequences of getting it wrong were huge, and the inherent uncertainties were substantial; prudence was always the order of the day. This was especially so after the tense moments over Berlin and Cuba in the early 1960s.

The problem of deterrence for lesser nuclear powers appeared to be far less demanding. Robert McNamara, when Secretary of Defense, claimed that small nuclear forces would be "dangerous, expensive, prone to obsolescence and lacking in credibility as a deterrent." Either he was right, in which case the disincentives to getting into the nuclear business would be profound, or he was wrong, in which case proliferation could be expected as more states concluded that at quite modest numbers a nuclear deterrent could be both survivable and useful.

Avery Goldstein, who takes the second of these views, considers the Cold War experience of China, Britain, and France and judges its relevance for the post-Cold War world. He examines not only the rationales for their acquisition of nuclear forces but also what they thought was necessary to achieve their deterrent purposes. He finds that they felt able to do this without attempting to match the exacting standards set by the United States and the Soviet Union, at least so long as they were limited in their ambitions and confined themselves to preserving the status quo. The trouble is that in developing this position goldstein demonstrates himself to be a complicator. There appears to be not a single issue of deterrence theory that he does not attempt to address, and he even includes his own little "expected utility model." The result is a dense read, with the more interesting material often tucked away in footnotes, and few general propositions are reached on the viability of alternative deterrence strategies that are not context-dependent.

Fortunately, Goldstein also seeks to develop his argument through case studies. His previous book was on China, and by far the best sections of this book are those that deal with the history of China's nuclear force. He is on top of all the best scholarship on Chinese foreign policy, from the entry into the Korean War to the Sino-Soviet dispute and the opening to the United States, and he has interesting things to say on why the force structure took the form it did. The case studies of France and Britain are less successful. Goldstein's neorealist position leads him to argue that the core motive behind acquisition was the lack of confidence in a superpower protector. That has some validity with France, as with China, but for Britain that is a much smaller part of the story. Of course the "standing alone" scenario was part of the rationale, but the basic impulse behind Britain's nuclear capability was, first, its initial status as one of the "big three" and indeed as the first country to demonstrate the possibility of a nuclear bomb and, second, its constant belief that a national nuclear capability provided an entrée into American policymaking.

Whether these three cases tell us much about the future is unclear. One might have thought the Israeli, Indian, and Pakistani cases, to which Goldstein devotes a few pages, are more relevant. As for future proliferation he points to the importance of the degree of insecurity afflicting individual states, the availability of nonnuclear means of addressing such insecurity as does exist, and the economic and technical capacity to develop the nuclear option. Goldstein's candidates are those that neorealists identified just after the end of the Cold War—Germany, Japan, and Ukraine—although in none of these cases is a military nuclear program on the immediate political agenda. The candidates that most bother American politicians—Iran, Iraq, and North Korea—are dealt with only in a cursory manner.

The underlying philosophy appears to be an expectation that the international system might one day conform to a neorealist model, that is, return to the great power politics of the old days, and then governments might be very grateful for any nuclear insurance that they had taken out. This indicates the basic problem with the title. Of course, the nuclear revolution remains important, and who knows what challenges might develop in the future, but to understand deterrence and security in the twenty-first century it is necessary to make sense of ways in which the state system is already changing; new forms of insecurity are developing, and therefore new forms of deterrence are required. This book is welcome for the historical analyses of the smaller nuclear powers but, contrary to the title, has nothing to say about security and deterrence in the twenty-first century, other than to suggest that it may be like the twentieth century.

Unipolarity and the Middle East. By Birthe Hansen. New York: St. Martin's, 2000, 288p. $59.95.

War, Institutions and Social Change in the Middle East. Edited by Steven Heydemann. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000. 372p. $60.00 cloth, $24.95 paper.

"Pariah States" and Sanctions in the Middle East: Iraq, Libya, Sudan. By Tim Niblock. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner, 2001. 241p. $49.95.

Robert O. Freedman, Baltimore Hebrew University

Scholars of Middle Eastern studies in the last decade often were preoccupied with two major problems. First, the democratization that has spread over most of the globe seems to have missed the Middle East. Second, there appears to be a growing gap between international relations and comparative politics theory, on the one hand, and Middle East studies, on the other. In seeking to explain why, some point to the highly politicized scholarship that can still be found in Middle East studies. Others argue that the theorists simply have not tried hard enough to fit the special nature of the Middle East into their theoretical models, or that Middle Eastern scholars have not tried hard enough to deal with theory. Two of the three books under review, by Hansen and Heydemann, do a great deal to narrow the gap between theory and reality in the Middle East. The book by Niblock is an example of the kind of highly politicized scholarship that is still found too often in Middle Eastern studies.

International relations theory meets the Middle East in Birthe Hansen's Unipolarity and the Middle East. In an admirable attempt to adapt Kenneth Waltz's theory of neorealism to Middle Eastern events in the 1990s, Hansen discusses a number of key developments during that period, including the Gulf War, the unification of Yemen, and the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, from the perspective of what is depicted as the "unipolar world" that emerged in the 1990s. Hansen offers some useful insights, but the problem, as with some of other international relations theorists who seek to deal with a region in which they do not have first-hand knowledge, is that a series of factual errors and questionable interpretations mar the rigor of analysis. Nonetheless, Hansen's discussion of unipolarity has strong theoretical merit and can be usefully refined by other scholars, including those with a greater knowledge of the region as well as international relations theorists, to reflect more closely Middle Eastern realities.

Essentially, Hansen argues that in the unipolar world that emerged in the 1990s the states of the region had to adapt or suffer the consequences. Syria, which did adapt, was able to reinforce its position in Lebanon by "flocking" (p. 65) to the side of the United States during the Gulf War. By contrast Iraq, which did not adapt, suffered a major defeat. Similarly, Hansen argues, Yemen unified because the northern and southern sections of the country could no longer benefit from the superpower "zero-sum game" competition for their support. Morocco was able to consolidate its control over the former Spanish Sahara because Algeria no longer had the Soviet Union to support it, whereas Morocco continued to have the support of the unipole, the United States.

A number of other interpretations of these events and others cited in the book are possible. To take but one example, it can be persuasively argued that the bloody civil war in Algeria, rather than the loss of Soviet support (which, in any case, diminished during the 1980s [p. 164]), was the primary reason Algeria acquiesced in Moroccan control of the former Spanish Sahara. Another questionable assertion is that the Cold War ended in September 1989, when Moscow made concessions on strategic arms to the United States (p. 78), rather than in January 1989, when the USSR withdrew from Afghanistan, or, as most observers contend, when the USSR acquiesced in both the fall of the Berlin Wall in November 1989 and the subsequent unification of Germany.

In addition to some questionable assertions, there are some factual errors. Syria intervened militarily in Lebanon for the first time in 1975, not 1976 (p. 141). Following the Hebron massacre in 1994, foreign observers were sent to Hebron, not Jericho (p. 169). There is also a misreading of Soviet support for Iraq during the Iran-Iraq war (after flip-flopping several times, Moscow tilted to the side of Iran in 1987) (p. 109) and a downgrading of the increasing Soviet opposition to the U.S. war effort against Iraq in January and February 1991. Hansen overestimates the influence of the Arab Cooperation Council in the 1989–90 period.

One also may question the theory of unipolarity itself. If the United States is indeed the unipole in the system, how does one explain Iraqi and Iranian opposition to the United States from 1991 to 2001, and the Palestinian rejection of U.S. mediation efforts in July 2000 (the Camp David II talks) and December 2000, during the Al-Aksa Intifadah? Perhaps it might be more useful, from a theoretical perspective, to call the 1990–2000 period one of limited unipolarity and to restructure the theory accordingly to explain the behavior of Iraq, Iran, and the Palestine Liberation Organization. Such a restructuring also would add more credence to the other case studies in the book. Despite its faults, the book is well worth reading because of Hansen's contribution to international relations theory.

Whereas Hansen asserts that the unipolar world led by the United States, with its emphasis on the spread of liberal democracy and free market capitalism, is basically a positive development, Tim Niblock describes the new world order established by the United States after the Gulf War as a "malign hegemony" (p. 6). A strong strain of anti-Americanism pervades his book, which purports to show "the view from the underside" (p. 7). Niblock asserts that this persective "does not imply disregard for international law but rather a determination not to allow international law and international institutions (such as the UN) to be used to promote Western/U.S. interests" (p. 6). He cites numerous interviews in both Libya and Iraq in his footnotes, and he clearly sympathizes with both countries, which weakens the analytical quality of the book. In the case of Libva, he asserts that one effect of sanctions, corruption, reflects the more general commercialization of society that is clearly associated with wider global processes that have spread Western values (pp. 76-7), and he also blames sanctions for the spread of Islamism in Libya (p. 90).

If Niblock takes a rather gentle view of Kaddafi's policies in Libya, he is even more sympathetic to Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein. Time after time Niblock supports Iraq's resistence to UN efforts, from ascertaining the status of Iraq's holdings of weapons of mass destruction (WMD) to the UN distribution of food to the Iraqi population, as justified because of Iraq's sense that its sovereignty was being challenged. Niblock frequently simply restates Iraqi arguments without critically evaluating them, such as the statement that the UN WMD inspection efforts were "simply a cover for creating an imbalance of power in the region favorable to Israel" (p. 104).

In sum, if one is looking for an apologia for the Libyan and Iraqi regimes, and a strong denunciation of the U.S.-led sanctions against them, this is the book.

By contrast, the edited book by Steven Heydemann is an example of first-rate scholarship. Heydemann asked a group of scholars to examine the thesis of Charles Tilly and others in Tilly's edited book, The Formation of National States in Western Europe (1975), to see whether their perspectives on the role of war in the expansion of state capacities, the emergence of new patterns of human and economic mobilization, and the organization of extractive institutions could be usefully compared to the formation of states in the Middle East. There are a number of excellent chapters in Heydemann's book, many of which not only add a new theoretical perspective to the dynamics of statebuilding in the Middle East but also offer new information about the evolution of many states in the region.

One of the best chapters is by Heydemann and Robert Vitalis on the role of the Middle East supply center in Cairo during World War II. The story of the center has been told before, as Roger Owen notes in a very helpful concluding chapter, but Heydemann and Vitalis cover new ground by convincingly demonstrating how Egypt and Syria, once they became independent states, had a much greater role for the state in their economies than they otherwise might have, due to the effect of the supply center on the two countries during World War II.

The chapter by Reem Saad on the experience of the Egyptian peasants during the 1967 and 1973 wars, based on detailed interviews in a single village, provides some fascinating insights on peasant attitudes toward their government and leaders in time of war. Although loyal to the state, they were very angry at Nasser, hitherto a hero for his land distribution policies, whom they blamed for lying to them at the beginning of the conflict about Egypt's great "victory" (p. 242), although they felt he was misled by his advisers. Interestingly enough, there was little lasting emotional feeling about the 1973 war. Saad speculates that this may have been due to the exhaustive Egyptian state propaganda about the "victory" in the 1973

Another very strong chapter deals with the formation of the militarized regime in Iraq under Saddam Hussein. Written by Isam al-Khafaji, it demonstrates how, through a combination of external war and internal terror, Saddam built loyalty among Sunni Muslims while marginalizing both Shia and Kurdish Iraqis (p. 282). Al-Khafaji also analyzes Saddam's use of "Arabism" as a device to secure loyalty not only from Sunni Iraqis but also from Arabs throughout the Arab world. According to Saddam, as their champion, Iraq deserved, indeed, was owed money by the Gulf Arabs (al-Khafaji calls this "strategic rent extraction," p. 273) to support its war against Iran (despite the fact that Saddam started the war by invading Iran).

A central theme in the Heydemann book is that unlike the states of Europe from the 17th to 19th century, which extracted taxes from their own populations to build up their military power and, in some cases, became more responsive to their populations as a result, a number of states in the Middle East avoided conflicts with their populations over taxes by becoming rentiers. This group included not only the oil-rich states of the Persian Gulf but also Egypt, Syria, and Iraq, which received military equipment from abroad either gratis or paid for by other Arab states. Needless to say, the end result was a very different relationship between rulers and ruled in the Middle East than in Europe. The Heydemann book goes a long way toward explaining why, in countries such as Syria, Egypt, and Iraq as well as in the Gulf states, genuine democracy has yet to develop.

Empire. By Michael Hardt and Antonio Negri. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2000. 478p. $36.95 cloth, $18.95 paper.

Manfred B. Steger, Illinois State University and University of Hawai'i—Manoa

Hailed by sympathetic reviewers as the "Communist Manifesto for our time" and condemned by scathing critics as an "impenetrable work of absolute abstraction," Empire has exploded on an unsuspecting international academic scene. Indeed, the tremendous appeal of the book has transcended the narrow walls of the ivory tower, drawing to its authors a glaring public spotlight that only rarely shines on political and literary theorists. In the ongoing public debate over the virtues and flaws of the study, even its most intransigent detractors can hardly deny that Empire represents a powerful neo-Marxist contribution to the rapidly emerging field of "globalization studies."

Like this new area of research, Michael Hardt and Antonio Negri's best-selling study is unapologetically interdisciplinary in character. Its authors are willing to paint in broad strokes, in the process eagerly digesting a plethora of materials drawn from legal studies, politics, economics, philosophy, anthropology, cultural studies, comparative literature, and critical theory. Franz Kafka and Herman Melville are made to rub shoulders with Baruch Spinoza and Karl Marx; the postmodernist ideas of Michel Foucault, Gilles Deleuze, and Félix Guattari are interspersed with the modernist insights of Hans Kelsen, Otto Bauer, and Max Weber.

Mixing passionate revolutionary appeals with abstract philosophical investigations and detached sociological analyses, Empire constitutes a fascinating tapestry of innovative ideas, brilliant interpretations, flamboyant provocations, shameless exaggerations, and bold generalizations. The 400plus pages of text pulsate with creative energy, taking the reader on an intellectual roller coaster ride that too often relies on dense language and esoteric terminology. The book incorporates Negri's long-standing sympathies for the central themes of the "autonomist movement" within 1970s Italian communism: skepticism of "big government, big business, and big labor" (p. 350); the "quest for workers' autonomous self-government" (p. 349); and "the multitude's right to selfcontrol and autonomous self-production" (p. 407). Hardt's influence is most obvious in the study's poststructuralist emphasis on the biopolitical (re)production of social life under conditions of late capitalism, in which the economic, the political, and the cultural increasingly overlap and invest one another (see, especially, pp. 22-41).

At the core of the study, one finds the authors' insistence that "Empire" represents a radically new paradigm of authority and control—a "new global order" composed of a series of national and supranational organisms that supersede old, nation-state-centered forms of sovereignty. For Hardt and Negri, "Empire" is not merely a metaphor but a promising theoretical concept signifying a "political subject that effectively regulates these global exchanges, the sovereign power that governs the world" (p. xi). In their view, this single logic of globalization operates in all spheres of social life, perhaps most visibly in the regulation of human interaction, the formation of global markets, the creation of new technologies, the expansion of vast circuits of material and immaterial production, and the generation of gigantic cultural flows. No longer opposed by an extrasystemic "outside," this new form of sovereignty constitutes a regime that effectively encompasses the "spatial totality" of the entire globe (pp. 353, 413). Wielding enormous powers of oppression and destruction, Empire neither establishes a territorial center nor relies on fixed boundaries, but "manages hybrid identities, flexible hierarchies, and plural exchanges through modulating networks of command. The distinct national colors of the imperialist map of the world have merged and blended in the imperial global rainbow" (pp. xii–xiii) As a regime "with no temporal boundaries and in this sense outside of history or at the end of history" (p. xv), Empire thus dwarfs any particular imperialist project previously undertaken by single nation-states.

Indeed, one of the major debates in globalization studies revolves around the question of whether the current "spatial reorganization of production" (James Mittelman) and the apparent "compression of time and space" (David Harvey) really constitute an entirely new phenomenon. On this issue, Hardt and Negri clearly side with other "hyperglobalizers," such as Susan Strange, Kenichi Ohmae, William Greider, and Martin Albrow, who argue that globalization defines a new epoch of human history, a fundamental reconfiguration of the framework of human action in which nation-states are becoming increasingly less important actors (see, especially, pp. xi, 5-20, 336). Unfortunately, however, Hardt and Negri never discuss in sufficient detail contrary empirical evidence provided by such globalization skeptics as Paul Hirst, Graham Thompson, and Linda Weiss, who conclude, first, that current world flows of trade, investment, labor, and ideas are by no means historically unprecedented and, second, that national governments seem to possess enduring powers to regulate economic activities. This omission points to a systemic flaw that prevades Empire: its authors' reluctance to engage fully the rapidly growing, diverse body of literature on the subject of globalization.

After a descriptive analysis of the present features of Empire and a long interpretation of the historical transition from imperialism to Empire, Hardt and Negri conclude on an optimistic note, suggesting that the creative forces of the exploited and subjugated producers that sustain Empire are also capable of autonomously constructing a "counter-Empire"—an alternative political organization of global flows and exchanges fueled by the multitude's "will to be against" (p. 210). Struggling for global mobility, global citizenship, a guaranteed social wage, and the right to the reappropriation of the means of production, this subjugated multitude is poised to invent new democratic expressions and new forms of constituent power.

In this context, Hardt and Negri's discussion of the subversive effects of a political demand for global citizenship is simply superb (pp. 396-400). A direct response to a globalizing world, mass migration and increasing mobility contain a truly revolutionary potential to undermine economic inequalities and asymmetrical power relations that are rooted in an anachronistic defense of fixed boundaries and spatial divisions separating the Northern and Southern hemispheres. Calling for subversion, insurrection, and biopolitical selforganization, Hardt and Negri end their study by introducing the heroic figure of the "militant" as the one who best expresses the life of the multitude. A cross between St. Francis of Assisi and a Wobbly organizer, the counter-imperial militant engages with new vigor in a "revolution that no power will control," thus posing against the misery of Empire "the irrepressible lightness and joy of being communist" (p. 413).

The greatest virtue of the book lies in its authors' ability to construct a new grand narrative of globalization that draws on relevant insights from diverse left traditions such as Marxism, anarchism, existentialism, poststructuralism, critical theory, critical race theory, subaltern studies, and feminist theory. Yet, contrary to its professed philosophical eclecticism, Empire remains stubbornly wedded to dogmatic Marxist categories that reify production (albeit in its postmodern, "biopolitical" version), reaffirm a communist teleology, and reduce the political arena to a "field of pure immanence" (p. 354). Unable to resolve the tension between the posture of revolutionary subjectivism and that of detached objectivism, the authors frequently fall prey to a deterministic view of globalization as a "structurally inevitable" and "irreversible" process (p. 336)—politically disempowering constructions that are the hallmarks of both Marxist and neoliberal ideology.

While rightfully criticizing "ideological master narratives" that are partly responsible for producing the very conditions they purport to explain, Hardt and Negri nonetheless accept all too easily Marxist and neoliberal representations of globalization as an all-encompassing process driven by a single capitalist logic. It is one thing to argue that modernity has both touched and transformed even the remotest corners of this earth, but it is quite another to suggest that the alleged "systemic totality" of Empire is no longer opposed by a qualitatively different "outside." To this reviewer, Hardt and Negri's account of globalization is hard pressed to explain the current renaissance of patriotic discourses that reify the nation-state as the chief provider of security against terrorist attacks from the antimodernist "outside"—or, conversely. exclusivist narratives that glorify the nation-state as the chief supporter of antimodernist struggles against the menacing secular "outside."

Still, Empire ought to be required reading for those interested in what is shaping up to be the most significant issue of our time.

Globalization of Japan: Japanese Sakoku Mentality and U.S. Efforts to Open Japan. By Mayumi Itoh. New York: St. Martin's, 1998. 256p. $45.00.

Kent E. Calder, Princeton University

The tide of globalization that has swept the world political economy over the past two decades is clearly a development of epic importance. Given Japan's economic scale—one-seventh of global GNP and more than one-quarter of world savings—its ability and inclination to respond is likewise a subject of broad international concern. Yet, the debate on Japan's evolving political-economic course has so far yielded far more heat than light.

Despite the bitter, sterile, and increasingly irrelevant struggle of the past decade between "revisionists" and their detractors, there are remarkably few well-researched and theoretically coherent works on the domestic political origins of Japanese foreign policy. There are virtually none in English on the Japanese worldview. This solidly researched and theoretically conscious work, which employs the clear and original concept of sakoku to explain Japan's international behavior in a wide range of policy spheres, helps fill an important void.

in a wide range of policy spheres, helps fill an important void. By sakoku (literally: "secluded nation") mentality, Itoh means the parochial worldview with which both the Japanese public and, to a substantial degree Japan's political leadership, approach international affairs. This mindset, she argues, "is not only ubiquitous in the business sector, but is also prevalent in Japan's cultural, educational, and societal systems" (p. 13). "It constitutes the core of Japanese foreign policy decision-makers' attitudinal prism" (p. 14).

The first third of Globalization of Japan is a concrete explication of how sakoku mentality originated and how it is expressed consistently in Japanese perceptions of the United States and Asia as well as in Japanese prescriptions for economic diplomacy. The other two-thirds of the volume present five richly detailed empirical studies of how sakoku is expressed in concrete policy terms, followed by a conclusion that assesses prospects for Japan's internationalization in the face of such parochial tendencies. The cases cover immigration, Okinawa policy, rice liberalization, collective security, and UN peacekeeping. The conclusion includes suggestions on how foreign nations should deal with Japan, given its deeply rooted but not incorrigible parochial tendencies.

Itoh's provocative overall argument involves a number of contentions. (1) The internationalization of the Japanese mind has not occurred. (2) Cultural barriers are among the foremost barriers to internationalization. (3) Other Asian nations, such as Korea and Taiwan, are responding more actively and sensitively to globalization than is Japan. (4) Japan has a long way to go, but (5) significant future movement toward true internationalization is not impossible. To encourage internationalist tendencies, Itoh argues that the United States, in particular, should continue to pressure Japan to liberalize but should tailor its appeals more sensitively to exploit potential for collaboration with allies inside Japan (pp. 183–5).

The strength of the book is its combination of a clear original analytic concept (sakoku mentality) with meticulous application in a series of admirably well-researched cases. Itoh makes no pretensions to grand theory, but she draws effectively on Robert Jervis, Jack Snyder, Harold and Margaret Sprout, and other international relations theorists to situate her argument. The sakoku concept seems to have explanatory value across a remarkably broad range of cases, including some, such as the textbook controversy with Japan's Asian neighbors, that have intensified since the book was written.

This creative and carefully researched volume does, to be sure, raise some important yet unanswered questions. Most important, Itoh does not clearly come to terms with arguments that blame institutions, rather than parochial mentality, for Japan's disappointing lack of prointernationalist behavior. She does observe, intriguingly, that on immigration issues the Japanese government has often been more rigid than the general populace (pp. 109–18). Itoh does not pursue the possibility of institutionalist alternatives to her worldview-based explanation very thoroughly.

Itoh is stronger in her description of current Japanese realities than in her policy prescriptions. Few, for example, would quarrel with her sensitive and original observations that Okinawans have suffered as a result of mainland sakoku mentality. Whether it follows that making Okinawa (or any individual region) self-supporting should be a national policy priority is not so clear.

Overall, this is one of the four or five most creative and solidly researched studies on the politics of Japanese foreign policy to appear in the past decade. It deserves wide readership among students not only of Japanese politics and policymaking but also of international relations more generally. Written from the unique standpoint of an expatriate Japanese scholar, it casts critical yet sensitive light on problems of growing importance to our increasingly integrated world.

The Cultural Construction of International Relations: The Invention of the State of Nature. By Beate Jahn. New York: Palgrave, 2000. 182p. $65.00.

The State and Identity Construction in International Relations. Edited by Sarah Owen Vandersluis. New York: St. Martin's, 2000. 207p. $69.95.

Cynthia Weber, University of Leeds

Conceptualizing the sovereign nation-state remains a core concern in the discipline of international relations (IR). Yet, as the volumes by Sarah Owen Vandersluis and Beate Jahn demonstrate, the theoretical location of this conceptual debate is shifting. Questions of identity, like those regarding sovereign nation-states, were answered in the 1990s with reference to terms like social construction. In the new millennium, "the social" is increasingly joined by "the cultural" as an intellectual marker of how serious IR scholars must pose questions of identity. Why this shift? And what difference does it make to our understandings of sovereign nation-states, not to mention IR theory more generally?

The glib answer to the first question is that the discipline of IR is following trends found in the humanities and social sciences generally, albeit typically years behind other disciplines. So the shift in IR is simply a reflection of what occurred earlier elsewhere. Even if this is the case, what accounts for this shift in the first place? Some might say it is the (postmodern?) ungrounding of the terms social and cultural, making the first a less necessary place from which to theorize question of identity and the second a less objectionable place to begin such theorizations. Others might argue that the shift from the social to the cultural is less theoretical and more material, reflecting a recognition that contemporary global phenomena must be equally understood through notions of consumption (more often associated with cultural consumption) as well as through notions of production (more often associated with social construction).

Whatever the reasons for the shift in emphasis from the social to the cultural, the volumes by Vandersluis and Jahn offer an opportunity to address the more important second question: What difference does this shift make for our understanding of sovereign nation-states and for IR theory in general?

The Vandersluis volume consists of a series of engagements with "the question of how to understand the state and its relationship to identity" (p. 4), without caving into the tired debates about whether the state is whithering away in an era of globalization. Organized into two sections, "Constructions of the State" and "Beyond the National State," the volume adopts a self-consciously social constructivist perspective. Its project is to undertake "an interrogation of the ways in which the state and sovereignty as intellectual categories and as historical practices are very slowly changing in response to the different demands, expectations, and constraints being placed upon them" (p. 1).

After a brief "Prologue" by James Mayall and Vandersluis, which does a nice job of offering a coherent overview of what is to follow, the first part of the book contains four essays that address primarily post—World War II understandings of the state. In "The State of International Relations," Martin Shaw provides a synopsis of his historical sociological "globality" argument, which presents the contemporary international system not only as socially constructed in general terms but also as characterized by a Western unified state conglomerate and other centers of state power. Christopher Clapham's chapter, "Degrees of Statehood," argues against an absolutist understanding based on his discussions of statehood and rival centers of power, such as guerrilla movements in sub-Sahara Africa.

The next two chapters in Part I examine the nation/state relationship. Dominique Jacquin-Berdal discuses Eritrean national identity and examines how the principle of "one-nation, one-state"—usually used to legitimize existing states—was in this case used to justify national separatism. Peter Shearman's chapter, "Nationalism, the State, and the Collapse of Communism," analyzes the case of the former Soviet Union to suggest how nationalism, globalization, and democratization are connected in the contemporary world order.

In Part II, three essays take up alternatives to the nation as the only legitimate site for securing state identity. Tim Dunne, in "Colonial Encounters in International Relations: Reading Wight, Writing Australia," reads Australia's encounter with colonialist diplomacy, law, and theories of identity to argue for a "radicalized post-colonial Rationalism [that] can contribute to the process of reconciliation" (p. 124). By focusing on Southeast Asia, Hari Singh, in "Hegemons and the Construction of Regions," looks at how hegemons construct identifiable regions and how these regions influence domestic and international relations. Naomi Mobed's chapter, "Culturalizing Security: Narratives of Identity and the Politics of Exclusion in the Arabian Gulf," examines how the practices and interests of the Gulf Cooperation Council are constructed at the intersections of two discourses of identity, one based on Western state forms and the other based on traditional religion.

Overall, the Vandersluis volume is accessible, clear, and varied. It may not offer many novel theoretical insights and does not risk straying as far away from the state and the nation as it might in the discussion of sovereign identity, but its contribution is to be found in its organization around key questions about state identity and some alternatives and in an array of strong empirical pieces, all of which enact a social constructivist project in one way or another. As Daniel Warner States in his illuminating "Epilogue," "what makes these chapters interesting is that they indicate the variety of responses available to [what Warner calls the state/sovereignty/institutional] dialogue" (p. 197).

In many ways, Beate Jahn's volume is a nice companion to the Vandersluis collection. It also might be classified as social constructivist. Jahn traces the social construction of the concept of the state of nature, which she explains undergirds both realist and liberal conceptualizations of the state, back to its specific historical introduction by the Spanish in their encounter with the Amerindians. In so doing, she produces a straightfoward deconstruction of the nature/culture dichotomy and some of its uses in IR. Put simply, Jahn argues that there is nothing "natural" about what IR calls a state of nature, which is a cultural construct.

Jahn does not stop there. What distinguishes her book from the Vandersluis volume is her preoccupation with how the construction of the state of nature functions culturally. Drawing upon the Clifford Geertz notion of thick description, Jahn argues that state of nature stories function as a cultural context to IR theory generally. She positions herself as a cultural analyst (in addition to a social constructivist) and demonstrates how IR theory conceives of culture as a problem and nature as its solution, how culture and nature became opposed in the Spanish/Amerindian encounter, and therefore how the Western concept of the state of nature is rooted in this cross-cultural experience, thereby making it cultural rather than natural. When IR theorists base their theories on state of nature stories, which construct a hierarchy of cultures between so-called civilized and so-called primitive peoples, they are "justifying in the process the very policies which have produced injustice and inequality in the international sphere in the first place" (p. 155).

Jahn concludes: "Culture, then, exerts quite a considerable power in mainstream International Relations. For the concept of the state of nature contains a culturally peculiar understanding of human nature, history, and destiny" (p. 168). Jahn argues that IR theory would do well to abandon such a concept and is particularly well placed to do so. It should enquire "into the conditions of cooperation and conflict between cultures which are mutually constitutive and subject to change, rather than hope for the day when nature will eventually overcome culture" (p. 169).

Jahn's story is a powerful one. The author convincingly deconstructs one axis of the nature/culture dischotomy in IR theory and analyzes its effects. Even though Jahn often slips from theorizing culture as a context into theorizing it as an ontology, her analysis enables us to think of IR theory not only as socially constructed (which has become a euphemism for "change" in IR theory) but also as cultural practice, as what Geertz has called "an ensemble of stories we tell about ourselves" (Clifford Geertz, The Interpretation of Cultures, 1975, p. 448).

Overall, these two volumes lead us to engage not only with specific IR concepts, such as the sovereign nation-state or the state of nature, but also with IR theory itself conceived of as cultural practice. "Culture" in IR theory should not reductively be read as merely "change" but as complexity analyzed in much the same way Michel Foucault read power (Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak, Critique of Postcolonial Reason, 1999). Such a cultural analysis of IR theory is indeed distinct from a social constructivist analysis, having implication for how we understand not only sovereign nation-states and states of nature but also IR theory more generally.

The International Dimension of Genocide in Rwanda. By Arthur J. Klinghoffer. New York: New York University Press, 1998. 208p. $40.00.

Peter Uvin, Tufts University

This well-documented book analyzes the manifold inconsistent, inefficient, piecemeal, and sometimes counterproductive ways the international community intervened in the dynamics of violence that beset Rwanda before, during, and after the 1994 genocide. Klinghoffer takes a position that runs counter to the popular description of the international community as being totally inactive and uncaring before and during the genocide. Rather, he maintains, interventions did take place, but they failed to achieve their aims. At a descriptive level, Klinghoffer, following Bruce Jones ("Intervention without Borders:' Humanitarian Intervention in Rwanda 1990-1994," Millennium 24 [Summer 1995]: 225-49), makes this point rather successfully. The book contains many interesting pieces of information that, taken together, force us to acknowledge some new elements in the simple picture that has become so dominant about the international community's conduct in Rwanda.

Klinghoffer also seeks to make a few broader, more theoretical, arguments based on his empirical analysis. The foremost is that sovereignty is withering: The events demonstrate that sovereignty "had fallen by the wayside" (pp. 13, 61, 154) or is in "death throes" (p. 154). But more is required to demonstrate that sovereignty is close to death than merely documenting the presence of ethnic hatred, regional war, and cross-border interventions. A second theoretical point is a plea for "humanitarian realism," that is, a serious look at the combination of altruism and self-interest that underlies many countries' behavior in such crises as Rwanda. This point has been made better both empirically and conceptually by Stephen Garret (Doing Good and Doing Well. An Examination of Humanitarian Intervention, 1999). In short, judged on its theoretical contributions, this is a rather disappointing

In its attempt to make an original argument that runs counter to established consensus, the book suffers from some defects. The background section is weak; it simplifies too much, draws solely on far-removed tertiary sources (see, e.g., note 1 p. 6), and occassionally contradicts itself (compare data on 1959-62 refugee flows on pp. 8 and 13). In addition, in what I take to be an effort to demonstrate the complexity of the situation, Klinghoffer seems to adopt a policy of equal criticism against the Habyarimana government and the Rwandan Patriotic Front (FPR). This creates some odd outcomes: To mention but one extreme example, the discussion of the number of persons allegedly killed by the FPR after the genocide (pp. 64–5) is significantly longer than any discussion of the number of people slaughtered during the genocide.

More generally, the author ends up following an overly simplistic "they are all bad guys" storyline, which oversimplifies the complexities and ethical quandaries involved. In order to make his points, Klinghoffer tends to overstate the degree of external peace efforts in the Rwandan crisis before the genocide. There is much very good information pointing to the diplomatic trail left by Western countries as they sought to promote peace. Simultaneously, however, a great deal was done by the international community that seemed to be totally indifferent to the dynamics of violence, exclusion, militarization, and polarization in Rwanda. (I, among others, document this at length in Aiding Violence. The Development Enterprise in Rwanda, 1998). The latter information does not fit into Klinghoffer's points, so he simply does not mention it.

This book adds some important questions to the standard story about the Rwandan genocide. It provides a nice collection of factual information to make that point. Its weakness is that it is rather obsessed with making this point, as well as a few theoretical ones that supposedly follow from it. This seriously reduces the analytical and descriptive quality of the overall work. I recommend it for those who are familiar with the Rwandan case and want a well-documented argument that asks some tough questions. I do not recommend it to people seeking a nuanced and well-grounded understanding of the Rwandan genocide's causes or, indeed, even the overall performance of the international community.

Same Bed, Different Dreams: Managing U.S.-China Relations, 1989–2000. By David M. Lampton. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001. 497p. $35.00.

David Bachman, University of Washington

David M. Lampton's book on the U.S.-China relationship is the best in a series of strong works on the topic in recent years. In contrast to James Mann's About Face (1999) and Patrick Tyler's A Great Wall (1999), books by scholarly journalists that cover the history of the relationship from the late 1960s to the late 1990s and that use declassified documents from the U.S. side extensively, Lampton concentrates solely on the former Bush and Clinton administrations. Moreover, he takes great advantage of his experience as president of the National Committee on United States-China Relations from 1988 to 1996 (he was professor of political science at Ohio State University before serving on the committee, and he is now a professor at Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies) to illustrate the ins and outs of U.S.-China relations. In contrast to Mann and Tyler, Lampton had great access to top Chinese leaders (and top U.S. officials as well) on a recurring basis, and the Chinese side is presented here with more insight than in any other source.

The book is part memoir, part history, part description, and part issue analysis of the dynamics of U.S.-China relations from early 1989 until the last days of the Clinton administration. Political scientists looking for great theoretical insights will be disappointed, but for those who want to understand the nature and evolution of U.S.-China ties, this is the best book to read on the subject.

Seven major themes are interwoven throughout the text. (1) The U.S.-China relationship can be seen as operating on three levels—global, domestic, and individual leader. (2)

Leaders confront two vary different constituencies—global and domestic. (3) Interdependence and external demands create opportunities for nationalistic appeals. (4) China is the largest late modernizer and a growing force in international affairs. At the same time, Chinese leaders and citizens see China as having been victimized by the international system for a long time. (5) Secure and effective political leadership in both countries is a key to managing the bilateral relationship well. (6) The challenge of managing this relationship will only grow in coming years. (7) Despite differences, the United States and China share many important interests, and this gives the relationship more durability than is commonly thought.

Lampton sees four main or potential turning points in U.S.-China relations during the period 1989 to 2000: maintaining the relationship after the Tiananmen massacre of 1989; Clinton's linking and delinking of human rights and China's most-favored-nation status in 1993-94; the Taiwan Strait crisis of 1995-96; and the series of events between April and November 1999, when the United States first turned its back on major Chinese concessions for a bilateral agreement on China's accession to the World Trade Organization, then bombed the Chinese embassy in Belgrade, and finally concluded the bilateral accord on WTO accession. These historical events provide the structure for much of the work, but there are chapters on security issues (with a tour d' horizon of China's international relations), economics and human rights, global institutions, the role of third parties in the bilateral relationship, the images by which each side sees the other, and how their media portray each other.

This is the first book to read on Sino-American relations for the 1989–2000 period, but it is not flawless. The major problem is that the book tries to be a bit of everything. Is it a history of the relationship? Is it an overview of issues? Is it an analysis of conditions in which the relationship is likely to be good (or bad)? Is it an analysis of conditions in which the relationship is likely to be good (or bad)? Is it justifying a series of policy recommendations? Is it designed to show the importance of the National Committee on United States-China Relations (this reviewer is a member of that committee)? Because Lampton tries to do some of all these things, he provides less depth on a number of issues than might be the case if there were a clearer sense of what the book is supposed to be.

A second problem is that of a bias (which I share). Lampton is deeply committed to U.S.-China relations and more generally to the policy of engaging China. As a result, more critical views of U.S.-China ties do not get the type of play that one might hope. This can take several forms or directions. Some expect the Chinese Communist Party will fall from power (or, indeed, believe that the United States should work to hasten its fall), but Lampton does not say much about the implications of these beliefs for the relationship. China's growing military capabilities and human rights abuses are discussed, but they donot receive a balanced treatment or are not constructed into an effective dialogue with the "comprehensive engagement" school of thought.

Implicitly, Lampton presents a view that is sympathetic to the primacy of the executive branch of government and to business in the setting of U.S.-China ties on the U.S. side, a view that is critical of the role of Congress or the role of public opinion in the framing of American policy toward China. Thus, when Lampton examines how individuals matter in the policy process, he highlights congressional critics of engagement (no member of Congress is singled out for advancing U.S.-China relations) and, for an example of an individual who advances the relationship, highlights Maurice Greenberg of the American International [Insurance] Group, who was a major supporter of the National Committee on United States—China Relations. The section on Greenberg almost reads like a thank-you note for the work he did for the committee when Lampton was its president.

These criticisms do not detract from the vast majority of insights provided in this book, which is, as stated earlier, the best work on the subject. But will those who do not share Lampton's views on engagement be persuaded by his analysis? Unfortunately, for all too many people, U.S.-China relations are no longer an issue on which rational argument can contribute to the setting of good policy.

Peace, Power and Resistance in Cambodia: Global Governance and the Failure of International Conflict Resolution. By Pierre P. Lizee. New York: St. Martin's, 2000. 206p. $65.00.

David W. Roberts, University of Ulster

This work discusses conflict resolution in the Western paradigm and Cambodia's recent experience of that. Lizee makes a notable contribution to our understanding of the management of transitions from conflict to peace in this sophisticated piece of analysis. The work revolves around the general hypothesis that the failure of the Cambodian peace process is attributable almost entirely to the inappropriate character of the Western-determined peace process. The book starts by comparing the evolution of conflict management processes in the West and in Cambodia; Lizee makes the differences quite clear, and this part of his work is very strong as an indicator of the evolution of socioinstitutional mores in Cambodia (especially pp. 39-43). He argues that a critical tension accounts for the failure of the Paris Peace Agreement (PPA). This is to be found in the Khmer approaches to social harmony through balance-of-power equations and Buddhist Political violence and conflict resolution in Cambodia can be explained, claims Lizee, because harmony is only maintained when there is a weighted balance of power in favor of a hegemonic group, such as a political clan or monarchy. When a weaker body tries to redress this, it destroys the fabric of harmony, legitimizing violent behavior by the challenged party or grouping. This was probably the case in the fighting that erupted in July 1997, inaccurately characterized in much of the less critical literature as a "coup" by Prime Minister Hun Sen. Moreover, Lizee continues, the academic literature does not acknowledge such concepts, so it can provide no alternatives for the unsuccessful peacekeeping operation in Cambodia between 1991 and 1993. This process, it is claimed, is self-reinforcing because of the repetition of Western peacecreating assumptions, which are transmitted through globalization and which ignore difference in cultural traditions of conflict resolution and the use of violence in settling disputes.

The book is divided into four parts. The second part is directed toward proving the impropriety of the PPA by applying an analysis of cultural institutions and processes in Cambodia to the PPA. According to Lizee, the PPA was conceptually and culturally flawed from the outset, letting down Cambodians and Westerners alike. A great deal of this analysis is thoughtful and probably gleaned through personal insights into Cambodian culture, but it neglects the limitations specific to the evolution of the peace process. Lizee discuses the stages of the war and its movement to peace in a clear manner, and he concludes that the outcome of the political settlement is inappropriate for Cambodia. But this was not because people were ignorant of, or well versed in, Khmer culture. Rather, the limitations were those of geopolitical Cold War realism. The PPA did not take the shape and form that it did because not enough policymakers had an inside track on Cambodia. It took its rigid form because that was what the United States and China sought as conditions for normalization between them and Viet Nam and the USSR.

Throughout the peace process, and certainly up until mid-1990, Washington demanded inclusion of the Khmer Rouge, not because this made sense in terms of conflict resolution but because they were a tool with which to continue the confrontation with Hanoi. The peace process itself only broke through the impasse of the Cold War when the USSR and Viet Nam acquiesced to the terms and conditions for normalization. Lizee provides evidence of these processes, but he does not relate them to the PPA and the failure he identifies. Thus, to blame the whole failure on the cultural limitations of the peace plan is to neglect the overarching shaping process conducted as an adjunct to normalizing relations with Viet Nam and, to a lesser degree, Cambodia. It seems hard to blame either the PPA or the UN Transitional Authority in Cambodia (UNTAC) if their contours were shaped largely by the various constraints that framed and determined the Part three of Lizee's work seeks lessons from the peacemaking experience in Cambodia that do not focus on orthodox arguments regarding technicalities and logistics. It teases with the suggestion that the author is going to provide some evidence as to why the main parties did not cooperate, but this is not forthcoming. A minor criticism is that Lizee describes the Cambodian people as being "fortunate enough to benefit" from the UNTAC operation (p. 139), which seems a little patronizing.

Part four argues that many important lessons from the 1993 experience were not incorporated into the 1998 elections. Lizee misses one crucial new experience, when the opposition refused to accept the victory of the Cambodian People's Party (CPP). The solution was found in the creation of the Senate, an unelected upper house into which the defeated parties' members could be dispersed in the traditional patronage and clientelist system of loyalty and reward. Also, Lizee takes a rather limited perspective on what he terms the "coup" of July 1997. Evidence available since then challenges strongly Lizee's view that Hun Sen was to blame. Furthermore, there is no reference to the fact that Hun Sen was publicly seeking to integrate the remaining Khmer Rouge while Ranariddh was engaged in covert processions with the intention of recruiting forces to influence the all-important balance of power against Hun Sen and the CPP. And there is no reference to Ranariddh being caught redhanded while smuggling weapons into Cambodia disguised as machine parts.

Despite the sometimes dense writing style (e.g., p. 47, para. 3; p. 76, para. 3), this work goes farther than most on this topic. It is especially welcome for offering a sophisticated conceptual alternative to the usual explanations for the failure of UNTAC as being rooted in administrative, technical, and logistical problems. It is marred, however, by certain evaluations, including the persistent reference to "failure" of UNTAC, which did surprisingly well in many areas. Any failure in conflict resolution was a fault neither of UNTAC as an institution nor its members (generally). The fault, as Lizee correctly argues, lies in the international nature of the PPA and the fact that the Cambodian conflict was not settled due to any concern for the Cambodian people. Rather, the PPA ended a superpower conflict in a manner that suited China and the United States. Those needs were incongruent with conflict resolution in Cambodia, and Lizee does well to illustrate this at certain points. With some exceptions, this is a valuable contribution to peace and conflict studies and to work on Khmer.

Democratic Commitments: Legislatures and International Cooperation. By Lisa L. Martin. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2000. 225p. $49.50 cloth, $18.95 paper.

Kathleen R. McNamara, Princeton University

One of the sharpest and most consequential divisions in international relations lies between those who believe that international politics is a realm unto its own and those who see the lines between domestic and international politics as both permeable and pertinent. For the former group, the consequences of anarchy swamp any potential for politics to be ordered at the international level as it is within states. In this view, the dynamics of domestic political life, such as the rule of law, norms of trust, or the independent effects of institutions, are foreign to the international system.

Lisa L. Martin's groundbreaking new book, Democratic Commitments, challenges this (still dominant) canonical viewpoint by forging strong theoretical and empirical linkages between the realm of domestic legislative institutions and international cooperation. By demonstrating that legislatures in stable democracies have the potential to increase the credibility of states' commitments and thus improve the chance of international cooperation, this book contributes significantly to emerging work on the interaction between the domestic political sphere and international outcomes.

The nature of domestic political arrangements has been shown before to be important for international politics, of course, but a persistent obstacle plaguing the literature is a lack of systematic theorizing as well as overly broad hypotheses. So many things may matter in the domestic realm; the trick is to focus on one element without trivializing it. Martin offers a good example of how to solve this problem by positing the role of the legislature as a crucial explanatory variable in the progress of international cooperation. Legislatures are a key element in the broader debate about the nature of democracy's effects on interstate relations, but they have not received ample study. Martin points to how legislative-executive arrangements reverberate back and forth to the systemic level, and the challenge of credible commitment acts as the fulcrum of her investigation.

The general analytical framework explains how differences in international cooperation may vary with different patterns of domestic legislative structure because of their effect on the credibility of national commitment. Martin evaluates alternative perspectives on executive-legislature relationships, and then she teases out more specific hypotheses from different logics of institutional delegation and how they might play out in the area of international cooperation. Legislative influence, not executive dominance, is her emphasis, against most of the literature and much conventional wisdom. Provocatively, she argues that instead of being pesky interlopers who ruin the chances for serious diplomacy, legislatures contribute to positive and cooperative outcomes by allowing agreements to be reached that are more likely to be implemented.

Martin parses out specific predictions and applications of her general framework in several empirical chapters that range over a variety of areas, but all examine the level of executive discretion in foreign policymaking and the effects of such discretion on the policy outcomes. In the U.S. context, she looks at a series of executive aggreements and treaties over the postwar era, using statistical methods to explore the interaction among the domestic influence of legislatures, decisions regarding ratification processes, and the credibility of U.S. commitments to specific agreements. Other chapters examine economic sanctions and variation in the role of Congress, and foreign aid, particularly food assistance.

The second part of the book applies Martin's line of questioning to Europe and parliamentary governments. Arguing quite rightly that the general outlines of her approach should be applicable in a variety of comparative settings, the author examines how variation in the organization of legislatures across the European Union (EU) had a predictable effect on the particular role member states have played in European integration, particularly decisions over the single market. This research is particularly helpful, given the paucity of systematic empirical work on the role of electoral politics in the path to EU integration.

The book also contributes usefully to practical debates in the EU over democratic accountability, in which democracy and efficiency seem locked in a zero-sum battle. Martin suggests that under some conditions (when legislative involvement makes implementation of agreements more likely) these two ideals can be complementary. Her reading of the EU case suggests that legislative involvement increases when there is a high level of conflict between the executive and the legislature on an issue, but she argues that this may be good in the long term, by making the commitments of states internationally more durable and implementable. This focus on the dynamics of implementation is a real strength of Martin's research, as most scholarship in international relations stresses only the negative effects of legislative involvement in bargaining or ratification processes.

Readers may not be satisfied by some of the solutions to empirical challenges. Much of the analytical story is about indirect, subtle mechanisms of influence. Anticipated reactions, such as the ways in which executives may a priori take into account legislators' preferences, and the dynamics of credibility are two areas critical to political life, but there is unlikely to be much in the way of direct evidence. Martin employs proxy tests and looks for observable, logical consequences in lieu of process-tracing methods. For example, credibility, an inherently intersubjective social phenomenon, is measured by outcomes, that is, commitments are credible when a state does what it says it will do. Despite the thoughtfulness and sophistication with which Martin rises to these challenges, some readers may decide the empirical work demonstrates correlation but not causation. Also, Martin's cases were chosen because they represent interesting substantive areas not probed by other authors, not because they offer the maximum leverage on her critical variables. The mechanics of executive-legislative relations at times become quite complex and contingent in her account, as the specifics of the cases vary dramatically. But these points are dealt with up front by Martin and do not detract from the overall contribution of the book.

As we prepare for the next round of GATT negotiations, we will need to know how domestic politics may play into the future of cooperation. The crucial issue of the timing of the EU's enlargement to the East will undoubtably continue to be entangled with domestic politics as well. The implication of Martin's work for these and a host of other issues demands attention from scholars as well as from policymakers concerned with the future of these international agreements and institutions. Joined (although not necessarily in agreement) with other important works, such as Helen Milner's Interests, Institutions, and Information (1997), the ideas advanced by Martin crystallize one of the promising new directions in the field at the turn of the millenium. Her forceful view that "part of the secret of democratic success lies precisely in its supposed handicap, constant interference in policymaking by legislative actors" (p. 47), is bound to cheer some and provoke many more, both in the scholarly world and in the real one Martin writes about so astutely.

Justice and Reconciliation: After the Violence. By Andrew Rigby. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner, 2001. 207p. $49.95 cloth, $19.95 paper.

Gary J. Bass, Princeton University

Much of the growing literature on human rights issues focuses on the post-1989 democratizations and the ethnic conflicts of the 1990s. It reaches across many disciplines, including work not just by political scientists but also by legal scholars, historians, sociologists, anthropologists, journalists, and practitioners. Much of the literature confronts the tension between the pursuit of justice and the pursuit of stability. Andrew Rigby, who teaches on forgiveness and reconciliation, contributes an eclectic and good-hearted meditation on the dilemma of political reconciliation after mass atrocities.

Rigby considers a number of different ways of coming to terms with the past: forgetting about it; holding trials or simple purges; setting up a truth commission; paying reparations. He briefly considers the effect of these various options as they have played out in different cases: Germany and Western Europe after World War II, Spain after the Franco dictatorship, Chile after Pinochet, Argentina after the "dirty war," Eastern Europe after communism, South Africa after apartheid, and others. His goal is the creation of "a new culture of respect for human difference and human rights—what some might term a culture of peace as opposed to a culture of violence" (p. 183).

The book reveals an intelligent skepticism about all these policy options; for instance, some Latin American truth commissions were not allowed to single out perpetrators by name (p. 9). "There is an ongoing tension between the need for truth, the quest for justice, and the desire for peace" (p. 12). Justice is not an absolute value for Rigby; it does not trump all other political concerns. More specifically, following Samuel P. Huntington's The Third Wave (1991), Rigby argues that "wherever the transition has been negotiated rather than imposed, some kind of amnesty is almost inevitable, particularly if the parties to the settlement continue to possess the capacity to shatter the peace" (p. 184).

Rigby does not just think this tradeoff is inevitable; he suggests that it may, perversely, be helpful. His most intriguing argument is that dwelling on terrible events in the past may not be a wise way to deal with them: "I am not convinced of the appropriateness of opening up the past and talking about it as a means of dealing with the hurt" (p. 1). He even notes that he has lost loved ones in terrible circumstances: "I will not forget them; to do so would dishonor them in some way. But I do not want the pain of those times to come back" (p. ix). This runs contrary to the therapeutic argument popular among some human rights advocates, who see truth commissions and trials as cathartic opportunities for the surviving victims to face and thereby overcome past traumas.

But Rigby does not always stick to these guns. Toward the end of the book he also argues that victims need to be "heard and validated" in order for members of a shattered society to build "a new definition and relationship that acknowledges difference but on the basis of a shared identity as survivors and as human beings" (p. 186). He also suggests that France has been too quick to close the book on its Vichy past, and Spain was wrong to engage in "a collective exercise in public amnesia" (p. 54) about Franco's regime in order to proceed with the establishment of parliamentary democracy. This sounds more like the therapeutic argument he earlier seemed to be against. In a splendid book, Unspeakable Truths: Confronting State Terror and Atrocity (2001), Priscilla B. Hayner gives a more sustained and richer account of the difficulties of pursuing truth, and she points out it is not clear whether truth commissions provide the kind of therapeutic effects that Rigby sometimes attributes to them.

Unlike Hayner, Rigby relies almost exclusively on secondary sources. There is always a potential tradeoff between depth and breadth. The liveliest chapter is the only one for which he has done primary work: on Palestinians accused of collaborating with Israel. He condemns the internecine violence among Palestinians, many of whom are targeted for personal rather than political reasons, as "the worst kind of lynch law" (p. 147; see also Mark Tessler, A History of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, 1994, pp. 747–8, and Baruch Kimmerling and Joel S. Migdal, Palestinians: The Making of a People, 1993, p. 268). For the rest of the cases, Rigby covers a lot of ground in a relatively slender book, which shows a laudable ability to synthesize broadly; but this comes at the expense of digging more deeply into the cases.

This book adds to a growing discussion. The question of the therapeutic effects of trials is one that might usefully be supplemented by the work of psychologists, as well as by a reconciliation specialist such as Rigby, all of them joining in what is increasingly a multidisciplinary area for study.

Appeasement in International Politics. By Stephen R. Rock. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 2000. 237p. $29.95.

David Cortright, University of Notre Dame

Since Neville Chamberlain's concessions to Adolph Hitler in Munich in 1938, appeasement has become a term of disrepute. The word is almost an epithet, denoting weakness in the face of aggression. Generations of scholars and policymakers have learned the lesson that appeasement emboldens the aggressor and makes war more likely. Academic attention has focused instead on deterrence theory and the role of coercion and compellence as key elements of international politics.

In recent years scholarly interest in inducement policies has been rekindled. Stephen R. Rock's new book is an important contribution to this emerging literature. Rock challenges the assumption that concessions do not work, and that hostile leaders cannot be appeased. He reminds us that appeasement was once an accepted practice of European diplomacy and was considered an effective means of reducing tensions and removing the causes of conflict. Through analyses of five cases—British concessions to the United States in the late 1890s, the appeasement of Germany before World War II, the Anglo-American acceptance of Soviet demands at Yalta, the American "tilt" toward Iraq in the late 1980s, and the use of incentives that led to the 1994 Agreed Framework containing North Korea's nuclear program—Rock offers lessons on the benefits and limitations of conciliatory strategies. He develops theoretical propositions and policy guidelines to aid scholars and policymakers in assessing the merits of inducement policies.

As Rock notes, appeasement is a subcategory of the broader concept of engagement. He acknowledges that engagement is a more widely accepted term among scholars and policymakers. Engagement is the more encompassing concept, referring to the building of longer-term cooperation. Appeasement tends to be narrower in scope, referring to concessions that remove the causes of conflict and reduce tensions. Because Munich still casts such a long and dark shadow, it would be best to subsume the analysis of appeasement under the general heading of engagement. A book with the word appeasement in the title is inherently handicapped.

This is unfortunate, for there is much insight and wisdom in Rock's compact volume.

Rock catalogs the various purposes that appeasement policies may serve, the mechanisms by which inducements exert influence, and the factors that account for success or failure. Inducements may seek to preserve the status quo—through crisis resolution and prevention—or to alter conditions—by offering political tradeoffs and developing alliances. The four mechanisms by which such policies reduce tensions are satiation, reassurance, socialization, and altering political dynamics within the adversary regime. Incentive policies, like sanctions, are an attempt to influence the political debate within a target or recipient regime by strengthening the hand of advocates of cooperation, while weakening the position of hostile factions. These internal influences are most likely to occur where some degree of pluralism exists.

While it is true that war-seeking states cannot be appeased, most countries that engage in hostile behavior are pursuing objectives that can in theory be appeased. Rock draws a major distinction between hostile policies that are driven by greed-a state's pursuit of territory, resources, or commercial advantage—and those that are security-driven—when a nation is motivated by concerns for its safety. Rock's characterization of these motives and how they function in different cases is not always convincing—nor is his attempt to define the circumstances in which incentives should be conditioned on reciprocity and accompanied by threats. Rock argues that when the adversary is motivated by greed, inducement policies should be conditional and combined with coercive measures. When the adversary is motivated by insecurity, inducements should be offered without the requirement for reciprocity and without accompanying threats. These are innovative propositions, but they have little grounding in Rock's case studies. They are based more on what he terms their "logic" than on hard empirical evidence. These propositions may be valid in some circumstances, but they need more thorough testing than Rock offers in his study.

The nature of inducements and how they are perceived by the adversary are crucial to the chances of success. Inducements must be properly directed to address the goals and motivations of the adversary. They should be delivered as much as possible to the supporters of reform rather than hostile factions. They must be of sufficient scale to satisfy the adversary. Finally, the state or coalition offering incentives must send clear signals and have a reputation for fulfilling its commitments. Mixed or confused messages and a failure to deliver on promised incentives can undermine effectiveness. As Rock notes, the hesitation and slowness of the United States in fulfilling its promises under the 1994 Agreed Framework have impeded progress in freezing Pyongyang's nuclear weapons program and slowed efforts to tackle ballistic missile testing and other contentious issues.

Inducement policies carry significant risks. They may be perceived by the adversary as a sign of weakness and may lead to further attempts to extract concessions. The adversary may become more daring and aggressive in pursuit of its hostile objectives. Rock argues that this is more likely in a regime that is motivated by greed than by insecurity, although his evidence in support of this claim is limited. Rock is on firmer ground when he identifies means for avoiding this moral hazard. A state can diminish the chances of being perceived as weak by making concessions conditional on reciprocal cooperation, by establishing a reputation for firmness and strength, and by maintaining the materiel capability to employ deterrent or coercive strategies if conciliatory gestures fail. In the case of North Korea, the United States and its South Korean and Japanese partners offered incentives on a step-by-step basis and made the delivery of benefits conditional on reciprocal cooperation from the other side Rock's case studies and theoretical propositions significantly advance our understanding of the strengths and weaknesses of inducement strategies in the conduct of international affairs. The book has limitations, including an overreliance on the distinction between greed and insecurity as motivations for hostile behavior, but its strengths far outweigh its weaknesses. Rock has confirmed, as other scholars have demonstrated, that engagement strategies can be and have been successful in advancing international cooperation.

Vehicle of Influence: Building a European Car Market. By Roland Stephen. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2000. 240p. $49.50.

James A. Dunn, Jr., Rutgers University, Camden

The significance of European integration as a process and an intellectual focus is undeniable. The economic importance of the European auto sector and its worldwide dimensions are also self-evident. Roland Stephen's effort to deepen our analytical understanding of the former through a detailed examination of the latter thus promises to be of interest to readers from a variety of fields, ranging from economics and politics to the analysis of corporate strategy.

Stephen acknowledges that no single, parsimonious theory is adequate to explain the complex trajectory of the development of the European Union (EU). Indeed, he gives short shrift to many of the traditional theoretical approaches to European integration, particularly the neofunctionalist or spill-over theory long identified with Ernst Haas. Stephen offers instead an analytical framework based on an eclectic set of insights and propositions taken from well-known theories of regulation, policy formation, and institutional analysis. Its key elements are the perceived distribution of the costs and benefits of integration across auto firms and member states as well as the institutional arena in which policy initiatives are debated and decided. The meat of the book is the application of the framework to four key issue areas: setting common standards for permissible levels of auto emissions, reducing national government subsidies to auto firms, antitrust policy toward the auto sector, and developing an EU-wide voluntary export restraint (VER) system with Japan to replace the hodge-podge of national restraints.

Stephen's framework can produce very plausible explanations of policy outcomes. For example, in the case of auto emissions, different firms specialized in different propulsion technologies and were divided because the costs of potential regulations would fall more heavily on some firms than others. National governments were also divided, because some felt more environmental political pressure than others. Policymaking shifted to the European Parliament and eventually resulted in higher common emissions standards than most auto companies would have preferred. In the case of Japanese imports and transplants, the auto companies were united in their reluctance to accept complete openness to what they perceived as unbeatable (and perhaps unfair) competition. Some national governments were more liberal in theory than others, but none was willing or able to put together an open auto trade coalition in the face of determined industry opposition. Policymaking remained very informal, and the result was a variant of the European tradition of managed trade in the form of a complex Europe-wide VER with Japan, which was "an antiliberal outcome ... imposed on consumers and importers" (p. 19).

In his cases the author makes good use of interviews with European auto industry officials, lobbyists, and Brussels

Eurocrats. He also draws on appropriate official documents from various EU institutions, some national documents, and a wide range of secondary literature about auto industry economics, politics, and corporate strategies. He displays an impressive knowledge of the kind of policymaking by informal understandings and insider deals among auto firms, national governments, and European officials on issues such as Japanese imports, which he labels as "typical of Brussels at its most opaque" (p. 134).

Occasionally, familiarity with the interests and positions of the various stakeholders and the desire to cast light on murky behind-closed-doors politics leads Stephen to the very edge of what his evidence will support. He resorts to assertions that might well be true but cannot be documented. His language then takes on a slippery, conditional air. For example: "Spain no doubt expected to be a beneficiary from an open investment regime. . . . The Japanese may even have quietly indicated as much, and EU structural funds were perhaps promised by the president of the Commission, Delors" (p. 133). Or: "Also, VW's preferences for high emissions standards must have been somewhat moderated after the acquisition of small-car producer SEAT (in Spain) in 1986" (p. 89). This can be annoying, in that it requires the reader to parse his sentences very carefully. But it is hardly a fatal flaw, given the less than full disclosure of much of the politics surrounding the European auto industry in these Stephen acknowledges that he has traded breadth of scope for depth of analysis. He notes that he makes little mention of potentially significant actors, such as labor unions, local and regional governments, consumer groups, and components manufacturers (p. 83). Except for a few brief references, the detailed coverage ends in the early 1990s. And there is no mention of the efforts, which were being discussed at both the national and European levels even in the 1980s, to limit the automobile's effect on cities, to promote alternative modes of mobility such as urban transit and high-speed trains, and to increase fuel taxes and levy other kinds of fees and ecocharges on automobiles.

Within these self-imposed limits, most readers will not be disappointed by what Stephen has to tell us about how the integration pulse provided by the Single European Act affected European auto markets, auto producers, and both national and EU policymakers. Readers interested primarily in the European auto industry will find a wealth of detail and some fascinating interpretations of events. Those interested primarily in the process of cooperation, integration, and institution building will also be rewarded by some very interesting and important insights into how to think about the interaction of business and politics at the national and European levels in the late 1980s and early 1900s

What Do We Know About War?. Edited by John A. Vasquez. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2000. 420p. $75.00 cloth, $29.95 paper.

H. E. Goemans, Duke University

The new collection of essays edited by John A. Vasquez in What Do We Know About War? provides a useful overview of the quantitative literature on war. This book makes no claims to move the field forward significantly but, instead, offers seniors and first-year graduate students a good basic understanding of how statistical analyses have been used to explain the variation between war and peace. The book has significant strengths and weaknesses. Its strengths are the wide array of questions addressed and the attempt to provide a systematic discussion of the current state of the quantitative knowledge on war; its weaknesses are the paucity of attention paid to new insights from the rational choice literature and their implications for the quantitative study of conflict.

The book is divided into four parts. The first offers an overview of the history, progress, and underlying issues of the Correlates of War (COW) and International Crisis Behavior (ICB) projects. The second examines factors that bring about war; the third, factors that promote peace; and the fourth and final part offers up some lessons and conclusions. The first part is particularly useful for undergraduates and first-year graduate students. In three chapters J. David Singer, Stuart A. Bremer, and Micahel Brecher, Patrick James, and Jonathan Wilkenfeld—prominent pioneers in the quantitative study of war-provide a good overview of the background, progress made, and questions that still need to be addressed by the COW and ICB projects. It is somewhat surprising to find that the contributors to this volume are strikingly modest in their claims about the success of the program. When Bremer assesses progress in attempts to answer the questions "Who fights whom, when, where, and why?" he feels compelled to "admit that this has not been a very successful endeavor" (p. 35). (See also Zeev Maoz' caution in his chapter on alliances [pp. 112, 137].) Singer's discussion of assumptions and some metatheoretical considerations offers good advice and food for thought for graduate students. In the third chapter, Brecher, James, and Wilkenfeld assess the progress of the ICB project and make some short comparisons of their findings with the COW findings. This is one of many instances where new insights from rational choice theory should have been discussed. James D. Fearon ("Signaling Versus the Balance of Power and Interests-An Empirical Test of a Crisis Bargaining Model," Journal of Conflict Resolution 38 [June 1994]: 236-69) has argued that ex ante observable characteristics such as military power should play a fundamentally different role in situations before and during crises. Except in the excellent chapter by Jack Levy, fundamental problems such as selection effects and endogeneity are barely discussed. (To be fair, Paul K. Huth, Gary Goertz and Paul F. Diehl, and James Lee Ray briefly address some of these issues in their chapters.) This is regrettable since these issues are coming to the front of the field.

The second group of essays discusses factors that bring about war. These nine chapters offer a nice mix of new and emerging research agendas (or variables), such as the role of territory and enduring rivalries in international conflict, and more established research agendas, such as the role of alliances, capabilities, military buildups, and escalation. The chapters by Paul R. Hensel and Paul K. Huth are among the best in the book and form a particularly nice match. Hensel carefully and instructively unpeels several layers of the onion and offers several original empirical analyses on the relationship between territory and war. He finds that "[t]erritorial claims appear to be a leading source of militarized conflict and war, increasing both the likelihood [and] ... severity levels of [militarized conflict]" (p. 81) While Hensel analyzes new data and proposes new hypotheses, Huth offers a rich and subtle discussion of theoretical explanations for the role of territory in conflict. The chapters on alliances by Zeev Maoz and Douglas M. Gibler consider a broad range of factors affecting how alliances can promote peace and war. The chapter by Maoz presents an especially thorough overview of the role alliances have played, with extensive tests and replications of the main propositions. Gibler proposes a reconceptualization and new typology of alliances and some initial tests. The two chapters, by Goertz and Diehl and by Frank Whelon Wayman, on rivalries offer only limited empirical evidence on the role of (enduring) rivalries but provide a good discussion of this emerging but relatively neglected research agenda.

Russell J. Leng's chapter on crisis escalation is a clear instance where the book achieves its goals. Since it is impossible to keep up with all the literature on conflict, I had missed Leng's earlier work on crisis escalation. He presents a very interesting typology of crises based on both realist (rationalist) and psychological factors. He finds that "[v]ariations in the crisis structure are strongly associated with whether the crisis escalates ... " and "that any examination of dispute escalation that does not consider its dynamic character is incomplete" (pp. 247, 256). Daniel S. Geller's chapter on material capabilities unfortunately highlights this book's failure to examine the links between the existing quantitative research and more recent formal work. Thus, while Geller broadly discusses the role of status quo orientations, no attempt is made to evaluate the empirical work in light of recent extensive work on status quo orientations and war, as, for example, by Robert Powell (In the Shadow of Power, 1999).

Part III of the book examines factors that promote peace and includes a chapter on international norms by Raymond and a chapter on democracy and war by Ray. The chapter on international norms discusses mainly theoretical concerns about norms and their effects; little attention is paid to the rich empirical literature linking norms and the democratic peace. Ray examines the empirical literature that links democracy and war with a careful eye on potentially confounding variables and spurious correlations. His discussion does incorporate the contributions made by the formal literature.

Three chapters, by Levy, Manus I. Midlarsky, and Vasquez, summarize the findings presented in the preceding chapters and offer conclusions on the progress of what is referred to as the "scientific study of war." Although brief, Levy's chapter stands out in this book as an excellent primer for future empirical research. Levy discusses emerging issues and concerns in the study of war, paying attention to new insights from the formal literature and constructivist approaches. He discusses how these insights affect and impact the quantitative study of conflict. To name but two of these, Levy offers brief but insightful discussions of the poor efforts in much of the quantitative study of war to understand and incorporate interaction and selection effects fully.

Most chapters clearly point to a lack of good theories to explain the relationship of the author's preferred variable to the variation between war and peace, and so it is all the more surprising that so little attention is paid to the emerging formal literature. Overall, however, I would recommend this book to new graduate students. Some of the chapters are excellent starting points for students surveying the existing quantitative literature on international conflict and for students starting their own research. Regrettably, there is a distinct trend toward Balkanization in international relations. A not-to-be-underestimated quality of this book is that it makes it easier for those interested mainly in other research traditions to follow and understand current debates in the quantitative study of war.

Organizing for Foreign Policy Crises Presidents, Advisers, and the Management of Decision Making

Patrick I. Haney

With a New Preface by the Author

"Haney offers a series of fresh and impor tant insights about U.S. decision-making in crisis situations. For students of the presidencys United States foreign policy, and crisis decision-making, this book is a must-read." —Phil Williams, University of Pittsburgh

Now in paper $22

Embedded Politics Industrial Networks and İnstitutional Change in Postcommunism

Gerald A. McDermott

Drawing on an analysis of communist Czechoslovakia and contemporary Czech industries and banks, McDermott offers an institutional and organizational study of the transition to democracy. cloth $55,00 April

Legislatures Comparative Perspectives on Representative Assemblies

Gerhard Loewenberg, D. Roderick Kiewiet, and Peverill Squire, Editors

This comparative, cross-national study of legislatures looks at the recruitment of candidates, the nature of legislative careers, the evolution of legislative bodies, and the electoral systems by which legislators are chosen.

cloth $65.00 | paper $24.95

Re-Forming the State The Politics of Privatization in Latin America and Europe

Hector E. Schamis

Focusing on Argentina, Chile, Mexico, Great Britain, and Hungary, this new book compares the processes leading to experiments in market reform. Schamis especially looks at patterns of collective action and coalition building that drive privatization.

cloth $55.00 April

When Opponents Cooperate Great Power Conflict and Collaboration in World Politics

Benjamin-Miller-With a New Preface and Afterword by the Author

Miller's ambitious and theoretically sophisticated book attempts to explain great power conflict and cooperation in security affairs. Informed by keen theoretical insight and imagination, Miller's book is a valuable addition to anyone seeking to understand what makes the clock tick in international relations?" —Journal of Politics

Now in paper $26.95

State Institutions, Private Incentives, Global Capital

Andrew C. Sobel

"The rigorous examination of the causes and consequences of increased financial integration ... is one of the great strengths of this book . . . Makes an important contribution to this research program and pushes it forward by demonstrating the value of careful empirical work." -International Relations Now in paper $24.95

Banking on Reform Political Parties and Central Bank Independence in the Industrial Democracies

William T. Bernhard

Looks at the political forces that have influenced recent reforms of monetary policy institutions in industrial democracies.

cloth $60.00 April

Managing "Modernity" Work, Community, and Authority in Late-Industrializing Japan and Russia

Rudra Sil

Sil examines how institution-builders in late-industrializing societies respond to the competing influences of institutional models and inherited social legacies as they attempt to generate and sustain authority for change.

cloth $60.00

Credit card buyers may order by phone (734-764-4392) or by fax (800-876-1922). www.press.umich.edu

Civil Wars and Foreign Powers Outside Intervention in Intrastate Conflict

Patrick M. Regan

"A theoretically rigorous, empirically rich analysis of the conditions that influence whether or not foreign powers will intervene and, if they do, whether the intervention will bring the conflict to a conclusion. ... The book should be on the must-read list for students of intrastate wars and policy-makers charged with deciding whether or not to intervene in such conflicts." —International History Review Now in paper $19.95

Anchors Against Change American Opinion Leaders Beliefs After the Cold War

Shoon Kathleen Murray

"[Murray] has developed a unique data set that spans a period of extraordinary change, including the end of the Cold War and the destruction of the Soviet Union. Her findings help us to understand better the cleavages that continue to divide Americans in the post-Cold War era." —Ole R. Holsti, Duke University Now in paper $22.95

The Voluntary City Choice, Community, and Civil Society

David T. Beito, Peter Gordon, and Alexander Tabarrok, Editors

Investigates the private provision of social services, along with the for-profit provision of urban infrastructure and community governance, and the growing privatization of residential life in the United States. In doing so it challenges the orthodoxy that insists that government alone can improve community life. cloth $65.00 | paper $24.95 April

The University of Michigan Press Dept. TD Ann Arbor, Michigan 48106-1104

GEORGETOW

New in the

AMERICAN GOVERNANACE AND PUBLIC POLICY SERIES

Series Editor: Barry Rabe, Gerald R. Ford School of Public Policy, University of Michigan

WELFARE POLICYMAKING IN THE STATES

The Devil in Devolution Pamela Winston

"Winston's thoughtful and well-written book adds enormously to our understanding of what the 'devolution revolution' means on the ground. . . . a must read for anyone interested in state politics, welfare reform, or the barriers that poor people face in making their voices heard in decisions that affect their lives."

–R. Kent Weaver, The Brookings Institution

American Governance and Public Policy series 352 pages • cloth, $59.95 • paper, $24.95

HOW GOVERNMENTS PRIVATIZE

The Politics of Divestment in the United States and Germany Mark Cassell

"In a powerful analysis, Cassell shows how two agencies in the U.S. and Germany made programs work . . . and how they then put themselves out of business. The result is an important contribution to our understanding of political economy, public policy, and public management."

---Donald F. Kettl, University of Wisconsin-Madison

American Governanace and Public Policy series 296 pages • cloth, $59.95

JUSTICE & NATURE

Kantian Philosophy, Environmental Policy, and the Law John Martin Gillrov

"Presents a powerful challenge to the current marginalization of environmental ethics in the public policy arena . . . Justice and Nature will help move environmental philosophy from the classroom to its rightful place at the forefront of public debate."

ROBERT V. PERCIVAL, UNIVERSITY OF MARYLAND

American Governance and Public Policy series 488 pages • NEW IN PAPERBACK! $34.95

BURMA: THE STATE OF MYANMAR

David I. Steinberg

"One of our foremost experts on Burma/Myanmar has produced an in-depth analysis of this reclusive state, interweaving the past and the present. Steinberg's work will be extremely valuable to those interested in modern Asia."

-ROBERT A. SCALAPINO, UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, BERKELEY

368 pp., NEW IN PAPERBACK! $21.95

THE LIMITS OF POLICY CHANGE

Incrementalism, Worldview, and the Rule of Law Michael T. Hayes

"An important contribution to both policy analysis and democratic theory. . . . a powerful alternative to the politics that all too often dominates contemporary policy debates."

-EDWARD J. HARPHAM, UNIVERSITY OF TEXAS AT DALLAS

Essential Texts in American Government series 216 pages • NEW IN PAPERBACK! $21.95

WHO PAYS FOR CAR ACCIDENTS?

The Fault versus No-Fault Insurance Debate Jerry J. Phillips and Stephen Chippendale

"A full, fair, and frank airing of the issues animating the controversy over no-fault automobile insurance . . . The civility of the authors and their grasp of the subject makes the text a pleasure to read."

—Joseph Page, Georgetown University Law School

Controversies in Public Policy series 144 pages • paper, $24.95

TAKING LANGUAGE SERIOUSLY

The Narrative Foundations of Public Administration Research Jay D. White

232 pages • NEW IN PAPERBACK! $19.95

GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY PRESS

c/o Hopkins Fulfillment Service P.O. Box 50370, Baltimore, MD 21211

Phone: 800-537-5487 or 410-516-6956 • Fax: 410-516-6998 www.georgetown.edu/publications/gup

New and Noteworthy from Cambridge

Cambridge Studies in Comparative Politics

Nationalist Mobilization and the Collapse of the Soviet State

Mark R. Beissinger 0-521-80670-4, Hardback, $80.00 0-521-00148-X, Paperback, $30.00

Macroeconomic Policies of Developed Democracies

Robert J. Franzese, Jr. 0-521-80294-6, Hardback, $75.00 0-521-00441-1, Paperback, $30.00

Redeeming the Communist Past

The Regeneration of Communist Parties in East Central Europe

Anna M. Grzymala-Busse
0-521-80669-0, Hardback, $60.00
0-521-00146-3, Paperback, $23.00

The European Parliament and Supranational Party System

A Study in Institutional Development Amie Kreppel 0-521-80625-9, Hardback, $60.00 0-521-00079-3, Paperback, $22.00

Stuffing the Ballot Box

Fraud, Electoral Reform, and Democratization in Costa Rica

Fabrice E. Lehoucq and Iván Molina 0-521-81045-0, Hardback, $55.00

Institutional Change and Political Continuity in Post-Soviet Central Asia

Power, Perceptions, and Pacts Pauline Jones Luong 0-521-80109-5, Hardback, $60.00

Public Support for Market Reforms in New Democracies

Susan C. Stokes, Editor 0-521-66339-3, Hardback, $60.00 0-521-66341-5, Paperback, $22.00

Global Capital, Political Institutions, and Policy Change in Developed Welfare States

Duane Swank 0-521-80668-2, Hardback, $60.00 0-521-00144-7, Paperback, $23.00

Cambridge Studies in Political Psychology and Public Opinion

The Macro Polity

Robert S. Erikson, Michael B. MacKuen, and James A. Stimson 0-521-56389-5, Hardback, $90.00 0-521-56485-9, Paperback, $30.00

Thinking About Political Psychology

James H. Kuklinski, Editor 0-521-59377-8, Hardback, $65.00

Race and Place

Relations in an American City Susan Welch, Lee Sigelman, Timothy Bledsoe, and Michael Combs 0-521-79215-0, Hardback, $55.00 0-521-79655-5, Paperback, $20.00

MACRO POLITY ROBERT S. TRIKSON MICHAEL B. MACKUEN TAMES A. STIMISON

Communication, Society and Politics

Shaping Abortion Discourse

Democracy and the Public Sphere in Germany and the United States Myra Marx Ferree, William Anthony Gamson, Jürgen Gerhards, and Dieter Rucht 0-521-79045-X, Hardback, $60.00 0-521-79384-X, Paperback, $23.00

The Winning Message

Candidate Behavior, Campaign Discourse, and Democracy Adam F. Simon 0-521-80733-6, Hardback, $55.00 0-521-00191-9, Paperback, $19.00

New and Noteworthy from Cambridge

Cambridge Studies in International Relations

The Democratic Peace and Territorial Conflict in the Twentieth Century

Paul K. Huth 0-521-80115-X, Hardback, $65.00 0-521-80508-2, Paperback, $23.00

Regions of War and Peace

Douglas Lemke 0-521-80985-1, Hardback, $65.00 0-521-00772-0, Paperback, $23.00

States, Identities and the Homogenisation of Peoples

Heather Rae 0-521-79284-3, Hardback, $65.00 0-521-79708-X, Paperback, $23.00

Democracy and Coercive Diplomacy

Kenneth A. Schultz 0-521-79227-4, Hardback, $65.00 0-521-79669-5, Paperback, $23.00

Justice and Community in International Relations

Richard Shapcott 0-521-78028-4, Hardback, $65.00 0-521-78447-6, Paperback, $23.00

The Social Construction of the Ocean

Philip E. Steinberg 0-521-80443-4, Hardback, $60.00 0-521-01057-8, Paperback, $22.00

Feminist International Relations

An Unfinished Journey Christine Sylvester 0-521-79177-4, Hardback, $65.00 0-521-79627-X, Paperback, $25.00

Constitutionalism and Dictatorship

Pinochet, the Junta, and the 1980 Constitution

Robert Barros

Cambridge Studies in the Theory of Democracy 0-521-79218-5, Hardback, $60.00 0-521-79658-X, Paperback, $22.00

A Theory of the State

Economic Rights, Legal Rights, and the Scope of the State Yoram Barzel

Political Economy of Institutions and Decisions 0-521-80605-4, Hardback, $60.00 0-521-00064-5, Paperback, $22.00

Gorbachev and Yeltsin as Leaders

George W. Breslauer 0-521-81486-3, Hardback, $65.00 0-521-89244-9, Paperback, $23.00

International Relations in Political Thought

Texts from the Ancient Greeks to the First World War Chris Brown, Terry Nardin, and Nicholas Rengger, Editors

0-521-57330-0, Hardback, $80.00 0-521-57570-2, Paperback, $40.00

The Dynamics of Coercion

American Foreign Policy and the Limits of Military Might Daniel Byman and Matthew Waxman
RAND Studies in Policy Analysis
0-521-80991-6, Hardback, $65.00
0-521-00780-1, Paperback, $23.00

Intervention and Transnationalism in Africa

Global-Local Networks of Power Thomas Callaghy, Ronald Kassimir, and Robert Latham, Editors 0-521-80666-6, Hardback, $70.00 0-521-00141-2, Paperback, $25.00

Liberalism, Democracy and Development

The Relevance of Liberal Democracy for Developing Countries Sylvia Chan
0-521-80883-9, Hardback, $65.00
0-521-00498-5, Paperback, $23.00

Religion and Public Doctrine in Modern England

Volume 3: Accomodations

Maurice Cowling

Cambridge Studies in the History and Theory of Politics
0-521-25960-6, Hardback, $100.00

Post-Communist Democratization

Political Discourses Across Thirteen Countries John S. Dryzek and Leslie T. Holmes Theories of Institutional Design 0-521-80664-X, Hardback, $65.00 0-521-00138-2, Paperback, $23.00

New and Noteworthy from Cambridge

Elbridge Gerry's Salamander

The Electoral Consequences of the Reapportionment Revolution

Gary W. Cox and Jonathan N. Katz Political Economy of Institutions and Decisions

0-521-80675-5, Hardback, $55.00 0-521-00154-4, Paperback, $19.00

Suharto

A Political Biography R.E. Elson 0-521-77326-1, Hardback, $35.00

Australians and Globalisation

The Experience of Two Centuries Brian Galligan, Winsome Roberts, and Gabriela Trifiletti 0-521-81199-6, Hardback, $65.00 0-521-01089-6, Paperback, $25.00

A Theory of Case-Based Decisions

Itzhak Gilboa and

David Schmeidler 0-521-80234-2, Hardback, $65.00 0-521-00311-3, Paperback, $23.00

The Dark Side of the Force

Economic Foundations of Conflict Theory Jack Hirshleifer 0-521-80412-4, Hardback, $90.00 0-521-00917-0, Paperback, $30.00

Historical Sociology of International Relations

Stephen Hobden and John M. Hobson, Editors 0-521-80870-7, Hardback, $70.00 0-521-00476-4, Paperback, $25.00

Religion and Politics in Comparative Perspective

The One, The Few, and The Many Ted G. Jelen and Clyde Wilcox, Editors 0-521-65031-3, Hardback, $60.00 0-521-65971-X, Paperback, $23.00

Collective Rationality and Collective Reasoning

Christopher McMahon 0-521-80462-0, Hardback, $55.00 0-521-01178-7, Paperback, $20.00

A Concise History of India

Thomas R. Metcalf and Barbara Metcalf Cambridge Concise Histories 0-521-63027-4, Hardback, $55.00 0-521-63974-3, Paperback, $19.00

Memory and Power in Post-War Europe

Jan-Werner Müller, Editor 0-521-80610-0, Hardback, $70.00 0-521-00070-X, Paperback, $25.00

Environmental Dilemmas and Policy Design

Studying the Motives, Preferences, Intentions and Behaviour of Citizens

Huib Pellikaan and Robert van der Veen Theories of Institutional Design

0-521-62156-9, Hardback, $55.00 0-521-62764-8, Paperback, $20.00

Ethics and Foreign Policy

Karen E. Smith and Margot Light, Editors
London School of Economics Monographs in International Studies
0-521-80415-9, Hardback, $60.00
0-521-00930-8, Paperback, $22.00

The First Amendment and the Media in the Court of Public Opinion

David Yalof and Kenneth Dautrich 0-521-80466-3, Hardback, $55.00 0-521-01181-7, Paperback, $19.00

Money and Security

Troops, Monetary Policy, and West Germany's Relations with the United States and Britain, 1950-1971

Hubert Zimmermann 0-521-78204-X, Hardback, $45.00

Now in paperback...

How Might We Live? Global Ethics in the New Century

Ken Booth, Tim Dunne, and Michael Cox, Editors 0-521-00520-5, Paperback, $25.00

Karl Popper—The Formative Years, 1902-1945

Politics and Philosophy in Interwar Vienna Malachi Haim Hacohen 0-521-89055-1, Paperback, $25.00

Welfare State Futures

Stephan Leibfried, Editor 0-521-00512-4, Paperback, $25.00

Modern China

A Guide to a Century of Change Graham Hutchings

"You could not possibly have a better guide to China than Graham Hutchings. His book—the product of years of scholarship and first-hand experience—is sharply written, perceptive, and judicious. That overworked word 'indispensable' is for once wholly deserved."

—Christopher Patten.

last governor of Hong Kong

$35.00 cloth

$45.00 cloth

The Miner's Canary

Enlisting Race, Resisting Power, Transforming Democracy

Lani Guinier, Gerald Torres

"The Miner's Canary is thoughtful, provocative, and timely. It persuasively develops the idea of 'political race,' a concept that identifies racial literacy as a new way to think about social change in American society. This book will challenge the very way we think about race, justice, and the political system in America."

—Henry Louis Gates, Jr.

The Nathan I. Huggins Lectures • $27.95 cloth

The Spirit of Capitalism

Nationalism and Economic Growth Ligh Greenfeld

"The Spirit of Capitalism offers an important thesis which it defends with rigor and passion. It links nationalism to the market society in complex ways. Liah Greenfeld's challenging, historically buttressed argument is bound to attract a wide and attentive audience."

—Suzanne Keller, Princeton University

Public Intellectuals

A Study of Decline
Richard A. Posner

READ EXCERPTS ONLINE

Richard Posner charts the decline of a venerable institution that included worthies from Socrates to John Dewey. Leveling a balanced attack on liberal and conservative pundits alike, Posner describes the styles and genres, constraints and incentives, of the activity of public intellectuals. And he offers modest proposals for improving the quality of public discussion in America today.

The Cold War and the Color Line

American Race Relations in the Global Arena

Thomas Borstelmann

The Cold War and the Color Line is the first comprehensive examination of how the Cold War intersected with the final destruction of global white supremacy. [Borstelmann] reveals America's efforts to contain the racial polarization that threatened to unravel the anticommunist western alliance. In so doing, he recasts the history of American race relations in its true international context, one that is meaningful and relevant for our own era of globalization.

Nixon's Civil Rights

Politics, Principle, and Policy Dean J. Kotlowski

"Nixon's Civil Rights is, far and away, the best book written on the topic. It is contemporary history at its absolute finest exhaustive research, clear prose, trenchant analysis, and shrewd judgments. Anyone interested in the Civil Rights Movement, the 1970s, and the Nixon era will find this book indispensable. A truly landmark study."

—Douglas Brinkley, University of New Orleans $35.00 cloth

The Death of Reconstruction

Race, Labor, and Politics in the Post-Civil War North, 1865-1901

Heather Cox Richardson

"The Death of Reconstruction offers a provocative explanation of why Northerners after the Civil War gradually and often reluctantly abandoned their efforts on behalf of the Southern freedmen. Not ignoring virulent racism directed at African Americans, Richardson shows that it was less race than class that brought about the end of Reconstruction. An important, impressively documented book [this] is a work comparable to David Montgomery's Beyond Equality as a major reinterpretation of the post-Civil War period."

—David Herbert Donald, author of Lincoln $39.95 doth

Strategy

The Logic of War and Peace Revised and Enlarged Edition

Edward N. Luttwak

In this widely acclaimed work, now revised and expanded, Luttwak unveils the peculiar logic of strategy level by level, from grand strategy down to combat tactics. Having participated in its planning, Luttwak examines the role of air power in the 1991 Gulf War, then detects the emergence of "post-heroic" war in Kosovo in 1999—an American war in which not a single American soldier was killed. Citing examples from ancient Rome to our own days, this book by one of the world's foremost authorities reveals the ultimate logic of military failure and success, of war and peace.

Belknap Press • $19.95 paper

Fairness versus Welfare Louis Kaplow and Steven Shavell

Fairness versus Welfare poses a bold challenge to contemporary moral philosophy by showing that most moral principles conflict more sharply with welfare than is generally recognized. The book draws on the work of moral philosophers, economists, evolutionary and cognitive psychologists, and legal academics to scrutinize a number of particular subjects that have engaged legal scholars and moral philosophers. $45.00 doth

Adversarial Legalism

The American Way of Law Robert A. Kagan

"This is a wonderful piece of work, richly detailed and beautifully written. It is the best, sanest, and most comprehensive evaluation and critique of the American way of law that I have seen. Every serious scholar concerned with justice and efficiency, and every policymaker who is serious about improving the American legal order should read this trenchant and exciting book."

—Lawrence Friedman, Stanford University $49.95 cloth

Constitutional Self-Government Christopher L. Eisgruber

"This is a cogent defense of a robust form of judicial review in a democratic polity. Eisgruber rejects simplistic majoritarian conceptions of democracy and the idea that judges owe any kind of mechanical obeisance either to constitutional or statutory texts or to ascribed legislative intentions... The book is sure to spark controversy and debate and to widen and deepen our understanding of the judicial role in a well-functioning democratic government."

—John Ferejohn, Stanford University $45.00 doth

The Private Roots of Public Action

Gender, Equality, and Political Participation

Nancy Burns, Kay Lehman Schlozman and Sidney Verba

"The Private Roots of Public Action is the most comprehensive examination of the similarities and differences in the political activity of women and men...This book goes beyond the literature in connecting to an enormous range of scholarship in political science, economics, and sociology...A fine piece of work"—John Mark Hansen, University of Chicago $27.95 paper

Shifting the Color Line

Race and the American Welfare State Robert C. Lieberman

"Shifting the Color Line is an enlightening look at America's failure to ask, without racist or political motives, how poor people can make progress... The book is an intense history course that bypasses decades of deceptive rhetoric to get to the core issues of the welfare debate.

—Alyssa Haywoode, Boston Globe $18.95 paper

Empire Michael Hardt and Antonio Negri

BROWSETHROUGHTHE BOOK ONLINE "Empire...is a bold move away from established doctrine. Hardt and Negri's insistence that there really is a new world is promulgated with energy and conviction. Especially striking is their renunciation of the tendency of many writers on globalization to focus exclusively on the top, leaving the impression that what happens down below, to ordinary people, follows automatically from what the great powers do."

—Stanley Aronowitz, The Nation $18.95 paper

Black Identities

West Indian Immigrant Dreams and American Realities

Mary C. Waters

"Elack Identities establishes a new landmark in the study of West Indian immigrant experiences in the United States. Mary C. Waters' perceptive and authoritative study challenges conventional views of the Americanization of West Indian immigrants."

—William Julius Wilson $18.95 paper

If You're an Egalitarian, How Come You're So Rich? G. A. Cohen

"[Cohen's book is] a strikingly personal acdress, fusing autobiography and the history of ideas with political philosophy, and ending not only with the weighty issue of how far personal attitudes must feature within the subject matter of justice itself, but with the more disconcerting question of how far the disciplines of living effectively under capitalism are bound to prove lethal for the soul."

---John Dunn,

Times Higher Education Supplement [UK] $13.00 paper

Principles of Social Justice David Miller

"As with all David Miller's work, a high level of scrupulousness marks Principles of Social Justice. He remains unswayed by ideological and philosophical background noise—no mean feat with this topic—and, as always, displays a distrust of grand generalization. The exposition, lucid and wholly unpretentious, is a model of its kind. And the argument is impressively sustained throughout, with some particularly acute remarks about the role of luck in judgments of desert, and about the relevance of procedures to just outcomes."

—Glen Newey,

Times Literary Supplement [UK] $18.95 paper

How Democratic Is the American Constitution? ROBERT A. DAHL

In this provocative book, one of our most eminent political scientists questions the extent to which the American Constitution furthers democratic goals.

"This book is vintage Dahl at the highest possible level. It is lucid. acutely analytic, literate and both consistent with the long

Iihad

The Rise of Militant Islam in Central Asia AHMED RASHID

By the author of the Number 1 New York Times Bestseller Taliban

"An amazing, comprehensive, learned and very frightening book. Rashid has, once again, provided unique insight and analysis of an explosive region." -Fred Halliday

$24.00

Also by Ahmed Rashid: $14.95 A Yale Nota Bene paperback

Cloak & Dollar

A History of American Secret Intelligence RHODRI JEFFREYS-JONES

"By far the most comprehensive and definitive description of the symbiotic relationship between the corporate world and the CIA's early space-based intelligence collection program. The quality of the research is extraordinary." -William E. Burrows $29.95

A HISTORY OF AMERICAN SECRET INTELLIGENCE RHODRI JEFFREYS-JONES

Corporate Irresponsibility

America's Newest Export LAWRENCE E. MITCHELL

"A critical resource for anyone who wants to get past the brouhaha of antiglobalization rhetoric and think clearly about what causes many corporations to fail in taking full responsibility for their huge influence in society."

–Karl Schoenberger $27.95

The Nile Basin

National Determinants of Collective Action JOHN WATERBURY

"Clear and persuasively written, this book will find an audience among . . . the international policy and donor community, and those with an interest in international collective action." -Arun Agrawal $35.00

Mass Atrocity, Ordinary Evil, & Hannah Arendt

Criminal Consciousness in Argentina's Dirty War MARK J. OSIEL

"A masterly study, certain to be of great interest to jurists, political scientists, and humanists."

-William P. Alford $30.00

, available in cloth & paper

The Fragmentation of Afghanistan

State Formation and Collapse in the International System, Second Edition BARNETT R. RUBIN

"This study is theoretically informed, empirically grounded, and gracefully written. Anyone who wants to understand Afghanistan's troubled history and the reasons for its present distress should read this book."—Foreign Affairs

(on the earlier edition) $18.95 paperback

Also by Barnett R. Rubin: The Search for Peace in Afghanistan From Buffer State to Failed State

The Social Contract & The First & Second Discourses JEAN-JACQUES

ROUSSEAU

Edited and with an Introduction by Susan Dunn With essays by Gita May, Robert N. Bellah, David Bromwich, and Conor Cruise O'Brien

This volume brings together three of Jean-Jacques Rousseau's most important political writings, works that inspired not only the French Revolution but also all modern movements for political transformation. Rethinking the Western Tradition

$15.95 paperback

Best Truth

Intelligence in the Information Age BRUCE D. BERKOWITZ AND ALLAN E. GOODMAN

"Berkowitz and Goodman are pros at the intelligence business. Their proposals for updating the intelligence community are radical but anything less than radical won't do."

-Leslie Gelb $15.00 paperback

(強)

New from Princeton

Democracies at War

Dan Reiter and Allan C. Stam

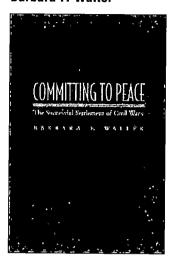

Why do democracies win wars? A traditional view-expressed most famously by Alexis de Tocqueville—has been that democracies are inferior in crafting foreign policy and fighting wars. In the first major study of its kind, Dan Reiter and Allan Stam discover that democracies tend to win the wars they fightspecifically, about 80% of the time.

"This is currently the best book on the security policies of democratic states and the big one everyone concerned with the topic will have to read immediately."-Bruce Russett, Yale University

Paper $19.95 ISBN 0-691-08949-3 Cioth $55.00 ISBN 0-691-08948-5

Committing to Peace

The Successful Settlement of Civil Wars Barbara F. Walter

Why do some civil wars end in successfully implemented peace settlements while others are fought to the finish? Numerous competing theories address this question. Yet not until now has a study combined the historical sweep, empirical richness, and conceptual rigor necessary to put them thoroughly to the test and draw lessons from them.

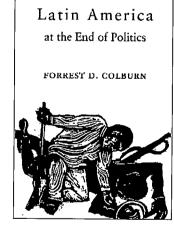

Using data on every civil war fought between 1940 and 1992, Barbara Walter provides a wealth of new information. Her key finding: rarely are such conflicts resolved without active third-party intervention. Cloth $52.50 ISBN 10-691-08930-2 Paper $18.95 ISBN 0-691-08931-0

Latin America at the End of Politics Forrest D. Colburn

After decades of ideological struggle, much of it in the service of an elusive socialist ideal. Latin America has embraced liberalism-democracy and unfettered markets. But liberalism has triumphed more by default than through exuberапсе.

Latin America at the End of Politics explores this period of circumscribed political passions through deft portrayals of crucial political, economic, social, and cultural issues.

"This book is brilliant, provocative, highly original, and immensely learned...." -Mark Falcoff, American Enterprise Institute Paper $14,95 ISBN 0-691-09181-1 Cloth $35.00 ISBN 0-691-08907-8

Regulating Intimacy

A New Legal Paradigm Jean L. Cohen

In this bold and innovative book, Jean Cohen presents a new approach to regulating intimacy that promises to defuse the tensions that have long sparked conflict among legislators, jurists, activists, and scholars. A synthesis of feminist theory, political theory, constitutional jurisprudence, and cutting-edge research in the sociology of law, this powerful work will reshape not only legal and political debates, but how we think about the intimate relationships at the core of our own lives.

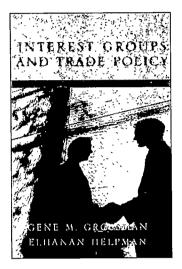

"This is a genuinely pathbreaking work."

—William Scheuerman, University of Minnesota Cloth $35.00S 0-691-05740-0 Due June

New from Princeton

Interest Groups and Trade Policy Gene M. Grossman and Elhanan Helpman

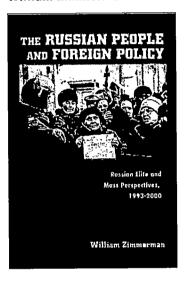

Gene Grossman and Elhanan Helpman are widely acclaimed for their pioneering theoretical studies of how special interest groups seek to influence the policymaking process in democratic societies. This collection of eight articles is a companion to their recent book, Special Interest Politics. It clarifies the origins of some of their key ideas and shows how their methods can be used to illuminate policymaking in a critical area.

These articles are required reading for anyone interested in international relations, trade policy, or political economy. Paper $19.95 0-691-09597-3 Cloth $65.00 0-691-09596-5

The Russian People and Foreign Policy

Russian Elite and Mass Perspectives, 1993–2000 William Zimmerman

Since the fall of communism, public opinion in Russia has become a substantial factor in that country's policymaking process. What this opinion might be and how it responds to American actions is the subject of this study. William Zimmerman offers important and sometimes disturbing insight into the thinking of citizens in America's former Cold War adversary. Drawing on nearly a decade of unprecedented surveys he conducted with a wide spectrum of the Russian public, he gauges the impact of Russia's opening on its foreign policy. Paper $19.95 ISBN 0-691-09168-4 Cloth $65.00 ISBN 0-691-09167-6 Due April

New in paperback
With a new preface by the author

The Challenge of Global Capitalism

The World Economy in the 21st Century

Robert Gilpin

"A comprehensive take on this new world of economic conflict.... [Gilpin] understands ... that the wheels may be coming off the post-cold-war roller coaster that the United States rode to great heights in the 1990's."—David E. Sanger, New York Times Book Review

"One of the many virtues of Robert Gilpin's wide-ranging book is its deep sense of history. [It] is an exemplary guide to the geo-strategic environment in which world markets operate." —John Gray, Times Literary Supplement

Paper $19.95 ISBN 0-691-09279-6

New in paperback
With a new afterword by the author

Republic.com Cass Sunstein

"Republic.com raises important and troubling questions about the effects of the Internet on a democratic society. Sunstein's assessment is persuasive."

—Stephen Labaton, New York Times Book Review

"Sunstein fears that the Internet is contributing to a fragmentation of public discourse that is undermining democracy.... [He] makes a provocative case."

—Peter Coy, Business Week Paper $12.95 ISBN 0-691-09589-2 Due May Microsoft LIT EBOOK

$9.95 ISBN 1-400-80904-5 Available now republic com cass sunstein

New Paperback

With a new afterword by the author

Stay the Hand of Vengeance

The Politics of War Crimes Tribunals Gary Jonathan Bass

"The best work yet on the politics of justice after war. This historically rich, theoretically informed study explores both celebrated and little known chapters in history, from St. Helena to The Hague.... Striking."-G. John Ikenberry. Foreign Affairs

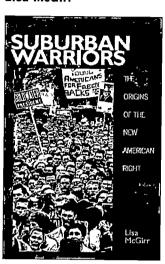

"One of the most valuable books to appear about doing justice."—Aryeh Neier, New York Review of Books

Princeton Studies in International History and

Paper $19.95 ISBN 0-691-09278-8

Suburban Warriors

The Origins of the New American Right Lisa McGirr

"Well written and authoritative, enriched by the voices of the Orange County conservatives [McGirr] interviewed and by deep archival research."

-Mark Schmitt, American Prospect

"Suburban Warriors affords a rare picture of the grass-roots process actually working at a specific place."-Russell Baker, New York Review of Books

Winner of the 2001 New England Historical Association Book Award Paper $18.95 ISBN 0-691-09611-2

Cold War Civil Rights

Race and the Image of American Democracy Mary L. Dudziak

"In her long-awaited book, Mary Dudziak brilliantly demonstrates the interconnections between race relations and the American response to the early Cold War.... Dudziak sets a new standard for literature on race and Cold War foreign policy.... Her work deserves a wide audience." -Laura Belmonte, Journal of Cold War Studies

"This nuanced, scholarly appraisal of the relationship between foreign policy and the civil rights story offers a fresh and provocative perspective on twentieth-century American history."

—Harvard Law Review Paper $18.95 ISBN 0-691-09513-2 Due April

Twentieth-Anniversary Edition With a new foreword by Robert H. Frank

Shifting Involvements

Private Interest and Public Action Albert O. Hirschman

"Shifting Involvements can be read over and over again, with each reading disclosing new subtleties, so cunning is its construction and so original its standpoint."

-Michael Banton, Times Literary Supplement

Eliot Janeway Lectures on Historical Economics Winner of the Talcott Parsons Prize of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences Paper $14.95 ISBN 0-691-09292-3

Sex Drives

Fantasies of Fascism in Literary Modernism

LAURA FROST

"A brilliant exposition of the historical and political contexts of eroticized fascism that also unravels the democratic imagination's vanilla fantasies about its own sexual rectitude. This is a landmark book: astute, subtle, marvelously readable, and in no way politically reassuring."—Laura Kipnis, author of Bound and Gaggged: Pornography and the Politics of Fantasy in America. 12 illustrations. $45.00 cloth, $17.95 paper

The Search for Modern Tragedy

Aesthetic Fascism in Italy and France

MARY ANN FRESE WITT

"Mary Ann Frese Witt provides rich and subtle readings of the key texts of Italian and French intellectuals who contributed to the emergence of an aesthetics of fascism...

This compelling account of intellectuals and politics is a definitive intervention in the debate over fascism and literature."—Russell Berman, Stanford University.

7 illustrations. $45.00

In the Matter of J. Robert Oppenheimer

The Security Clearance Hearing Edited by

RICHARD POLENBERG

"The Oppenheimer hearings were one of the great dramas of the Cold War at home. Their outcome still affects the relationship between scientists and the state. Richard Polenberg's skillfully edited transcript proves once again that history reads better than fiction."—Gregg Herken, author of The Winning Weapon: The Atomic Bomb in the Cold War, 1945-50. 19 illustrations.

$45.00 cloth, $19.95 paper

The Countryside in the Age of the Modern State

Political Histories of Rural America

EDITED BY CATHERINE MCNICOL STOCK AND ROBERT D. JOHNSTON

"This collection of essays represents a major advance in the field of rural history. By focusing on the different dimensions of political activism-and the role of the state in the country-side, it provides a much-needed rural perspective on some of the central issues of twentieth-centruy history."—Hal S. Barron, author of Mixed Harvest: The Second Great Transformation in the Rural North, 1870–1930.
4 illustrations, 1 map, 7 tables.
$45.00 cloth, $24.95 paper

Hollyworld

Space, Power, and Fantasy in the American Economy

AIDA HOZIC

"Aida Hozic delves into the economic engine room of Hollywood and comes back up with some remarkable insights. A significant part of the book's originality lies in its emphasis on distribution as a critical agency in shaping the production and consumption of contemporary culture."—Allen J. Scott, UCLA. 19 illustrations. $29.95

The Education of Cyrus

XENOPHON

Translated and Annotated by Wayne Ambler
"At long last, Xenophon's masterpiece is available in an absolutely reliable translation that conveys even the charms of the original: clarity and grace, profundity and levity. An exemplary rendering of a marvelous book."—Robert Bartlett, Emory University Agora Editions. 1 table, 1 map. $45.00 cloth, $19.95 paper

To Be a Citizen

The Political Culture of the Early French Third Republic JAMES R. LEHNING

"To Be a Citizen . . . is an overview of the limitations of republican political culture in the early Third French Republic, especially as it affected women, colonial subjects, immigrants, workers, and Catholics. No other book offers such breadth and depth of analysis about this period."

—Raymond Jonas, University of Washington. 6 illustrations. $39.95

Blood in the City

Violence and Revelation in Paris, 1789–1945

RICHARD D. E. BURTON

"This astonishing and compelling book is both a graphic study of the many forms and waves of violence that have swept Paris since 1789, and a subtle, imaginative interpretation of the bloody rituals that have marked the long contest between embittered Catholics and anticlericals still deeply marked by France's catholic culture."
—Stanley Hoffmann, Harvard University. 2 maps, 20 illustrations. $36.50

No Exit

America and the German Problem, 1943–1954

JAMES MCALLISTER

James McAllister outlines a new account of early Cold War history, one that focuses on the emergence of a bipolar structure of power, the continuing importance of the German question, and American efforts to create a united Western Europe. Cornell Studies in Security Affairs. $39.95

The Origins of Nonliberal Capitalism

Germany and Japan in Comparison
EDITED BY WOLFGANG STREECK
AND KOZO YAMAMURA

"There have been many observations of and conjectures about the similarities and differences of Japanese and German capitalism, but few systematic and interdisciplinary analyses of the subject. [This book] takes us a long way in that direction."—Masahiko Aoki, Stanford University. Cornell Studies in Political Economy. 3 line drawings, 8 tables. $45.00

The Soul of Justice Social Bonds and Racial Hubris

Social Bonds and Racial Hubris
CYNTHIA WILLETT

"Cynthia Willett forcefully argues that a theory of radical democracy needs both a notion of hubris and a notion of social eros. . . . Willett takes us to the heart of tensions between need and independence, autonomy and ultruism, self and others, rights and duties, equality and difference. This book will change the way that we think about justice and democracy in an era of globalization." -Kelly Oliver, State University of New York, Stony Brook. $45.00 cloth, $17.95 paper

NEW IN PAPER

Imitation and Politics

Redesigning Modern Germany

WADE JACOBY

"This is an excellent book which manages to give an account of four episodes of policy transfer, to enrich our understanding of the German system of education and industrial relations and advance substantially our understanding of the conditions under which policies developed in one jurisdiction can be used as models for reform in another."

—Geopolitics. $17.95

Memorabilia

XENOPHON

Translated and Annotated by Amy L. Bonnette Introduction by Christopher J. Bruell An essential text for understanding Socrates, Memorabilia is the compelling tribute of an affectionate student to his teacher. Here, Xenophon offers a rare firsthand account of Socrates' life and philosophy. Agora Editions. $17.95

You Don't Always Get What You Pay For

The Economics of Privatization

ELLIOTT D. SCLAR

"With breathtaking clarity,
Professor Sclar reminds us that today's privatization is nothing more than a fancy label for yesterday's public contracting...
His examples and his analysis—and most of all his plea for sensible attention to good public management techniques—deserve wide notice. Even if politicians don't heed his advice, taxpayers should."—The New York Times.
A Century Foundation Book.
12 tables. $17.95

The Making of NAFTA

· How the Deal Was Done

MAXWELL A. CAMERON AND BRIAN W. TOMLIN

"Drawing on extensive personal interviews in all three NAFTA countries, [this book] provides the best explanation yet as to why this trade agreement took the form it did."
—Judith Teichman, University of Toronto. 12 tables. $18.95

Three Women in Dark Times

Edith Stein, Hannah Arendt, Simone Weil

SYLVIE COURTINE-DENAMY

Translated by G. M. Goshgarian "Sylvie Courtine-Denamy's narrative of the intellectual, cultural, and political contributions of these extraordinary women situates their work within the rise of European totalitarianism and anti-Semitism, revealing not only their personal tragedies but also their outspoken courage on behalf of others and their enduring legacies as writers, teachers, and activists."—Shari Benstock, University of Miami. $17.95

Inquisition and Medieval Society

Power, Discipline, and Resistance in Languedoc

IAMES, B. GIVEN

"This is the first serious attempt ever made by a historian to get behind the documents and study the sociopolitical context within which the Inquisition operated. Given brings to bear not only his own deep knowledge of medieval history but also extensive reading in modern social history and sociology."—American Historical Review. 1 map, 6 charts. $18.95

Cornell University Press

Sage House 512 East State Street, Ithaca, New York 14850

New Political Science from Duke

The Treatment

The Story of Those Who Died in the Cincinnati Radiation Tests

MARTHA STEPHENS

"Stephens is a skilled investigative journalist, piecing together medical records, Pentagon reports, and firsthand interviews to weave a damning and unforgettable picture of what happened in the basement of Cincinnati General Hospital."—Eileen Welsome, author of The Plutonium Files: America's Secret Medical Experiments in the Cold War 312 pages, 15 b&w photos, cloth $28.95

Slobodan Milosevic and the Destruction of Yugoslavia LOUIS SELL

"Louis Sell brings to his fascinating study of the Serbian tyrant a deep experience in the Balkans, an authority based on his own participation in some of the events he describes, and a keen analytical eye. This is a first-rate book."—Warren Zimmermann, United States Ambassador to Yugoslavia, 1989–1992

392 pages, cloth $34.95

Confronting Mass Democracy and Industrial Technology

Political and Social Theory from Nietzsche to Habermas JOHN P. McCORMICK, EDITOR

"This rich volume is sure to attract scholarly attention in a variety of fields. There is nothing else like it in print."—Stephen Holmes, New York University School of Law

368 pages, paper $21.95

DUKE UNIVERSITY PRESS

www.dukeupress.edu toll-free 1-888-651-0122

Prejudicial Appearances

The Logic of American Antidiscrimination Law

ROBERT C. POST WITH K. ANTHONY APPIAH, JUDITH BUTLER, THOMAS C. GREY, & REVA B. SIEGEL

"An astute, humane, and compelling case for the central role of the law in shaping the meanings of race and gender."—Henry Louis Gates, Jr.
184 pages, paper $18.95

The Rule of Rules

Morality, Rules, and the Dilemmas of Law LARRY ALEXANDER & EMILY SHERWIN

"Accessible to the non-specialist, the arguments found in The Rule of Rules are clearly made and well-illustrated with concrete examples. This will make an important contribution to ongoing jurisprudential debates."—Mark Tushnet, Georgetown University Law Center 288 pages, doth $45.95

The Culture of Conformism

Understanding Social Consent PATRICK COLM HOGAN

"[Hogan's] goal is not merely to explain but to provide tools of understanding that will be of practical value to those who struggle for justice and freedom. Drawing from an impressive array of sources, his valuable study advances both ends considerably, no mean accomplishment."—Noam Chomsky

192 pages, 2 figures, paper $17.95

Foreign in a Domestic Sense

Puerto Rico, American Expansion, and the Constitution CHRISTINA DUFFY BURNETT & BURKE MARSHALL, EDS.

"The most important work of its kind of our generation, a book that advances the scholarship while having a material impact on current and future debates about Puerto Rico's self-determination."—Francisco A. Scarano, author of Puerto Rico: Cinco Siglos de Historia

440 pages, paper $23.95
Amencan Encounters/Global Interactions

Guide to Sustainable Development and Environmental Policy NATALIA MIROVITSKAYA & WILLIAM L. ASCHER, EDITORS

"This useful and unusual resource brings together a large number of interrelating concepts on an important and contentious issue."—Lynton K. Caldwell, author of International Environmental Policy: From the Twentieth to the Twenty-First Century 592 pages, paper $34.95

The Community Economic Development Movement

Law, Business, and the New Social Policy WILLIAM H. SIMON

"An original, informative, and important contribution to the fields of urban studies and social policy."—Richard Briffault, Columbia Law School 240 pages, 2 tables, 3 figures, paper $18.95

NEW FROM OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

GLOBAL CIVIL SOCIETY 2001

CENTRE FOR CIVIL SOCIETY and CENTRE FOR THE STUDY OF GLOBAL GOVERNANCE, LSE

Many scholars, policy-makers, and especially activists have begun to use the term "global civil society," yet it remains highly contested and under-researched. This Yearbook, a land-mark publication, discusses and clarifies the concept: mapping, measuring, and examining it on a yearly basis. The conceptual chapters, comprehensive case studies, and comparative empirical data make it an essential volume for researchers in a number of disciplines, including economics, political science, anthropology and sociology, international law, and international relations.

2001; 348 pp ; 37 halftones/line illus., cloth $65 00/ paper $22 95  $\,$

New in Paperback!

PARTIES WITHOUT PARTISANS

Political Change in Advanced Industrial Democracies

Edited by RUSSELL J. DALTON and MARTIN P. WATTENBERG

"A cohesive study of party change in the late 20th century in most of the advanced democracies...indispensable for graduate students, researchers, and faculty."—Choice (Comparative Politics)

2002; 328 pp; 13 figs., paper $19 95/ cloth $45.00

EUROPEAN STATES AND THE

Europeanization, Variation, and Convergence

Edited by KENNETH DYSON

With the introduction of euro notes and coins in 2002 and the prospect of a UK referendum on the single currency, questions about how Economic and Monetary Union is affecting European states will come ever closer to the centre of political debate right across Europe. This ground-breaking book brings together leading experts in the field to examine the nature of the effects of the euro on EU member states.

2002; 420 pp.; cloth $72.00/ paper $29.95

New in Paperback!

TRANSFORMING TECHNOLOGY

A CRITICAL THEORY REVISITED ANDREW FEENBERG

Thoroughly revised, this new edition rethinks the relationships between technology, rationality, and democracy, arguing that the degradation of labor—as well as of many environmental, educational, and political systems—is rooted in the social values that preside over technological development.

2002; 232 pp; paper $19 95

POLITICAL PARTIES

OLD CONCEPTS AND NEW CHALLENGES

Edited by RICHARD GUNTHER, JOSÉ RAMÛN MONTERO, AND JUAN LINZ

Several of the world's leading scholars present critical analyses (both conceptual and empirical) of important substantive themes on political parties in contemporary democracies. They critically re-examine the classic concepts and typologies that have guided research in this field over the past decades, and explore new challenges faced by parties today.

(Comparative Politics)
May 2002, 380 pp; cloth $49.95/ paper $21.95

Institutions and Democratic Citizenship

AXEL HADENIUS

Divided into two parts, this highly informative work first contributes to the debate on democracy's preconditions, then explores the historical development of state structures. Its primary conclusion is that democracy is not the product of social and economic forces, yet, to a greater extent, it is the consequence of prevailing institutional conditions, i.e. the nature of the state. In the second section, Hadenius maintains that the differing modes of state have displayed a variable capacity for governance and economic development. Thus, the evolution of state structures has consequences across broad areas of political and social life.

(Oxford Studies in Democratization) 2001; 312 pp; 2 figs., cloth $60 00/ paper $29 95

FEDERALISM, DEMOCRATIZATION, AND THE RULE OF LAW IN RUSSIA

JEFFERY KAHN

How has Russia's political elite struggled to build a federal system of government out of the rubble of the Soviet empire? This ground-breaking book examines the public debates, official documents, and political deals that built Russia's federal house, and analyzes the strength of its troubled foundation. 2002; 300 pp; $65.00

ARISTOTLE

POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY RICHARD KRAUT

This book offers a systematic overview of Aristotle's conception of well-being, virtue and justice in the Nicomachean Ethics, and then explores the major themes of Politics: civic-mindedness, slavery, family, property, the common good, class conflict, the limited wisdom of the multitude, and the radically egalitarian institutions of the ideal society.

(Founders of Modern Political and Social Thought) 2002; 500 pp., paper $24.95

New in Paperback!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERAL EDUCATION

MEIRA LEVINSON

What should the aims of education be in a liberal society? Who should exercise control over education? How can children be taught to become good citizens of a pluralistic state? The Demands of Liberal Education seeks to answer these questions by drawing on political theory, philosophy of education, and empirical research to develop a liberal theory of children's education. Author Meira Levinson argues that contrary to the assumptions of many philosophers, educators, parents, and politicians, the liberal state is obligated as a matter of justice to help all children develop the capacity for autonomy. Forwarding a provocative new view, Levinson contends that liberal governments should exercise much greater control over schools than they currently maintain.

2002; 248 pp; paper $19 95/ cloth $39 95

Kashmir

Domestic Insurgency, International Dispute IFFAT SANA MALIK

This is a political analysis of the Kashmir conflict that focuses on its domestic and international aspects as two distinct issues: an international one between Pakistan and India, and a domestic one between Kashmiri Muslims and Indians.

2002; 105 pp; $24.95

THEORIZING FEMINIST POLICY

AMY MAZUR

Theorizing Feminist Policy avoids the usual clash between feminist analysis and non-feminist social science in mapping out the new field of feminist comparative policy. Instead, it intersects empirical feminist policy analysis with non-feminist policy studies to define and contribute to this new and emerging field of study. Consulting a wide sweep of empirical and theoretical work, the book first defines Feminist Comparative Policy showing how it dialogs with the adjacent non-feminist areas of Comparative Public Policy, Comparative Politics, and Public Policy Studies. It then seeks then to strengthen one of the weakest links of this new area - the study of explicitly feminist government action. In the remaining chapters, the books defines feminist policy as a separate sector, with eight sub sectors. It develops a qualitative and comparative framework for analyzing the profiles and styles of feminist policy in post industrial democracies and uses the framework to examine twenty seven different cases of feminist policy formation across thirteen different countries.

(Gender and Politics Series) 2002, 280 pp; cloth $72.00/ paper $21.95

NEW FROM OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

THE FEDERAL VISION

LEGITIMACY AND LEVELS OF GOVERNANCE IN THE US AND EU Edited by KALYPSO NICOLAIDIS and ROBERT HOWSE

Based on a transatlantic dialogue between scholars, this work addresses the complex and changing relationship between levels of governance within the United States and the European Union. It examines modes of governance on both sides, analyzing the ramifications of the legitimacy crisis in our multi-layered democracies and moving beyond the current policy debates over "devolution" and "subsidiarity." Its authors believe that in spite of the fundamental differences between them, both the EU and the US are in the process of re-defining a federal vision for the twenty-first century.

2002; 400 pp.; cloth $85 00/ paper $29 95

RIGHTSIZING THE STATE

THE POLITICS OF MOVING BORDERS Edited by BRENDAN O'LEARY, IAN S. LUSTICK, and THOMAS CALLAGHY

Strategic decisions to reduce the size, scope, or ambitions of organizations—including states—to enhance future prospects are among the most difficult and least understood conclusions. This volume identifies the conditions in which less really is more, analyzing the possibilities for institutional redesign—including state contraction—for responding effectively to destabilizing and often violence-laden conflicts. Among the countries discussed in detail are Turkey, Pakistan, Morocco, Congo, Jordan, Indonesia, Russia, the former Soviet Union, Iraq, and India.

2002, 350 pp.; $45.00

THE ARCHITECTURE OF DEMOCRACY

CONSTITUTIONAL DESIGN, CONFLICT MANAGEMENT, AND DEMOCRACY Edited by ANDREW REYNOLDS

In this fascinating exploration of democracy, Reynolds assembles prominent scholars to discuss the successes and failures of constitutional design. Chapters analyze the effects of presidential and parliamentary systems, issues of federalism and autonomy, and the varying impact of electoral systems, concluding with notable case studies of Fiji, Ireland, Eritrea, Indonesia, Nigeria, and India. The culmination of the study of constitutional engineering in the third wave of democracy, this important work sets parameters for crucial research as democracy diffuses across the world.

(Oxford Studies in Democratization) 2002; 400 pp.; cloth $72.00/ paper $24.95

Women, Politics, and Change

Edited by KAREN ROSS

This report offers a range of perspectives on the role of women in formal politics in a variety of political contexts, from mature to more emergent democratic systems. The wide geographical range - from Africa to Europe, from China to Australia - is a significant strength of the book, as is the diversity of its methodological approaches and techniques.

(Hansard Society Series in Government and Politics) 2002; 250 pp.; paper $24.95

ARGUING COMPARATIVE POLITICS

ALFRED STEPAN

Assembling articles by one of the foremost scholars in comparative politics, this volume covers the important works and ideas in the field from the last thirty years, most notably the nature of contemporary democracy and its prospects. It explores state and society, constructing politics, and varieties of democracies; contains articles on civil society, political society, economic society, and a usable state; and compares and contrasts the incentive systems and political practices of parliamentarianism, presidentialism, and semi-presidentialism. 2001; 384 pp.; 3 figs., cloth $65.00/ paper $17.95

Abortion Politics, Women's Movements, and the State

A Comparative Study of State Feminism

Edited by DOROTHY McBRIDE STETSON Containing the results of a cross-national research project on abortion politics in eleven democratic states (between the 1960s and 2000), this volume marks major progress in abortion research. It develops a comprehensive research design to examine whether or not women's policy agencies (institutional groups intended to improve the status of women) have functioned as necessary and effective allies of women's movements. It explores their efforts to gain access to power arenas and secure abortion laws that coincide with feminist goals. Indeed, these findings constitute a rigorous application of comparative methodology to assess explanations from social movement and democratic theory pertaining to variations in state feminism and movement success.

(Gender and Politics Series) 2002; 380 pp; cloth $72.00/ paper $24.95

THE RUSSIAN MAFIA

PRIVATE PROTECTION IN A NEW MARKET ECONOMY FEDERICO VARESE

"Enlightening, perceptive and superbly researched. Essential reading for anybody seriously interested in the mind and heart of contemporary Russian criminal society."—John le Carré

2001; 304 pp.; 6 figs.; $27.50

CAPITALISTS AGAINST MARKETS

THE MAKING OF LABOR MARKETS AND WELFARE STATES IN THE UNITED STATES AND SWEDEN

PETER SWENSON

Conventional wisdom argues that welfare state builders in the US and Sweden in the 1930s took their cues from labor and labor movements. Swenson makes the startling argument that pragmatic social reformers looked for support not only from below but also from above, taking into account capitalist interests and preferences. Juxtaposing two widely recognized extremes of welfare, the US and Sweden, Swenson shows that employer interests played a role in welfare state development in both countries.

2002, 464 pp.; cloth $64.95/ paper $21 95

New in Paperback!

CONTAINING NATIONALISM MICHAEL HECHTER

"An elegant and sweeping account of modern nationalism."—Foreign Affairs. "A very useful introduction to a complex subject bound to continue to preoccupy observers."—Choice. "Containing Nationalism is a trenchant discussion of a problem that...shows little sign of abating. Even more, however, it is a thoughtful attempt by a veteran observer to offer a theoretical analysis with very practical implications. This book will be indispensable for academics and policymakers alike."—Politics, Social Movements, and The State.

2001; 272 pp. 6 figs; pager $19.95/ cloth $29.95

New in Paperback!

INCLUSION AND DEMOCRACY IRIS MARION YOUNG

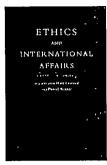

Democratic processes of communication in a multicultural society often marginalize those whose forms of expression don't fit the norms of political discussion. The author, a leading political philosopher, examines the ideals of political inclusion and exclusion and recommends ways to make democratic politics more inclusive.

(Oxford Political Theory) 2002; 320 pp., paper $18 95/ cloth $29.95

United Nations Publications

Ethics and International Affairs: Extent and Limits

This publication explores the extent and limits of contemporary international ethics and examines the ways in which the international community has responded to some of the most crucial challenges of the last ten years. At the center of the book is a discussion of how responsibility is viewed at individual, national and international levels when facing the pressing problems of human rights, humanitarian intervention, environmental issues, considerations of gender, international economic justice, matters of war and peace, and the plight of refugees. While some authors revisit the conception and interpretation of international ethics, others focus on the necessity to push for better implementation and improvement of existing international norms. E.01.III.A.7 9280810529 296pp. $29.95

Sharing the Front Line and the Back Hills: Peace-keepers, Humanitarian Workers and the Media in the Midst of Crisis

This book tells the story of thousands of individuals who have dedicated themselves to helping others at great sacrifice to themselves and their families. These are people who have worked with peacekeeping and peacebuilding missions, humanitarian workers with the United Nations and disaster relief operations, human rights defenders, journalists and other media professionals. In addition to creating an awareness of and an appreciation for the accomplishments as well as costs and sacrifices of these international protectors and providers, the book also discusses the issue of protection and how it should be integrated into the planning, implementing and evaluating international intervention and action.

E.01.I.23 0895032635 450pp. $59.00

International Instruments Related to the Prevention and Suppression of International Terrorism

Terrorism strikes at the very heart of everything the United Nations stands for. It presents a global threat to democracy, the rule of law, human rights and stability. Globalization brings home the importance of a truly concerted international effort to combat terrorism in all its forms and manifestations. An important part of that effort is the work of the United Nations in the establishment of the necessary legal framework for the prevention and suppression of terrorism. The "treaty-making" process, covering various aspects of terrorism, has led to the adoption of many instruments over the past four decades. This publication presents a compilation of global and regional instruments on terrorism.

E.01.V.3 9211336317 280pp. $30.00

UNITED NATIONS PUBLICATIONS

Visa, MC and AMEX accepted. Domestic orders: Add 5% of gross ($ 5.00 minimum) for shipping and handling. Overseas Orders: Add US$ 5.00 per title in addition to US$ 5.00 basic handling charge.

PORTLAND STATE UNIVERSITY

The Mark O. Hatfield School of Government at Portland State University and the School of Politics and Economics at the Claremont Graduate University jointly announce the

Fourth Power Transition Conference

August 8-10, 2002 La Playa Hotel, Carmel, California

Paper Competition

Scholars are invited to submit paper proposals for innovative work involving power transition theory. Papers may be theoretical, including formal and game theoretic, or applied, including national policy, national security, and regional analysis. Papers linking power transition theory and expected utility techniques are welcome.

Proposals will be reviewed by Ronald L. Tammen of the Hatfield School of Government, Jacek Kugler of the Claremont Graduate University, and Doug Lemke of the University of Michigan.

Ten successful applicants will receive a $500 stipend for the paper plus transportation to and lodging at the conference. Self-funded scholars also may apply for an invitation.

Send proposals in the form of a one-page abstract to Betty Lewis, Assistant to the Director, Mark O. Hatfield School of Government, Portland State University, P.O. Box 751, Portland, Oregon 97207-0751, by April 15, 2002.

KANSAS

Democratic DelusionsThe Initiative Process in America

Richard J. Ellis

"A rare accomplishment: first class civic education that is a pleasure to read. Ellis has a lot to offer American voters everywhere—especially those who wonder exactly what the initiatives on their ballots will actually accomplish." —Nelson W. Polsby, author of Political Innovation in America: The Politics of Policy Initiation

"Highly readable and often provocative, Democratic Delusions boldly challenges the belief that the initiative process gives 'power to the people." —Daniel A. Smith, author of Tax Crusaders and the Politics of Direct Democracy

Studies in Government and Public Policy 264 pages, Cloth $35.00, Paper $17.95

Civil Servants and Their Constitutions

John A. Rohr

"Relying on a breathtaking range of scholarship, Rohr definitively shows how and why public administration is inevitably and strongly bound up with constitution-making and constitutional governance. This book should forever change mainstream public administrative thought in the United States."—David H. Rosenbloom, coauthor of Constitutional Competence for Public Managers

Studies in Government and Public Policy 216 pages, Cloth $35.00, Paper $16.95

Women in the BarracksThe VMI Case and Equal Rights

Philippa Strum

"Fascinating and beautifully written, Women in the Barracks is far more than a case study of a lawsuit. It offers unique insights into the evolution of gender roles in modern and postmodern America."—Linda Grant De Pauw, author of Battle Cries and Lullabies: Women in War from Prehistory to the Present

"An 'inside story' full of rich detail that illuminates both VMI's institutional history and one important strand in the modern women's movement."—Kenneth L. Karst, author of Law's Promise, Law's Expression: Visions of Power in the Politics of Race, Gender, and Religion

448 pages, 29 photographs, Cloth $34.95

Constitutionalism and American Culture Writing the New

Writing the New Constitutional History

Edited by Sandra F. VanBurkleo, Kermit L. Hall, and Robert J. Kaczorowski

Foreword by Stanley N. Katz

"A highly rewarding and lively volume that adds depth and insight to our understanding of constitutionalism. Far-ranging in scope, these essays probe vital issues, challenge conventional wisdom, and suggest fresh approaches to shaping the future of constitutional history."—James W. Ely, Jr., author of Railroads and American Law 448 pages, Cloth $45.00, Paper $24.95

Alexander Hamilton and the Persistence of Myth

Stephen F. Knott

"A superb book about how and why one of the greatest of Americans has been one of the least appreciated. Knott's penetrating and sensitive account of the vicissitudes of Hamilton's public image over two centuries contains within it a subtle and profound commentary on the images Americans have had of themselves."—Forrest McDonald, author of Novus Ordo Seclorum: The Intellectual Origins of the Constitution

"Knott has done for Hamilton what Merrill Peterson did for Jefferson, and in the process he has made clear, as never before, the contours of American political history. No one interested in our national trajectory or in the current prospect can afford to ignore this fine book."—Paul A. Rahe, author of Republics Ancient and Modern

American Political Thought

New in Paperback

John Adams and the Spirit of Liberty

C. Bradley Thompson

344 pages, Cloth $34.95

Winner of the APSA's Foundations of Political Theory Award

"This is intellectual history as it should be written: powerful and penetrating, compelling and convincing."—Times Literary Supplement
American Political Thought
350 pages, Paper $17.95

Available at bookstores or from the press. VISA and MasterCard accepted.

University Press of Kansas

2501 West 15th Street • Lawrence, KS 66049 Phone (785) 864-4155 • Fax (785) 864-4586 • www.kansaspress.ku.edu

New In

POLITICAL SCIENCE

From Transaction

A HISTORY OF TERRORISM

Walter Laqueur

With a new introduction by the author

0-7658-0799-8 (paper) 2001 285 pp. $24.95/£20.95

DIRECT DEMOCRACY IN SWITZERLAND

Gregory A. Fossedal

With a foreword by Alfred R. Berkeley III 0-7658-0078-0 (cloth) 2001 324 pp. $39.95/£33.95

THE POLITICS OF THE BLACK "NATION"

A TWENTY-FIVE-YEAR RETROSPECTIVE NATIONAL POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW, VOLUME 8

Georgia Persons, editor

0-7658-0859-5 (paper) 2001 480 pp. $29.95/£25.95

THE LIBERAL STATE AND THE POLITICS OF VIRTUE

Ludvig Beckman

0-7658-0086-1 (cloth) 2001 298 pp. $49.95/£41.95

CONSERVATISM

DREAM AND REALITY

Robert Nisbet

With a new introduction by Brad L. Stone

0-7658-0862-5 (paper) 2001 140 pp. $21.95/£18.95

SOCIAL DEMOCRACY AND ARISTOCRACY

John H. Kautsky

0-7658-0091-8 (cloth) 2001 245 pp. $39.95/ £33.95

GOVERNMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

Woodrow Wilson

With a new introduction by Sidney A. Pearson, Jr. 0-7658-0866-8 (paper) 2001 270 pp. $29.95/£25.95

PHOENIX

FASCISM IN OUR TIME

A. James Gregor

With an introduction by Allesandro Campi

0-7658-0855-2 (paper) 2001 228 pp. $24.95/£20.95

POLITICAL MACHINES

GOVERNING A TECHNOLOGICAL SOCIETY

Andrew Barry

0-485-00439-9 (cloth) 2001 240 pp. $90.00 0-485-00634-0 (paper) 2001 240 pp. $29.95

ENDING SLAVERY

HIERARCHY, DEPENDENCY, AND GENDER IN CENTRAL MAURITANIA

Urs Peter Ruf

3-933127-49-1 (paper) 2001 434 pp. $39.95 / £30.95

Visit our website for more information on our extensive collection of books in Political Science and a wide array of books and journals in other social science disciplines.

To order, call toll free 1-888-999-6778 or fax: 732-748-9801

(US only)

TRANSACTION PUBLISHERS

In North America — Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey, Department ADo1 PS, Berrue Circle, Piscataway, New Jersey 08854

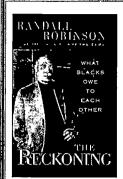

In The UK—3 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London WC2E 8LU Tel: +44 (0)20 7 240 0856 Fax: +44 (0)20 7 379 0609

In Australia—Footprint Books Pty Ltd, Unit 4/ 92A Mona Vale Road, Mona Vale NSW 2103, Australia Tel: +61 02 9997 3973

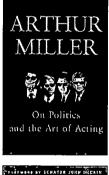

In India — Viva Books, Private LTD. 4262/3 Ansari Rd. New Delhi, 110 002, India, Tel: 0091 11 3258325

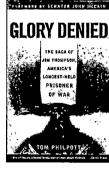

Visit our website for online specials www.transactionpub.com

Crypto STEVEN LEVY

Randall Robinson The Reckoning What Blacks Owe to Each Other

Focusing on the future, Robinson calls on black Americans to join the crucial battle to free the residents of America's inner cities from economic blight and social pathology.

Dutton 288 pp. 0-525-94625-X $24.95

Steven Levy Crypto How the Code Rebels Beat the Government— Saving Privacy in the Digital Age "Gripping and illuminating."—The Wa

"Gripping and illuminating."—The Wall Street Journal. "A great David-and-Goliath story—humble hackers hoodwink sinister spooks."—Time.

Penguin 368 pp. 0-670-85950-8 $14.00

On Politics and The Art of Acting

Miller considers the twin arts of acting and politics, and contrasts the relatively poor thespian skills of recent presidential candidates George Bush and Al Gore with the consummate art practiced by some of the great masters of the modern American political stage: Roosevelt, Kennedy, Reagan, and Clinton.

iking 96 pp. 0-670-03042-2 $15.0

Tom Philpott Glory DeniedThe Saga of Jim Thompson, America's Longest-Held Prisoners of War

Foreword by Senator John McCain
Plume 480 pp. 0-452-28316-7 $15.00

Eugene Linden The Future in Plain Sight A Look at Our Planet in the Year 2050

"A very important book...provocative....
A lucidly written guide to the near future."—Edward O. Wilson, Pulitzer Prize-winning author Consilience.

Plume 288 pp. 0-452-28299-3 $14.00

Barbara Garson

Money Makes the World Go Around

"What an idea for a book! Barbara Garson tracks her own money through the global economy, transforming what in other hands might be dreary abstraction into human personality, dashed dreams, life and hope."—Robert Kanigel. Penguin 352 pp. 0-14-200050-7 $14.00

Thomas Cahill Pope John XXIIIA Penguin Lives Biography

Follows Ronacalli's life from his peasant roots to his landmark Second Vatican Council, with its emphasis on worldwide social justice, which marked the beginning of a true shift in the Catholic Church and its relationship to the modern wold. Lipper/Viking 176 pp. 0-670-03057-0 $19.95

Sheldon Rampton and John Stauber Trust Us, We're Experts How Industry Manipulates Science and Gambles with Your Future

"Finally a long-overdue exposé of the shenanigans and subterfuge that lie behind the making of experts in America."—Jeremy Rifkin. Winner of the NCTE Orwell Award.

Tarcher 368 pp. 1-58542-139-1 $14.95

Catherine Merridale Night of Stone Death and Memory in Twentieth-Century Russia

"Merridale's account of how ordinary Russians coped with violent death on a scale few of us can even imagine is an epic and moving history."—The Observer (London).

Penguin 416 pp. 0-14-200063-9 $15.00

Marshall Frady Martin Luther King, Jr. A Penguin Lives Biography

An inspiring, uniquely firsthand portrait of a civil rights icon by "one of the best political biographers of our time" (Los Angeles Times).

Lipper/Viking 224 pp. 0-670-88231-3 $19.95

For a free Political Science catalog email academic@penguinputnam.com

LYNNE RIENNER PUBLISHERS

Women in Developing Countries: Assessing Strategies for Empowerment

EDITED BY REKHA DATTA AND JUDITH KORNBERG hc $49.95 • pb $19.95

CHOICE OUTSTANDING ACADEMIC BOOK! FORTHCOMING IN PAPERBACK!

State Legitimacy and Development in Africa

PIERRE ENGLEBERT • hc $55 • pb $19.95

NEW IN U.S. POLITICS . . .

Cozy Politics: Political Parties, Campaign Finance, and Compromised Governance Peter Kobrak

"This is a penetrating assessment of the moneycrazed, low-turnout, pork-barrel system of politics in the United States—a political system spiraling out of control."—Darrell West • hc $55 • pb $22.50

Electing Jesse Ventura: A Third-Party Success Story

JACOB LENTZ

"A fun, quick read about the election of a unique candidate—this richly detailed narrative would make an outstanding supplement for courses on state and local politics or on campaigns and elections."

-Steven C. Wagner

"Jesse Ventura's victory surprised and puzzled many.

After reading this book, they may remain surprised—but a lot of the puzzle will be cleared up."

—Sidney Verba • hc $45 • pb $16.95

Politics and Policymaking: In Search of Simplicity

IRA SHARKANSKY

"Sharkansky has produced a useful and perceptive book, examining the search for simplicity in politics, and providing an empirical challenge to those who argue that more information is always desirable. It is stimulating, informative, and a delight to read."
—James Anderson • hc $49.95

Strategic Thinking: An Introduction and Farewell

PHILIP WINDSOR, EDITED BY MATS BERDAL AND SPYROS ECONOMIDES hc $49.95 • pb $19.95

Driven by Drugs: U.S. Policy Toward Colombia

RUSSELL CRANDALL hc $49.95 • pb $19.95

Truth and Reconciliation

in South Africa: Miracle or Model?

LYN S. GRAYBILL hc $49.95 • pb $19.95

INTRODUCING

GLOBAL

ISSUES

NEW EDITIONS—AVAILABLE FOR FALL CLASSES!

2ND EDITION

Understanding Development: Theory and Practice in the Third World

JOHN RAPLEY • pb $19.95

2ND EDITION

Introducing Global Issues

EDITED BY MICHAEL T. SNARR AND D. NEIL SNARR • pb $22.50

3RD EDITION

U.S. National Security: Policymakers, Processes, and Politics

SAM C. SARKESIAN, JOHN ALLEN WILLIAMS, AND STEPHEN J. CIMBALA hc $59.95 • pb $22.50

DIGNITY AND LIBERTY

Constitutional Visions in Germany and the United States By Edward J. Eberle Foreword by Donald P. Kommérs

"Important and illuminating."

Richard G. Huber Emeritus Professor of Law Boston College

Praeger Publishers • 2002 • 320 pages 0-275-97249-6 • $64.95

paper: 0-275-97491-X • $24.95

AMERICAN INDIANS AND U.S. POLITICS

A Companion Reader Edited by John M. Meyer Foreword by David E. Wilkins

The first book designed for introductory government courses, this reader explores the singular and vitally important relationship between American Indians and the U.S. political system.

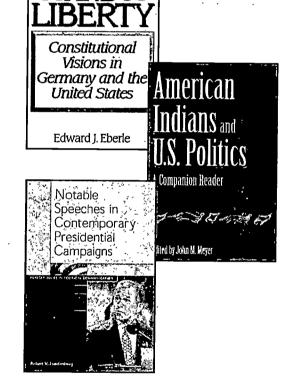

Praeger Publishers • 2002 • 216 pages 0-275-97264-X • $64.95 paper: 0-275-97278-X • $22.95

NOTABLE SPEECHES IN CONTEMPORARY PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGNS

By Robert V. Friedenberg

Key speeches by JFK, Barry Goldwater, Richard Nixon, Ronald Reagan, Bill and Hillary Clinton, and George W. Bush are carefully analyzed.

Praeger Publishers • 2002 • 264 pages 0-275-96785-9 • $64.95 paper: 0-275-97573-8 • $24.95

Praeger is an imprint of the Greenwood Publishing Group

88 Post Road West • P.O. Box 5007 Westport, CT 06881-5007 Order Fax (203) 750-9790

PLACE YOUR ORDER TOLL-FREE: 1 - 8 0 0 - 2 2 5 - 5 8 0 0 www.greenwood.com

Ť

American Constitutional Law, 4th Ed.

Louis Fisher, LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

In the only book that develops constitutional law in the comprehensive sense, Fisher covers not just the results of court decisions but also the efforts of legislatures, executives, the states, and the general public and illustrates how both judicial and non-judicial forces shape constitutional law. Used in over 80 schools, it is available both as a single-volume hardback and as a two-volume paperback.

2001 1,296 pp casebound $90.00 classroom adoption price $64.00 v.1: 592 pp paper $32.00 v.2: 816 pp paper $37.00

The President's Authority Over Foreign Affairs _____

An Essay in Constitutional Interpretation

H. Jefferson Powell, DUKE UNIVERSITY

The debate over who decides American foreign policy — Congress or the president — seems endless and intractable. Powell argues that the Constitution does give clear answers, by vesting the president with independent discretion in foreign affairs and ensuring to Congress an ultimate check on executive action.

2002 184 pp jacketed hardback $30.00

Election Law, 2nd Ed. ___

Daniel Hays Lowenstein, UCLA Richard L. Hasen, LOYOLA LAW SCHOOL, LOS ANGELES

The second edition of this popular book is not only an update, but includes new material on issues such as the Florida recount controversy, soft money, race and redistricting, laws relating to campaigning, and more.

2001 848 pp $85.00 class adoption price $62.00

Fixing Columbine _

The Challenge of American Liberalism

Doriane Lambelet Coleman, DUKE UNIVERSITY

Fixing Columbine examines the 1999 tragedy in Littleton, Colorado, in the context of the unprecedented epidemic of depression, anxiety, and antisocial personality disorders that plagues 15 to 25% of American children annually. It discusses the ultimate causes of this epidemic and then focuses on the role that liberal political and legal theory and their incarnations in the culture have played.

2002 304 pp $40.00 jacketed hardback

Our Chief Magistrate and His Powers _

William Howard Taft

with foreword, introduction and endnotes by H. Jefferson Powell, DUKE UNIVERSITY

Taft's 1916 publication, written from the unique vantage point of a former president who was later to become Chief Justice, is one of the most insightful descriptions of the presidential office ever written. Now this classic work is once again available, with new material by H. Jefferson Powell discussing its current relevance.

2002 226 pp jacketed hardback $45.00

International Law, 2nd Ed. _____

Valerie Epps, SUFFOLK UNIVERSITY

Concentrating on more than just international relations, Epps combines narrative sections which explain the basic law with cases, questions, and problems that allow students to read actual legal materials and apply them to other similar or distinguishable situations. Now in a new edition, this popular text has been used at over 50 schools.

2001 520 pp paper $40.00 Document Supplement 584 pp paper $45.00

The Decline of the Civil Jury ____

Ellen E. Sward, UNIVERSITY OF KANSAS

Sward discusses the effects of a number changes in the composition of the jury, the interpretation of the Constitution and laws governing the jury, and the relationship between judge and jury and concludes that the cumulative effect of these changes is a significant decline in the civil jury's use and function.

2001 416 pp paper $40.00

The Battle Over Citizen Lawmaking _____

The Growing Regulation of Initiative and Referendum

M. Dane Waters, INITIATIVE & REFERENDUM INSTITUTE

Utilizing the views of leading scholars, opinion leaders, journalists, elected officials, activists, and attorneys, Waters discusses the evolution of the I & R process, how it has been utilized, major regulations that have been imposed, the role the courts have played, and how the process has been regulated in other countries.

2001 312 pp paper $28.00 classroom adoption price $22.00

EW FROM CALIFORNIA

FOOD POLITICS

How the Food Industry Influences Nutrition and Health

Marion Nestle

"Food politics underlie all politics in the United States. There is no industry more important to Americans, more fundamentally linked to our well-being and the future well-being of our children. Nestle reveals how corporate control of the nation's food system limits our choices and threatens our health. If you eat, you should read this book."

-Eric Schlosser, author of Fast Food Nation California Studies in Food and Culture $29.95 cloth

VOTING AT THE POLITICAL FAULT LINE

California's Experiment with the Blanket Primary

Bruce E. Cain and Elisabeth R. Gerber. Editors

"This is the most important and impressive collection of original research available on California's blanket primary. Its discussion of open primaries and crossover voting raises provocative issues which loom large. The findings are impressive."

-Max Neiman, author of Defending Government Published in association with the Institute of Governmental Studies, University of California, Berkeley

$55.00 cloth, $22.50 paper

LIVABLE CITIES?

Urban Struggles for Livelihood and Sustainability

Peter Evans, Editor

"An exciting book that captures the urban environmental condition through the struggles and knowledge of real people, Livable Cities? reveals how grassroots input can make top-down policy more effective. By focusing on small, seldomstudied communities in such countries as Vietnam, the book illuminates the particular intersection between larger environmental dynamics and their concrete materializations in specific settings."

-Saskia Sassen, author of The Global City 2001 $45.00 cloth, $17.95 paper

GANDHI'S WAY

A Handbook of Conflict Resolution

Mark Juergensmeyer

Available in Paperback—"This is a manual of instruction in the best sense: a popular reassessment of the activist use of satyagraha ['truth force'] in conflict resolution that has depth and a true appreciation for the ethical subtleties of dialectical struggles, and for the multiple dimensions of 'passive resistance."

—Library Journal

CALIFORNIA IN THE NEW MILLENNIUM

The Changing Social and Political Landscape

Mark Baldassare

New in Paperback—"This book raises provocative questions regarding the relationship among social change, elections, and policymaking, and the uniqueness of the California survey data contribute to a better understanding of the politics of change."

—Greg Andranovich, American Political Science Review

$17.95 paper

$15.95 paper

At bookstores or order (800) 822-6657 • www.ucpress.edu

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA PRESS

Another Such Victory

President Truman and the Cold War, 1945-1953

ERIC T. JENNINGS

"At a moment in the early 2lst century when the choices in a new crisis seem simply black and white, this is precisely the kind of historical perspective we should have.
Professor Offner has reopened a long overdue debate on Harry Truman — both on the man and his role in the origins of the Cold War...
[I]t certainly demands to be read and widely discussed."

—Walter LaFeber, Cornell University and author of America, Russia and the Cold War

Russia and the Cold W Stanford Nuclear Age Series $37.95 cloth

FORTHCOMING

The Costs of Coalition

CAROL MERSHON

"An extremely valuable contribution to comparative politics.... It will be required reading in any course on European coalition government."

—Norman Schofield, Washington University at St. Louis

$49.50 cloth

Vichy in the Tropics

Pétain's National Revolution in Madagascar, Guadeloupe, and Indochina, 1940-44

ERIC T. JENNINGS $55.00 cloth

POLITICAL SCIENCE FROM

New From Palgrave Macmillan

NEW PAPERBACKS

DEMOCRATIZATION

A Critical Introduction Jean Grugel

287 pp. / 0-333-67969-5 / $22,95 pb.

POLITICAL SCIENCE

A Comparative Introduction Third Edition

Rod Hague and Martin Harrop 332 pp. / 0-312-39746-1 / $35.00 pb.

THEORIES IN INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Second Edition

Scott Burchill and Richard Devetak 320 pp. / 0-333-91418-X / $23.95 pb.

UNDERSTANDING INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Second Edition Chris Brown

308 pp. / 0-333-94849-1 / $22.95 pb.

DIMENSIONS OF BLACK CONSERVATISM IN THE U.S.

Made in America Edited by Gayle T. Tate and Lewis A. Randolph

284 pp. / 0-312-29370-4 / $18.95 pb.

GLOBALIZATION, GENDER. AND RELIGION

The Politics of Women's Rights in Catholic and Muslim Contexts Edited by Jane Bayes and Nayereh Tohidi

288 pp. / 0-312-29369-0 / $18.95 pb.

THE TWENTY YEARS' CRISIS 1919-1939

An Introduction to the Study of International Relations

E.H. Carr

Edited by Michael Cox 291 pp. / 0-333-96377-6 / $19.95 pb.

THE ECONOMIC FACTOR IN INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

A Brief Introduction Spyros Economides and Peter Wilson 288 pp. / 1-86064-663-8 / $22.50 pb. I.B.Tauris

WELFARE THEORY

An Introduction Tony Fitzpatrick

238 pp. / 0-333-77843-X / $19.95 pb.

CHANGES IN STATEHOOD

The Transformation of International Relations

Georg Sørensen

240 pp. / 0-333-96301-6 / $22.95 pb.

DIPLOMACY

Theory and Practice Second Edition G. R. Berridge

256 pp. / 0-333-96929-4 / $22.95 pb.

THE POLITICS TODAY COMPANION TO AMERICAN GOVERNMENT

Alan Grant and Edward Ashbee 272 pp. / 0-7190-5892-9 / $22.95 pb. Politics Today Manchester University Press

POLITICAL IDEOLOGY TODAY

Second Edition Ian Adams

328 pp. / 0-7190-6020-6 / $24.95 pb. Politics Today Manchester University Press

NEW STUDIES IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

DEATH AND THE STATESMAN

The Culture and Psychology of U.S. Leaders During War Joseph B. Underhill-Cady 256 pp. / 0-312-23928-9 / $49.95 cl.

DEPENDENT ON D.C.

The Rise of Federal Control over the Lives of Ordinary Americans -

Charlotte A. Twight

432 pp. / 0-312-29415-8 / $26.95 cl.

INTEGRATING COGNITIVE AND RATIONAL THEORIES OF FOREIGN POLICY DECISION MAKING Edited by Alex Mintz

192 pp. / 0-312-29409-3 / $45.00 cl. Advances in Foreign Policy Analysis

JAPAN'S RELUCTANT REALISM

Foreign Policy Challenges in an Era of Uncertain Power Michael J. Green

368 pp. / 0-312-23894-0 / $45.00 cl.

IORDANIAN EXCEPTIONALISM

A Comparative Analysis of State-Religion Relationships in Egypt, Iran, Jordan, and Syria

Mansoor Moaddel

256 pp. / 0-312-23843-6 / $49.95 cl.

EUROPE AT THE POLLS

The European Elections of 1999 Edited by Pascal Perrineau, Gerard Grunberg and Colette Ysmal

336 pp. / 0-312-23895-9 / $65.00 cl.

Europe in Transition

TOWARD A THEORY OF IMMIGRATION

Peter C. Meilaender

272 pp. / 0-312-24034-1 / $55.00 cl.

TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY WORLD ORDER AND THE ASIA PACIFIC

Value Change, Exigencies, and Power Realignment Edited by James C. Hsiung 400 pp. / 0-312-23879-7 / $59.95 cl.

1-800-221-7945 ext. 270 www.palgrave-usa.com

Global Publishing at St. Martin's Press Distributors of I.B.Tauris, Manchester University Press, and Zed Bocks

Why Join The American Political Science Association?

To participate in the advancement of the discipline and the profession.

he American Political Science Association is the major professional society for those engaged in the study of politics. Our mission is to reach out to scholars, teachers, students, and others throughout the world to facilitate learning, teaching, and research in the field of political science.

To do so, we promote scholarly research and communication, promote high quality teaching and education about politics and government, work to diversify the profession and represent its diversity, increase academic and non-academic opportunities for members, seek to strengthen the professional environment for political science, represent the professional interests of political scientists, defend the legitimacy of scholarly research into politics and government, recognize outstanding work in the discipline, encourage the application of rigorous ethical and intellectual standards in the profession, and seek to serve the public, including disseminating research and preparing citizens to be effective citizens and political participants.

To invest in the professional development of your own career.

Members of the American Political Science Association receive a wide range of benefits, including:

Listing in the triennial Directory of Members and the Directory of Members Online. These directories are widely used in the US and abroad as a source of information about APSA members and their areas of expertise, and are excellent sources of professional opportunities.

Subscriptions to the American Political Science Review, the leading journal of political science research, PS, the only quarterly professional news journal in the political science field, and APSR online and PS online, full electronic copies of the current editions of APSR and PS and limited archives.

Eligibility for special member programs such as:

- Membership on association committees and governing bodies which directly affect the profession.
- Membership in Organized Sections.
- Employment services such as the Personnel Service Newsletter, PSNonline, E-jobs, the Annual Meeting Placement Service online, and the online member CV/resume database.
- APSA research grants.
- APSA fellowships.
- Health, disability, and professional liability insurance.

Discounts and special reduced rates for members on:

- APSA's annual meeting, attended by thousands of political scientists from around the world. Our members get discounts on registration, air fare, and hotel rates.
- APSA's publications, including directories, research and professional guides, instructional resources, software, and more.
- Subscriptions to over 100 periodicals from other organizations.
- Memberships in the American Historical Association, the American Sociological Association, the American Society of International Law, and the American Association of Political Consultants.
- Hertz car rentals.
- Membership in Quest, a travel company that provides reducedrate hotel rooms for professional travel in the U.S. and abroad.

Photocopy both sides of the Membership Application on the opposite page and mail or fax to:

AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

PO Box 631125, Baltimore, MD 21263-1125 phone 202.483.2512 • fax 202.483.2657 email: membership@apsanet.org • web: www.apsanet.org

Please fill in and return both sides of this page.

APSA

APSA will mail to your work unless you specify otherwise: Address to use for Journals: ☐ Home ☐ Work Membership Application Form Address to use for Newsletters: D Home D Work email email Name Name Address Address City State____ Zip __ City ___ State Zip MEMBERSHIP DUES (CHECKOND) Professional Members with gross calendar income of: Life Members $3,000 🗆 Under $40,000 Associate Members (non-political scientists only) $39 🗆 $40 - 49,999 $106 🗖 High School Faculty $50 - 59,999 $60 - 79,999 $34 🗆 $124 🗅 Community College Faculty $34 $134 🗅 Student Members (7 year limit) $80,000 + $149 🗖 $34 🗆 Unemployed Members (2 yr. limit) $100,000 + $34 🗆 Retired Members (must have been an APSA member for 25+ years) ** Family Members $18 🗆 with gross calendar income of. Under $25,000 $29 🗆 $49 🗅 Member's name $25,000 + receive-PS only ** do not receive APSR or PS SECTION DUES (GHECK ANY YOU WISH TO JOIN) 1. Federalism and Intergovernmental 20. Comparative Politics $ 5.00 $ 10.00 $ 10.00 $ 10.00 $ 5.00 $ 5.00 $ 5.00 $ 10.00 21. European Politics & Society
22. State Politics & Policy
23. Political Communication
24. Politics and History Relations 10.00 7.00 8.00 7.00 5.00 5.00 5.00 5.00 5.00 0000 Law and Courts Legislative Studies Public Policy 5. Political Organizations and Parties
6. Public Administration
7. Conflict Processes 25. Political Economy 25. Political Economy
26. Ecological & Transformational Politics
27. New Political Science
28. Political Psychology
29. Undergraduate Education
30. Politics and Literature
31. Foreign Policy
32. Elections, Public Opinion & Voting Behavior
33. Race, Ethnicity and Politics
34. International History & Politics
35. Comparative Democratization Representation and Electoral Systems 9. Presidency Research 10. Political Methodology* $ 25.00 $ 8.00 $ 10.00 11. Religion and Politics 13. Urban Politics 8.00 8.00 5.00 5.00 6.00 15. Science, Technology, and Environmental 16. Women and Politics 8.00 35. Comparative Democratization 17. Foundations of Political Theory 8.00 ā 18. Information Technology & Politics 36. Human Rights 19. International Security and Arms Control $ *Includes 4 issues of POLITICAL ANALYSIS PERSONNEL SERVICE Personnel Service Newsletter: online only $20 \(\sigma\) print & online $40 \(\sigma\) AIRSIR - JISTROIR / SOIDE Online searchable access to APSR archive, 1906-1998 (APSR only): $25 \, \Pi State of the Discipline 3: $45 \square IDN'HERNAMIONAIL POSTAGE Membership (Family and Associate members are excused). Other: Organized Sections (compute as follows): Number of Organized Sections x $2 = ..... Total International Postage Costs (add the amounts above) .................$ MIETHEOID OF PAYMENT (GHECKONE) Check (payable to APSA) Visa □ MasterCard 🗆 AmEx 🗅 Money Order 🗆 Card # __ Exp. Date _ Signature _

NOTE: APSA cannot process your order without a total!

Do you need to update your membership information? The information we maintain is reported to you annually on your Membership Renewal Form, which you update and return to us with your dues payment. It is up to you to make sure we have your most current data. If you are a new member, if your information changes, or if you want to add something new, please neatly fill out this form and return it to us. Please use the codes provided, as we can only maintain information which fits within the standardized confines of our database. Current Information — Please provide the following so we can locate your record in our database: NAME: Member No. (if known): $New\ Information$ — Please indicate all appropriate changes: NAME ADDRESSES (please indicate any changes in the addresses we maintain for you):* HOME WORK ADDRESS 1 Can be no more than 5 lines of 33 characters each, including your name and country code (if non-US) PHONE FAX email *Do not complete if information is provided on the other side of this form. Biographical Information — Please supply or update your information using the codes listed below Birthdate:* Race/Ethnicity: Demographics Gender: Highest: Year: Institution: Degree Institution or Company: Rank or Position: Employment Fields in Political Science — Please identify up to two general fields that describe your work in political science, using the codes listed below. Due to limited space, if you wish to provide or update your specialized fields, please contact APSA Member Services directly at 202/483-2512 (phone), 202/483-2657 (fax) or membership@apsanet.org. Standardized Codes for APSA Membership - Please use these codes to describe yourself and your career. Rank or Position Race/Ethnicity General Fields African-American Business Researcher AME - American Government and Politics Retired Consultant Asian-American Comparative Politics CMP -Student Caucasian Government INT - International Politics Interest Group Professional Two-Year College Latino (a) MET – PHI – Methodology Unemployed · Association, Foundation Native American Political Philosophy and Theory Other (specify on other side) K-12 Teacher Other PLW - Public Law and Courts Lecturer/Instructor Public Policy Highest Degree Media PAD - Public Administration Part Time Faculty Ph.D. Professor — Assistant ABD Professor - Associate M.A. *NOTE: Birthdate is not reported publicly; APSA only Professor — Emeritus B.A.

uses the information in the aggregate for internal.

statistical purposes.

Professor — Full

Professor — Visiting

LL.B. or J.D.

Other

WE INVITE YOU TO ATTEND

The Summer Program: Experiments in the Social Sciences

Sponsored by: The Institution for Social & Policy Studies at Yale University August 21-22, 2002

New Haven, Connecticut

A two day short course on the design, conduct, and analysis of social science experiments. In this short course you will:

- Learn about why experiments are valuable tools for social science and program evaluation.
- Examine in-depth examples of how field experiments are designed. executed, and analyzed.
- Explore and develop your own research ideas through discussion with peers and specialists.

Hosted by:

Donald P. Green Professor of Political Science and Director, Institution for Social & Policy Studies, Yale University

Alan S. Gerber Professor of Political Science, Yale University

John S. Lapinski Assistant Professor of Political Science, Yale University

Application:

Information:

- Name, mailing address, phone numbers (home, work, and fax), and e-mail address.
- Current position and responsibilities and educational background

Personal Statement: Please describe your research interests, and any research projects on which you have worked. If you need financial assistance, please explain why.

Mail application to:

Summer Program: Experiments in the Social Sciences

Institution for Social & Policy Studies

Yale University P.O. Box 208209

New Haven, CT 06520-8209

Or send as e-mail attachment to: pamela.lamonaca@yale.edu

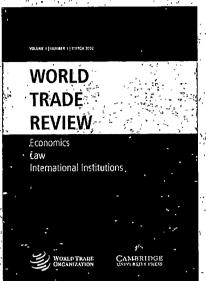

the ISPS web site: http://www.yale.edu/isps/experimental/

Tuition: $395, which covers housing, instructional materials, and lunch each day.

For inquiries about the program, email ispsyale@minerva.cis.yale.edu. Additional information is also available at

NEW TO CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS IN 2002

The WORLD TRADE REVIEW has been established at the initiative of the World Trade Organization (WTO) in close cooperation with Cambridge University Press. It is an independent journal that includes articles written from economic legal and inter-disciplinary perspectives on issues of relevance to the multilateral trading system.

For more information, subscription rates, and instructions for contributors, please email: wtradvt@cambridge.org

WORLD TRADE REVIEW

is available online as part of the Cambridge Journals Online service, offering free access to tables of contents and article abstracts for all users. For details of other features available in this service, visit the site at http://journals.cambridge.org

The journal will be of interest to:

- Academics economists, lawyers, political scientists, etc.
- WTO delegates, and their support staffs in capitals
- NGO staffers
- Trade policy makers
- Legislators interested in trade issues
- Staffs of international economic organizations.
- Students in international economics and international relations programs

EDITOR

Richard Blackhurst, Graduate Institute of International Studies (Geneva)

EDITORIAL BOARD

James Crawford, University of Cambridge Joseph François, Erasmus University Henrik Horn, Stockholm University Petros Mavroidis, University of Neuchâtel André Sapir, Free University of Brussels Joseph Weiler, New York University L. Alan Winters, University of Sussex Patrick Low (ex officio), World Trade Organization

email wtradvt@cambridge.org for more information and subscription details

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

American Pol

American Political Science Review

ARTICLES	4
OTher Philosophic Importance of Political Life:
On the "Ploression "In Platois Theaereus"	S 27
Paul Stern (*
The Logic of Strategic Defection: Count-Executive Relations in Argentina Under Dictatorship and Democracy	29
Gretchen Helmke
• Jurisprudential Regimes in Supreme Court Decision Making	30
Mark J. Richards and Herbert M. Kritzer
• Electoral Competition, Political Uncertainty, and Policy Insulation	32
Rui J. P. de Figueiredo, Jr.
<ul> <li>Bureaucracy that Kills: Federal Sovereign Immunity and the</li> </ul>
Discretionary Function Exception	33
William G. Weaver and Thomas Longoria,
Bringing the State Back In to Civic Engagement: Policy Feedback
Effects of the G.I. Bill for World War II Veterans	35
Suzanne Mettler	1.
• The Influence of Party: Evidence from the State Legislatures	. 36
Gorald C Wright and Prion E Cohoffnor

The Slant of the News: How Editorial English Campaign Coverage and @izens' Views Kim Fridkin Kahinana Perutokang

- BOOK REVIEWS

  Political Theory

  American Politics

  Comparative Politics

  International Rela

EDITOR

Lee Sigelman

Department of Political Science
The George Washington University
Washington, DC 20052

BOOK REVIEW EDITORS

Susan Bickford
University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

Gregory E. McAvoy
University of North Carolina at Greensboro

EDITORIAL BOARD

Martha Ackelsberg Smith College Kathleen Bawn University of California, Los Angeles Janet Box-Steffensmeier The Ohio State University Cathy Cohen University of Chicago/ Yale University Timothy Cook Louisiana State University/ Williams College Neta Crawford Brown University Ivor Crewe University of Essex Darren Davis Michigan State University Jon Elster Columbia University Diana Evans Trinity College Steven Finkel University of Virginia Robert Goodin Australian National University Ruth Grant Duke University Peter Hall Harvard University Richard Herrmann The Ohio State University

Rodney Hero University of Notre Dame James Johnson University of Rochester Jane Junn Rutgers University Kim Fridkin Kahn Arizona State University George Klosko University of Virginia Arthur Lupia University of Michigan Forrest Maltzman The George Washington University Edward Mansfield University of Pennsylvania Kenneth Mayer University of Wisconsin
Kirstie McClure
University of California, Los Angeles Kenneth Meier Texas A&M University K.C. Morrison University of Missouri James Morrow University of Michigan Rebecca Morton New York University Robert Price University of California, Berkeley

Thomas Remington Emory University M. Elizabeth Sanders Cornell University Kathryn Sikkink University of Minnesota Beth Simmons University of California, Berkeley Jack Snyder Columbia University Janice Gross Stein University of Toronto Robert Stein Rice University Sven Steinmo University of Colorado Shannon Stimson University of California. Berkelev Leslie Paul Thiele University of Florida Clyde Wilcox Georgetown University John Wright
The Ohio State University Bernard Yack University of Wisconsin Langche Zeng The George Washington University

EDITORIAL STAFF

Elizabeth Cook
Assistant Editor

John A. Donaldson Jason MacDonald Tricia Mulligan Editorial Assistants Elizabeth K. Markovits Maria Murray Riemann Carisa R. Showden Assistants to the Book Review Editors

Association Office Address and Membership Information: American Political Science Association individual membership dues are: Regular Members with income $100,000+, $174; $80,000-$99,999, $149; $60,000-$79,999, $134; $50,000-$59,999, $124; $40,000-$99,999, $106; Under $40,000, $72; Student Members $34; Retired over $25,000, $49.00; Retired under $25,000, $16 Members, $3,000.00; Unemployed members, $34.00. The amount of the dues allocated for a subscription is $5 for an individual membership. Changes of address for members should be completed online or mailed to the APSA membership office at: APSA, 1527 New Hampshire Avenue, N.W., Washington, DC 20036.

Subscription, Publishing, and Advertising Office Address: Cambridge University Press, 40 West 20th Street, New York, NY 10011-4211; and (outside the United States, Canada, and Mexico) Cambridge University Press, The Edinburgh Building, Shaftesbury Road, Cambridge CB2 2RU, England.

Subscription Information: American Political Science Review (ISSN 0003-0554) is published quarterly in March, June, September, and December by Cambridge University Press for the American Political Science Association. Annual institutional electronic-only subscription rate (2002) in US$329 in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, UK£213 elsewhere. Annual institutional print-and-electronic subscription rate (2002) is US$365 in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, UK£236 elsewhere. Periodicals postage rate is pending at New York, NY and additional mailing offices. Institutional subscription orders and address changes should be sent to: American Political Science Review, Cambridge University Press, 110 Midland Avenue, Port Chester, NY 10573, USA.

Copyright © 2002 by the American Political Science Association.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, in any form or by any means, electronic, photocopying, or otherwise, without permission in writing from Cambridge University Press. Photocopying information for users in the U.S.A.: The Item-Fee Code for the publication (0003-0554/02 $9.00 + $.10) indicates that copying for internal or personal use beyond that permitted by Sec. 107 or 108 of the U.S. Copyright Law is authorized for users duly registered with the Copyright Clearance Center (CCC) Transaction Reporting Service, provided that the appropriate remittance of $9.00 per article is paid directly to CCC, 222 Rosewood Drive, Danvers, MA 01923. Specific written permission must be obtained for all other copying.

American Political Science Review

Volume 96, Number 2, June 2002 Table of Contents

NOTES FROM THE EDITOR	• • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • •	vi
ARTICLES
The Philosophic Importance of Political Life: On the "Digression" in Plato's Theaetetus Paul Stern		275
The Logic of Strategic Defection: Court–Executive Rein Argentina Under Dictatorship and Democracy	elations
Gretchen Helmke  Jurisprudential Regimes in Supreme Court Decision	Making
Mark J. Richards and Herbert M. Kritzer Electoral Competition, Political Uncertainty, and Pol	• • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • •	305
Rui J. P. de Figueiredo, Jr.	•	321
Bureaucracy that Kills: Federal Sovereign Immunity Discretionary Function Exception
William G. Weaver and Thomas Longoria Bringing the State Back In to Civic Engagement: Poli		335
Effects of the G.I. Bill for World War II Veterans	•
Suzanne Mettler	1-4	351
The Influence of Party: Evidence from the State Legis Gerald C. Wright and Brian F. Schaffner	•••••	367
The Slant of the News: How Editorial Endorsements Campaign Coverage and Citizens' Views of Candid Kim Fridkin Kahn and Patrick J. Kenney	lates	381
BOOK REVIEWS
Political Theory
Arato, Andrew. Civil Society, Constitution, and Legitimacy	Andreas Kalyvas	395
Bathory, Peter Dennis, and Nancy L. Schwartz, eds. Friends and Citizens: Essays in Honor of Wilson Carey McWilliams Baum, Bruce. Rereading Power and Freedom in J. S. Mill	Philip Abbott	396 397
Bennett, Jane. The Enchantment of Modern Life: Attachments,	•
Crossings, and Ethics Brown, Wendy. Politics Out of History Cruikshank, Barbara. The Will to Empower: Democratic Citizens	Leslie Paul Thiele	397 398
and Other Subjects	. Clarissa Rile Hayward	399
Deneen, Patrick J. The Odyssey of Political Theory: The Politics	Robert Pirro	400 of Departure and Return		401
Comparative Perspective	Dres. M. C.	402
and the Decent Life	16-5	403 403
Enlightenment Politics	Gina Luria Walker  Jeanne M. Heffernan	405 200 406
	soquine w. Henerilan	- 2 00

Hénaff, Marcel, and Tracy B. Strong, eds. Public Space and 407
ingho, condition 200106) with interest in the contract of the	408
Kraynak, Robert P. Christian Faith and Modern Democracy: God and Politics in the Fallen World.	400
Tant, raymona, rounds, rounds, and read rounds, restrictions	409
Mahdi, Muhsin S. Alfarabi and the Foundation of Islamic Political	410
Philosophy	410
Caring for Souls	411
Plant, Raymond. Politics, Theology and History. See Kraynak,	7
Robert P., above.
Sheldon, Garrett Ward. The Political Philosophy of James
Madison Franklin A. Kalinowski	412
Teske, Robin L., and Mary Ann Tétreault, eds. Conscious Acts and the Politics of Social Change: Feminist Approaches to Social 413
	414
······································
American Politics
Barreto, Amilcar Antonio. The Politics of Language in Puerto Rico Steve C. Ropp	415
Burbank, Matthew J., Gregory D. Andranovich, and Charles H.
Heying. Olympic Dreams: The Impact of Mega-Events on Local 416
	417
Bennett, W. Lance, and Robert M. Entman, eds. Mediated Politics:
Communication in the Future of Democracy	418
Ericson, David F. The Debate over Slavery: Antislavery and Proslavery Liberalism in Antebellum America.
Simeone, James. Democracy and Slavery in Frontier Illinois: The Bottomland Republic Manisha Sinha	419
Gonzalez, George A. Corporate Power and the Environment:
2110 x 0111110111 = 001110111	420
Greenstein, Fred I. The Presidential Difference: Leadership Style from a Bacto Common and a second control of the second control of	421
22010101, 22011 11 11 00000 11 11 11 11 11 11 11 11	422
Kelly, Christine A. Tangled Up in Red, White, and Blue: New Social	400
	423
Kim, Claire Jean. Bitter Fruit: The Politics of Black-Korean	40.4
Congress with the congress of	424
Lascher, Edward L., Jr. The Politics of Automobile Insurance  Proceedings of Automobile Insurance  Martin Lubin	425
210/07/11 20000, 2700111110110, 411110 2 0000 / 1111111111111111111111111	425
Lawrence, Regina G. The Politics of Force: Media and the  Construction of Police Brutality	426
Lee, Frances E., and Bruce I. Oppenheimer. Sizing Up the Senate:	440
	427
Lipset, Seymour Martin, and Gary Marks. It Didn't Happen Here:	-W/
	428
McDonnell, Lorraine M., P. Michael Timpane, and Roger Benjamin, 429
Monroe, J. P. The Political Party Matrix: The Persistence of
Organization	430
Rosenbloom, David H. Building a Legislative-Centered Public Administration: Congress and the Administrative State, 1946–
1999 John S. Robey	430
Schier, Steven E., ed. The Postmodern Presidency: Bill Clinton's
Legacy in U.S. Politics Shirley Anne Warshaw	431
Simeone, James. Democracy and Slavery in Frontier Illinois: The Bottomland Republic. See Ericson, David F., above.
Stearns, Maxwell L. Constitutional Process: A Social Choice	122
Analysis of Supreme Court Decision Making	432
and Public Neighbors	433
Wawro, Gregory. Legislative Entrepreneurship in the U.S. House	-133 of Representatives	434
Zilber, Jeremy, and David Niven. Racialized Coverage of Congress: The News in Black and White	435

Comparative Politics
Agrawal, Arun, and Clark C. Gibson, eds. Communities and the Environment: Ethnicity, Gender, and the State in Community-
Based Conservation	436
Arceneaux, Craig L. Bounded Missions: Military Regimes and Democratization in the Southern Cone and Brazil	437
Democracy: Lessons from Nineteenth-Century Europe Michael Bernhard DiGaetano, Alan, and John S. Klemanski. Power and City Governance: Comparative Perspectives on Urban	438 Development
in Latin America: Left and Right	439 440
of the Welfare State: Parties and Policies in Global Markets Politics of the Borderlands from Pre- to Postcommunism Use?
Levy, Daniel C., and Kathleen Bruhn, with Emilio Zebadúa.  Mexico: The Struggle for Democratic Development
Lichbach, Mark I., and Adam B. Seligman. Market and Community:  The Basis of Social Order, Revolution, and Relegitimation
Meyer, David S., and Sidney Tarrow, eds. The Social Movement Society: Contentious Politics for a New Century.  Zirakzadeh, Cyrus Ernesto. Social Movements in Politics: A
Comparative Study	446
Democracy in Latin America	448
Western Europe	449
Market Reforms in Latin America	450 451
Ragin, Charles C. Fuzzy-Set Social Science	452
Southeast Asia	453
the Paradox of Italian Democracy Franklin Hugh Adler Sanasarian, Eliz. Religious Minorities in Iran Haleh Esfandiari Silva, Patricio, ed. The Soldier and the State in South America:	454 455
Essays in Civil–Military Relations	456
Markets and Distributive Conflict in Mexico	457
Activism in China and Taiwan	458
International Relations
Abernethy, David B. The Dynamics of Global Dominance:  European Overseas Empires, 1415–1980	459
Asia: ASEAN and the Problem of Regional Order
Democratic Governability: Mexico and the U.SMexican Borderlands	461
Rights and International Relations in Latin America	462
International and Changing Human Rights Norms	463

de Boer-Ashworth, Elizabeth. The Global Political Economy and Post-1989 Change: The Place of the Central European Transition Peter Gowan	464
Eribo, Festus. In Search of Greatness: Russia's Communications with Africa and the World Laura Roselle	465
Erisman, H. Michael. Cuba's Foreign Relations in a Post-Soviet World.
Roy, Joaquín. Cuba, the United States, and the Helms-Burton
Doctrine: International Reactions Joel C. Edelstein	466
Foot, Rosemary. Rights Beyond Borders: The Global Community and the Struggle over Human Rights in China.
Wan, Ming. Human Rights in Chinese Foreign Relations:
Defining and Defending National Interests Samuel S. Kim	467
Garver, John W. Protracted Contest: Sino-Indian Rivalry in the Twentieth Century Mark W. Frazier	469
Ghanem, As'ad. The Palestinian-Arab Minority in Israel, 1948-
2000: A Political Study	470
Ikenberry, G. John. After Victory: Institutions, Strategic Restraint, and the Rebuilding of Order after Major Wars K. J. Holsti	471
Khadiagala, Gilbert M., and Terrence Lyons, eds. African Foreign Policies: Power and Process	472
Koslowski, Rey. Migrants and Citizens: Demographic Change in the European State System Patrick Ireland	473
Nincic, Miroslav, and Joseph Lepgold, eds. Being Useful: Policy
Relevance and International Relations Theory	474
Pyle, Christopher H. Extradition, Politics, and Human Rights Mark Gibney	475
Roy, Joaquín. Cuba, the United States, and the Helms-Burton Doctrine: International Reactions. See Erisman, H. Michael, above.
Skålnes, Lars S. Politics, Markets, and Grand Strategy: Foreign	4=
Economic Policies as Strategic Instruments Brian M. Pollins	476
Thomas, Daniel C. The Helsinki Effect: International Norms,	4
Human Rights, and the Demise of Communism Lawrence J. LeBlanc	. 477
Wan, Ming. Human Rights in Chinese Foreign Relations: Defining and Defending National Interests. See Foot, Rosemary, above.
Weber, Katja. Hierarchy Amidst Anarchy: Transaction Costs and	420
Institutional Choice Jeffrey D. Berejikian	4/8

Officers

PRESIDENT Robert D. Putnam Harvard University

PRESIDENT-ELECT Theda Skocpol Harvard University

VICE PRESIDENTS
David Collier
University of California,
Berkeley

John Jackson University of Michigan

Kristen Renwick Monroe University of California, Irvine SECRETARY
John A. Garcia
University of Arizona

TREASURER Robert R. Kaufman Rutgers University

PROGRAM CO-CHAIRS W. Phillips Shively University of Minnesota

Kathryn Sikkink University of Minnesota

EDITOR, APSR
Lee Sigelman
George Washington University

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR Michael Brintnall American Political Science Association

Council

2000-2002

Richard A. Brody Stanford University

Bob Holmes Clark Atlanta University

L. Sandy Maisel Colby College

Doris Marie Provine Arizona State University

Mary Segers*
Rutgers University

Ronald Schmidt*
California State University,
Long Beach

Katherine Tate University of California, Irvine

Margaret Weir University of California, Berkeley

*serving one year terms 2001–02

2001-2003

Bruce Bueno de Mesquita Hoover Institution

Nancy Burns University of Michigan

Susan Clarke University of Colorado, Boulder

Lawrence C. Dodd University of Florida

Valerie Martinez-Ebers Texas Christian University

Kirstie M. McClure University of California, Los Angeles

Desiree Pedescleaux Spelman College

James C. Scott Yale University

Former Presidents

Frank J. Goodnow Albert Shaw Frederick N. Judson James Bryce A. Lawrence Lowell Woodrow Wilson Simeon E. Baldwin Albert Bushnell Hart W. W. Willoughby John Bassett Moore Ernst Freund Jesse Macy Munroe Smith Henry Jones Ford Paul S. Reinsch Leo S. Rowe William A. Dunning Harry A. Garfield James W. Garner Charles E. Merriam Charles A. Beard William Bennett Munro

Jesse S. Reeves

. John A. Fairlie

Benjamin F Shambaugh Edward S. Corwin William F. Willoughby Isidor Loeb Walter J. Shepard Francis W. Coker Arthur N. Holcombe Thomas Reed Powell Clarence A. Dykstra Charles Grove Haines Robert C. Brooks Frederic A. Ogg William Anderson Robert E. Cushman Leonard D. White John Gaus Walter F. Dodd Arthur W. MacMahon Henry R. Spencer Quincy Wright James K. Pollock Peter H. Odegard Luther Gulick. Pendleton Herring

Ralph J. Bunche Charles McKinley Harold D. Lasswell E. E. Schattschneider V. O. Key Jr. R. Taylor Cole Carl B. Swisher Emmette S. Redford Charles S. Hyneman Carl J. Friedrich C. Herman Pritchett David B. Truman Gabriel A. Almond Robert A. Dahl Merle Fainsod David Easton . Karl W. Deutsch · Robert E. Lane Heinz Eulau Robert E. Ward. Avery Leiserson Austin Ranney James MacGregor Burns Samuel H. Beer

John C. Wahlke Leon D. Epstein Warren E. Miller Charles E. Lindblom Seymour Martin Lipset William H. Riker Philip E. Converse Richard F. Fenno Jr. Aaron B. Wildavsky Samuel P. Huntington Kenneth N. Waltz Lucian W. Pye Judith N. Shklar Theodore J. Lowi James Q. Wilson Lucius J. Barker Charles O. Jones Sidney Verba Arend Liphart Elinor Ostrom M. Kent Jennings Matthew Holden Jr. Robert O. Keohane

Robert Jervis

Notes from the Editor

In my "Notes" in the March 2002 issue, I announced several modifications that we have introduced into the APSR's review process. Here I will simply refer again to two new procedures that are included in our "Instructions to Contributors"; I highlight these, not because they are the most important of the new procedures, but because they seem to have escaped the notice of many authors. First, when you submit a paper to the APSR, you are also invited to suggest the names of appropriate reviewers. Of course, we do not guarantee that we will follow your suggestions, but so far we have found these suggestions quite helpful. A second, and more mundane, instruction is to submit an electronic (i.e., diskette), anonymous version of your manuscript along with the requisite number of paper copies; having an electronic version on hand can greatly expedite the review process in certain circumstances.

It has not been all that many years ago that, after submitting a paper to a journal, an author could expect to wait six months, a year, or even longer before hearing back about the paper's fate. Times have changed, and authors now quite reasonably expect faster service. The brutal fact is that the news they receive is generally bad, for the great majority of the decision letters that I write (something like 9 out of every 10) are rejection letters. Receiving bad news is doubly painful when one has been kept waiting for it for an inordinately long time. Accordingly, we are working hard to try to make the review process move along in a timely manner. Inevitably, some manuscripts get bogged down, but for the most part our efforts, and of course those of the scholars from whom we solicit reviews, seem to be paying off. So far, from the day a paper arrives in our office until the day my decision letter goes into the mail, the median elapsed time has been just 39 working days.

IN THIS ISSUE

The March 2002 issue, the first to bear my imprint, was really more Ada Finifter's than mine, for almost all the articles in that issue were in advanced stages of the review process when I assumed the editorship. Of the articles in the current issue, half were submitted to, and revised at the invitation of, my predecessor. Future issues can be expected to contain an occasional article on which a significant portion of the decision making preceded me, but for the most part the credit or blame (depending on one's perspective) for future issues should be directed at me.

In this respect, I am delighted to report that a number of papers are in the queue that are, in my estimation, not only truly interesting and important but also refreshingly diverse in terms of subject matter and analytic approach. Please stay tuned.

In the lead article in this issue, Paul Stern poses a question of special interest to political theorists but of much broader interest as well: What is the connection between politics and philosophy? In "The Philosophic Importance of Political Life: On the 'Digression' in Plato's Theaetetus," Stern turns for guidance to a wholly unexpected source: a Platonic dialogue well known to philosophers but less so to students of politics, and more specifically to a passage in the Theaetetus that was identified by Socrates himself as a digression and has been regarded as such ever after. Stern's accomplishment, as one of the APSR's reviewers summarized it, is to show that a passage long dismissed as an irrelevant digression "is in fact a rosetta stone" for understanding the interwoven relationship between politics and philosophy. While many interpretations of ancient texts are congenial only to a certain school of thought (Straussian, liberal, postmodern, or whatever), Stern's interpretation can be appreciated by theorists of various persuasions. No less importantly, it is important enough to command the attention of, and accessible enough to be understood by, nonspecialists as well. Even those who have never even heard of the Theaetetus and who now remember Plato only dimly, if at all, will find their understanding of politics and political science enriched by Stern's essay.

Two articles in this issue focus on the courts. According to the conventional view, only an independent judiciary can serve effectively as check and balance on the operation of the other branches of government. Although this view is virtually taken for granted in the United States, Gretchen Helmke questions its applicability to other contexts, and in particular to developing democracies. In "The Logic of Strategic Defection: Court-Executive Relations in Argentina Under Dictatorship and Democracy," Helmke contends that it is not judicial independence but the lack thereof that leads judges to turn against a government whose future looks insecure. Focusing on the Argentine case, Helmke integrates this previously overlooked factor into accounts of the calculus of judicial decision making, and in so doing addresses larger issues of judicial legitimacy, institutional design, and the strength of democratic institutions in developing democracies.

While Helmke's mission is to call a widely held idea about the courts into question, Mark Richards and Herbert Kritzer set out to rehabilitate a traditional notion that has fallen into some disfavor and disuse: the idea that judges' decisions are strongly influenced by law and precedent. With the rise of the "attitudinal model," judges' ideological perspectives and policy preferences have come to the fore in analyses of judicial decision making, and judges' understandings of the law sometimes seem to matter hardly at all. By contrast, in "Jurisprudential Regimes in Supreme Court Decision Making" Richards and Kritzer outline and test a law-and-precedent based account. In the process, they suggest a new way, manifested by the concept of "jurisprudential regimes," of thinking about how legal precedents shape the decisions of America's highest are reviled in every corner of the globe and from every ideological direction, though for altogether different (and sometimes contradictory) reasons. The image of bureaucracy that motivates Rui de Figueiredo's "Electoral Competition, Political Uncertainty, and Policy Insulation" is that of unresponsiveness. In this article, Figueiredo challenges the widely held view that political uncertainty motivates elected officials to insulate agencies from outside pressures and political opponents. Supplementing the tools of formal modeling with illustrative case studies, Figueiredo illuminates the limits of the uncertainty-based approach and posits new ways of understanding bureaucracies and their foibles.

The next two articles in this issue focus on the bureaucratic sector—and more specifically, on why bureaucracies are so, well, bureaucratic. Bureaucracies

Unresponsiveness, the face of bureaucracy examined by Figueiredo, is one thing. Death and destruction, the subject matter of William Weaver and Thomas Longoria's analysis of bureaucracy, are something else again. In "Bureaucracy That Kills: Federal Sovereign Immunity and the Discretionary Function Exception," Weaver and Longoria focus on a seemingly innocuous but potentially lethal provision of the Federal Tort Claims Act, the "discretionary function exception." The authors trace numerous cases of damage, injury, and death to this provision, which they unflinchingly characterize as "an anachronism sandwiched into an ideal" that is "at war with justice." Following an historical review of the normative and legal issues concerning sovereign immunity, Weaver and Longoria use data drawn from hundreds of federal circuit court decisions to buttress their historical-legal interpretation. Their article can be read as a case study in what Hannah Arendt called "the banality of evil," and their conclusions have important implications concerning the operation of judicial oversight of government agencies and the achievement of justice.

A much more upbeat message about the effects of governmental policies and programs is conveyed by Suzanne Mettler in "Bringing the State Back In to Civic Engagement: Policy Feedback Effects of the G.I. Bill for World War II Veterans." The "golden age" of civic engagement in the United States was the post-World War II era, when millions of Americans were direct beneficiaries of massive government social programs most notably, the G.I. Bill. Could it be, Mettler wonders, that such programs helped foster civic engagement by enhancing their beneficiaries' senses of belongingness or reciprocity? Mettler not only presents a close, multimethod analysis of the long-term impact of the G.I. Bill on citizen participation, but does so within a framework that should open up opportunities for parallel analyses of the effects of other government programs in other contexts.

Among students of American politics, debate rages about the role of party in legislative politics, with one side portraying legislators as self-interested actors whose behavior is affected only incidentally by partisanship, and the other viewing parties as an important, or even a central, influence on the behavior of legislators. The normal focus of this debate is Congress. However, in "The Influence of Party: Evidence from the State Legislatures," Gerald Wright and

Brian Schaffner change the venue to state legislatures, following the often-heard but seldom-observed recommendation to treat states as "laboratories" or empirical testing grounds. Using what students of comparative politics will recognize as a "most similar systems" design, Wright and Schaffner match two neighboring states, Kansas and Nebraska, which have many features in common and a great difference as well: Nebraska's legislature, unlike its counterpart in Kansas, is nonpartisan. What Wright and Schaffner discover about the ideological structure of the two legislatures speaks directly to a scholarly controversy that has proven difficult to resolve when attention is confined to Congress, but also speaks more broadly to ongoing public debates about the role of parties in democratic systems.

lished in this issue is Kim Fridkin Kahn and Patrick Kenney's analysis of the outputs of the "fourth branch of government," the press. Over the course of the twentieth century, the norm of "objective" news coverage of political campaigns and controversies gradually diffused. Nonetheless, many politicians, pundits, journalists, and members of the general public continue to lambaste the media, not for taking strong political stands per se, but for permitting their political preferences to shape their news coverage. Such criticism of the media poses a direct challenge to what is supposed to be a saving grace of modern journalism, the "wall of separation" between news and editorial content. How high is that wall? That is the question that Kahn and

Kenney ask in "The Slant of the News: How Editorial

Endorsements Influence Campaign Coverage and Citizens' Views of Candidates," a calm attempt to address a heated issue that divides critics and defenders of the media. In addition to providing content-analytic evidence that weighs heavily on one side of the debate.

Kahn and Kenney introduce survey-based evidence that their answer matters in terms of election outcomes.

Completing the institutional focus of the articles pub-

INSTRUCTIONS TO CONTRIBUTORS

General Considerations

The APSR strives to publish scholarly research of exceptional merit, focusing on important issues and demonstrating the highest standards of excellence in conceptualization, exposition, methodology, and craftsmanship. Because the APSR reaches a diverse audience of scholars and practitioners, authors must demonstrate how their analysis illuminates a significant research problem, or answers an important research question, of general interest in political science. For the same reason, authors must strive for a presentation that will be understandable to as many scholars as possible, consistent with the nature of their material.

The APSR publishes original work. Therefore, authors should not submit articles containing tables, figures, or substantial amounts of text that have already been published or are forthcoming in other places, or that have been included in other manuscripts submitted for review to book publishers or periodicals (including on-line journals). In many such cases, subsequent publication of this material would violate the copyright of the other publisher. The APSR also does not consider papers that are currently under review by other journals or duplicate or overlap with parts of larger manuscripts that have been submitted to other publishers (including publishers of both books and periodicals). Submission of manuscripts substantially similar to those submitted or published elsewhere, or to part of a book or other larger work, is also strongly discouraged. If you have any questions about whether these policies apply in your particular case, you should discuss any such publications related to a submission in a cover letter to the Editor. You should also notify the Editor of any related submissions to other publishers, whether for book or periodical publication, that occur while a manuscript is under review by the APSR and which would fall within the scope of this policy. The Editor may request copies of related publications.

If your manuscript contains quantitative evidence and analysis, you should describe your procedures in sufficient detail to permit reviewers to understand and evaluate what has been done and, in the event that the article is accepted for publication, to permit other scholars to carry out similar analyses on other data sets. For example, for surveys, at the least, sampling procedures, response rates, and question wordings should be given; you should calculate response rates according to one of the standard formulas given by the American Association for Public Opinion Research, Standard Definitions: Final Dispositions of Case Codes and Outcome Rates for RDD Telephone Surveys and In-Person Household Surveys (Ann Arbor, MI: AAPOR, 1998). This document is available on the Internet at http://www.aapor.org/ethics/stddef.html. For experiments, provide full descriptions of experimental protocols, methods of subject recruitment and selection, subject payments and debriefing procedures, and so on. Articles should be self-contained, so you should not simply refer readers to other publications for descriptions of these basic research procedures.

Please indicate variables included in statistical analyses by capitalizing the first word in the variable name and italicizing the entire variable name the first time each is mentioned in the text. You should also use the same names for variables in text and tables and, wherever possible, should avoid the use of acronyms and computer abbreviations when discussing variables in the text. All variables appearing in tables should have been mentioned in the text and the reason for their inclusion discussed.

As part of the review process, you may be asked to submit additional documentation if procedures are not sufficiently clear; the review process works most efficiently if such information is given in the initial submission. If you advise readers that additional information is available, you should submit printed copies of that information with the manuscript. If the amount of this supplementary information is extensive, please inquire about alternate procedures.

The APSR uses a double-blind review process. You should follow the guidelines for preparing anonymous copies in the Specific Procedures section below.

Manuscripts that are largely or entirely critiques or commentaries on previously published articles will be reviewed using the same general procedures as for other manuscripts, with one exception. In addition to the usual number of reviewers, such manuscripts will also be sent to the scholar(s) whose work is being criticized, in the same anonymous form that they are sent to reviewers. Comments from the original author(s) to the Editor will be invited as a supplement to the advice of reviewers. This notice to the original author(s) is intended (1) to encourage review of the details of analyses or research procedures that might escape the notice of disinterested reviewers; (2) to enable prompt publication of critiques by supplying criticized authors with early notice of their existence and, therefore, more adequate time to reply; and (3) as a courtesy to criticized authors. If you submit such a manuscript, you should therefore send as many additional copies of their manuscripts as will be required for this purpose.

Manuscripts being submitted for publication should be sent to Lee Sigelman, Editor, American Political Science Review, Department of Political Science, The George Washington University, 2201 G Street N.W., Room 507, Washington, DC 20052. Correspondence concerning manuscripts under review may be sent to the same address or e-mailed to apsr@gwu.edu.

Manuscript Formatting

Manuscripts should not be longer than 45 pages including text, all tables and figures, notes, references, and appendices. This page size guideline is based on the  $\overline{\text{U.S.}}$  standard 8.5  $\times$  11-inch paper; if you are submitting a manuscript printed on longer paper, you must adjust accordingly. The font size must be at least 11 points for all parts of the paper, including notes and references. The entire paper, including notes and references, must be double-spaced, with the sole exception of tables for which double-spacing would require a second page otherwise not needed. All pages should be numbered in one sequence, and text should be formatted using a normal single column no wider than 6.5 inches, as is typical for manuscripts (rather than the double-column format of the published version of the APSR), and printed on one side of the page only. Include an abstract of no more than 150 words. The APSR style of embedded citations should be used, and there must be a separate list of references at the end of the manuscript. Do not use notes for simple citations. These specifications are designed to make it easier for reviewers to read and evaluate papers. Papers not adhering to these guidelines are subject to being rejected without review.

Use endnotes rather than footnotes; again, like all other text, endnotes are to be double-spaced and in 11-point font. Place tables and figures (on separate pages and only one to a page) at the back of the manuscript with standard indications of text placement, e.g., [Table 3 about here]. If your paper is accepted for publication, you will be required to submit cameraready copy of graphs or other types of figures. Instructions will be provided.

For specific formatting style of citations and references, please refer to articles in the most recent issue of the APSR. For unusual style or formatting issues, you should consult the latest edition of The Chicago Manual of Style. For review purposes, citations and references need not be in specific APSR format, although some generally accepted format should be used, and all citation and reference information should be provided.

Specific Procedures

Please follow these specific procedures for submission:

- 1. You are invited to submit a list of scholars who would be appropriate reviewers of your manuscript. The Editor will refer to this list in selecting reviewers, though there obviously can be no guarantee that those you suggest will actually be chosen. Do not list anyone who has already commented on your paper or an earlier version of it, or any of your current or recent collaborators, institutional colleagues, mentors, students, or close friends.
- 2. Submit five copies of manuscripts and a diskette containing the word-processed version of the manuscript. Please ensure that the paper and diskette versions you submit are identical; the diskette version should be of the anonymous copy (see below). Please review all pages of all copies to make sure that all copies contain all tables, figures, appendices, and bibliography mentioned in the manuscript and that all pages are legible. Label the diskette clearly with the (first) author's name and the title of the manuscript (in abridged form if need be), and identify the word processing program and operating system.
- 3. To comply with the APSR's procedure of double-blind peer reviews, only one of the five copies submitted should be fully identified as to authorship and four should be in anonymous format.
- For anonymous copies, if it is important to the development of the paper that your previous publications be cited, please do this in a way that does not make the authorship of the submitted paper obvious. This is usually most easily accomplished by referring to yourself in the third person and including normal references to the work cited in the list of references. In no circumstances should your prior publications be included in the bibliography in their normal alphabetical location but with your name deleted. Assuming that text references to your previous work are in the third person, you should include full citations as usual in the bibliography. Please discuss the use of other procedures to render manuscripts anonymous with the Editor prior to submission. You should not thank colleagues in notes or elsewhere in the body of the paper or mention institution names, web page addresses, or other potentially identifying information. All acknowledgments must appear on the title page of the identified copy only. Manuscripts that are judged not anonymous will not be reviewed.

5. The first page of the four anonymous copies should contain only the title and an abstract of no more than 150 words. The first page of the identified copy should contain (a) the name, academic rank. institutional affiliation, and contact information (mailing address, telephone, fax, e-mail address) for all authors; (b) in the case of multiple authors. an indication of the author who will receive correspondence; (c) any relevant citations to your previous work that have been omitted from the anonymous copies; and (d) acknowledgments, including the names of anyone who has provided comments on the manuscript. If the identified copy contains any unique references or is worded differently in any way, please mark this copy with "Contains author citations" at the top of the first page.

No copies of submitted manuscripts can be returned.

ELECTRONIC ACCESS TO THE APSR

Back issues of the APSR are available in several electronic formats and through several vendors. Except for the last three years (as an annually "moving wall"), back issues of the APSR beginning with Volume 1, Number 1 (November 1906), are available on-line through JSTOR (http://wwwjstor.org/). At present, JSTOR's complete journal collection is available only via institutional subscription, e.g., through many college and university libraries. For APSA members who do not have access to an institutional subscription to JSTOR, individual subscriptions to its APSR content are available. Please contact Member Services at APSA for further information, including annual subscription fees.

Individual members of the American Political Science Association can access recent issues of the APSR and PS through the APSA website (www.apsanet.org) with their username and password. Individual nonmember access to the online edition will also be available, but only through institutions that hold either a print-plus-electronic subscription or an electronic-only subscription, provided the institution has registered and activated its online subscription.

Full text access to current issues of both the APSR and PS is also available on-line by library subscription from a number of database vendors. Currently, these include University Microfilms Inc. (UMI) (via its CD-ROMs General Periodicals Online and Social Science Index and the on-line database ProQuest Direct), Online Computer Library Center (OCLC) (through its on-line database First Search as well as on CD-ROMs and magnetic tape), and the Information Access Company (IAC) (through its products Expanded Academic Index, InfoTrac, and several on-line services [see below]). Others may be added from time to time.

The APSR is also available on databases through six online services: Datastar (Datastar), Business Library (Dow Jones), Cognito (IAC), Encarta Online Library (IAC), IAC Business (Dialog), and Newsearch (Dialog).

The editorial office of the APSR is not involved in the subscription process to either JSTOR for back issues or the other vendors for current issues. Please contact APSA, your reference librarian, or the database vendor for further information about availability.

BOOK REVIEWS

All books for review should be sent directly to the APSR Book Review Editors, Susan Bickford and Greg McAvoy. The address is Susan Bickford and Gregory McAvoy, American Political Science Review Book Review Editors, Department of Political Science, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, CB No. 3265, Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3265. E-mail: bickford@email.unc.edu; gemcavoy@uncg.edu.

If you are the author of a book you wish to be considered for review, please ask your publisher to send a copy to the APSR Book Review Editors per the mailing instructions above. If you are interested in reviewing books for the APSR, please send your vita to the Book Review Editors; you should not ask to review a specific book.

OTHER CORRESPONDENCE

The American Political Science Association's address, telephone, and fax are 1527 New Hampshire Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036, (202) 483-2512 (voice), and (202) 483-2657 (fax). E-mail: apsa@apsanet.org. Please direct correspondence as follows.

Information, including news and notes, for PS:

Dr. Robert J-P. Hauck, Editor, PS E-mail: rhauck@apsanet.org

Circulation and subscription correspondence (domestic claims for nonreceipt of issues must be made within four months of the month of publication; overseas claims, within eight months):

Elizabeth Weaver Engel, Director of Member Services

E-mail: membership@apsanet.org Reprint permissions:

Ed Lamb

E-mail: elamb@apsanet.org

Advertising information and rates:

Laura Barrantes, Advertising Manager E-mail: lbarrantes@apsanet.org

EXPEDITING REQUESTS FOR COPYING APSR AND PS ARTICLES FOR CLASS USE AND OTHER PURPOSES

Class Use

The Comprehensive Publisher Photocopy Agreement between APSA and the Copyright Clearance Center (CCC) permits bookstores and copy centers to receive expedited clearance to copy articles from the APSR and PS in compliance with the Association's policies and applicable fees. The general fee for articles is 75 cents per copy. However, current Association policy levies no fee for the first 10 copies of a printed artide, whether in course packs or on reserve. Smaller classes that rely heavily on articles (i.e., upper-level undergraduate and graduate classes) can take advantage of this provision, and faculty ordering 10 or fewer course packs should bring it to the attention of course pack providers. APSA policy also permits free use of the electronic library reserve, with no limit on the number of students who can access the electronic reserve. Both large and small classes that rely on these articles can take advantage of this provision. The CCC's address, telephone, and fax are 222 Rosewood Drive, Danvers, MA 01923, (978) 750-8400 (voice), and (978) 750-4474 (fax). This agreement pertains only to the reproduction and distribution of APSA materials as hard copies (e.g., photocopies, microfilm, and microfiche).

The Association of American Publishers (AAP) has created a standardized form for college faculty to submit to a copy center or bookstore to request copyrighted material for course packs. The form is available through the CCC, which will handle copyright permissions.

APSA also has a separate agreement pertaining to CCC's Academic E-Reserve Service. This agreement allows electronic access for students and instructors of a designated class at a designated institution for a specified article or set of articles in electronic format. Access is by password for the duration of a class.

Please contact your librarian, the CCC, or the APSA Reprints Department for further information.

APSR Authors

If you are the author of an APSR article, you may use your article in course packs or other printed materials without payment of royalty fees and you may post it at personal or institutional web sites as long as the APSA copyright notice is included.

Other Uses of APSA-Copyrighted Materials

For any further copyright issues, please contact the APSA Reprints Department.

INDEXING

Articles appearing in the APSR before June 1953 were indexed in The Reader's Guide to Periodical Literature. Current issues are indexed in ABC Pol Sci; America, History and Life 1954—; Book Review Index; Current Contents: Social and Behavioral Sciences; EconLit; Energy Information Abstracts; Environmental Abstracts; Historical Abstracts; Index of Economic Articles; Information Service Bulletin; International Index; International Political Science Abstracts; the Journal of Economic Literature; Periodical Abstracts; Public Affairs; Recently Published Articles; Reference

9

Sources; Social Sciences and Humanities Index; Social Sciences Index; Social Work Research and Abstracts; and Writings on American History. Some of these sources may be available in electronic form through local public or educational libraries. Microfilm of the APSR, beginning with Volume 1, and the index of the APSR through 1969 are available through University Microfilms Inc., 300 North Zeeb Road, Ann Arbor, MI 48106 (www.umi.com). The Cumulative Index to the American Political Science Review, Volumes 63 to 89: 1969–95, is available through the APSA.

The Philosophic Importance of Political Life: On the "Digression" in Plato's Theaetetus

PAUL STERN Ursinus College

The reassessment of Plato's stance toward democracy has made his understanding of the relation-ship between philosophy and politics a salient issue. To gain clarity on this issue, I examine the central passage of Plato's Theaetetus, which treats the conflict between the philosopher and the orator-politician. Located in a dialogue devoted to the meaning of knowledge and often dismissed as a digression, the passage has received relatively scant attention regarding this issue. A careful consideration of the passage and its context, however, shows that the question of the meaning of knowledge requires a consideration of the more comprehensive question of good and that this question is properly investigated through an examination of political life. Socrates thus focuses on politics not to guide political life but rather to vindicate the philosophic life. An appreciation of this motive should inform reflection concerning Plato's view of the relationship between philosophy and politics.

ow should philosophy guide politics? The recent scholarly reassessment of Plato's disposi-Ltion toward democracy has once again made this a salient question. This reassessment rejects the portrayal of Plato as an inveterate enemy of democracy, concluding instead that he is "engaged in a fruitful dialogue with democracy" (Ober 1998, 158).<sup>2</sup> The goal of this revision is not, however, simply to set the historical record straight. It also holds out the possibility that Platonic philosophy might provide guidance concerning the nourishment of our own democratic practices.<sup>3</sup> But if we are to seek such guidance about specific democratic practices, we should first be clear regarding Plato's understanding of the scope and aim of philosophy's guidance of politics in general. We need to ask, How does Plato think philosophy should guide politics? I provide an approach to this large and vexing question by considering why, in Plato's view, the philosopher takes an interest in politics at all.

My consideration of this issue focuses on a dialogue not usually regarded as bearing on Plato's political philosophy—the Theaetetus. The Theaetetus initiates the octet of dialogues through which Plato weaves the story of Socrates' indictment, trial, and execution.<sup>4</sup> The most general issue of the trial, the conflict between the political life and the philosophic, recurs throughout the octet, but it is nowhere more explicit than in the central passage of this initial dialogue of the drama. Yet, because of its anomalous context, this passage has, until recently, received less attention than it deserves.<sup>5</sup> Its practical theme seems to spring up abruptly from an intensely abstract discussion between Socrates and two mathematicians concerning the meaning, and even possibility, of knowledge. And its confident praise of the philosophic life sits uneasily in the heart of this most skeptical of dialogues (Benardete 1986, ix). In fact, Socrates himself identifies the passage as a digression (Theaetetus 177b8).6 As a result, those interested in the epistemic issues of the dialogue often skip over this central passage, while students of political philosophy concentrate on discussions of its theme that occur in more obviously political contexts.<sup>7</sup> I suggest, however, that we regard this unusual context as an invitation to consider the conflict underlying Socrates' trial from an alternative perspective. Plato often portrays Socrates' attempts to open nascent politicians' minds to the benefits of philosophic activity. But in the Theaetetus Socrates aims to turn theorists' minds to politics rather than politicians' to theory. With this aim, he focuses not on the practical needs motivating his consideration of political life but on the theoretically required rationale that led him, unlike his predecessors. to see philosophic importance in political life.

Paul Stern is Professor of Politics, Ursinus College, Collegeville, PA 19426 (pstern @ursinus.edu).

I am grateful to the Earhart Foundation for its support of my research through a Fellowship Research Grant. I would also like to thank the Ursinus College Faculty Development Committee for its support.

&lt;sup>1</sup> This scholarly reassessment includes works by Euben (1997), Mara (1997), Monoson (2000), Rocco (1997), Saxonhouse (1996, 1998), and Wallach (2001).

&lt;sup>2</sup> This characterization is applicable as well to the authors mentioned in footnote 1. But see also Saxonhouse 1996, 90, 112. On the conventional view of Plato's Socrates vis-à-vis democracy, see Saxonhouse 1996, 87–90, and Monoson 2000, 13–4.

&lt;sup>3</sup> For example, see Euben 1997, 30, 208; Monoson 2000, 237–83; Rocco 2001, 103; and Wallach 2001, 1–2, 391–2.

&lt;sup>4</sup> The octet comprises Theaetetus, Euthyphro, Cratylus, Sophist, Statesman, Apology of Socrates, Crito, and Phaedo.

&lt;sup>5</sup> Articles by Hemmenway (1990) and Rue (1993) are the exceptions to this long-standing neglect. I have benefited from their perceptive analyses of this passage.

&lt;sup>6</sup> References to the Theaetetus are hereafter by Stephanus page only. The Greek text is Burnet 1979. The translation is by Benardete (1986).

Among commentators that consider the central passage as purely digressive, Schleiermacher (1973, 197-8) sees it as providing reassurance that, despite the skepticism of the dialogue, the stable Platonic world remains firmly in place. Cornford (1935, 83), McDowell (1973, 174), and (despite some differences with Cornford) Cooper (1990, 81-5) believe that it provides the more specific reassurance that, contrary to what immediately precedes the digression, Plato does think that there are permanent standards of justice, beauty, and piety. But, according to McDowell, to make this point at length would have taken Plato "too far afield from the original topic of perception" the "digression" thus contains material "which in a modern book might be served by footnotes or an appendix" (1973, 174). Burnyeat maintains that the digression has the moral function of reminding us how important knowledge is for the way we live our lives. But, contrary to the argument of the present essay, he concludes that it "does not contribute to the main inquiry" (1990, 36).

This rationale emerges from a conversation with Theodorus and Theaetetus—and looming behind them, the figure of Protagoras-two mathematicians whose theorizing is so abstract, so lacking in self-awareness, that it leaves them unable to defend their theoretical activity as either possible or desirable. In responding to the groundlessness of their position, Plato's Socrates treats another question that remains vital. As thinkers at least since Nietzsche have recognized, the failure to place theoretical inquiry in its practical, human context leaves it defenseless when, perhaps inevitably, the good of this often disruptive activity is doubted. But a question remains regarding how this human context should be understood. What exactly is the practical, pretheoretical basis out of which theory derives its justification? The Theaetetus compels this still vital question precisely by showing why the dialogue's theoretical theme necessarily requires a consideration of the digression's practical theme. In particular, as I argue, the dialogue shows that the issue of the meaning of knowledge resides within the more comprehensive context of the issue of human good. The digression is thus not a digression at all but a culmination of the issue that precedes it. 9 And, I argue further, the "digression" itself responds to this question with its explanation of why the issue of human good is best investigated through a consideration of political life. It is this investigation that ultimately vindicates theoretical inquiry, especially philosophic inquiry. Understood in the setting of the dialogue, then, the central passage of the Theaetetus deserves our careful attention because here we learn why that inquiry into politics, which culminates in Socrates' trial and execution, was and is a philosophic and not simply a political necessity.<sup>10</sup> Appreciating Plato's response to this question, we will better understand Plato's view of the relationship between philosophy and politics.

THE CONTEXT OF THE "DIGRESSION"

Theories of Knowledge and One's Own Good

What connection exists between the meaning and possibility of knowledge, on the one hand, and the examination of conflicting ways of life, on the other? The explicitly digressive character of the Theaetetus' central passage places this puzzle right on the surface of the dialogue. Like nearly all subsequent commentators, Socrates' interlocutors simply accept his characterization of the central passage as a digression. But Socrates' conversation with Theodorus and Theaetetus reveals a necessary link between these apparently disparate themes. Paradoxically, that link emerges most clearly from his interlocutors' efforts to obscure it.

Socrates' conversation with Theaetetus began as an examination of Theaetetus' soul but had quickly become an examination of the more abstract question, What is knowledge? (145b6–7, 145e9). Socrates linked Theaetetus' suggestion that knowledge is perception to Protagoras' famous claim that (each) man is the measure of all things. The idiosyncratic character of perception provides the connection. Specifically, insofar as perception is individual, each perceiving through his or her own eyes and ears, each necessarily becomes the measure of the beings. Socrates proceeded to radicalize this thought, maintaining that if knowledge is perception, and each act of perception is unique, then we cannot know of stable beings, including human beings.<sup>11</sup> Rather, each perception is one in a series of unrepeatable events, each occupying a unique set of spatiotemporal coordinates, as the ever-changing perceiver makes contact with the ever-changing perceivable. Socrates finally arrives at a thoroughgoing relativism based on universal flux, a thesis associated with the philosopher, Heracleitus, but that Socrates traces ultimately to the poet, Homer (153a2).

Having constructed this thesis, Socrates then raises this objection to it: The thesis dissolves anything distinctly human because it provides no standard by which to distinguish between human and nonhuman perceptions, much less among human perceptions. To sharpen this objection, Socrates addresses the thesis's bearing on intelligence or phronesis, claiming that it leaves Protagoras indistinguishable from a tadpole "in point of intelligence (phronesis)" (161d1). Phronesis refers here to that cognitive capacity by which an individual judges the goodness of his or her way of life. 12 And in these passages leading up to the "digression," Socrates focuses on the tension between Protagoras' theory and Protagoras' view of his own good. For example, Socrates wonders how, if Protagoras' thesis is true, he could actually "claim for himself that he justly deserves to be the teacher—with great wages—of everyone else" (161d8-e1). He also worries about his own activity because if the thesis is true, "the entire business of conversation is also open to ridicule" (161e5-6). Thus, well in advance of the "digression," Socrates' objection in

<sup>12</sup> For Plato, this capacity also involves a theoretical understanding, knowing how things are in general.

<sup>8</sup> See Gadamer 1988, xi-xii, 214-74; Heidegger 1973, 32-5, 98-9, 122-49; Husserl 1965, 83-7, 119-20, 280-2, 295; Husserl 1970, 315-34; and Nietzsche 1989, 9-32.

&lt;sup>9</sup> For the sake of convenience I continue to refer to the digression but I place it in quotes to express my judgment on this characterization. <sup>10</sup> Euben (1997, 85), Rocco (1997, 113), and Wallach (2001, 6, 9, 24–5, 33) regard Plato's political philosophy as a response to political dilemmas in Athens. My own view is closer to that of Mara (1997, 159–60, 173–4) in seeing a philosophic rationale for Socrates' interest in politics. On this point see, especially, Strauss 1989, 126. This is not to deny that, as Saxonhouse writes, "Socrates is a creature of democracy and no other regime" (1996, 91). But this judgment does not yet explain why Plato's Socrates found philosophic interest in political life.

&lt;sup>11</sup> Socrates confronts Theaetetus with the most radical version of this doctrine, repeatedly inducing him to undermine any distinction that would preserve the possibility of stability on the side of the beings or objective judgment on the part of the knower. As Modrak (1981, 38–9) points out, the resulting phenomenalism does not necessarily undermine the possibility of stable objects of perception, but Socrates lets such an impression stand. Socrates' procedure has generated controversy over whether he actually holds this radical view of perception. See Burnyeat 1976a, 44–54, Cooper 1970, 123–46, and Modrak 1981, 41–8, on one such controversy. I believe that Socrates' transparent neglect of these distinctions aims to raise questions about the tenability of the extreme version of the Protagorean thesis, moving the reader to ask what the attraction of such a dubious doctrine might be.

the name of phronesis relates the issue of knowledge to this very practical question: How can Protagoras, or Socrates, or anyone justify his or her chosen way of life on the basis of Protagoras' theory?

This practical context is also evident in Socrates' subsequent speech, where he impersonates Protagoras to defend him. He thus invites his interlocutors to confront not only Protagoras' theory, but Protagoras himself as an embodied human being facing the question of the good of his chosen way of life. Speaking as "Protagoras," Socrates again endorses the flux doctrine in its most extreme form. On the basis of this endorsement "Protagoras" (notably now speaking of opinion as well as perception) denies that one individual's opinion can be truer than another's, each being the measure. 13 But, he maintains, one opinion can nevertheless be better than another. "Protagoras" wisdom—for which he "deserves a lot of money"—consists precisely in the art by which he can change someone's condition so that good things will in fact appear as good (167d1). Yet how can "Protagoras" maintain this distinction between true and good? or, more specifically, How can he maintain both his theory of knowledge and this definition of his art? Among many other difficulties, the theory undermines the very distinction between the true and the apparent good on which the definition depends; it also subverts the possibility, required by the definition, of even speaking of the condition of an individual enduring over time. 14 The manner in which this discrepancy is "reconciled" becomes clear as the speech continues.

Drawing an analogy between his own art and that of the physician, "Protagoras" states that the physician "effects a change by drugs, the sophist by speeches" (167a5-6). But the analogy is imperfect. Clearly, the goods aimed at by the sophist's art, which are said to include the "just and beautiful," are controversial in a way that the good of health is not (167c4-5). To maintain the prestige of his art—wisdom as the power to effectuate good-Protagoras must obscure the potentially controversial character of good. Otherwise, the efficacy, and thus marketability, of his artful wisdom—its status as a technique of providing certain good—becomes dubious. Decoupling good from truth not only obscures but denies the controversial character of good. It renders meaningless the question of whether or not something is truly good. The nature of the reconciliation of Protagoras' theory of knowledge and his art is thus clear: Protagoras' theory subserves the definition of wisdom that defines his practice. His epistemic commitments are formulated to promote his good.

This conclusion is further substantiated in connection with Socrates' focus on the tension within Protagoras' doctrine between the claim that some are wiser than others and the claim that each is "self-sufficient in point of phronesis" (169d5). In opposition to the latter claim, Socrates notes the opinion of "all human beings" that they lack self-sufficiency in phronesis, that some are, indeed, wiser than others insofar as they have a firmer grasp of truth (170a7). As Socrates makes clear. this universal opinion is followed in practice. When faced with danger or illness, we invariably seek those who know better to secure our good (170a9-b1). Yet this universally held opinion places Protagoras in a bind. If he affirms the opinion, the homo mensura thesis is refuted by its content. If he denies it, the thesis is refuted by the implication that some opinions, notably his own, are superior to others. Protagoras could challenge its universality but this would ultimately entail the indefensible claim that no one believes that anyone is wiser than someone else (170c5–d2).

As many commentators have pointed out, however. there does remain one option for Protagoras. In presenting Protagoras' view, Socrates neglected to provide its most self-consistent version. The contradiction, so evident in the version presented, could have been avoided by strict adherence to the claim that all opinions, including Protagoras' own, are true only for each individual. But would Protagoras himself favor this option? His deeds suggest not. Socrates maintains that the living, breathing Protagoras would be a much more vigorous defender of "his own things" than would Socrates and would "disparage our attempt while solemnly upholding his view" (168c4-5, d2-4). And when Socrates has the deceased "Protagoras" pop out of the ground, the late sophist asserts the superiority of his own view and thus contradicts his own radical relativism which maintains that each is the measure (171d1-3). But finally, as Socrates suggests in the conclusion of this argument, Protagoras was the author of a book entitled Truth, which, as such, aims to make a general nonrelative claim about the way things are (171c6). 16 Again, as in his earlier speech, Protagoras sacrifices consistency for the same reason that all human beings seek those who are wiser: seriousness about his good.

This same seriousness is powerfully evident in the words and deeds of Socrates' interlocutors, especially in their attraction to Protagoreanism. Subsequent to the speech of "Protagoras," Socrates makes Theodorus, the senior mathematician, his interlocutor. Theodorus has previously shown great reluctance to join in Socrates'

&lt;sup>13</sup> In his articulation of the Protagorean thesis, Socrates had collapsed all cognitive activities, including speech, into perception. But this reduction is difficult to maintain; to see is to see some thing, a unity available only in speech as a collection of sensuous qualities. On this point see Bolotin 1987, 165–6. Unlike the inherent privacy of perception, opinion is inherently shareable. It is the medium of political life. Accordingly, when speaking of the sophists' treatment of opinion, "Protagoras" brings up "the just and beautiful in the opinion of each city" (167c4–5). On this shift from perception to opinion see Maguire 1973, 118–9.

&lt;sup>14</sup> On the various difficulties with this argument see Cole 1966, 109–12; Cropsey 1996, 40–2; Maguire 1973, 126–30; McDowell 1973, 166–7; and Polansky 1992, 123–7.

&lt;sup>15</sup> Bostock (1988, 89–92), Lee (1973, 244–7), and McDowell (1973, 171) maintain that the omission of the qualifier, "for one," vitiates the argument against Protagoras. For an opposing view consider Burnyeat 1976b, 172–95. Polansky (1992, 131) maintains that both may be right because the argument is self-contradictory. Omitting these qualifiers, I argue, makes the reader question whether anyone, including Protagoras, can actually adhere to this unqualified position, whether, that is, in the very act of speaking as an embodied human one refutes the Protagorean position.

one refutes the Protagorean position.

16 McDowell (1973, 170) recognizes this as an allusion to Protagoras' book.

dialectical mode of investigating through question and answer. Seeking to overcome this reluctance, Socrates throws down this challenge to Theodorus: Should Theodorus accept Protagoras' doctrine he would also have to accept that everyone is as competent as himself in geometry, astronomy, "and everything else in which you are charged with excelling" (169a4-5). This, Theodorus is unwilling to do. He is provoked and charges Socrates with compelling him to "give a logos," a defense of his way of life (169a7). Now, it is clear that Socrates does not press Theodorus so hard because he harbors some hope of converting him to Socratic philosophy at this late date (146b3-4). Rather, Theaetetus and Socrates himself are the intended beneficiaries of this conversation. For both, the benefit derives from Socrates' examination of Theodorus' own Protagoreanism.

It may seem odd that a mathematician, oriented as such on permanent invisible objects, should be drawn to the unceasing flux underlying Protagoreanism. It is hard to see how any objective claims could be made on such a basis. But Theodorus' reluctance to give a logos, to examine the underpinnings of his deepest choices, helps explain the friendship between Theodorus and Protagoras (161b8, 162a4, 168c3, 168e7, 171c8). Protagorean relativism enables the mathematician Theodorus to dismiss the realm of moral and political choice as one of endless and thus fruitless contention, exemplified precisely by the ceaseless questioning of Socrates. Theodorus can use Protagoreanism to carve out a realm of certainty free of the controversies generated by such questions (see Hemmenway 1990, 341–2).

The source of Theodorus' concern for certainty becomes evident in the dilemma Socrates sets before him. Throughout the passage Socrates pummels Theodorus with the aforementioned point: Protagorean relativism goes too far to serve Theodorus' purpose; it cannot be prevented from infecting all of knowledge. Theodorus cannot both adopt a doctrine that renders his view invincible because all views are equal and maintain the superiority of his own knowledge in its pristine certainty. It becomes clear that what moves Theodorus to adopt this untenable position is not so much his devotion to Protagoras' theory as it is his self-concernand a concomitant desire for mastery. Accordingly, in response to Socrates' question—"Don't thousands battle you on each occasion with counteropinions, convinced that you judge and believe what is false?"-Theodorus swears, "Yes, by Zeus, Socrates, it's indeed thousands... and it's they who give me all the trouble that I have from human beings" (170d8-e3). Theodorus wishes knowledge to be unassailable so that he can silence those "thousands" who would challenge his view and, so, dominate his world. 17 So deep is this desire for dominance that he is willing to purchase unassailability at the cost of rendering his own theoretical pursuits indefensible. Socrates' interrogation of Theodorus exhibits the fact that, like Protagoras, Theodorus' epistemic allegiances are shaped by an understanding of his good. It is this understanding that determines what, in his view, counts as knowledge.

Induced by his teacher and by his own inclinations, Theaetetus has also joined his mathematical education with an attraction to Protagorean relativism (152a5). The great desire of this bright, eager student is to find the correct answer, to avoid making a mistake (146c6). Apparently antithetical, both mathematics and Protagoreanism speak to Theaetetus' desire in their shared insistence that unassailable knowledge is immediately available, whether in the rational necessity of mathematics or in the absolute idiosyncrasy of Protagoreanism. 18 Both provide immunity from doubt. Both, in particular, reject the notion that our knowledge must be gained mediately, through ascent from the particular to the general or, to use the language of the dialogue, from "the things nearby" to "the nature of each whole of the things that are" (174a1-2). On the basis of this rejection, Theaetetus can set aside such phenomena as error, falsehood, and opinion, each of which exists because of the incomplete character of that ascent.<sup>19</sup> But in rejecting this ascent from opinion he must also reject that possibility essential to the activity of the teacher and the student, the possibility of learning (145d5–9). This he is willing to do to secure his desire that knowledge be unassailable.

In avoiding the realm of opinion, Theaetetus, like Theodorus, especially wishes to avoid the realm in which he might confront perplexing questions of good. Thus, while he was aware of Socrates' investigations, he avoided Socrates and the dizziness induced by the perplexities of Socratic inquiry (148e2-3). In the portion of the dialogue just prior to the "digression," Socrates shows that the cost of this avoidance is self-contradiction. In Protagoras' case, the selfcontradiction lies in his effort to maintain a view of humanity in general that cannot apply to himself as the individual expressing the view. He attempts to exempt himself from the limits of his individual existence, forgetting or neglecting that he speaks as an embodied individual concerned, as such, with his own good. Such cases of self-contradiction occur throughout the dialogue: The Megarians of the dialogue's prologue, adherents of a philosophical school that denies the reality of potential, discuss whether Theaetetus fulfilled his potential (see Aristotle, Metaphysics 1046b29–1047b2); mathematicians adopt the view that all knowledge is perception with its consequent denial of any stable entities; a teacher and a student adhere to a view that makes impossible an account of learning.

Socrates' aim, however, is not simply to catch his interlocutors in a contradiction. Rather, he means to plumb the meaning of this self-contradiction, to see <sup>17</sup> Certainly, Plato could have portrayed mathematicians motivated by an appreciation of the beauty of mathematics. (There may be a suggestion of this motive at 147d1–148b4.) But in this dialogue Plato has chosen to emphasize the motives that would lead to their attraction to Protagoras.

&lt;sup>18</sup> This position is compared to Cartesian foundationalism by Recharko (1994, 142-3)

Reshotko (1994, 142–3).

19 Thus, a considerable portion of the dialogue is given over to a discussion of the possibility of falsehood.

what it teaches about the soul. By recognizing the mathematicians' adherence to beliefs that make impossible an account of their own mathematical activity—or even of their lives as humans—Socrates can witness the power of the desire for good as it exerts its pull even on those passionately devoted to knowledge. He can also assess the validity of those views that cast doubt on his own, "terrible love" for speeches about the human good (169c1). He can thus better judge whether his way of life is defensible, an outcome that can benefit not only the young Theaetetus but also Socrates.

This defense, however, does not involve an abstraction from the orientation on one's own good. Socrates does not urge his interlocutors to adopt, or even to seek, some view liberated from the question of good. This would be to repeat the same self-forgetting mistake of his interlocutors. To embark upon such a search would be, once again, to forget or neglect, in the manner of Protagoras, that we speak as embodied individuals, concerned as such with our own good. It would be to neglect the human context of theoretical inquiry. For Socrates' point is not simply that one's views of good can affect and even distort one's epistemic commitments. The manifest devotion of his interlocutors to the acquisition of knowledge is intended to tell a broader story. The influence of the view of good on those who most assiduously attempt to avoid it-on one who, in the case of Theaetetus, is indisputably brilliant—suggests that such a view is inalienable; we cannot help but consider the world through the lens of a view of good.<sup>20</sup> For exactly this reason, a careful examination of views of good in relation to knowledge becomes necessary. This at least is the indication of Socrates' own deeds. Far from undertaking a value-free analysis of the meaning and possibility of knowledge, he now examines precisely those views of good that motivate the diverse views of knowledge. The character of Socrates' examination makes clear that the question of good provides the pretheoretical framework within which we seek knowledge and so accounts for what we take knowledge to be. Socrates now also makes clear that this question is best considered through the medium of politics.

The Specific Question of Good in the "Digression"

Admittedly, it is not immediately clear how Socrates' examination of the more comprehensive issue of good might resolve all difficulties. After all, the question of good assumes importance precisely because of the elusiveness of comprehensive certainty; the evaluative perspective from which we view the world can wield such influence because of the uncertainty of our knowledge. But if, as Theodorus and Theaetetus suspect, it proves impossible to acquire certain knowledge of these views of good, then all claims to knowledge will be dubious.

Socrates responds to this concern, but he does so by interrogating the expectation of such certain knowledge rather than by directly providing a comprehensive and certain account of the good. He, in particular, examines the view of good on which this criterion of certainty is based. The deepest strand of this examination involves the issue Socrates now introduces: the character of "the political things," which comprises advantage, on the one hand, and beauty, justice, and piety, on the other (172a1–b2).

Socrates maintains that while Protagoras' homo mensura is appropriate in the realm of taste, when it comes to a good such as health even Protagoras would want to recognize the existence of superior knowledge (171d9-e8). And, according to Socrates, as it is with an individual and health, so it is with a political community and its "advantage" (172a5). By 'advantage' Socrates means, first of all, that which is useful or profitable, distinguishing it from any sense of beauty, justice, and piety. There can be little doubt whether the steps a community has taken to secure the good in this basic sense have been successful; it is not difficult to determine whether or not the community endures and achieves material well-being. About these things even Protagoras "would scarcely have the nerve to assert that whatever a city lays down for itself in the belief they're to its advantage, it's as certain as can be that these things will be to its advantage" (172a8-b2; emphasis added).<sup>21</sup> Socrates thus easily transforms radical Protagoreanism into a modified Protagoreanism that does recognize a good not simply dependent on the view of each. If it were Socrates' goal simply to respond to radical Protagoreanism, he could end the discussion with this conclusion. He continues, however, because his focus is on the view of good that underlies both radical and modified Protagoreanism, the good of advantage.

Good so understood renders the community a means to secure the good that we enjoy as individuals. Like health, the goods of security, dominance, and material gain answer to needs we have as embodied, individuated beings. It is good, understood in this way, as answering to our most basic needs, that first calls forth our desire for knowledge; we do not want to be mistaken regarding our survival (170a9-b1). Error is wellnigh intolerable when it concerns our very existence. But advantage reaches beyond wealth to encompass power and glory in the pursuit of what each wants as an individual: "to have things happen in accordance with the commands of one's own soul" (Laws 687c5–7). It is knowledge understood as certainty that gives the power to accomplish our heart's every desire, to be free of need. 22 The beliefs that the good is advantage and that the touchstone of knowledge is unassailable certainty go hand in hand. Theodorus and Theaetetus, as well as Protagoras, desire to have, or be seen as having, the knowledge that will let them either master the uncertain future or be free of these nagging uncertainties. Again, the question of good provides the framework within which they seek knowledge and so accounts for what they believe knowledge to be. But this means that if our view of good should change, so must the sought-after object of knowledge. In particular, if our good is not properly thought of as advantage, in the sense defined above, then we must also question whether unassailable certainty is properly thought to be the touchstone of knowledge.

On Theaetetus' mathematical achievements see Desjardins 1990, 226, n. 2, 228, n. 4, and the material cited therein.

&lt;sup>21</sup> In his careful consideration of the "digression," Bradshaw (1998, 63–5) argues that its purpose is to use "modified Protagoreanism" to show that the Philosopher's way of life is superior to that of the orator-politician because he more surely achieves what he deems to be his advantage than does the latter. I argue, however, that the "digression" bears not on means but on the end insofar as it raises a question about the very notion of advantage. A significant part of that question involves doubt as to whether the Philosopher (as opposed to Socrates) can in fact attain the end he has in view.

&lt;sup>22</sup> Accordingly, Protagoras considers knowledge as power. See 166d5–167d1.

It is, however, difficult to question advantage. Its solidity stands in marked contrast with the variability of those other constituents of the political things, beauty, justice, and piety. In light of this variability, many conclude about the latter that "none of them is by nature with a being of its own," that they are merely conventional (172b4-5). This conclusion is, in fact, held by "everyone": even those who do "not altogether speak the speech of Protagoras [lead] wisdom in one way or another to this" (172b6-7; emphasis added).<sup>23</sup> In view of the widespread agreement that advantage is the human good, this consensus should not be surprising. If our understanding is expected to provide the certain means to this good, then whatever partakes of the sort of fluctuation evident in the meanings of beauty, justice, and piety must be ruled out as part of the natural human good. As Socrates' remark indicates, the sophist Protagoras is not alone in drawing this conclusion. Nor is Protagorean relativism necessarily required for this outcome; with his introduction of modified Protagoreanism Socrates confirms that Protagoras' relativism is a tool wielded in pursuit of the same view of good underlying conventionalism. This conclusion is thus reached by others oriented on wisdom, others who need not wholly share Protagoras' theoretical orientation. As the "digression" makes clear, these others include Socrates' philosophic predecessors who do share the view of good that leads to this conclusion.

Examining this view of good in the digression, Socrates assesses whether the judgment regarding the conventional status of beauty, justice, and piety does not already presuppose a specific conception of the good. He considers, in other words, whether these constituents of the political things, even in their variability, could be as expressive of our nature and of our good as is advantage.<sup>24</sup> In approaching this question of good predecessors. <sup>24</sup> Following the "digression," Socrates refers to the good things rather than to advantage. See 177d2–3.

<sup>23</sup> On the translation of this line see Burnyeat 1990, 33, n. 41. Cornford (1935, 81–3) and Polansky (1992, 133, n. 86) believe that Socrates is referring to some who go farther than Protagoras in denying any natural basis for the city, including advantage. Burnyeat (1990, 32–3) and McDowell (1973, 172–3) maintain that it refers to some who are less radical in their relativism than Protagoras, applying it only to justice. My view is closer to the latter but differs in maintaining that Socrates is ultimately more interested in conventionalism than in relativism because the former reveals the view of good to which relativism (of whatever degree) is instrumental. His ultimate concern is this understanding of good that is shared by his philosophic predecessors.

through a consideration of the political things, Socrates means not merely to critique Protagoras but ultimately to understand, more clearly than did his predecessors, the character of that knowledge that is the ultimate goal of inquiry. Accordingly, notwithstanding his later characterization of the central passage as a digression, Socrates tells Theodorus, as this central passage begins, that "a greater speech . . . from a lesser speech is overtaking us" (177b8, 172b8-c1).

THE "DIGRESSION"

The Philosopher's Neglect of Politics

The "digression" considers the question of good through a comparison of the life of the Philosopher and the life of the orator–politician. <sup>25</sup> As several commentators have recently shown, in this comparison Socrates not only roundly demeans the orator–politicians, the Philosopher also comes in for his share of ridicule. Specifically, in opposition to his own philosophic concern for that which is good, beautiful, and just, Socrates portrays the Philosopher as otherworldly and apolitical, ignorant or neglectful of the transitory, particular, and trivial affairs of humans. <sup>26</sup> In what follows I focus on this critique of the Philosopher.

The Philosophic life appears in the "digression" as the antithesis of the political life. Those leading these divergent ways of life interpret the exact same phenomena in opposite ways. This difference conduces not only to ridicule but to contempt issuing from both sides (172c8-d2; see also Rue 1993, 84). The opposition is manifest in Socrates' initial distinction between the Philosopher's speech and courtroom oratory. As Socrates remarks to Theodorus, the Philosophers "always have available that which you said—leisure" to speak at whatever length they desire (172d4–5). But the orators who embody the Protagorean doctrine, being swept along in the Heracleitean flow of time, "are always speaking in the press of business—water in its flow is bearing down on them—and there's no room to have their talks about whatever they desire" (172d9-e2).<sup>27</sup> This activity has a deleterious effect on the orators'

&lt;sup>25</sup> The "digression" thus introduces the issue of Socrates' trial. The connection between Socrates' trial and the central passage of the Theaetetus is made most clearly by Hemmenway (1990, 323–46) and Rue (1993, 71–100). They also provide the most sustained discussions of the digression as a critique of non-Socratic philosophy. Berger (1982, 400) and Waymack (1985, 483) make the same general point but without the same degree of detail.

